important to know what our nominally and professionally "good" men are doing for society, and what its most reputable forms contribute to its well-being. It is most important for us to decide whether we are always to be divided into two great camps—plutocrats, aristocrats, intellectuals, brain-workers, and idlers, on the one hand, and manual laborers on the other, neither class knowing anything of its neighbor. Is there to be a reconciling force? Mr. Kennedy says "Yes, it will be the Church, but a very different Church from that which exists to-day." He may be right or wrong in these theses which he nails to the doors of the Adelphi Theatre. I can understand the critics vehemently and angrily disputing the right of the theatre to deal with such things. Indeed, I cannot imagine them taking any other view; because, with one or two exceptions, they have co-operated with the managers to keep the British stage clear of all serious subjects and considerations. But I cannot understand their indifference in such a controversy. It is impossible to call "The Servant in the House" uninteresting. It is not a consistently powerful and moving work. It is a little too stilted, too naïve, too obviously didactic, for that. But it has humor, it has thrilling moments, and through it indubitably moves the awakening force which we call sincerity. In a word, it is not negligible. And yet those dramatic critics of ours, who are preparing to devote scores and hundreds of pages to the new bundle of old stage puzzles and cryptograms which this season will produce, for the most part pass over Mr. Kennedy's play with a word or two of good-natured contempt. It is really very strange.

H. W. M.

Letters to the Editor.

"MAKING THE FOREIGNER PAY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The question raised in your issue of the 6th inst. as to whether the foreigner does or does not pay import duties or any part of them offers little difficulty to men of business who are not blinded by prejudices.

What we buy from the foreigner, upon which a duty is imposed, leaves his country at a net price and is redeemed from the Customs house at that price, with a duty added. If the buyer stipulates that the foreigner shall include the duty in the price, the Customs house takes no cognisance of the transaction; it demands the amount of the duty and frees the goods to the buyer. The transaction is either an isolated one and does not affect the market price of the article, or it is one of many, and thus affects the market price, but the duty does not, in the latter case, escape being paid by the buyer, for only the market price is lowered all round, and the duty charged is less protective than when prices were higher, as it is the level of prices in the selling and in the buying markets respectively which governs the protective nature of a duty—the buying market standing at a level higher than the selling market by the amount of the duty levied.

Let it be assumed that the foreigner pays the duty by a sacrifice in the price he accepts for his goods, exactly equal to the duty to be charged at the port of discharge. The cost to the buyer, after paying the duty at the Customs house, would be precisely what it would have been had no duty been charged, with no necessity for the foreigner to make a duty discount. The home manufacturer would say to the Customs officials: "Thank you for 'nothing.' You allow goods to come in at the old price, and I have no advantage." Yet the duty is received by the Government, thus a duty is not necessarily protective unless it is high enough. A ten per cent. duty, if the foreigner chooses to reduce the price of the goods he sells to us by ten per cent., is not protective in the minutest degree, and it must be increased until it passes the point of price reduction, when it at once ceases to add anything to revenue, and remains an engine for raising prices only, within our shores.

Finally, a business man will ask: What is the country which has a low price for what it sells abroad, and retains the market price, or a high one, for what it consumes at home, except it be a country which is highly protected? There exists no such country which is not a protected one. Then what is gained by buying dearly and selling cheaply, to enable our fellow-citizens to obtain from us high prices for what they make?

Free Trade, as we know it, allows us to buy cheaply, to sell cheaply, and to live cheaply, and a shilling spent on the "Financial Reform Almanac" will give more texts to preach from, and to guide our action by, than any other work now published, as the balance sheets of our principal rivals and our own are there set forth most clearly, and doubts need no longer be entertained as to the wisdom of continuing and strengthening our present policy.—Yours, &c.,

A. GRIMSHAW HAYWOOD.

Blundellsands,

November 8th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your article under this title you represent the writers on economics as dwelling "over-much on the rare instances in which the foreigner pays the tax," and you argue that such instances only occur when, owing to a monopoly of some kind, the foreigner is making profits above the minimum rate at which his countrymen are willing to do business. Is this not a grave admission? You yourself proceed to say that it is "arguable that a tax on petroleum might be borne by the Standard Oil Company and a tax on diamonds by de Beers." Are there not many articles, such as German chemicals (produced by patented or secret processes) and rubber (enjoying the advantages of the present shortage), which are producing exceptional profits? Foreign Chancellors of the Exchequer, you hint, should annex such profits, but if they "neglect their fiscal opportunities," and allow the German manufacturers and the rubber proprietors to pay the dividends they do—fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, or more, per cent.—why, on your showing, should not Mr. Lloyd George ask for his share? If without damage to anyone he can put death duties, increment tax (if they are freeholders), and super-tax (their incomes being sufficient) upon Sir J. Brunner and Dr. Ludwig Mond, "in respect of the values created by the social demand," why does not the Budget include some reasonable claim upon the Standard Oil and the Deutsche Anilin Fabrik and the like? Mr. Hobson's doctrine of superfluity appears to apply to the foreign and the home manufacturer without distinction. Having, like your original correspondent, "Veritas Vincit," a dislike of import or (I will add for myself) any other taxes, I will conclude by begging you to give us another article upon the same text.—Yours, &c.,

November 9th, 1909.

E. C.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am an author, and have published one of my books on commission. It sells in this country at x shillings net; but for copies sold in the United States I get exactly half that sum. The difference is accounted for by the cost of freight, the American middleman's profit, and the American import duty. I, the exporter, pay that duty, as I know to my cost. What, then, becomes of your contention that the consumer pays? Moreover, I do not pay the duty direct: it is deducted from the amount paid to me by the American importers. This, I think, answers your objection that if it was the foreigner who paid, "his payment would take shape in foreign goods, which Protectionists say they want to keep out." Is not the duty always paid in the form of a diminution of the price received by the exporter?—Yours, &c.,

MORRIS JOSEPH.

Gloucester Terrace, Hyde Park,

November 9th, 1909.

[Mr. Joseph's letter serves well to illustrate, not to refute, the reasoning of our article. We there adduced conclusive evidence to show that, so far as ordinary trade is concerned, the exporter does not suffer any diminution of his price. But where a monopolist fixes his own price, it might in theory be possible for a foreign Government to tax him. An author, to the degree of the originality appertaining to his book, is a monopolist.—ED., NATION.]

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Balfour may or may not succeed in "broadening the basis of taxation," but he has undoubtedly enlarged the vocabulary of criticism. It will hardly be a breach of the canons of controversy if I characterise the Tariff Reform cry, "Tax the Foreigner" as a "frigid and calculated lie," or as "base coin put into legitimate circulation." From every platform this fiction is repeated, in the hope that people will be gulled, but there is not a Tariff Reform speaker so ignorant as to believe it. What he means is, "Tax foreign goods," but he forgets to tell the people that they are taxing themselves, and it would not help his case if he were to argue that there is not a single economist but has discovered, after microscopical examination, some exceptional case, which, while it proves the larger rule, supports the platform fiction. The practical man of business may be excused if he forgets, because he never encounters them in experience, some of the theories he learned at school, and looks on these questions in the light of everyday happenings.

As one such, I should like to add my experience to that of those whom you quote in your timely article on this subject. I am only a small operator, and my trade with and in protected countries, colonial and foreign, amounts, roughly, to £400,000. In no single instance where I make a sale do I fail to add to the price of the goods the cost of packing, inland freight, &c., leaving in no case less than the price I obtain at home for the same goods. The purchaser pays freight and his own duties. I have scores of competitors, and their practice is the same as mine.

In certain markets I have to sell in the currency of the country, and to the cost of my goods I have to add the duties, freight, &c., and a reasonable profit on these expenses in addition. This profit comes back to me in a form that may figure in the imports as boots and shoes from America, or millinery from France. It goes to swell the excess of imports, which is the bête noire of Tariff Reformers, but to me is, Thank God!

We talk of a 10 per cent. tariff. Take even that impossible rate. What will this 10 per cent. amount to by the time it reaches the user? The distributing importer must have just the same profit on the duty that he has on the goods. Ten per cent. means at least 15 per cent. by the time it reaches the consumer, and who is foolish enough to believe that we would stop at 10 per cent.?

All this on the supposition that goods will come in just as at present—but will they?—and if not, what goes? Revenue first, then trade. Fifty per cent. of the £140,000,000 of manufactured and partly manufactured goods coming into this country constitute the raw material of certain industries. Much of it is re-exported after the expenditure of labor. The duty would kill that trade, and in many cases climatic conditions and conditions of labor—apart altogether from higher or lower wages—would make it impossible to replace the imported goods with home products.

Another phase of the question seldom mentioned is worth notice. If, as is so ardently desired by the Tariff Reformers, imports are reduced and foreign indebtedness can no longer be liquidated by merchandise, exchange will rise, and will have the same effect as an additional tariff against our goods. The return from foreign investments, except when payable in London, will also be reduced by the cost of remittance.

Lastly, I am thoroughly convinced, from my own experience, that one of the main causes of unemployment is the agitation for Tariff Reform. It is paralysing industry and putting a stop to legitimate enterprise and expansion. My trade would justify fresh plant and increased facilities for production, but here is an agitation for a complete reversal of our fiscal policy, which, if successful, will lead us nobody knows where. One thing nobody disputes—it will increase the cost of production, and this will shut me out of some of the markets into which I now get by the skin of my teeth.

Can I take the risk, and gamble on the defeat of the agitation? Apply the same to the shipping trade, and you can account for almost all the depression in the shipbuilding industry.—Yours, &c.,

MANUFACTURER.

Glasgow, November 9th, 1909.

LIBERAL WOMEN AND THE SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—“What cause, however great,” asks Mr. Holford Knight, “could displace in the public mind the Budget and the Constitution?” I will answer—Justice. Liberal voters like myself cannot prevent a Liberal caucus from forcing on certain constituencies gentlemen like Dr. Massie, who preach that political society is based not on justice, but on force; still, by refusing to vote for them, we shall prove our loyalty alike to Liberalism and Christian civilisation. Our case is admirably pleaded in the last issue of THE NATION. “A State (and likewise a party) which implicitly declares that it is not strong enough or wise enough to stand upon right, has ipso facto abandoned its moral claim upon the respect and obedience of the people.”

All gratitude to the Women's Liberal Federation, which, as far as in it lies, is saving the honor of Liberalism!—Yours, &c.,

A LIBERAL VOTER.

Devonshire Club,

October 27th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I think your correspondent, Kate Chandler, is somewhat unjust to those members of the Women's Liberal Federation who have faithfully and loyally worked for their party during the last four years. These women think with your correspondent that they should count themselves Liberals first, and women afterwards, and they proved themselves to be “politicians” long before the advent of the militant Suffragists. They are, however, still awaiting the settlement of their just claims, and some of them are beginning to realise that those claims never will be recognised until they take the drastic step of refusing longer to work until their work is recognised by admission to the franchise.—Yours, &c.,

MARY D. HORNE.

7, Palace Gardens Terrace, W.

November 6th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of October 30th Mr. Conybeare explains his position with regard to the Suffragettes—the women who are supporting their claims to the suffrage by violent and illegal acts.

While agreeing with him as to the great harm they are doing, I estimate it rather as an injury to their present cause than as an injury to the position of their sex. I deplore and regret their action, perhaps even more than he.

But is not his a strangely illogical position? He was “formerly well-disposed towards the movement,” but is now converted into a determined opponent of it. That is to say, because two or three score of women have behaved in the way which he (and I) condemn, he would withhold the vote which he was formerly disposed to give them from what he will perhaps allow me to call “the enormous and daily growing multitude” of law-abiding Suffragists who have done nothing to deserve his displeasure.

He believes that “if Mill were alive now he would be reconsidering his scheme.” That is a speculation which he is welcome to entertain if it pleases him. But is it not more in keeping with Mill's character to remain firm to his principles than to surrender them even under considerable provocation? As regards the question raised by Mr. Holford-Knight, each Liberal woman must decide for herself what is right for her to do. But a very similar question arises for Liberal men who are also Suffragists. To me the issues involved in the coming election are so serious that in my opinion it behoves every Liberal man to spend such strength and such time as he can afford in working for the general Liberal welfare. But I can see no reason why he should work for a Liberal who is not a genuine supporter of women's suffrage, even though that Liberal is candidate for the constituency in which he lives, when he can probably find a candidate with whose views both as a Liberal and a Suffragist he thoroughly agrees in some neighboring constituency. I sincerely hope that many Liberal men may in this manner avoid sacrificing either their Liberalism to their suffrage views, or their suffrage views to their Liberalism, and may be able to throw themselves heart and soul into the great fight.—Yours, &c.,

FRANK E. MARSHALL.

Keswick, November 3rd, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you allow me to revert to the correspondence on this subject in your issue of October 30th?

I subscribe to the full to the opinions expressed by Mr. Fred. C. Conybeare with this exception, that I never was well-disposed towards the movement initiated by John Stuart Mill, no more than his friend and correspondent, Charles Kingsley, who expressed his aversion to the female vote in very simple language. Yet a more ardent admirer of the potentialities in womanhood, a better husband or father, is not known to me in English literature.

It is well for both that they were spared the recent emanation of the female mind.

I cannot but turn with sympathy to the question asked by "C. R." She has made up her mind that, for the benefit of the State, the Liberal policy is the best. Where and how is that conviction antagonistic to her sense of womanhood? It is not a question between womanhood and political factions, but between womanhood and manhood, and to this we men have to give the final answer without any political bias. We have weighed woman up with kindness and with justice, we know what they can do and what we can do. We take the hardest work upon ourselves, and no good and just woman can complain of want of consideration, legally or socially.

I am strongly inclined to believe that "C. R." will admit this, and will in future give us men her helpful hand.

I have no such hope in the case of your correspondent, "M. A.," who coolly states that, at the present moment, when vital political issues are at stake, nothing but enfranchisement does appeal to her. This, fortunately, is a state of mind shared by a very small minority of women. Here follows a string of assertions offered as incontrovertible maxims, and in a strain of self-assertion which it is not pleasant to behold.

"These women's matters," of which "M. A." so glibly speaks, I discuss with my wife and daughters, and act accordingly. The advice of "M. A.," or any woman who has studied at Girton, Oxford, or Cambridge, is of no importance to me. It is the family on which the State is based.

Women who respect their own dignity should not utter such mean threats as "M. A." so blandly utters, and they do not do it.—Yours, &c.,

G. S.

November 10th, 1909.

ELECTIONS ON SUNDAYS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In a recent issue appeared a letter from Mr. Albert Raphael, recommending either the extension of the present polling hours or the holding of elections on Sunday.

As regards the latter suggestion, perhaps the following paragraph, which I have just come across in Mr. Graham Wallas's admirable book, "Human Nature in Politics," might be of interest:—

"Something might be done, and perhaps will be done in the near future, to abolish the more sordid details of English electioneering. Public-houses could be closed on the election day, both to prevent drunkenness and casual treating, and to create an atmosphere of comparative seriousness. It is a pity that we cannot have the elections on a Sunday as they have in France. The voters would then come to the poll after twenty or twenty-four hours' rest, and their own thoughts would have some power of asserting themselves even in the presence of the canvasser, whose hustling energy now inevitably dominates the tired nerves of men who have just finished their day's work. The feeling of moral responsibility half consciously associated with the religious use of Sunday would also be so valuable an aid to reflection that the most determined anti-clerical might be willing to risk the chance that it would add to the political power of the churches. It may cease to be true that in England the Christian day of rest, in spite of the recorded protest of the founder of Christianity, is still too much hedged about by the traditions of prehistoric taboo to be available for the most solemn act of citizenship. It might again be possible to lend to the polling-place some of the dignity of a law court, and, if no better buildings were available, at least to clean and decorate the dingy schoolrooms now used. (pp. 230-1.)

—Yours, &c.,

H. P. DOUGLAS.

Manchester, October 30th.

"EDUCATIONAL FINANCE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—At a debate on Lord Sheffield's paper on "Educational Finance," I submitted that folk songs, morris dances, and traditional games should be introduced into the school course. Unfortunately, sitting as I did a good distance from Lord Sheffield, I was unable quite to catch his reply, so I hope I am not misrepresenting him when I say he threw cold water on my suggestion, on the grounds that it would cost money, and that it wasn't to the point.

I write now to emphasise what I said in my speech, that the cost is practically nothing. The folk songs can be taught by any teacher, out of books which cost from one penny to five shillings. The pupils do not need to have books; indeed, experience has shown it to be better that the songs should be taught orally, as they have been for generations. As regards the traditional dances and games, a lady can be sent down for a week by the Association for the Revival and Promotion of Folk Music to teach the whole school, including the teacher, for two guineas, plus fare and lodgings.

Should it be thought desirable to do so, this cost can be more than repaid by an entertainment given by the pupils.

There is no doubt that the introduction of these songs and dances have a good effect on the children. It makes them brighter and more intelligent, it makes them like going to school, and creates a good feeling between teacher and pupil. In other words, to look at it from a material point of view, it enables the British tax-payer to get the value for his money. Surely this is very much to the point.

Another point which I raised, though only incidentally, was that if this scheme were carried out in the rural districts, the old "Merrie England" life would be to some extent revived, and there would be less talk of emigration to the large towns. Lord Sheffield replied to the effect that man was an economic animal, and by emigrating to the large towns he was merely following a law of political economy, in going where work is. To refute this, I will quote from a booklet by Mr. R. A. Lister, entitled "Danish Small Holdings."

"Quite recently I noticed in one Gloucestershire paper, circulating in rural districts, that there were only six men advertising for situations, and these were as gardeners, grooms, and butlers, whilst in the same paper twenty-two farmers were advertising for shepherds, stockmen, and other agricultural laborers."

Should space have permitted, I could have gone on to quote from Irish papers to show that it is at last generally recognised that one of the causes of the emigration from Ireland to America is the monotony of the country life, and that it is to counteract this that a large portion of the zeal and public spirit of the Gaelic League is now being directed.—Yours, &c.,

C-T.

November 10th, 1909.

THE AUTOMATIC FIXING OF IRISH RENTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As the Irish Land Bill will occupy the attention of Parliament in the course of a few days, would you allow me to direct attention to some points, which, if not yet provided for, might well be considered in connection with the future administration of the Irish Land Acts.

The present cost of administering the rent-fixing provisions of those Statutes has become altogether out of proportion to the diminished duties that that Department of the Irish Land Commission is at present called upon to discharge.

In 1887 Mr. Balfour proposed to fix the fair rents of the agricultural holdings of Ireland by an automatic process, which would have had the advantage of being more expeditious and much less costly than the existing procedure provided by the Land Act of 1881.

At that time there were some thousands of fair rent applications awaiting adjudication, and the proposal to deprive the parties of a public investigation of their cases evoked the hostility of Mr. Parnell and his followers, as also that of the tenant right farmers of Ulster, and the combined opposition proved so powerful that Mr. Balfour abandoned his proposed legislation.

In the years that have since passed all the arguments then advanced against the automatic fixing of fair rents have disappeared. At that time it was essential that each holding should be inspected by two Assistant Commissioners, who had previously sat in Court with an Assistant Legal Commissioner and heard the evidence. That course of procedure is no longer necessary, as the history and circumstances of every holding embraced within the purview of the Irish Land Acts, and which have been adjudicated upon for a first and second judicial term, has been inspected by at least four Court inspectors, and in the cases in which appeals were heard an additional inspection has been made by the Assessors of the Land Commission, and all that exhaustive official information is preserved in the records of the Land Commission. In addition, there is the recorded evidence of at least four valuers for the parties; viz., two for the landlord and two for the tenant, testifying to the amount of rent that should be put upon the holding. It should also be observed that this evidence is supplemented by the Statutory reports, known as the "Pink Schedules," which are attached to the Court file of each individual application, and which supply the following important particulars: (1) A map giving the area of each field in the holding. (2) The particulars of its mode of cultivation and its suitability for certain crops and pasture, &c. (3) The elevation of the farm, its aspect, and proximity to public roads, railways, market and seaport towns, &c. (4) The improvements effected by the tenant, or those to which the landlord has contributed. Thus every item of information connected with "the circumstances of the case, holding, and district," has been obtained and recorded, and in the future fixing of fair rents automatically only three statistical factors would have to be considered, namely (1) The fluctuations in the price of such produce as the holding, under a system of good husbandry, is capable of producing; (2) The prevailing cost of labor; and (3) The variations in such local charges and taxes as the holding may be liable to.

Again, out of the greatly reduced number of fair rent applications that remain to be disposed of, a very small percentage now involve questions on the legal construction of the Land Acts. Such cases have been so exhaustively dealt with by judicial decision that a public court inquiry is no longer required.

Time and practice, accompanied by extensive purchase, having thus created the present situation, what remains to be done is reduced to a limited quantity, and it is submitted that it would not only be expedient in the interest of all parties concerned, but of national advantage, to relegate the future fixing of fair rents, say, to one or two of the Chief Commissioners, assisted by two practical experts or accountants, to fix them automatically from the information available in the existing records of each case. Provision might, of course, be made for appeals in exceptional cases by special leave of a Chief Commissioner, under certain conditions as to costs, &c.

The saving that would thereby be effected in the annual cost of the Land Commission would be very considerable, as the salaries and travelling expenses of the Sub-Commissioners and officials of the Sub-Commissions, the salaries and expenses of the assessors of the Court of Appeal, and the enormous upkeep of the headquarters of the Commission in Dublin would be avoided. Purchase would be expedited and finality secured.—Yours, &c.,

EDWARD GREER, B.L.

Dalkey, November 9th, 1909.

MR. ELLIS BARKER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—No doubt Mr. "Ellis Barker" is best dealt with as you deal with him, in a spirit of momentary amusement. There is even a sort of innocence about him, as of a man who truly and honestly cannot conceive what patriotism can be. But I think it worth while to pause upon the incident, because many people misunderstand the obvious Liberal principle in this matter. Mr. "Ellis Barker" solemnly states that he is not a German, but a naturalised Englishman. Now that is what we complain of; he is such a very naturalised Englishman. He has naturalised, or denaturalised, even his name. In fact, he plainly and definitely pretends to be a born Englishman; that is, he pretends to be what he is not. If he were frankly a foreigner, he would have a perfect right to advise England to adopt Tariff Reform. If a Herr Eltsbacher chose to write on Protectionist projects in England, I hope we should all listen to him with respect. The subject is one of legitimate European interest. We could all respect Eltsbacher; it is Ellis Barker whom we cannot respect. I think the point worth a paragraph of your space, because, ever since the South African War, we have had cause to accuse the alien influence in Imperialism; and our protest should be understood. The objection to Imperialism is not that it attracts foreigners, but that it has a peculiar attraction for undignified foreigners. What weakens the Birmingham patriotism so much in the eyes of honest men is not merely that it is supported by the "naturalised Englishman." It is that it is so largely supported by the particular kind of man who pretends to be another kind of man; by the man who rejects his own father whenever he signs his name.—Yours, &c.,

G. K. CHESTERTON.

Overroads, Beaconsfield,
November 11th, 1909.

GENERAL BINGHAM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I be permitted to correct a slight inaccuracy in your article last week on the New York Police? General Theodore A. Bingham, the late Police Commissioner, is not, as therein stated, "a veteran of the Civil War." He was not born until 1858. The error is probably due to a confusion with General David J. Bingham, to whom your description would apply.—Yours, &c.,

H. W. H.

November 10th, 1909.

Poetry.

REQUIESCAT.

Your birds that call from tree to tree
Just overhead, and whirl and dart,
Your breeze fresh-blowing from the sea,
And your sea singing on, Sweetheart.

Your salt scent on the thin, sharp air
Of this grey dawn's first drowsy hours,
While on the grass shines everywhere
The yellow starlight of your flowers.

At the road's end your strip of blue
Beyond that line of naked trees—
Strange that we should remember you
As if you would remember these!

As if your spirit, swaying yet
To the old passions, were not free
Of Spring's wild magic, and the fret
Of the wilder wooing of the sea!

What threat of old imaginings,
Half-haunted joy, enchanted pain,
Or dread of unfamiliar things
Should ever trouble you again?

Yet you would wake and want, you said,
The little whirr of wings, the clear
Gay notes, the wind, the golden bed
Of the daffodil: and they are here—!

Just overhead, they whirl and dart
Your birds that call from tree to tree,
Your sea is singing on—Sweetheart,
Your breeze is blowing from the sea.

Beyond the line of naked trees
At the road's end, your stretch of blue—
Strange if you should remember these
As we, ah! God! remember you!

CHARLOTTE M. MEW.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE following is our weekly selection of books which we commend to the notice of our readers:—

"The Great French Revolution, 1789-1793." By P. A. Kropotkin. Translated from the French by N. F. Dryhurst. (Heinemann. 6s. net.)

"The Medici." By Colonel G. F. Young, C.B. (Murray. 2 vols. 36s. net.)

"The Survival of Man." By Sir Oliver Lodge. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Orpheus: A General History of Religions." By Salomon Reinach. (Heinemann. 8s. 6d. net.)

"Essays on Greek Literature." By R. Y. Tyrrell, Litt.D. (Macmillan. 4s. net.)

"Consciousness." By H. R. Marshall (Macmillan. 17s. net.)

"Life in an English Village." By Maude E. Davies. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Raphael." By A. P. Oppé. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Far Eastern Question." By T. F. Millard. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

"Reminiscences of a K.C." By T. E. Crispe. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

"The Principles of Religious Development." By George Gallo-way. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)

"On the Forgotten Road." By Henry Baerlein. (Murray. 6s.)

"Histoire de la Langue Française des Origines à 1900." Tome III. "La Formation de la Langue Classique 1600-1660." Par Ferdinand Brunot. (Paris: Colin. 12fr. 50.)

"Le Sillon et le Mouvement Démocratique." Par N. Ariès. (Paris: Nouvelle Librairie Nationale. 3fr. 50.)

"L'Évolution de l'Idée dramatique chez les maîtres du Théâtre." Par Jules Guillemot. (Paris: Perrin. 3fr. 50.)

* * *

MR. ARNOLD BENNETT, the current issue of "The Bookman" tells us, is at work on a series of three long novels relating the history of a family in the Five Towns, and written in the manner of "The Old Wives' Tale." The first of the three will not be issued until next autumn, but Mr. Bennett has two other novels ready for publication, one of which, called "The Card," is to appear as a serial in "The Times" weekly edition. The title of the other is "Helen with the High Hand." Mr. Bennett is also at work on a play commissioned by Mr. Herbert Trench for the Haymarket Theatre.

* * *

MR. FRANK PALMER, who has made an excellent start as a publisher by the issue of Mr. Frank Harris's very remarkable book, "The Man Shakespeare," has in the press "The True Story of Jack Cade: A Vindication," by Mr. Joseph Clayton. Mr. Clayton has made an independent study of the documents relating to Cade and his times, with the result that he considers Shakespeare's portrait of Cade to be an unhistorical travesty. Mr. Clayton holds that Cade fared little better at the hands of modern historians. Stubbs, he says, despised him, while Professor Gairdner, in the Introduction to the "Paston Letters," is also hostile. It is remarkable that though a book dealing with Cade's movement has been published at Strasburg, Mr. Clayton is the first English writer to think the subject worth an extended notice.

* * *

A COLLECTION of letters written by Mrs. Lothrop, whose husband was for some years American Minister at St. Petersburg, is announced for publication during the autumn. The letters are said to give an intimate picture of the Russian Court during the 'eighties, and of its leading figures, both social and political. The title of the volume will be "The Court of Alexander III."

* * *

"THE CLERK OF OXFORD IN FICTION" is the promising title of a book by Mr. Samuel F. Hulton, which will be published shortly by Messrs. Methuen. It contains a series of portraits taken from Chaucer, medieval manuals of wit, the character-sketches of Overbury and Earle, and the essays of Steele, Amherst, Johnson, and others, together with a collection of verses written by contemporary Oxford Heads, and illustrating the various revolutions of University history. Mr. Hulton reaches the conclusion that the characteristics which make up the "Oxford manner" are both ancient and indestructible.

* * *

MADAME MARCELLE TINAYRE's story, "L'Ombre de l'Amour," which has appeared as a serial in the "Revue de Paris," will be published shortly in volume form by M. Calmann-Lévy. Another novel of importance is M.

Victor Margueritte's "L'Or," which will be published in a few days through the Bibliothèque-Charpentier.

* * *

AMONG the works of history to be published during the season are the two concluding volumes of Messrs. Longmans' "Political History of England." These are "From the Death of Edward VI. to the Death of Elizabeth," by Professor A. F. Pollard; and "From the Restoration to the Death of William III.," by Mr. Richard Lodge. Mr. Lodge's volume may be expected immediately, while Professor Pollard's is in the press. Another contribution to English history will be Professor Oman's "England before the Conquest," which appears in Messrs. Methuen's list.

* * *

A NOTE at the end of Mr. Stephen Gwynn's historical novel, "Robert Emmet," mentions, as among the materials for a history of the Emmet rising, "The Emmet Family," edited by Dr. Thomas Addis Emmet, of New York. This volume has been printed for private circulation by a grandson of the United Irishman, Thomas Addis Emmet, who acted in 1803 in Paris as the accredited representative of the United Irishmen, negotiating for the assistance of the French Government. It contains a diary kept during that year and other documents—including several letters written by Robert Emmet—which throw light upon the history of the period. It is a pity that the book has not been published in the ordinary way, for, although copies are to be found in a few public libraries, it is inaccessible to most ordinary readers.

* * *

PROFESSOR JOSEPH BIEDER, who has succeeded Gaston Paris at the Collège de France, begins, this month, a course of five lectures on "The French Epic Legend" at the University of Chicago. The lectures will probably appear in book form next year.

* * *

THE Council of the Society for the Promotion of Hellenic Studies have taken the first steps towards founding a companion Society for the Promotion of Roman or Latin Studies, the scope of which will be ancient Roman civilisation in all lands of the Roman Empire, together with its survivals in Italy and Western Europe down to the end of the Middle Ages. It is proposed that the new society should issue a Journal of Roman or Latin Studies, corresponding in general features to the Journal of Hellenic Studies, while its members would also have facilities for borrowing books and lantern slides. Those in sympathy with the project are invited to communicate with Mr. J. ff. Baker Penoyre, the Secretary of the Hellenic Society, at 22, Albemarle Street, W.

* * *

MESSRS. BELL's new series, "Masters of Literature," aims at providing "a good collection of the best work of our prose masters, chosen carefully and deliberately, in accordance with a definite principle, and suitably introduced with relevant biographical, critical, and bibliographical data." The opening volumes are "Scott," by Professor A. J. Grant, and "Fielding," by Professor Saintsbury (3s. 6d. net each). In both cases the selections have been well chosen; they are long enough to interest the reader, and representative of the author at his best. A volume of selections is, from its nature, open to many objections, but there are a good many people who are debarred by want of time from reading the complete works of our great prose writers. For these, as well as for examination candidates who are required to know something about a multitude of authors, Messrs. Bell's series should prove useful. Professor Grant, in his introduction, makes a list of the twelve best of the Waverley novels. Scott's work, he says, is at its very best, "first, when it deals with Scotch life; secondly, when it brings public and private life into relation with one another; thirdly, when the lives of the poor play an important part." Applying these tests, he places "The Heart of Midlothian," "Waverley," and "Rob Roy" as the first three. Professor Saintsbury confines his selections from Fielding to the four novels and "The Voyage to Lisbon." The plays, the periodicals, the pamphlets, the poems, are, in his view, "merely interesting because they were written by Fielding: it is not rash to say, in regard to the others, that Fielding is interesting because he wrote them."

Reviews.

THE SOUTH POLE EXPEDITION.*

THE present reviewer remembers seeing from the capstan fronting the house from which he writes the "Erebus" and "Terror" at anchor in Aldeburgh Bay in May, 1845. His father, who came of a race of Greenland whalers, and who therefore felt special interest in Arctic exploration, went on board the "Erebus," and when talking to Sir John Franklin about the barriers of ice to be overcome, was met with the brief response, "If I can't cut through it, I'll bite it." The spirit which impelled that "heroic sailor soul" to his fateful enterprise has ruled in a succession of explorers, of whom he whose record is now published is the latest. One has only to look at the portrait which prefaces the first volume and is repeated "in winter garb" on a later page; still better, to look on the face itself, kind, sympathetic, but wrought as of heart of oak, to discern what a resolute spirit is there incarnate.

It will suffice to say, once and for all, how the impressions made upon those who have met Lieutenant Shackleton are deepened by the reading of his narrative. The secret of his success, which would have been crowned by planting the Union Jack on the South Pole had supplies held out, lies in the camaraderie between the crew of the battered forty-year old sealing-ship from commander to cook, and in the high aim which urged Lieutenant Shackleton to his task. That aim was not personal fame, but an addition to the sum of human knowledge and, as he tells us, his was the temptation by which the "mysterious fascination of the unknown lures a man from trodden paths." The cheerfulness which laughed at difficulties and short rations (between November, 1908, and February, 1909, the company "had but one full meal, and that was on Christmas day") imparted itself to the company, and goes far to explain how their well-nigh superhuman labour was accomplished. Not a life was lost. One man returned minus an eye, another a great toe, while another grew a second wisdom tooth!

A public avid for the latest news, especially when pluck and skill pervade it, has been made familiar already with the outlines of the moving story now told in detail, illuminated with wonderful photographs and effective colour-plates, and made easy to follow by excellent maps and charts. The gist of it lies in the fortunes of the three sledging parties between whom the work was divided. One of these reached the hitherto unvisited South Magnetic Pole (the earth is a great magnet, the magnetic poles being those at which the dipping-needle is vertical); the second surveyed the mountain ranges west of McMurdo Sound; and the third, which comprised Lieutenant Shackleton, Messrs. Adams, Marshall and Wild, achieved the task of planting the flag of Britain on a plateau 11,000 feet above sea-level "within one hundred geographical miles of the South Pole," leaving the mystery of the Great Ice Barrier to be solved, let us hope, by Captain Scott.

Duly acknowledging the sources of material, some of these supplied by the diaries of the other sledge-parties, Lieutenant Shackleton gives precedence to an account of the last hundred years of Antarctic enterprise from the competent pen of Dr. Hugh Mill. The earlier chapters are occupied with full details of the preparations for the expedition. These serve the useful purpose of informing future explorers as to necessary equipment, amongst which the motor car now takes its place. But vain are the most perfect preparations if "the man behind the machine" be not there. And that Lieutenant Shackleton, while urged by wholesome ambition to probe the mystery of the South Pole, was keen to seek what may be known of its biology, geology, and mineralogy; to ascertain how far weather conditions originating there affect Australia and New Zealand; what are the tidal movements; the ice formations, and a host of other matters of terrestrial physics; evidences what intellectual equipment is needful as supplement to bodily vigour and staying power. A certain note of monotony runs unavoidably through narratives of voyages, even when, as in the present case, there loom up through them the dreaded forms of icebergs veiled in mist, and moving masses of "pancake" ice. • Nor can the details of store-landing and hut-building cause us to wish the chapters on these subjects prolonged. But the interest advances apace as we approach the story of the ascent of the steam-capped Mount Erebus, whose summit, "the most remarkable in the world," is 13,000 feet above the level of the sea, and whose crater is three times as deep as that of Vesuvius; an interest culminating in the story of the journey towards the Pole, the primary purpose of the expedition. The eight chapters concerned with this will be, to the adventure-loving reader, the most attractive in the book; to quote from them, even did space permit, would only be to tear quivering words from their context.

We must pass from the sequel of the planting of the Union Jack by the four adventurers in an "icy gale that cut them to the bone," on snow plains, a few miles beyond which lay the goal they so nearly succeeded in reaching, to a brief reference to the scientific results of the expedition "in the domains of geology, biology, magnetism, meteorology," of which only a summary is possible even in the volumes themselves, and which have yet to be worked out by experts. The interest of any discoveries bearing on the life-history of the earth at either pole is the greater, because, as Buffon was the first to suggest in his "Epoques de la Nature," life probably originated in those regions. In a cooling globe, they were the earliest places to reach a temperature making organic evolution possible. As far north as eighty-one degrees of latitude, there have been found abundant remains evidencing a warm climate, coal-beds nearly thirty feet in thickness having been discovered. Corresponding to this, is Lieutenant Shackleton's discovery of seams of varying thickness, which Professor David reports consists of coal or "mother of coal," and which lie between sandstone deposits towards the head of the glacier leading to the plateau on which the Union Jack was planted. Professor Edgeworth David, while able as yet to speak only of "one determinate fossil in the shape of a piece of coniferous wood," refers to previous discoveries, showing that, "in regions now continuously covered with ice and snow, there existed in Jurassic deposits (which cover a vast area in both hemispheres) a rich and diversified flora, embracing ferns, cycads, and conifers." The section on animal life in the Antarctic, from the pen of Mr. Murray, biologist of the expedition, supplies an amusing and instructive account of the only "civilised natives of Antarctic regions," as he calls them, the penguins. Among the microscopic forms described in detail are those highly organised specks, the rotifers, whose presence Mr. Murray suggests is explained either by their survival from times when a milder climate prevailed, or by migration from temperate regions. Although, individually, short-lived, he adds that "the Antarctic was not cold enough to show us any temperature at which they die." The additions to our knowledge of pelagic life as a further result of the expedition invite comment, but our space-limit is reached, and it is only with words of superfluous commendation that an inadequate notice of volumes replete with interest, both for the general reader and for the specialist, can be concluded.

CHRISTIANITY AT THE CROSS-ROADS.*

THE posthumous work of a distinguished man has a unique interest. More especially is this so when the personality of the writer was so intensely alive as in the case of Father Tyrrell. "Christianity at the Cross-Roads" is an enigmatic book; it leaves us with the twofold impression, the pia curiositas et curiosa pietas, of which Erasmus speaks. We long to interrogate, to cross-examine the writer; to make sure of the exact shade of meaning which he intended to convey.

At first sight the book may appear to be an apologetic treatise written in the interests of the Roman Catholic Church. Modernism, primarily a protest against the defects

* "The Heart of the Antarctic: Being the Story of the British Antarctic Expedition, 1907-1909." By E. H. Shackleton, C.V.O. With an Introduction by H. R. Mill, D.Sc., and an account of the First Journey to the South Magnetic Pole by J. W. Edgeworth David, F.R.S. Two volumes. Heinemann. 36s. net.

* "Christianity at the Cross-roads." By George Tyrrell Longmans 5s

William Blackwood & Sons' Autumn Publications, 1909.

A NOTABLE LIST.

Lady Wake's Reminiscences.

Edited by LUCY WAKE. Illustrated with Portrait. 12s. 6d. net.
Like Archbishop Tait and her other brother, Sheriff Tait, Lady Wake possessed force of character and intellectual ability, and to the end of her long life she preserved her great interest in the world around her.

"Reminiscences told in so lively a vein, with so much literary charm, yet so sanely and unpretentiously written, acquire by the general suffrage of sensible people a permanent place in the biographical literature of their day."—Fall Mall Gazette.

"A real refreshment and delight to read."—Northampton Mercury.

The Letters of John Stuart Blackie to his Wife.

With a Few Earlier Ones to His Parents. Selected and edited by his nephew, A. STODDART WALKER. 12s. 6d. net.

"Nothing that has been written upon the late Professor Blackie can be brought into even distant comparison with this volume as a revelation of a very remarkable personality. The marvellous variety and vivacity of these letters is scarcely to be even indicated in a brief review."—Glasgow Herald.

"The most delightful book of random reflections published for many years."—Scotsman.

Sir Walter Scott's Friends.

By FLORENCE MACCUNN, Author of "Mary Stuart." With Portraits. 10s. net.
"Mrs. MacCunn has written an exceedingly interesting book. Gifted with quick sympathy and ability to seize the essentials of a character, she is able without drawing a full-length portrait, to convey a living impression of her subject. Grace and finish of style add much to the charm of the book."—Aberdeen Free Press.

Travels in the Upper Egyptian Deserts.

By ARTHUR E. P. WEIGALL, Chief Inspector of the Department of Antiques, Upper Egypt. With numerous Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.

"We can imagine nothing so delightful as reading Mr. Weigall's fascinating story."—Fall Mall Gazette.

"Mr. Weigall has written one of the most interesting books of travel published in recent years."—Belfast News Letter.

The Life and Times of Akhnaton, Pharaoh of Egypt.

By ARTHUR E. P. WEIGALL. 10s. 6d. net.
Akhnaton was the founder of "the New Theology" in Egypt, and the story of his life should therefore be of special interest at the present day.

The Passing of the Shereefian Empire.

By E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, Author of "The Siege and Capitulation of Port Arthur," &c. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett knows Morocco well, having been special correspondent in that country in 1907 and 1908, when he had interviews with both Abdul Aziz and Moulay el Hafid. Readers of his other books know with what vividness and interest Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett can write of those events with which he has become familiar.

The Work and Play of a Government Inspector.

By HERBERT PRESTON-THOMAS, C.B. With a Preface by the Right Hon. JOHN BURNS, M.P. 10s. 6d. net.

It may safely be said that no one has a better opportunity for a wide observation of life than a Government Inspector. Mr. Preston-Thomas, late Local Government Board Inspector for the South-Western District, has collected in a book many varied experiences and humorous situations which he has lit up by wise counsel and a good understanding.

A History of Mediæval Political Theory in the West.

By R. W. CARLYLE, C.I.E., Balliol College, Oxford; and A. J. CARLYLE, M.A., Chaplain and Lecturer (late Fellow) of University College, Oxford. Vol. II. 15s. net.

The Enchanted Island: and other Poems.

By ALFRED NOYES, Author of "Drake: an English Epic," "Forty Singing Seamen," "The Forest of Wild Thyme," &c. 5s. net.

"Mr. Alfred Noyes is to be congratulated upon a most notable achievement, and to be thanked for a book which illustrates so abundantly the fact that poetry is still flourishing in the land of Keats and Shelley, Swinburne and Meredith."—Daily Telegraph.

Hector and Achilles: a Tale of Troy.

Rendered into English after the Chronicle of Homer. By RICHARD SHEEPSHANKS of the Indian Civil Service, sometime senior Classical Scholar, St. John's College, Cambridge; and Bell Scholar, Cambridge University. Illustrated by J. FINNEMORE. 5s. net.

Round about India.

By EDMUND CANDLER, Author of "The Unveiling of Lhasa," "A Vagabond in Asia." Illustrated. 6s. net.

Messrs. BLACKWOOD have an interesting List of FICTION, and Novels that will be found well worth reading are the following, price 6s. each:—

A NEW BOOK.

By the Author of CAPTAIN DESMOND, V.C., and THE GREAT AMULET, both of which are now issued in the Popular Shilling form.

CANDLES IN THE WIND.

By MAUD DIVER.

Mrs. Diver's previous books have reached a circulation of 100,000 copies.

THE PATH TO HONOUR.

By SYDNEY C. GRIER, Author of "The Warden of the Marches," &c.

"The reader will find his interest increasing with every page."—Scotsman.

A MAN'S MAN.

By IAN HAY, Author of "The Right Stuff," &c.
"A bright, fresh book all through, with plenty of go and plenty of humour."—Times.

BLACK MARK.

By "A WHISPER." A brilliant new author.
"The adventures of 'Black Mark,' a man of fashion in the days of George II., who turns highwayman to pay his gaming debt, and of Letty Beanders, are narrated with sprightly ease and dramatic skill."—Athenæum.

THE BACKGROUND.

By W. J. ECCOTT, Author of "His Indolence of Arrass," &c.

"An excellent book.....Written by one with a well-stored mind and an appreciation of the value of good style. The literary charm is all over it, and the author's obiter dicta are informed by good judgment and a sense of humour."—Aberdeen Free Press.

SOME EVERYDAY FOLK AND DAWN.

By MILES FRANKLIN, Author of "My brilliant Career."

"Noteworthy piece of fiction.....Exceedingly interesting.....We recommend this Australian story as one having genuine interest."—Standard.

THE BLUFFSHIRE COURIER.

By PENTLAND PEILE, Author of "Clantrae."

The heroine's grandfather had been evicted from his crofting home on the Duke of Bluff's estate, and had migrated to America. By the turn of Fortune's wheel she comes back to the old place possessed of a great fortune. Her practical plans and a love idyl between her and the Duke's son go to the making of a charming love story.

Read BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE,
The Most Brilliant of all Magazines.

GEORGE ELIOT'S WORKS.

ADAM BEDE.
SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE.
THE MILL ON THE FLOSS.
FELIX HOLT, THE RADICAL.
MIDDLEMARCH.
SILAS MARNER; BROTHER
JACOB; THE LIFTED VEIL.
ROMOLA.
DANIEL DERONDA.
THE SPANISH GYPSY; JUBAL.
ESSAYS: THEOPHRASTUS SUCH.

The New Popular Edition, with Photogravure Frontispiece to each Volume, from Drawings by William Hatherell, R.I., Edgar Bundy, R.I., Byam Shaw, R.I., A. A. Van Ancoy, Maurice Grieffenhagen, Claude A. Shepperson, R.I., E. J. Sullivan, and Max Cowper. Each Work complete in One Volume. Handsomely bound, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net. Ten Volumes in all.

Warwick Edition. 14 Volumes, including Life, cloth, limp, gilt top, 2s. net per Volume; leather, limp, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net per Volume; leather, gilt top, with bookmarker, 3s. net per Volume.

Standard Edition. 21 Volumes, crown 8vo. In buckram cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. per Volume; or in Roxburgh binding, 3s. 6d. per Volume.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, Edinburgh and London.

and limitations of the Roman system, takes secondarily the shape of a vindication, not, indeed, of actual, but of potential Catholicism.

"It is not of Catholicism in the grip of the exploiter, but of Catholicism as a living and lived religion, as a school of souls, that Modernists are thinking. . . . What tyranny ever voted its own destruction, or admitted a truth fatal to its own interests? Will the Roman bureaucracy, that exploits even the Papacy, ever resign their revenues and their ascendancy? Modernists do not believe it for a moment. Their whole hope is in the irresistible tide of truth and knowledge, which must at last surround and overmount the barriers of ignorance, buttressed up by untruthfulness; and, above all, in such inward and living Christianity as may still be left in a rapidly dying Church."

This is not enthusiastic. "O Mighty Mother!" exclaimed Cardinal Newman. "O malign stepmother!" cries the Modernist. Yet repel him as she will—and does—he clings to her.

"While such hopes, be they ever so delusive, live in him, why should the Modernist leave his Church? Where else will he find the true Catholicism of which he dreams? In this or that body he may find some neglected principle of Catholicism, emphasised and developed, but in isolation from the rest and at the cost of integral Christianity. He would find a religion as little, or less, Catholic in fact, and far less in potentiality."

But Father Tyrrell's main purpose was not apologetic of this kind. "The difficulty is not Catholicism," he tells us, "but Christ and Christianity."

"In the Roman Church the question is put more clearly and exactly than elsewhere. But the answer must interest, and eventually decide, the fate of every other Church which shares any measure of the same dogmatic system and rests on the same ultimate presuppositions. If Rome dies, other churches may order their coffins."

"To the lover of Christ," says Miss Petre, in an introduction characterised by singular insight and delicacy, "the Christological problem is more painful and arduous than is the ecclesiastical to the lover of the Church. Father Tyrrell faced them both; and in this book we have his last—I will not say it was necessarily his final—treatment of the double problem."

The argument of "Christianity at the Cross-Roads" stands or falls with a particular estimate of the time-and-place element in the historical Jesus. The question is one of emphasis and proportion. If the estimate to which we refer is accepted, we shall not say that the writer's argument holds—we do not think that it does—but it is waste of time to discuss the matter; because Christ and Christianity break down. If it be ruled out of court—and, in spite of the considerable names that can be quoted for it, it must (we think) be so ruled—the sufficient reason for the book disappears. It is ingenious, brilliant, suggestive—this is only to say that it is Father Tyrrell's. But it ends in a blind alley; we must get back to the high road.

All the churches want to claim Jesus; and that, reversing the order of things, we are apt to make Him to our own image is true. But the Divine Light never descends unclothed. He comes to us—He cannot but come to us—in the likeness of man. The "modernised Christ" is for to-day what the medieval Christ was for the Middle Ages. He was Orpheus for the Church of the Catacombs; the Logos for the schools of Alexandria; everywhere and always there is a superstructure, and this varies in various places and at various times. We picture Him as best we can, and as we advance the picture becomes fuller; but the unity derives from the subject, not from the perspective or the technique. The Christians of the first age enjoyed the same freedom and lay under the same necessity in this respect as those of later days. It was as inevitable that there should be an element of the marvellous, of the enthusiastic, in their presentation of Jesus as it was that this should be found in Him; they and He were of their place and time. That the compilers of the Gospels accentuated this note in the Central Figure of their story is a legitimate assumption and a valid inference. We should expect them to do so; and they did. This accentuation becomes more marked—again, as we might expect—in each successive stage of the formation of the history: a comparison of the incidents recorded in the earlier and the later narratives shows a steady development of legendary detail. But what is surprising is not that this should be so—it could not but be so—but that the element in question is present in so restrained a form and on so comparatively small a scale; that its separation from the substance of the Gospel can be effected so easily; that this should be so readily detached from its setting and frame. Take it at the most; suppose the improbable case of the Evangelists having represented the consciousness of Christ unrefracted by their own—in vain do we look in Him for the distinctive features of Catholicism, medieval or modern, or of anything from which these can be legitimately developed; the instinct which bids Rome keep the Bible from the people is sound.

"Incidit in Scyllam qui vult vitare Charybdis."

It is best not to read the New Testament with spectacles; but, if we must use them, better those of our own than of a past age. To suppose that—

"the Jesus of the first century would be in sympathy with just those elements of Catholicism that are least congenial to the modern mind—with sacraments, temples, priests, and altars; with diabolic possessions, and exorcisms; with devils and angels and all the supernaturalism of His own age and tradition," is a paradox; it recalls the convex and concave glasses of the optician which distort the features out of all recognisable relation to fact.

To bring the temple ritual under the shelter of Christ is to associate Him with just those elements of Jewish religion which in His time were smitten with decadence. The Temple ritual went with the Temple State—with the Diaspora, the Lesser as well as the Greater, it became secondary; the destruction of Jerusalem hastened but did not bring about its fall. This was the result, as such changes so often are, of migration and of the development of the religious sense. "Incense is an abomination to me," said the prophet: and the Apostle—"He dwelleth not in temples made with hands." While of the passing over of this paraphernalia—temple, sacrifice, priest, and altar—into the Christian Church, the New Testament has never a word. Nor is the argument one from silence only. The spirit of the two systems is incompatible: they look different ways. The fact that Jesus submitted Himself to certain—only to certain—prescriptions of the law gives no color to legal conceptions of religion. He dealt with such conceptions summarily enough. "It was said to them of old time—But I say."

The belief in diabolic possession stands on different ground. Jesus held, or at least accommodated Himself, to this belief: it was the setting in which certain nerve and mind disorders, even now imperfectly diagnosed by science, came before the thought of His time. Given the Incarnation, this attitude on His part follows: He willed the means in and with the end. But, if "the Devil is essential to the Catholic scheme," this is no argument for either. The revelation of God in Christ must be taken in connection with His general manifestation of Himself in the world and in man. This, is the teaching of the Fourth Gospel. To isolate Christ is to deprive Him of significance: His mission has its place, in the centre of indeed, but in the scheme of things. While to urge that the Gospel was His own, and His ethic was an adaptation, is unconvincing. Neither, in the strict sense of the word, was original: there were Apocalypics before Him. But each was transformed in the taking, and raised to a higher plane.

The problem of conformity, so burning a question for many Modernists (and not for them only) must be solved, it seems to us, on other grounds. Father Tyrrell gives them. It is to a great extent personal.

"No two men will quite agree as to the precise moment when a case becomes desperate. . . . The reason why, confronted by the same data, one man hopes and another desponds, is just a difference of personality, temperament, and experience. Hence even those who see eye to eye with the Modernist may not, and in most cases will not, agree with him. But they will respect the hope which they do not share, while those who despise the hope cannot truly understand it."

THE HIDDEN WORLD OF ISLAM.*

BELOW all the great forms of religion one may always find other forms persisting, sometimes in secret, sometimes under the protection, or at least toleration, of the priests themselves. These underlying forms are often mere relics of earlier worship, like the traces of "pagan" beliefs still common in all Catholic countries, from Italy to Ireland,

* "The Soul of a Turk." By Victoria de Bunsen. Lane. 10s. 6d. net.

BOOKS OF THE SEASON.

NEW EDITION ILLUSTRATED BY AUBREY BEARDSLEY.

Le Morte D'Arthur. A New Edition in One Volume, which contains 300 Designs by AUBREY BEARDSLEY. Photogravure Frontispiece, 46 full-page Illustrations, Bordered Pages, &c. Cr. 4to, 25s. net. 1,000 copies only will be printed for England, after which the type will be distributed.

This edition contains all Beardsley's original designs and illustrations, and is reprinted word for word from Caxton's edition of 1485, pointed and spelt in uniformity with modern usage, with an introduction by Prof. Rhys.

Modes and Manners of the Nineteenth Century, as represented in the pictures and engravings of the time. By Dr. OSCAR FISCHER and MAX VON BOEHM. Translated by MARIAN EDWARDES. Square demy 8vo. Three vols., in slip board case, 21s. net. Silk moiré, 25s. net. 600 coloured and half-tone Illustrations of Old World Fashion. Of the 83 coloured Illustrations, 77 are coloured by hand.

Milton's Comus. From the Original MS. at Bridgewater House. Fcap. 4to, 12s. 6d. net. By the courtesy of the Earl of Ellesmere, Messrs. J. M. Dent & Sons are now preparing an edition of this unique MS., which will be beautifully printed and richly illustrated.

Beethoven's Letters. Critical Edition, with explanatory Notes. By Dr. ALF. CHR. KALISCHER. Translated with Preface by J. S. SHEDLOCK, B.A. Photogravure Frontispiece, many interesting Portraits, Facsimiles of Music hitherto unpublished, &c. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 21s. net.

Whimsies. By GEOFFREY WHITWORTH and KEITH HENDERSON. With 12 coloured Drawings by the latter. Fcap. 4to, 6s. net. The coloured drawings by Mr. Keith Henderson, whose illustrations to the "Romance of the Rose" are well known, will make this one of the most beautiful artistic books of the year.

NEW ILLUSTRATED EDITION of the Novels of CHARLOTTE, ANNE, and EMILY BRONTË. 10 vols. 60 Coloured Illustrations by Edmund Dulac. Fcap. 8vo. 2s. 6d. net per vol. Jane Eyre, 2 vols. Shirley, 2 vols. Vilette, 2 vols. Professor, 1 vol. Wuthering Heights, 1 vol. Wildfell Hall and Agnes Grey, 2 vols.

A Pocket Lexicon and Concordance to the Works of Shakespeare. Prepared by MARIAN EDWARDES. Illustrated. Demy 16mo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. net. "Every unusual word, or word employed in an unusual sense, is recorded and explained, the concordance element coming in the references to the places where it may be found. The greatest praise is due to the industry and care of the compiler."—SPECTATOR.

Les Classiques Français. A Series in the Original French. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Post 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; limp lambskin, 2s. 6d. net.

NEW VOLUME. Full List of Volumes on application.

Les Fables de la Fontaine. Preface de JULES CLARETIE de l'Académie Française.

Studies in Apostolic Christianity. By Rev. A. W. F. BLUNT, M.A., sometime Fellow and Classical Lecturer of Exeter College, Oxford. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

A clear and original sketch of the early history and organisation of the Christian Church, with special reference to theories of Apostolic succession. Although dealing with matters of controversy it is intended for the general reader and the young student of theology.

The Shorter Bible. Small crown 8vo, paste grain leather, 2s. 6d. net; cloth, 1s. 6d. net.

At the present time this reverent presentation of a Shorter Bible is likely to be welcomed in schools and homes in Britain and abroad, and with this end in view the above announcement will doubtless be received with interest.

Socialism and the Social Movement. By WERNER SOMBART. Translated with Notes by M. EPSTEIN, M.A., Ph.D. Cr. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"The book is a clear and impartial examination of the growth and aims of the social movement. The translator had the advantage of working with Dr. Sombart for two years."—OBSERVER.

Husband and Wife in the Law. By EDWARD JENKS, B.C.L., M.A., Principal and Director of Legal Studies of the Law of Society, &c. Cr. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

"An admirable work of reference for the general public on the English law of marriage."—GLASGOW HERALD.

Prospectuses of above Books may be had on application

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd.,

19, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET,
LONDON, W.C.

GEORGE ALLEN & SONS' NEW BOOKS.

CHINA : Its Marvel and Mystery.

By T. HODGSON LIDDELL. 40 FULL-PAGE ILLUSTRATIONS IN COLOUR BY THE AUTHOR. Crown 4to cloth, gilt top.

A number of the scenes here painted and described by the Author are quite new, as he had a special permit giving access to parts of the Imperial Palace never before entered by a European.

21/-
Net.

IRISH WAYS.

By JANE BARLOW. With 16 full-page Illustrations in Colour by WARWICK GOBLE, and 15 chapter headings in black and white. Demy 8vo.

This book takes the reader into lonely and lovely Irish scenes, into the homes and hearts of a peasantry by nature sociable, pleasure-loving, and witty.

15/-
Net.

BRITANNIA'S CALENDAR OF HEROES.

By KATE STANWAY. With facsimiles of about 200 autographs and reproductions of Orders and Decorations. Crown 8vo. Gilt cloth. 5s. net.

A collection of short accounts of some 2,000 British heroes and heroic acts covering a period extending over the last seventy years.

5/-
Net.

HISTORICAL PLAYS FOR CHILDREN.

By AMICE MACDONELL. Produced under the auspices of the BRITISH LEAGUE OF EMPIRE. Crown 8vo. Paper covers.

Alfred the Great—Saxon and Norman—Magna Charta—Edward III.—Robin Hood—Story of Armada—The Enterprise of The Mayflower.

6d.
Net Each.

The National Gallery LEWIS BEQUEST.

By M. W. BROCKWELL. With 32 full-page Illustrations from the original Pictures and Plans, and much hitherto unpublished and tabulated matter about the National Gallery. Crown 8vo.

5/-
Net.

The County Memorial Series

General Editor: Rev. P. H. DITCHFIELD, M.A., F.S.A. Demy 8vo. 300 pages, about 35 plates and numerous text Illustrations, cloth extra, gilt top.

NEW VOLUMES.

OLD SUSSEX.

Edited by PERCY D. MUNDY.

Chief Contents:—Celtic Antiquities—Saxon Architecture—Monastic Remains—Historic Houses—Cottage Architecture, and an article on the Individuality of Sussex, by Hilaire Belloc, M.P.

15/-
NET.

OLD STAFFORDSHIRE.

Edited by Rev. W. BERESFORD.

Chief Contents:—Forests—Ancient Tenures—Towers and Spires—Lichfield and its Cathedral—Charles Cotton, &c.

15/-
Net.

THE POCKET MAETERLINCK.

Foolscap 8vo, gilt top, with Special Design on back and cover.

THE LIFE OF THE BEE.

THE TREASURE OF THE HUMBLE.

WISDOM AND DESTINY.

And Two Volumes of Plays.

Cloth.
2/6

Leather
3/6
Net per vol.

PROBLEMS OF TO-DAY

WEALTH—LABOUR—WAGES—THRIFT—THE LAND—SOCIALISM.

By ANDREW CARNEGIE.

Crown 8vo. [Second Edition.]

Cloth.
2/-
Paper,
1/-
Net.

LONDON :

GEORGE ALLEN & SONS, 44-45, Rathbone Place, Oxford St.

and such as linger even in the most Calvinistic parts of Germany and Scotland. But they are not necessarily relics; frequently they are accretions, additions, or new developments, contributed by popular feeling to the pure original form. So it has been with Buddhism, originally one of the austere faiths, and so it is now especially with Hinduism, whose high origin has been overloaded with fantastic imaginings till it can hardly be discerned.

One would have supposed that Islam had kept itself pure equally from survivals of older faiths and from the additions of the common mind. Its creed is so definite and limited, the doctrine so intelligible and severe, that one would almost as soon expect vegetable growths on ice as mysteries or magic in Islam. And, in comparison to others, the faith is pure; even in the midst of West African superstitions you will recognise at once the simplicity and calm of the Mohammedan mind. But just on account of this purity the underlying demand of the Faithful for something their creed cannot give is the more remarkable. It reminds us of the background of obscurity, mysterious and inexplicable, which scholars have found in Greece behind the bright worship of Apollo.

It is these dim, underlying beliefs, these vague desires unsatisfied by the definite faith of Islam, that form the main subject of Mrs. de Bunsen's book. Not the only subject by any means. The book is the result of five journeys in the Near East, and, for the greater part, is based upon the seven months' journey from Smyrna to the Tigris described in "Desert Ways to Baghdad," by Mrs. Wilkins, who alone accompanied the author on her adventure. There are many excellent pictures of travel, of seldom visited scenes, and of life many centuries remote from our own. The story of the Albanian Turk who accompanied the little caravan is a revelation of the best Turkish nature and the common Turkish existence. But still the main interest of the book is religious. It lies in the pictures of the revolt of suffering and unreasoning mankind against a creed too narrow, not for his knowledge, but for his unlimited desire, affection, and longing for personal communion with the unseen. As Mrs. De Bunsen says:—

"This instinct of man, to pierce behind the material, the actual, to come into contact with the spiritual, the ideal, is an instinct deep-rooted, part of man's very constitution. It is as innate, as irresistible as any of the other great primitive instincts which, at bottom, form the structure of man's life on earth. Like hunger, sex, fear, it over-rides the reason, masters the will."

On one side, this instinct may turn to mere magic, as among ourselves it used to turn to crystal-gazing, table-turning, planchette, and similar devices. Of magic and its more interesting forms of folk-lore the writer has much to tell, for, partly to gain knowledge, but chiefly, one thinks, out of mere courtesy and human feeling, she took a personal share in all the people's ritual:—

"After a touch of fever," she writes, "I was ceremoniously purified by hair-cutting. For jaundice I drank the milk of a yellow cow. Against the evil eye I wore the blue bead. And when they saw that I did what they told me in all seriousness, they took me into their confidence. . . . My interest in these survivals of magic and religion brought me into touch with human hearts and lives, human aches and pains, human griefs and sorrows."

Mrs. De Bunsen does not here mention one of the finest instances of her compliance, when the captain of her escort insisted on squeezing the jan out of her head during an attack of fever, and actually felt that "genius" (as the old Arabian Nights used to call him) depart between his fingers, though the patient was conscious of no improvement, and only recovered, as she says, by drinking the milk of a yellow cow. But she has many other strange examples of magic power in knotted threads and fetish rags, and she dwells on the tendency of all mankind to charms:—

"It was Islam, with its cold fingers," she writes, "that separated me from the people. With that lofty creed, its simple, self-sufficing philosophy, its crude angles and its clear-cut definitions, I, the Christian of the twentieth century, could have little in common. But these primitive human aspirations, these inborn, unreasoning beliefs, this inevitable flight to magic and to religion for help in trouble—they drew us together. I understood, though I was puzzled. They stirred my heart, though they did not convince my mind."

It is not, however, mainly the discovery of folk-lore and magic charms that forms the real attraction of so excellent a book. The attempt is made to penetrate the significance of much obscurer depths of man's soul than these, and it is with heresies, or at all events dubious sects, rather than with superstitions that the author is really interested. She finds in the Dervish, in the Shiah doctrine, and in the Imam, or incarnations of divine spirit, evidences of the soul's endeavor to transcend the limits of a Deistic creed whose functions on earth never go beyond the dictates of enjoined morality. The injunctions of ethics are all very well, but man in his blindness or his infinite power of apprehension demands ever so much more than ethics. When teachers bid us, "being mortal, to mind only mortal things," man always raises Aristotle's protest against the insufficiency of the counsel. Mrs. De Bunsen speaks often with great penetration of this, the deepest fibre in religious growth. Writing of the true Dervishes, not the tourist shows of Stamboul, she says:—

"What was the idea at the back of these dances? They were no mere dances of joyfulness and thanksgiving. They were means to an end, and that end was the highest religious goal of the mystic, the state of ecstasy or freedom from self. In that state alone was the union with the god possible. And this was a real union, no merely metaphorical term to express deep devotion or submission. It was actual oneness, a union in which the worshipper and the worshipped, the priest and the god he served, became identified and one. This is the most daring of all religious beliefs. . . . It is fraught with danger to all who cannot grasp the highest."

Certainly it is dangerous, as anyone with a knowledge of the ecstatic forms of worship in Russia, for instance, can tell. But still it is an evidence of that supreme desire for spiritual union which Mrs. De Bunsen found within the Shiah, as contrasted with Sunni or more "orthodox" forms of Islam:—

"In Shiah Mohammedanism," she says, "the Aryan consciousness finds its natural religious expression. The Shiah doctrine of the Imam and all it implies, this is but the crude and awkward embodiment of a fundamental attitude, intellectual and spiritual. . . . Man is one, body, soul, and spirit. No one part of him, intellect, reason, for instance, can lay claim to be sole vehicle of spiritual truth. . . . Hence the doctrine of the Imam, the incarnation of the divine in human form. God must become man, must walk the earth as man with men. Only so could every subtle part of man's personality find Him, reveal Him forth. The appearance of the Imams supplied the need."

The position, one sees, is much the same as in Matthew Arnold's essay on the kindred subject of Hassan and Hussein, and at the end of her book Mrs. De Bunsen follows out the idea in her successive chapters on Adonis, Hussein, and Jesus with equal vividness and reverence for the inherent longings of the human race.

NINETEENTH CENTURY MODES.*

DR. OSCAR FISCHER and Max Von Boehm, the eminent German authors of this work, have compressed into three volumes a subject that might well occupy three hundred. To this circumstance, no doubt, we owe the tumultuous hurry with which the text skips from one topic to another, from dress to politics, from politics to the theatre or concert-room, from the latter to the dinner-table, from the dinner-table to art, from art to the less important modes, reputable and disreputable, that prevailed in society during the last century. Erudition can hardly contain itself here. It flows forth, not in one continuous stream, but in a series of brawling rivulets. It astounds by the enormous capacity for research in different directions, by the Teutonic thoroughness with which every theme is worked out. We doubt whether any living English author could have compiled such a work. It is, at any rate, morally certain that no Englishman could have written with such ease and exhaustiveness on the topic of female dress without the liberal assistance of his wife or sister. Abounding, as it does, in baffling technicalities, its description has apparently presented no more difficulties to these German scholars than has such a mere bagatelle as the political and constitutional history of the Continent and England.

* "Modes and Manners of the Nineteenth Century, as represented in the Pictures and Engravings of the Time (1790-1878)." Translated by M. Edwards. With an Introduction by Miss Grace Rhys. Three Volumes. Dent. 21s. net.

MR. HEINEMANN'S NEW BOOKS.

MR. DE MORGAN'S NEW NOVEL.

Mr. HEINEMANN has pleasure in announcing that he will publish on Tuesday

IT NEVER CAN HAPPEN AGAIN

By WILLIAM DE MORGAN.

In two Volumes, uniform with the Author's previous works, "Joseph Vance," "Alice for Short," and "Somehow Good,"
Crown 8vo, 10s.

HEINEMANN'S LIBRARY OF MODERN FICTION.

BELLA DONNA.

By ROBERT HICHENS. 2 vols., 4s. net.

THE STREET OF ADVENTURE. By PHILIP GIBBS 1 vol., 3s. net.

HEDWIG IN ENGLAND. By the Author of "Marcia in Germany." 1 vol., 3s. net.

THE SCANDALOUS MR. WALDO. By RALPH STRAUS. 1 vol., 3s. net.

LORD KENTWELL'S LOVE AFFAIR. By F. C. PRICE. 1 vol., 3s. net.

BEYOND MAN'S STRENGTH. By M. HARTLEY. 1 vol., 3s. net.

A SENSE OF SCARLET. By MRS. DUDENEY. 1 vol., 3s. net.

THE WHITE PROPHET. By HALL CAINE. 2 vols., 4s. net.

THE MAGNETIC NORTH.

By ELIZABETH ROBINS.
Popular Edition, Cloth, 2s. net.

THE HEART OF THE ANTARCTIC

By SIR ERNEST SHACKLETON, C.V.O.

In two volumes, fully Illustrated in Colour and from Photographs. Crown 4to, 36s. net.

Autograph Edition de Luxe.—Limited to 300 numbered copies, each signed by SIR ERNEST SHACKLETON and the members of the Shore Party with additional Illustrations and Text, printed on Dutch Hand-made paper, with special watermark, medium 4to, vellum, £10 10s. net

THE LAND OF THE LION.

By DR. W. S. RAINSFORD. Profusely Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

[Next week.]

MR. RACKHAM'S NEW BOOK.

UNDINE.

Adapted from the German by W. L. COURTNEY. Illustrated in Colour by ARTHUR RACKHAM. Cr. 4to, 7s. 6d. net.
N.B.—This is the only entirely new and original work by Mr. Rackham published this year.

ITALIAN HOURS.

By HENRY JAMES. Illustrated in Colour by JOSEPH PENNELL. Demy 4to, 25s. net.

THE CATHEDRAL CITIES OF SPAIN.

By W. W. COLLINS, R.I. With 60 Water-Colour Drawings by the Author. Demy 8vo, 16s. net. Also Edition de Luxe, 42s. net.

THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.

Illustrated in Colour by ARTHUR RACKHAM. Crown 4to, 15s. net.

ORPHEUS: A Universal History of Religions.

By DR. SOLOMON REINACH, Author of "Apollo." Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

. The religions of man, hardly to be distinguished from his art in their common origins, have never ceased to intermingle their currents with those of art. In studying the one, M. Reinach has naturally been drawn to contemplate the other, and he offers us the fruits of his labours in a masterly synthesis which he has christened "Orpheus."

THE GREAT FRENCH REVOLUTION.

By P. A. KROPOTKIN. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

THE TRIBUNAL OF THE TERROR:

A Study of Paris in 1793-95.

By G. LENOTRE.

Profusely Illustrated, demy 8vo, 10s. net.

MEMOIRS OF THE DUCHESSE DE DINO.

Demy 8vo, 10s. net.

THE RETURN OF LOUIS XVIII., 1814-15.

By GILBERT STENGER. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 10s. net.

A COTSWOLD FAMILY: HICKS AND HICKS BEACH.

By Mrs. WILLIAM HICKS BEACH. Fully Illustrated, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

LEAVES: Sketches and Essays.

By VIOLET CLARKE.
Crown 8vo, 6s.

Mr. Heinemann's Illustrated Autumn Announcement List post free.

London: WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford St., W.C.

The authors spare us nothing that may be termed instructive. A more or less detailed description of the wars waged by the men of a particular period, of the intrigues of courts, of the caprices of kings, is considered a necessary preparation of the ground before we are told what they ate and drank, whether they washed, what clothes they put on, what was their taste in art, literature, and the drama; so it is set down remorselessly. But there is a plain purpose in this. The object is to connect the social with the political life of the century, before attempting to analyse the former, and to suggest in unmistakable manner the intimate relationship that has almost always existed between, say, a revolution and a new fashion or popular taste. Let us illustrate this by the case of dress. At the French Revolution—

"One of the first Acts of the National Assembly was the abolition by solemn decree of all distinction in the dresses of the classes. The noblemen who had selfishly usurped the wearing of feathers, embroideries, and red heels, had to look on while the citizens declared that they laid no value on such insignificant trifles, but left them gladly to the use of lackeys. It was significant of the victory of the lower class all along the line. . . . The result to us has been that all the variety and splendour of men's dress before 1789 have completely disappeared; they fell into discredit as reminiscent of a hated class, and every effort on Napoleon's part to revive them failed to check the universal introduction of black for men's wear. The democratic tendency which was then gaining power, the plebeian sentiment of equality, has so far carried the day that now when another century has passed over our heads, not only has man's dress attained to an uncompromising uniformity, but women's dress also has been forced to give up any peculiarity indicative of rank or station. In England this change of dress took place naturally and without fuss; it was not so in France, where it was accomplished with full stage effect."

The English change to soberer garb not only took place without fuss; it took place considerably later. In 1832 dark green and violet blue tail-coats, violet trousers, white velvet breeches, and gold buttons were still everyday articles of apparel. The modern lack of color did not become popular till the end of the 'forties. Necessarily the developments in women's clothes is a far more intricate subject, and it would be rash to affirm that history shows any clear connection between them and political happenings, or to suggest that all their fashions were dictated by human logic. The present authors appear to have been conscious of this difficulty, for in stating—in Volume II.—that "in 1815 everything about her is tight and straight, in 1830 puffed and rounded; in 1845 the dress becomes flowing, and the capricious, coquettish creature of 1830 has grown graceful and languishing," they are constrained to add: "The laws which govern fashion are as inexplicable as the reasons which give rise to change of taste." However, the connection between the pseudo-classic fashion in painting, furniture, and architecture, of which David was the high priest after the Revolution, and the classic ease in dress adopted by the ladies of that and the following Empire period, is easy enough to trace; and we can easily fit in the costume, frilled, flounced, vari-colored, and generally extravagant, of 1830 with "the romantic ideas that filled the smaller heads" of that time, or couple the quieter styles that came a little later with the growing interest in questions of social reform. But what baffles the simple mind is why the primitive classic style of dress degenerated into something so primitive as to be hardly dress at all. After 1795, in the most fashionable Paris circles—

"Not only did corsets and under-petticoats disappear, but further garments were also discarded—the lady of society wore rings on her bare feet, while silk tights and a transparent chemise open to the knee composed the remainder of her costume. The more fashionable of these half-insane women strove as to which of them should put on the least clothing. No one now spoke of any one as 'well dressed,' but as 'well undressed,' and it became an amusement in society to weigh a lady's garments; her whole clothing, including shoes and ornaments, was not allowed in 1800 to weigh over eight ounces."

A fashion that was surely the most curious of all democratic protests against the ostentation and license of the noblesse! However, it serves to recall the very common belief that fashions, whatever their logic or illogic, have generally been due to the caprice of Royalty or at any rate of some leader of Society. Marie Antoinette, the Empress Eugénie, Beau Brummel, Beau Nash, and Count D'Orsay are names that occur of personages who have exercised a sartorial tyranny over their generation. But as regards Royalty—in France at any rate—this part of their prerogative was swept away with the fall of the French Queen's head, and the steady progress of democracy throughout the nineteenth century has undoubtedly affected our regard for the example of Royalty in this direction. It is, by the way, one of the contentions of this book that the Empress Eugénie, though a lady of fine taste, was not the leader of fashion she is usually believed to have been, but a follower of rare skill whose constructive achievement lay in modifying and possibly beautifying the fashions that were imposed upon her. Whether this was so or not, blind adherence to a leader of fashion no longer exists. Indeed, it is difficult nowadays to trace the origin of any fashion further back than the modiste—to such a pass have hygiene and the general leveling up of classes brought us!

The Romantic movement about 1830, and its effect upon social life, are instructively and entertainingly dealt with in these pages. At the first glance it seems paradoxical that any movement of the kind should have appealed to a society which, throughout civilised Europe, had the accumulation of big fortunes for its first object in life. The era of the middle-class business man had begun, and commerce was outwardly the one obsession. Yet society accepted Romanticism greedily. Without any training in or hereditary instinct for art and letters, it helped Delacroix and his fellow-painters to subjugate, though not to annihilate, the classical school, welcomed Scott with open arms, went into ecstasies over Byron, Dumas, Hugo. But it did more than listen to the preaching of the new gospel; it applied the doctrine, or tried to, to the ordinary events of life. It anticipated the somewhat prevalent modern habit of making Romantics out of lunatics and criminals. We do not hear much of the Romantic ordinary citizen—except in regard to his dealings with the other sex—who had his business to consider; but there was undoubtedly the Romantic Woman, who brought "ethereality" to unequalled perfection during this period, and posed and fainted at every possible opportunity. A further phase was the cult of Love. In its essence Love was romantic. The novels of George Sand and other writers not only criticised the marriage-tie as a protest against the spiritual enslavement of women. They made Free Love the special property of Romanticism. In contradistinction to the etherealists, whose watchword was helplessness, the stronger-minded women of the day clamored for the abolition of marriage as well as an equality of citizenship. Between the disturbance caused by these two conflicting sections of feminine fashion, complicated by a further movement, happily shared by both sexes, in the direction of social reform, Society was in a half-revolutionary state. It is, perhaps, not ultra-fantastic to suggest a connection between the perturbation of the times and the steady growth of the comforting tobacco habit among men.

Possibly the strongest impression produced by this record of nineteenth century Society is that nearly every problem with which we are confronted to-day has had its prototype within the last hundred years. Fashion then, as now, invariably tended to extravagance. There has always been the same popular enthusiasm for frivolous amusements, the same neglect of intellectual ones; the same sorts of mind have always propagated the same sorts of schemes, and failed owing to the same mistakes. So little has the method of human self-expression changed that it would not surprise us in the least if some patient investigator of 1830 archives discovered, let us say, the evidences of a Romantic Budget Protest League! We must leave this fascinating speculation to congratulate Miss Marian Edwardes, who is responsible for the translation of these volumes, on a most creditable achievement. She has preserved the flowing style so characteristic of modern German authors; and she has grappled successfully with the difficult task of preventing German candor of expression on delicate topics from reading like English coarseness. The unsuspecting fearlessness with which our Continental neighbors set forth matters not usually discussed at the English dinner-table offers many a pitfall in translation, and Miss Edwards has done well in steering a clear course between them. We can say nothing of the hundreds of reproductions from pictures, engravings, and photos, in color and monotone, that enliven these volumes, except that they are truly illustrations to a monumental history of nineteenth century modes.

Messrs. CONSTABLE & Co's Announcements

The Two Most Beautiful Books of the Year.

THE DESERTED VILLAGE

By OLIVER GOLDSMITH

With 40 full-page plates in colour and numerous drawings in the text, by

W. LEE HANKEY

4to, cloth, 15s. net. Edition de Luxe, limited to 250 copies, 42s. net.

Mr. RACKHAM'S MASTERPIECE.

THE FAIRY TALES OF THE BROTHERS GRIMM

With 40 full-page plates in colour and 70 drawings in the text, by

ARTHUR RACKHAM

4to, cloth, 15s. net. Edition de Luxe, limited to 750 copies, out of print.

Mr. Sichel's Great Biography Now Ready

THE LIFE OF RICHARD BRINSLEY SHERIDAN

By WALTER SICHEL, Fully Illustrated, 2 vols. 31s. 6d. net.

Mr. Wheatley's New Book Now Ready

HOGARTH'S LONDON

By H. B. WHEATLEY, F.S.A. Profusely Illustrated, 21s. net.

A Fascinating Study of London Life Past and Present Now Ready

LONDON LIFE OF YESTERDAY

By ARTHUR COMPTON-RICKETT, M.A., LL.D. 7s. 6d. net.

The First Authentic Life of Queen Elizabeth Now Ready

THE GIRLHOOD OF QUEEN ELIZABETH

By F. A. MUMBY. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

A Record of Pioneer Exploration in the Punjab Himalaya

PEAKS AND GLACIERS OF NUN KUN

By FANNY BULLOCK WORKMAN and WILLIAM HUNTER WORKMAN. Fully Illustrated, 18s. net.

With an Introduction by Henry Newbolt

THE BOOK OF CUPID; being an Anthology from the English Poets. With an introduction by HENRY NEWBOLT

And 25 Illustrations by THE LADY HYLTON. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

Miss Silberrad's New Novel Next Week

ORDINARY PEOPLE.

By UNA L. SILBERRAD. 6s.

From . .

WELLS GARDNER, DARTON & Co.'s LIST

An Original Book on a new plan. The Illustrations are all Mounted on Art Brown.

11 by 8½, fancy paper boards, cloth back, 5s. net.

The Animal Why Book.

By W. P. PYCRAFT, F.Z.S., A.L.S. Illustrated in Colours by EDWIN NOBLE, R.B.A.

A book of Natural History on novel and interesting lines. 32 Pictures painted in a bold and original style, beautifully produced in chromo-lithography, besides others in black-and-white.

The New Volume in the Series of FINE ART GIFT-BOOKS.

8½ by 5½, printed on Superfine paper, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

A Wonder-Book of Beasts.

Edited by F. J. HARVEY DARTON. Full of Humorous Illustrations by MARGARET CLAYTON.

A volume of Romance and Adventure, where all the leading characters are animals. The Illustrations are full of humour, and the volume will delight "grown-ups" as well as children.

UNIFORM WITH

A Wonder Book of Old Stories from the Faerie Romance
By F. J. Harvey Darton

By Mary Macleod

Tales of the Canterbury Pilgrims

By F. J. Harvey Darton

Runaways and Castaways

By E. V. Lucas

The Book of King Arthur

By Mary Macleod

Children of the Dawn:

Old Tales of Greece

By E. F. Buckley

Etc., Etc., Etc.

Messrs. GARDNER, DARTON & CO., LTD., will send post free a list of this well known series of Fine Art Gift Books, together with a New Book List, beautifully printed in colors.

3 by 5½, printed on Superfine Paper, Cloth, 6s.

Bellerophon. "The Bravest of the Brave!"

By EDWARD FRASER.

Mr. Fraser has written a stirring and romantic battle story of the hardest fighter of the Fleet of Nelson's time, and how Napoleon gave himself up a prisoner, with some account of the later 'Bellerophons,' including the present vessel of the 'Dreadnought' type.

8 by 5½, cloth, 5s.

Seeing the World. The Adventures of a Young Mountaineer.

By ASCOTT R. HOPE. With Illustrations in Colour from Drawings by GORDON BROWNE, R.I.

An excellent tale for boys by a most popular and experienced writer.

WELLS GARDNER, DARTON and CO., Ltd.,
3 and 4, Paternoster Buildings, E.C., & 44, Victoria St., S.W., London

Now Ready, the Best and Most Popular
Annuals for Children of the Empire

CHATTERBOX.

416 LARGE PAGES. 12 COLOURED PLATES.

CHATTERBOX.

OVER 250 NEW ILLUSTRATIONS. "A CHILD'S LIBRARY IN ITSELF."

NEW VOLUME NOW READY.

Coloured Boards, 3s.; Cloth Bevelled, Gilt Edges, 5s.

Weekly Numbers, 3d.; Monthly Parts, 3d.

The TIMES said: "'Chatterbox' is one of the best children's books we have seen."

The SCHOOL GUARDIAN said: "The most popular volume for children ever published. Both pictures and letterpress are very good."

SUNDAY.

416 LARGE PAGES. 6 COLOURED PLATES.

250 ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

SUNDAY.

"SUNDAY" Bound Volume, Coloured Boards, 3s.; Cloth Bevelled, Gilt Edges, 5s.

Weekly Numbers, 3d.; Monthly Parts, 3d.

"A difficult problem solved as well as it can be anywhere."—Spectator.

"We can imagine nothing better."—Times.

WELLS GARDNER, DARTON & CO., Ltd.,

3 and 4, Paternoster Buildings, London; and all Booksellers.

POPULAR FICTION.*

"Bella Donna" is, perhaps, the most striking piece of literary scene-painting that Mr. Hichens's clever brush has yet given us. His work, sure to captivate the imagination of a big audience, has an atmospheric color which will survive any test but that of a scrutiny in cold daylight. Just as Mr. Harker's magic backcloths in Act I. almost persuade us that the characters in a smart society set have really broken one commandment in a private suite in the Savoy Hotel, and in Act II. are proposing to break others in a houseboat up the Nile, so Mr. Hichens's "interiors" are almost as good as the real thing. Almost; in fact, better, so far as their romantic effect goes; for the romantic illusion in a picture of real life, as Mr. Harker knows, is what the public "is after." Seriously, we must congratulate Mr. Hichens on the skill he has lavished on his pictures of up-to-date life in the Villa Androud, Luxor, in the dahabeeah, the Loulia, in a tent in the Fayyûm oasis, in the Villa Nuit d'Or near Armant, in the Winter Palace Hotel at Luxor, and other attractive and impressive places where all his characters, the beautiful and sinister Mrs. Chepstow, and Nigel Armine, heir to Lord Harwich and "the immense estates," and Mahmoud Baroudi, the irresistible Turko-Egyptian seducer of our frail European womenkind, and Dr. Meyer Isaacson, the fashionable London physician, and Ibrahim and Hamza, the dragoman and the donkey-boy, have their being. The exciting drama is played out between the four leading characters. Mrs. Chepstow, a lady once very much in society, is in the odious position of having no future and of being cut by everybody, when Nigel Armine, partly from motives of sentimental kindness, marries her and carries her off to the Villa Androud on the Nile. Nigel bores her insufferably by his manly devotion, and she soon abandons herself to a grande passion for Mahmoud Baroudi, who typifies the glamor and the mystery and the luxury of Eastern sensuality. Under Baroudi's spell Mrs. Armine proceeds to administer daily doses of poison to the unsuspecting Nigel, when his old friend, Dr. Meyer Isaacson, suddenly turns up at Luxor, and after several pitched battles with the poisoner, takes charge of the case, and rescues the patient who is at death's door. Mrs. Armine, detected, tries to force herself on Baroudi, but the Turko-Egyptian repulses her, and the last glimpse we have is of the infatuated heroine "disappearing into the darkness, going blindly towards the distant hills that keep the Arabian desert." The plot and much of its presentation and working out are certainly effective. More we may not say. Dr. Meyer Isaacson is not a Jew at all, but a sentimental Christian who is playing at being a doctor. Nigel Armine is quite unreal—an impossible type of man. Mrs. Chepstow is better, but Mr. Hichens has taken a heavy load on his shoulders in attempting a psychological analysis of her insatiable craving for an Oriental. Baroudi is interesting, but we should believe in his existence more if he had been quite contemptuous of Englishwomen and their ways. The story of the poisoning is an artistic excrement, and does not fit in with Mrs. Chepstow's character, but still Mr. Hichens is to be congratulated on the cleverness and skill with which he has fitted all the pieces and properties of this drama of "real life" together.

Everyone has made merry over Daudet's "Tartarin," and now in "The Diverting Adventures of Maurin," a novel which has had a great success in France, M. Jean Aicard has vindicated the honor of the good people of the Midi. Maurin, hunter, smuggler, poacher, is a great personage in the department of the Var, where, although a peasant, he is known as the uncrowned king of thirteen communes and is styled the Don Juan of the Woods. The Provençal's love of heroics, his picturesque feeling for drama, his slyness and talent for poking fun, find full expression in M. Aicard's genial chapters which recount with leisurely ease how Maurin quarrelled with and outwitted the gendarmes from Hyères, won the Préfet to his side, captured wild boars singlehanded, made a conquest of Tonia, the fair Corsican, and carried on love affairs with half the pretty women of the neighborhood. The old time popular hero worship of the bandit, in short, reappears in a new shape in this glorification of a free, wild, shrewd local champion, who is a match for stingy proprietors who hasten to lock up their wives when he approaches, and for the lawyers and police officers who scheme to lay him by the heels. All is, however, innocent and healthy enough in the narrative, and from the "Diverting Adventures" one can gain that insight into Provençal feeling and local habits and traditions which to the foreign tourist are always a sealed book. A good deal of modern folklore of the district of the Maures is also presented to us in the anecdotes and good stories of the worthy M. Désiré Cabissol, a French antiquarian, who holds that Maurin is "a figure worthy of Balzac's brush," and that his life is "an opera of which you will never have more than the bare libretto."

It is a far cry from the hardy and healthy Provençal Maurin to Jenny Peters, a typical child of the filthy slums of manufacturing Eastborough. Mr. Dudley Ward's story is certainly "a novel with a purpose," and what he lacks in art he makes up for in vigor. The hero of the tale, the Rev. Richard Smith, a High Church Parson in Eastborough, is forced to resign his living, at the close of the book, ostensibly through his Ritualistic practices, but in reality because his Socialistic opinions have alarmed Lord Midland and the Eastborough burgesses. By Socialism Lord Midland and Vibart, the Conservative member, mean that their duties as owners of slum property in the town have been brought home to them by the clergyman, and that the expenses of municipal reforms are to be thrown on the rates. A rival campaign for Tariff Reform is successfully conducted by these gentlemen, assisted by Mr. Jalland, the mayor, a man who has risen from the ranks and is always hat in hand to his superiors by birth. While the pictures of slum life in Kershaw's Rents are by no means exaggerated in tone, those that depict the pleasures of the wealthy circle at "Midlands Park" are somewhat crude in drawing. To speak frankly the partisanship shown in "Jenny Peters" is as strong as the author's honesty of purpose. But, taking it on the plane of "campaign literature," the book accomplishes its object, and the publisher would be well advised to issue the second edition at a popular price.

Mr. W. W. Jacobs's ingenuity is really remarkable. Here is the eleventh volume from his pen, and the changes are still rung dexterously on the identical characters, situations, and scenes that first won popular favor in "Many Cargoes." And very amusing most of his stories are. If we get a little tired of Mr. Jacobs's henpecked mates and timid master mariners who always sing small before their feminine tyrants, he makes amends in the story, "Double Dealing," where the situation is, relatively, new. Mr. Fred Carter, a holiday-making Londoner, is accosted on the beach by two seafaring men, who will take no denial that he is one "Bert" Simmons, an absconding suitor who four years previously has "nipped off to London," leaving the girl, Nan Evans, mourning in vain for his return. Miss Evans, in an interview, avows that Mr. Carter is not the recreant Bert; but Mr. Carter, smitten by her charms, has a bright idea, and gallantly insists that he is, and hands over his purse and watch and chain to her father as security for his future good behavior. When, later on, various gentlemen drop in and claim old acquaintanceship with Mr. Carter, and recall that he owes them "half a quid," "two quid," &c., the latter sees Nan's hand in it. She is punishing him for his presumption by the loss of his money. The situation, which is, naturally, too farcical for life, is neatly handled by Mr. Jacobs, who, by a few deft turns, deflects the pleasure craft as he pleases, never leaving shallow waters, but never running aground.

Extremely good fun of unusual quality is provided in Mr. Birmingham's "Search Party." Dr. Lucius O'Grady, the popular but penniless medical officer of Clonmore Union, unaccountably disappears from the town the day before the arrival of his fiancée, Miss A. M. Blow, a good-looking young lady of unusual determination. The Clonmore people, such as Jimmy O'Loughlin the innkeeper, Patsy Devlin the blacksmith, Lord Manton the R.M., Mr. Goddard the District Inspector, and Sergeant Farrelly, are at their wits' end, have to appease Miss Blow when she rejects their soothing concoctions, and insists that a search warrant must be issued, and every house in the neighbor-

* "Bella Donna." By Robert Hichens. Heinemann. 4s. net.

"The Diverting Adventures of Maurin." By Jean Aicard. Translated by Alfred Allinson. Lane. 6s.

"Jenny Peters." By C. H. Dudley Ward. T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.

"Sailor Knots." By W. W. Jacobs. Methuen. 3s. 6d.

"The Search Party." By George A. Birmingham. Methuen. 6s.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S LIST.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

THE CARAVANERS

By the Author of "Elizabeth and her German Garden."

TIMES: "Very agreeable humour, which sparkles on every page of this entertaining narrative of experience on the Kentish roads."

DAILY CHRONICLE: "It is very amusing—could our author write anything that was really dull? One laughs and laughs again at the colossal conceit of the Baron."

HER MOTHER'S DAUGHTER

By KATHARINE TYNAN.

IRISH INDEPENDENT: "For charm of diction and brilliancy of description few writers can equal Miss Katharine Tynan, and we doubt if amongst the many excellent works of fiction she has written there is a story more delightfully fresh and artistically perfect than her latest novel."

With 3 Portraits. Small demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: A MEMOIR

By the Rt. Hon. GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL, P.C., Author of "Collections and Recollections," &c.

DAILY CHRONICLE: "Sir Wilfrid Lawson's humour was part of the kindly and sunny nature of the man. There are many specimens of it in this book . . . an excellent presentation of a noble life."

Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

BRITAIN FOR THE BRITON

Co-operative Working of Agriculture and other Industries a Necessity.

By Sir W. EARNSHAW COOPER, C.I.E., Author of "Socialism and Its Perils," "The Murder of Agriculture," &c.

TIMES: "Sir William Cooper is an able and trenchant independent writer who here undertakes to show that in agriculture lies the main secret of Britain's prosperity."

With a Frontispiece in Colour, and 24 pages of Illustrations. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

WITH MULAI HAFID AT FEZ

By LAWRENCE HARRIS, F.R.G.S.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE COMING ENGLISHMAN

By PROF. JAMES LONG, Author of "British Dairy Farming," "The Small Farm and its Management," &c.

Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE ROMANCE OF THE TWISTED SPEAR, and other Tales in Verse.

By HERBERT SHERRING.

Contemporary Review: "We recommend these 'Tales of Verse.' . . . At times the story-teller rises above his medium, and writes almost with splendour. This book deserves not only criticism, but a public. Mr. Sherring is a story-teller of the first rank."

On Nov. 15. With 16 Half-tone Illustrations and a Map. Small demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE STORY OF THE THAMES

By the late J. E. VINCENT.

Mr. Vincent gathers a full sheaf of the innumerable associations—historical, literary, and personal—which attach themselves to almost every reach of the most characteristic of English rivers, choosing for illustration the less familiar, unhackneyed points of beauty and interest.

Ready Nov. 15. In 2 vols. Demy 8vo, 25s. net.

FIFTY YEARS OF NEW JAPAN

Compiled by COUNT SHIGENOBU OKUMA, late Prime Minister of Japan, and Minister for Foreign Affairs, and others. Edited by MARCUS B. HUISS, Vice-Chairman of the Japan Society.

An important work on the growth of Japan since the opening-up of the country, compiled by Count Okuma, late Prime Minister of Japan, with the assistance and co-operation of the highest authorities on the various subjects. The work is dedicated, by special permission, to His Majesty the King.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

ALVIN LANGDON COBURN'S London.

A collection of Twenty Photogravures revealing familiar scenes in quite unusual views. The artist shows us London in pictures of great originality and beauty. An essay on London by HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P., accompanies the illustrations. 25s. net.

RALPH NEVILL'S

The Merry Past.

"A multitude of anecdote which will conjure up better than the most learned of disquisitions a picture of the habits and customs, the foibles and fashions, the prejudices and preferences—in short, the local colour of English life from about 1750 to 1820. Story after story comes tumbling from his fertile pen, and almost every aspect of life is dealt with in turn."

—Daily Telegraph.

"Outspoken, vigorous, and breezy."—Country Life.

"Terse and vividly picturesque English."—Bookman.

With a Frontispiece in Colour, 12s. 6d. net.

E. BERESFORD CHANCELLOR'S

Lives of the British Architects.

From William of Wykeham to Sir William Chambers.

40 illustrations, 337 pages, 7s. 6d. net.

RICHARD JEFFERIES'

The Hills and the Vale.

"These Essays have never appeared before in book form. They are the best of Jefferies' writings which have remained unobtainable, and they must find a place in any collected edition of his works. Care has been taken to select only those worthy of his reputation."

Cloth extra, gilt top, 6s.

With an introduction by EDWARD THOMAS.

JOHN GALSWORTHY'S

Villa Rubein and other stories.

396 pages, crown 8vo, 6s.

CECIL ROSS JOHNSON'S

The Trader.

A Venture in New Guinea

Crown 8vo, 6s.

ELIZABETH MARTINDALE'S

Margaret Hever.

"This clever novel has for its subject the struggle in a girl's nature when invaded and hypnotised by a man whom she fears and tries to repulse. A first novel, it is receiving a great deal of attention as a work that means something."

"A thoughtful book of first-rate quality."

6s.

W. H. DAVIES' Reminiscences

Beggars.

"This new work by the Author of 'A Super Tramp' is 'written in an excellent style.' It gives first-hand information on the art and craft of begging. 'He has probed to the bottom the mind of the true beggar,' and 'one meets with strange company under his guidance.'"

With a Portrait, 6s.

Mrs. W. K. CLIFFORD'S

Three Plays.

"There is so much charm in the writing, so much skill in construction, so sure a touch of humour. . . . Should have great attraction for a large section of the public."

—Evening Standard.

"Apart from their undoubted merits as drama, they possess fine qualities as literature."—Scotsman.

6s.

DUCKWORTH & CO., Covent Garden, LONDON.

A List of Autumn Announcements sent post free.

hood visited by the police. Being Irishmen, they cannot avow their firm belief that the doctor has absconded to escape his approaching marriage, and they are driven into the most humiliating evasions, all of which are scouted in turn by the exasperated Englishwoman. The plot thickens when Patsy Devlin himself disappears the next day, and confusion becomes general when two English M.P.'s, Mr. Dick and Mr. Sanders, who are touring the district with their wives, are also spirited away on the road to Pool-a-donagh. We shall leave our readers to investigate the mystery for themselves by procuring the book. Mr. Birmingham has a very nice sense of the humorous shades in Irish life and character, and he has succeeded in striking out an original line for himself.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

WE are informed that Mr. W. Grinton Berry's "John Milton" (Jarrold, 2s.) in the "Men of Fame" series has been designed for "secondary schools, students, reading circles, &c., and this circumstance quite justifies the elementary character of the criticism it contains. At the same time we cannot help thinking that the "young student," who is exhorted or advised on every other page, would not have resented a little more criticism of Milton and a little less advice addressed to himself. Mr. Berry has emphatically the schoolmaster touch. He is disposed, like many schoolmasters, to underestimate the intelligence of his audience; witness the reference to the Eikon Basilike, which title, he kindly but, one would think, rather superfluously, explains as "Greek words signifying the image or portraiture of the King." He is rightly desirous of impressing the student with Milton's power of suggestion, but his illustrations are not always happily chosen. For instance, in the chapter on "Paradise Lost," he observes that Milton's characteristic manner of indicating the distance between Heaven and Hell is to say that the conquered angels occupied nine days and nights in falling through the intervening chaos. "At what rate," proceeds Mr. Berry, "per hour, per minute, did they fall? Suppose an aeronaut to ascend five thousand feet . . . and then . . . leap out from his car, at what rate, &c.? . . . Suppose it was possible for him to continue this descent nine days and nine nights—what length of space would he traverse? . . . he (Milton) suggests a vast, undefined region of thought to be explored by the cogitation and fancy." We humbly submit that the interesting problems enumerated lie within the region of arithmetic rather than poetry; and that if Milton causes the young student's cogitation and fancy to wander in these directions, he had better be discarded in favor of Todhunter. However, the book is not all like this. There is a really illuminating comparison between Milton's attitude towards inanimate nature and that of Wordsworth or Burns. The poet's prose style, too, is capably dealt with, the comparative modernity of Shakespeare's being contrasted therewith. The book should serve its purpose as an introduction to a noble subject.

* * *

THE selection of four hundred "great" pictures out of the world's art production is a task that might dismay the most venturesome of book compilers. More than this number, however, are reproduced in "The World's Great Pictures" (Cassell & Co., 10s. 6d. net), a handsome publication containing nearly four hundred pages of text and illustrations, in which the great paintings of five centuries, from the fourteenth to the eighteenth, are dealt with. On the whole the book is very well done. The selection of works might have been better in some respects; but in view of the absence of any definite standard of taste—art criticism is a subject in which personal preferences are less distinguishable from actual right and wrong than in most others—we are not disposed to grumble overmuch. The text is discreet, and descriptive rather than critical. The worst blemish of the book appears to us to be that—excepting the British School, which is allowed to end with Turner—it practically excludes works of the nineteenth century. This arrangement is responsible for the French School culminating rather tamely with Madame Vigée Lebrun, and the German with Angelica Kauffmann; the latter's membership of the British Academy not preventing her from being relegated to the society of her compatriots. Thus we have none of the great pictures from the Romantic painters of France or the later Barbizon school, nothing from the history painters and realists of nineteenth-century Germany, nothing from the modern landscape school of Holland, nor from the Belgian school of the last hundred years. On the other hand, the older pictures have been explored fairly thoroughly, though there are instances of indiscrimination. We see no reason for giving a full-page reproduction of a work by Jan de Bray, an inconspicuous Dutchman who imitated Hals; considering that neither Honthorst nor Ravesteyn, more important artists of the same period, are not represented or mentioned. Again, the inclusion, in the Italian section, of two pictures by Melozzo da Forlì, and another by Francesco Albani, is typical of the modern tendency to regard every old Italian picture as great because it is Italian. One regrets the space occupied by these examples of minor masters the more because Titian's "Bacchus and Ariadne" has been omitted. This should not have been passed over by any book on the "world's great pictures," nor does the fact that other famous works of Titian are included afford any valid reason for leaving this out, if we are to regard the title of the book as indicative of its object. It is rather unfortunate, too, that the art of the brothers Pollaiuoli should be represented by a picture executed by Piero alone, seeing that he was admittedly an inferior painter to his brother Antonio. There are one or two somewhat unthinking descriptions of this or that painter's art. Is it fair, for example, to say of Carlo Crivelli, who clung to Byzantine archaism long after it had ceased as an element of Italian painting, and whose art was always controlled by a decorative motive, that he was "exaggeratedly dramatic"? Is it accurate to describe William van der Velde as "a true deep-sea painter"? Bakhuizen came nearer to the description, but in the light of what we nowadays understand thereby, neither of the Dutchmen could lay claim to the title, and the art of van der Velde is certainly remembered more pleasurably by his seashore scenes of sea and shipping. Yet the volume, whatever its sins of omission and commission in text or illustrations, is one that will give a great deal of pleasure to any art-lover who takes it up. The half-tone plates are admirably wrought; and though the color pictures vary somewhat in quality, the average is sufficiently high, and many a friend in the European galleries, whose memory has grown dim, can be recalled vividly enough through their agency.

* * *

READERS of the "Daily News," who have followed the fiscal controversy, will be familiar with many of the "101 Points against Tariff Reform," the series of notes which Mr. L. G. Chiozza Money began to contribute to that journal on March 23rd last, in answer to Mr. J. Ellis Barker's "101 Points against Free Trade," in the "Daily Express." After thirty-three days the "Express" ceased to publish its "Points" daily, and announced that they would issue the remainder in a booklet. The "Daily News" followed suit by publishing Mr. Money's replies in its penny series. The booklet, apart from the convincing, not to say crushing, character of its contents, is of the handiest possible size and shape for the pocket. Every Free Trader should get it.

* * *

DENMARK is certainly the most progressive of European countries in matters pertaining to agricultural development, and one hopes to find some explanation of this excellent feature of her national life in a book of travel in that country. Miss F. M. Butlin, the author of "Among the Danes" (Methuen, 7s. 6d. net), is an observant traveller, and paints not only the system of land-ownership, of co-operative indemnity closely associated with State aid and encouragement, but also some pleasant pictures of the peasants in Jutland and Seeland. Two chapters are given to Copenhagen, "the most peaceful, prosaic, and prosperous of modern cities," and its pleasant open-air life. Danish legend and history are also noticed at some length, and the author, who knows her subject well, is to be congratulated on a capital description of Denmark and its people.

"..... and I find that the smoking of a pipe of

CHAIRMAN

teaches a philosophy that is well worth knowing. Its fine qualities have a pleasing and soothing effect, minimising the little troubles and difficulties of life. It never obtrudes and it never palls, but, week in and week out, is the one tobacco that gives to most men the greatest pleasure in smoking—a pleasure which only the right tobacco for their palate can give. It is cool—always cool—and burns evenly to the last shred with a rich and pleasing aroma."

BOARDMAN'S

is the same tobacco milder, and the same but fuller flavoured.

RECORDER

Most tobacconists sell them at 6d. per oz. in 1 and 2 oz. packets, and $\frac{1}{4}$ and $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. tins.

R. J. LEA, MANCHESTER.

The Daily News

PRINTED SIMULTANEOUSLY
in LONDON & MANCHESTER.

"The Daily News" the representative Liberal Daily, is on sale all over England
first thing in the morning.

If you have any difficulty in procuring a copy communicate with the publisher.

LONDON AND MANCHESTER

Price One Halfpenny.

Head Offices: BOUVERIE STREET & FLEET STREET, E.C.
Telephone: 2626 Holborn (3 lines)

Northern Offices: 53, DALE STREET, MANCHESTER.
Telephone: 8031 Central.

"THE TRUE WAY OF LIFE."

By EDWARD GRUBB, M.A.

The BISHOP OF HEREFORD writes in a Foreword to the book:—

"We welcome the arguments set forth in this volume. We feel that the writer is doing the best national and international service, that he is in the direct line of those great preachers of national righteousness, the Hebrew Prophets, and we believe that his preaching of the true way of national and international relationships, as herein set forth, is destined to prevail, and that the time is coming when every monarch, statesman or diplomatist of good repute and all responsible leaders of public opinion will recognise that every nation or state or government is a morally responsible personality; and that all governments claiming to be civilised should hold each other amenable to the universal moral law of veracity and fair dealing."

All the Profits on this book will be devoted to the furtherance of Anglo-German Friendship. To be obtained of all booksellers.

Price 1s. net. Post free 1s. 2d.

Headley Brothers, 14 Bishopgate Without, London, E.C.

THE many admirers of Miss Agnes Weston, whose devoted work in connection with the Sailors' Rests at Devonport and Portsmouth is well known, will appreciate the record of that work as given in "My Life among the Blue-Jackets" (Nisbet, 6s. net). In this volume Miss Weston describes the influences that led her to a missionary career, and how she came to interest herself in the Navy; how, in partnership with Miss Wintz, she founded the first Sailors' Rest at Devonport; how the modest buildings at this centre and at Portsmouth developed into the palatial buildings; and how the hospitality of these is now extended to the navies of other countries. The opposition of the public-houses, which were for so long the only refuge of the sailor ashore, was one of her principal difficulties, and the story of their gradual conquest makes interesting reading. It is pleasant, also, to hear of the cordial relationship that has always existed between Miss Weston and persons in high places, from Royalty downwards. The opening chapters of the book are ingeniously autobiographical, and the whole work, leavened as it is by a strain of sincere piety, is written in a simple and intimate style.

* * *

THOSE who are interested in vine culture should not fail to read the white paper in which Lord Blyth records the results of his recent visit of official inquiry and report to South Africa. Those who have the wines of Cape Colony in their home know that—though there is some very good Cape wine in London—it does not at present stand export very well. Its best is of a finer and more delicate quality than most Australian vintages, but it does not seem to bear a long voyage so well. Therefore Lord Blyth is well advised in recommending the Cape growers, who include some thoroughly accomplished experts, to grow first for the home market.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning, Nov. 5.	Price Friday morning, Nov. 12.
Consols 2½ per cent.	82½	82½
German Threes	82	82½
Spanish Fours	93½	94½
Buenos Ayres Pacific	92	90
Steel Common	91½	91½

NOTHING is more wonderful than the buoyancy of the City, which is strong enough to repel not only the depressing influence of a five per cent. bank rate, but the rapidly-approaching menace of a national crisis in finance. Probably the firmness and cheerfulness of Wednesday's markets were due to the optimism of the Prime Minister's speech at the Mansion House. He was able to take a far more satisfactory view of foreign politics than last year; and so vast, so complex, so widely-spread are London's financial mercantile banking and shipping interests, ramifying, as they do, into every civilised or semi-civilised part of the earth, that nothing pleases City magnates more than prospects of settled peace and good relations with other Powers. Mr. Asquith's references to Germany gave special satisfaction. There is an idea that Germany has begun to co-operate with us on the Congo question, and the horrors of the Congo seem to have touched some quarters where the purse is usually larger than the heart. Foreign bonds have been much firmer, and it is expected that Portuguese will rise, temporarily at least, upon the visit of the King of Portugal. Some operators are taking an interest in home railways and predicting that certain of these stocks will have a biggish rise in the near future. This may very well happen, if the improvement in trade gains ground, as I expect it will. The J. and P. Coats figures for 1909 are wonderfully good—£216,000 better than a year ago.

THE TRADE RETURNS.

The returns for our imports and exports in October showed a rise of nearly two millions in imports, and of close upon a million in exports of British produce and manufactures over October of last year. Lancashire will observe that the figures are practically accounted for by the cotton trade, which bought two millions' worth more of raw cotton and sold to foreign customers £856,000 more of manufactured cotton goods. Our exports of woollen goods and of manufactured iron and steel also rose. In the first ten months of this year we have spent 207 millions on imports of food, drink, and tobacco. The table analysing this total and comparing it with the figures for the first ten months of 1908 are rather interesting, especially in view of the prominence given lately to the Tariff Reform substitute for the present Budget. Here they are:—

I.—FOOD, DRINK, AND TOBACCO.

	1908.	1909.
A. Grain and Flour	£59,997,186	£68,871,531
B. Meat, including Animals for food	40,953,011	39,555,302
C. Other food and drink:
(1) Non-dutiable	56,660,109	55,273,425
(2) Dutiable	39,506,296	39,539,740
D. Tobacco	4,183,706	4,148,651
Total, Class I.	£201,300,308	£207,388,649

The first three figures in each year represent free untaxed food, and as the stomachs of rich and poor are equal, it will be obvious that a tax upon these would operate very much as a poll tax after the manner advocated by the rich Budget-framers among the Penguins. Let me add for further material another table of another class of imports which have been much in controversy:—

II.—RAW MATERIALS AND ARTICLES MAINLY UNMANUFACTURED.

	1908.	1909.
A. Coal, Coke, and Manufactured Fuel	£4,051	£5,082
B. Iron Ore, Scrap Iron, and Steel ...	4,100,176	4,074,931
C. Other Metallic Ores	7,611,127	6,829,484
D. Wood and Timber	21,229,975	19,812,310
E. Cotton	39,872,639	41,669,667
F. Wool	25,457,290	28,656,110
G. Other Textile Materials	10,674,093	9,287,435
H. Oil Seeds, Nuts, Oils, &c.	24,119,252	25,413,160
I. Hides and Skins	7,891,115	9,514,184
J. Paper Making Materials	3,767,459	3,530,073
K. Miscellaneous	18,393,002	22,464,818
Total	£163,120,179	£171,257,254

About these categories Tariff Reformers are hopelessly at variance. Some, like Mr. Wyndham, would tax wood and some would not. Others look at the table rather with an eye to imperial preference. A third table has particular interest in view of the possibility that through the action of the House of Lords our Customs Tariff, more especially the Tea Duties, may be thrown out of gear. It is an account of the quantities of the principal articles of imported merchandise, subject to duties of Customs, remaining in the bonded warehouses of the United Kingdom or entered to be warehoused therein on October 31st, 1909, as compared with the quantities on October 31st, 1908, and October 31st, 1907:—

	1908.	1909.
Chicory (cwt.)	4,000	3,000
Cocoa, raw (lb.)	11,899,000	19,651,000
Cocoa, prepared (lb.)	121,000	172,000
Coffee (cwt.)	582,000	501,000
Currants (cwt.)	512,000	330,000
Raisins (cwt.)	231,000	295,000
Spirits (prf. galls.)	9,937,000	10,327,000
Sugar (cwt.)	2,840,000	2,250,000
Tea (lb.)	113,157,000	108,118,000
Tobacco, manufactured (lb.)	1,361,000	1,519,000
.. unmanufactured (lb.)	192,365,000	206,484,000
Wine (galls.)	4,748,000	4,739,000

THE FINANCIAL DANGER.

Though the City (as I have said) has been fairly cheerful, at least up to Thursday night, some astute financiers are making anxious inquiries about the action of the Lords. It is all very well for the wild peers to have a row, but the row may cost the City dear. "What will be the deficiency?" is asked when the rejection of the Budget is discussed, and the answer varies from 50 millions downwards. The top figure, it is whispered, has appeared in a Treasury calculation. But there is a latent notion that our statesmen are too practical to allow chaos and confusion to enter the doors of the Customs and Inland Revenue. Then there is not much confidence in the "Times" since Lord Northcliffe took it over; and it was the "Times" that announced the move against the Budget. Certainly the firmness of Consols has been wonderful. I think it is too good to last; for apart from the Lords, there is dear money and no immediate prospect of relaxation. The bank return was disappointing, and a six per cent rate is still on the cards.

LUCELLUM.

MAKERS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

There is one cocoa that is always appreciated and enjoyed,
because of its pleasing flavour.

Rowntree's Cocoa

is delicious!

Are You a Writer?

Whether Journalist, Student, Secretary—whatever status you occupy where writing is essential, you will find the greatest possible help from the . . .

BLICKENSERFER

Visible Writing
TYPEWRITER

This Machine does beautiful work, and fulfils all the practical purposes of a high-priced Machine. It can be had in three different Models at Prices from £9 9s. to £13 13s.

Less Liberal Cash Discount or Easy Terms.

All Models have Visible Writing, Interchangeable Type, Perfect and Permanent Alignment, Variable Line Widths, together with a handiness all their own.

The "Oriental" pattern writes at will either from left to right or from right to left. Can be arranged to work in almost every language upon the one machine, including Hebrew and English.

WRITE FOR LIST No. 76 NOW.

THE BLICKENSERFER CO., LTD.,
9 & 10, CHEAPSIDE, LONDON, E.C.

After the theatre

After the theatre, with its pleasant excitement, its warmth and glow: after the theatre—the chill!

Sometimes the chill is hardly noticed; so don't leave the chill to chance, and the checking till too late.

Chills are checked at once by taking a hot

Mustard Bath

—a bath to which a couple of tablespoonfuls or so of COLMAN'S MUSTARD have been added. Try it yourself.

Colman's mustard

SUPPORT HOME INDUSTRIES.

STAND 56 OLYMPIA

25/30 H.P.

35/45 H.P.

"A car in every sense worthy of the best Traditions of BRITISH WORKMANSHIP."

See our NEW "SEVENTEEN."

THE MAUDSLAY MOTOR CO. (1907) Ltd.,
60, PICCADILLY,
LONDON, W.

Works: Coventry.

LONDON COUNTY & WESTMINSTER BANK, LIMITED.

ESTABLISHED IN 1836

CAPITAL - £14,000,000, in 700,000 Shares of £20 each.
Paid-up Capital, £3,500,000. Reserve Fund, £4,250,000.

Head Office: 41, LOTHBURY, E.C.
LOMBARD STREET OFFICE: 21, Lombard Street, E.C.
WEST END OFFICE: 1, St. James's Square, S.W.
Foreign Branch—80, Cornhill, E.C.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS are opened on the usual terms. Facilities are given Customers at any Branch for the transfer of money to or from any other Branch.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.—Sums of £10 and upwards are received on deposit at interest, subject to notice of withdrawal, or by special agreement, in accordance with the usual custom.

EXECUTOR AND TRUSTEE BUSINESS UNDERTAKEN.

PURCHASE AND SALE of Stocks and Shares effected.

DIVIDENDS, ANNUITIES, &c., received.

THE AGENCY OF FOREIGN AND COUNTRY BANKS is undertaken, and every description of Banking Business transacted.

FOREIGN DEPARTMENT.

CURRENCY DRAFTS, CIRCULAR NOTES and LETTERS OF CREDIT are issued, and TELEGRAPHIC TRANSFERS made to all parts of the world.

APPROVED FOREIGN DRAFTS are purchased, and Collections undertaken.

DOCUMENTARY CREDITS are established, and every facility given for the handling of Documents to or from Abroad.

The Officers of the Bank are bound to secrecy.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£12 12s. OPORTO, GIBRAITER, TANGIERS, ALGIERS, PAIERMO, February 15th.

£26 5s. PALESTINE, EGYPT, CONSTANTINOPLE, GREECE,
March 3rd.

Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

ALPINE SPORTS LIMITED beg to announce that they have secured the entire accommodation in the following hotels for the winter season for SKATING, TOBOGGANNING, CURLING, SKI-ING and SLEIGHING:—MONTANA PALACE, VILLARS-SUR-OLLON, the seven principal hotels; MORGINS-LES-BAINS, two hotels; ST. BEATENBERG, two hotels; KANDERSTEG, Hotel VICTORIA, WENGEN, four hotels; LENZERHEIDE, Kurhaus, BALLAIGUES, GRAND HOTEL AUBEPINE, &c. For illustrated handbook apply to The Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, N.W.

Now ready. Small 4to, pp. x-270, 1s. net.

RELICTA. Poems. By ARTHUR MUNBY.

"The book cannot fail to please a serious, quiet-minded lover of poetry."—Scotsman.

Other Works by the same Author:—

POEMS, CHIEFLY LYRI AND ELEGIAC. Small 4to, 5s.

VESTIGIA RETRORSUM. Crown 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

ANN MORGAN'S LOVE. Crown 8vo, 1s.

SUSAN: a Poem of Degrees. Small 4to, 2s.

BERTRAM DOBELL, 77, Charing Cross Road, London.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Scholarship Examination in December.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE. BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country, with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

ST. GEORGE'S CLASSES, EDINBURGH.

(FOUNDED 1876.)

TUITION BY CORRESPONDENCE.

Help and Direction for Home Students in Literature, Fine Art (Special Subject for 1909-10, "The National Gallery—Foreign Schools"), History, Geography, Philosophy, Languages, Science, &c.

The Classes, under the direction of an Honorary Committee of Ladies, are conducted by experienced tutors of high University attainment who work in direct communication with their students. Preparation for examinations. Fees from 12s. per term. Write for Prospectus to Secretary, St. George's Classes, Edinburgh.

SESAME HOUSE for Home-life Training and for Training of Children, Lady Nurses and Kindergarten. For full particulars apply, the Principal Miss Emily Last, 45A, Acacia Road, London, N.W.

CO-EDUCATION.

SIDCOT SCHOOL, WINSCOMBE, SOMERSET.

FOUNDED 1808.

80 BOYS. 64 GIRLS. Ages 11-18 years.

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.
All particulars from Dr. BEVAN LEAN, Headmaster.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of
Other Bibles and Prayer
Books from Oxford and
6d. to £10.

I
B
L
E
S

Illustrated,
Wide Margin,
Interleaved,
Teachers',
Interlinear
Revised,
and other Editions.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

Telephone Central 329

PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS

Catalogue No. 367. Just Out

WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD.,

265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

Also a Useful and Comprehensive Catalogue of Current General Literature, Fiction, Science, Art, &c.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE,
SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills. & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

KINGSLEY HOTEL, Near the British Museum.
Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

THACKERAY HOTEL,
Opposite the British Museum.
Great Russell Street, London.

These well-appointed and commodious Temperance Hotels will, it is believed, meet the requirements at moderate charges of those who desire all the conveniences and advantages of the larger modern Licensed Hotels. These Hotels have Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every floor, spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard, and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive charge for Bedroom, Attendance Table d'Hôte, Breakfast and Dinner, From 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

Full Tariff and Testimonials on application.

Telegraphic Addresses—

Kingsley Hotel, "Bookcraft, London." Thackeray Hotel, "Thackeray, London."

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71 Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel, Close Pier; 1st Class; moderate

SILVER HOW., Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL 120 rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.

CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell

Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone 3032 Royal, 3 wires

GRAPES HOTEL, Tarleton St. Snacks and Luncheons. Tel. 3074
Royal. G. Cutts, Prop.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LLANDUDNO.

The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).

ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.

RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL. Rhondda Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s per day. Tel. 422.

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

ALBERT HOTEL. Ordinary daily. Sunday Table d'Hôte. H. E. Taylor

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

Your Week End
Is Not Complete

WITHOUT

The Saturday Westminster

(The Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette.")

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the kind.

"F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.
An Unique page of "Problems and Prizes,"
Book Reviews and Special Literary
Articles by the best known Writers.

ONE PENNY. Post 6/6 per annum (home), 8/8 (abroad).

Offices: Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION PUBLISHING Co. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME V. OF THE NATION

Is now ready, and can be obtained free on application to the Manager.

IMPORTANT NOTICE

Messrs. Methuen have just published one of the most important books of the year for which the demand everywhere is great:—

THE SURVIVAL OF MAN: a Study of Unrecognised Human Faculty. By Sir OLIVER LODGE, F.R.S. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Methuen have also just published the following books:—

BY THE WATERS OF EGYPT. By NORMA LORIMER. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.

A CENTURY OF SPAIN AND PORTUGAL. By Lieut-Col. G. F. WHITE. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

MAN AND NATURE ON TIDAL WATERS. By A. H. PATTERSON. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s.

FUNGI AND HOW TO KNOW THEM. By E. W. SWANTON. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE SPIRITUAL COMBAT. By DOM LORENZO SCUPOLI. Newly translated by THOMAS BARNES, M.A. Small pott 8vo, 2s.; leather, 2s. 6d. net. [Library of Devotion.]

The Last Three Volumes of the COLLECTED EDITION of the WORKS of OSCAR WILDE are also ready:—

10. DE PROFUNDIS AND PRISON LETTERS. (This is the Fourteenth Edition and contains new matter.)

11. ESSAYS. ('Historical Criticism,' 'English Renaissance,' 'London Models,' 'Poems in Prose.')

12. SALOME. (Containing a new Preface by the Editor, a Bibliographical Note and Two Plays: a Florentine Tragedy, 'La Sainte Courtisane.') Fcap. 8vo, 5s. net each.

GENERAL LITERATURE

ON EVERYTHING. By HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P., Author of "On Nothing." Fcap. 8vo, 5s.

REMINISCENCES OF A K.C. By T. E. CRISPE, K.C. With 2 Portraits. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE BOOK OF THE ZOO: by Day and Night. By ERIC PARKER. With 24 Illustrations from Photographs by HENRY IRVING. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Author has tried in this book to make a round of the Zoological Gardens, and to show the Animals to a visitor as they appear to one who has spent many hours watching their individual characters and habits in captivity.

RAPHAEL. By A. OPPÉ. With 200 Plates, wide royal 8vo, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net. [Classics of Art.]

THE AUSTRIAN COURT IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. By Sir HORACE RUMBOLD, late Ambassador at Vienna. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 18s. net. [Second Edition.]

"Its survey is wide; it abounds in personal touches, and is never lacking in human interest."—Daily Telegraph.

MARIE ANTOINETTE. By HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P. With 35 Portraits and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

"The story is told with a full appeal to contemporary evidence and with dramatic skill."—Standard.

GOOD COMPANY: a Rally of Men. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo, 5s.

This is uniform with "The Open Road." "The title is just; the characters are pleasant companions, the anthology very agreeable."—Morning Leader.

THE WORKS OF OSCAR WILDE. A New Edition, reset in 12 vols. fcap. 8vo, 5s. net each.

1. LORD ARTHUR SAVILE'S CRIME. 2. THE DUCHESS OF PADUA. 3. POEMS (including "The Ballad of Reading Gaol" and "The Sphinx"). 4. LADY WINDERMERE'S FAN. 5. A WOMAN OF NO IMPORTANCE. 6. AN IDEAL HUSBAND. 7. THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING EARNEST. 8. A HOUSE OF POMEGRANATES. 9. INTENTIONS.

TREMENDOUS TRIFLES. By G. K. CHESTERTON. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. [Second Edition.]

"There is bubbling humour; there is ripe philosophy."—Onlooker.

ONE DAY AND ANOTHER. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. [Second Edition.]

"An elysium of humour and humanity."—Pall Mall Gazette.

A WANDERER IN PARIS. By E. V. LUCAS. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by WALTER DEXTER, and 32 from Photographs after Old Masters. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.]

"M. E. V. Lucas vient, en effet, en bon Samaritain, de se pencher sur la misère du voyageur mélancolique; il lui a donné un beau livre dont l'écriture est chatoyante et féline, un livre sur Paris tout plein d'images et de faits mais tout plein aussi d'humour et de grâce familière."—M. CHARLES CHASSE, in L'Opinion.

"The soul of Paris is caught and reflected in these pages."—Standard.

SHELLEY: the Man and the Poet. By A. CLUTTON BROCK. With 12 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"A fine combination of accuracy, penetration, and charm."—Morning Leader.

THE NINE DAYS' QUEEN: being the Life of the LADY JANE GREY. By RICHARD DAVEY. Edited by MARTIN HUME, M.A. With 12 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Romantic History.]

"This scholarly book is written with conspicuous charm."—Standard.

MATILDA OF TUSCANY. By NORA DUFF. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

SIR PHILIP SIDNEY. By PERCY ADDLESHAW. With 12 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE MAXIMS OF MARMADUKE. By C. E. JERNINGHAM. Fcap. 8vo, 5s.

"The vivacity of the author never flags."—Daily Mail.

THE PILGRIM FATHERS: their Church and Colony. By WINIFRED COCKSHOTT. St. Hilda's Hall, Oxford. With 12 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE MEDÆVAL HOSPITALS OF ENGLAND. By ROTHAMARY CLAY. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [The Antiquary's Books.]

ONE HUNDRED MASTERPIECES OF SCULPTURE. With an Introduction and Descriptive Notes by G. F. HILL. With 101 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. A splendid book.

"An admirable study of the development of sculpture, well-informed and well written."—Scotsman.

THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

By EDWARD GIBBON. Edited by J. B. BURY, Litt.D. In 7 vols. Vols. I. and II. each 10s. 6d. net.

This is a completely new Edition, newly set in large type, with many Illustrations and new Maps.

THE INCOMPARABLE SIDDONS. By Mrs. CLEMENT PARSONS, Author of "Garrick and his Circle." With 20 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

"A picturesque presentation of Mrs. Siddons' life and times, and a critical study of her art."—Clarion.

"A delightful book on a fascinating theme."—Stage.

THE COURT OF A SAINT. By WINIFRED F. KNOX. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

This is a Life of St. Louis of France.

AIR AND HEALTH. By RONALD C. MACFIE. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [New Library of Medicine.]

A scientific and practical book on air in reference to health and disease, climate, dust, fog, and ventilation.

FOOD AND HEALTH. By A. E. POWELL, Lieutenant Royal Engineers. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

MY PETS. By ALEXANDRE DUMAS. Translated by A. R. ALLINSON. With 16 Illustrations by V. LECOMTE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

ROME. By EDWARD HUTTON, Author of "The Cities of Umbria." With 16 Illustrations in Colour by MAXWELL ARMFIELD, and 12 other Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

A ROSE OF SAVOY: Marie Adelaide of Savoy, Duchesse de Bourgogne, Mother of Louis XV. By H. NOEL WILLIAMS. With a Frontispiece in Photogravure and 16 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

THE COURT OF LOUIS XIII. By K. A. PATMORE. With 16 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Second Edition.]

ST. TERESA OF SPAIN. By HELEN H. COLVILL. With 20 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"A trustworthy history of a remarkable woman. . . . A suggestive and admirable volume."—Globe.

FICTION

SAILORS' KNOTS. By W. W. JACOBS, Author of "Many Cargoes." Illustrated by WILL OWEN. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. [Second Edition.]

"There is not a page without a good healthy, hearty laugh."—Morning Post.

"They are works of art; they are real short stories."—Morning Leader.

THE TYRANT. By Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE, Author of "The Lonely Lady of Grosvenor Square." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.]

"Remarkably charming and truthful."—Morning Leader.

"Delightfully written; tears and laughter mingle in it."—Manchester Courier.

NORTHERN LIGHTS. By Sir GILBERT PARKER, M.P., Author of "The Weavers." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.]

"These stories will be read by future generations."—Morning Post.

THE SEVERINS. By Mrs. ALFRED SIDGWICK, Author of "The Kinsman." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition.]

"The charm and freshness of the book are delightful."—Morning Leader.

"For all-round excellence 'The Severins' show us Mrs. Sidgwick at her best."—Spectator.

THE PRICE OF LIS DORIS. By MAARTEN MAARTENS, Author of "Brothers All," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The pictures of character are wonderfully firm and clear; their intimacy and vitality is surprising. A strong and valuable novel."—Morning Leader.

METHUEN'S POPULAR NOVELS

SIX SHILLINGS EACH

THE SEARCH PARTY G. A. BIRMINGHAM

SPLENDID BROTHER W. PETT RIDGE

TOIL OF MEN ISRAEL QUERIDO

THE COLUMN OF DUST EVELYN UNDERHILL

THE BURNED CHILDREN MARY E. MANN

THE BURNED OFFERING SARA JEANNETTE DUNCAN

THE FIRST ROUND ST. JOHN LUCAS

IN AMBUSH MARIE VAN VORST

JACK CARSTAIRS OF THE POWER HOUSE SYDNEY SANDYS

THE SQUIRE'S DAUGHTER ARCHIBALD MARSHALL

HAPPINESS MAUD STEPNEY RAWSON

LOVE AND THE WISE MEN PERCY WHITE

GIANELLA MRS. HUGH FRASER

LORDS OF THE SEA EDWARD NOBLE

THIS DAY'S MADNESS MAUDE ANNESLEY

THE BRIDE GRACE RHYS

THE CASTLE BY THE SEA H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON

WATCHERS BY THE SHORE J. E. PATTERSON

A ROYAL INDISCRETION RICHARD MARSH

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1909.

The Nation

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1909.

Mr. EDWARD ARNOLD'S New Books.

THIRD IMPRESSION IN THE PRESS.

Lady St. Helier's Memories of Fifty Years.

By MARY JEUNE (Lady St. Helier).

With Illustrations, 1 vol. demy 8vo, cloth, 15s. net.

Truth.—"A matchless record of the people who have helped to make the past fifty years stand out in English history."
Observer.—"One could go on indefinitely enumerating the good things in this book, which is likely to be one of the most repandu publications of the season."

Daily Telegraph.—"Peculiarly fascinating. Likely to prove an invaluable contribution to the history of our times."
Saturday Review.—"A part from its being a fascinating record of the past, every woman with social ambition should read this book in order to learn her lesson."

FIRST IMPRESSION EXHAUSTED BEFORE PUBLICATION.—SECOND IMPRESSION READY.

Lady Sarah Wilson's South African Memories.

By Lady SARAH WILSON.

With Illustrations, 1 vol. demy 8vo, 15s. net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"Whether writing of men or events, of war, about Mafeking, or of the amazing scenery about the Falls of the Zambesi, the author always gives us matter that will repay perusal, that interests us by its subject, and attracts us by its directness and lack of affectation."

EVENING STANDARD.—"Tells us exactly what we want to know."

EDMUND GARRETT: A Memoir. By E. T. COOK, Joint Editor of Ruskin's Works, &c. With Portrait, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

The Evening Standard says:—"This book should be read. It is a memoir of a man. The book ought to make a wide appeal for the reason that it is a fine record of a fine character. It is full of hope, high spirits, and the joy of battle against the world and fate."

THE LIFE OF SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW, Bart. By GEORGE SMALLEY, M.A., Author of "Studies of Men," &c. With Portrait, 1 vol. demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

TEN GREAT AND GOOD MEN. Lectures by HENRY MONTAGU BUTLER, D.D., D.C.L., Master of Trinity College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

AN IMPORTANT HISTORICAL WORK IN THREE VOLUMES (TO BE ISSUED AT INTERVALS OF SIX MONTHS).—VOL. I. READY.

A CENTURY OF EMPIRE, 1801-1900.

By the Right Hon. Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart., P.C., Author of "The Life of Wellington," &c.

Vol. I., from 1801 to 1832. With Photogravure Portraits, about 400 pages, demy 8vo, cloth, 14s. net.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"Eminently readable; in fact there is not a dull page in it."

NEW BOOKS ON TRAVEL.

TURKEY IN TRANSITION. By G. F. ABBOTT, Author of "The Tale of a Tour in Macedonia," &c. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

HIGH ALBANIA. By M. EDITH DURHAM, Author of "The Burden of the Balkans," &c. Fully Illustrated, with Map, demy 8vo, 14s. net.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITIONS.

IN THE DESERT: the Hinterland of Algiers. By L. MARCH PHILLIPPS. With Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s. net.

A PARSON IN THE AUSTRALIAN BUSH. By the Rev. C. H. S. MATTHEWS. Illustrated, 3s. 6d. net.

SIKHIM AND BHUTAN: Experiences of Twenty-one Years on the North-Eastern Frontier of India. By JOHN CLAUDE WHITE, C.I.E., lately Political Agent in Sikhim. With magnificent Illustrations and a Map, 1 vol. royal 8vo, 21s. net.

A SCAMPER THROUGH THE FAR EAST, Including a Visit to the Manchurian Battlefields. By Major H. H. AUSTIN, C.M.G., D.S.O., R.E. With Illustrations and Maps, 1 vol. demy 8vo, 16s. net.

HOUSEBOAT DAYS IN CHINA. By J. O. P. BLAND. Illustrated by W. D. STRAIGHT. With Map, medium 8vo, 15s. net. Scotsman.—"Mr. Bland's book is excellent."

Charmingly Illustrated in Colour by Mrs. ALLINGHAM.

THE COTTAGE HOMES OF ENGLAND.

With 64 Full-page Coloured Plates from Pictures by HELEN ALLINGHAM, never before reproduced. 8vo (9½ in. by 7 in.), 21s. net. Also a limited Edition de Luxe, 42s. net.

BOOKS ON COUNTRY LIFE AND SPORT.

TEN YEARS OF GAME KEEPING. By OWEN JONES. Fully Illustrated, 10s. 6d. net.

The Observer says:—"A fascinating book, full of the sense of the open air."

MEMORIES OF THE MONTHS. Fifth Series. By the Rt. Hon. Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart. With Photogravure Plates, large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. (Uniform with Series I., II., III., and IV.)

THE SALMON RIVERS AND LOCHS OF Scotland. By W. L. CALDERWOOD, Inspector of Fisheries to the Fishery Board for Scotland. Author of "The Life of a Salmon." With Illustrations and Maps, demy 8vo, 21s. net. Also a Large-Paper Edition, limited to 250 copies, £2 2s. net.

IN A YORKSHIRE GARDEN. By REGINALD FARRER. Author of "My Rock Garden," &c. With Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

A CRUCIAL EXPERIMENT. By A. C. FARQUHARSON, Author of "St. Nazarius," &c.

The British Weekly says:—"Remarkable for its high literary power, its excellent, firm, graphic style, and also for the feeling, restrained but sufficient, which is thrown into the narrative and makes it a pleasure to read."

THE BEGGAR IN THE HEART. By EDITH RICKERT, Author of "The Golden Hawk," &c.

The Athenæum says:—"Interesting and unusual."

THE PASQUE FLOWER. By JANE WARDLE, Author of "Margery Pigeon," &c.

The Times says:—"There is more seriousness and pathos here than in Miss Wardle's humorous 'Margery Pigeon,' but in either vein she is a delightful writer."

THE MYSTERY OF THE YELLOW ROOM. By GASTON LEROUX.

The Morning Leader says:—"Neither Mr. Futrelle nor M. Leblanc, the most original of recent criminal novelists, has produced a more striking and intriguing work, or better characters."

 PLEASE WRITE FOR PROSPECTUSES GIVING FURTHER PARTICULARS OF THE ABOVE PUBLICATIONS.

London: EDWARD ARNOLD, 41 and 43 Maddox Street, Bond Street, W.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

In the Grip of the Nyika. Further Adventures in British East Africa. By LIEUT.-COLONEL J. H. PATTERSON, D.S.O., Author of "The Man-Eaters of Tsavo." With Illustrations. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

[November 19.]

NEW COLOUR BOOKS.

The French Pastellists of the Eighteenth Century. By HALDANE MACFALL. Edited by T. LEMAN HARE. With 40 Examples in Colour and 12 in Black. Demy 4to, 42s. net.

The Water Babies. By CHARLES KINGSLEY. With 32 Illustrations in Colour, by Warwick Goble. Crown 4to, 15s. net. Also an Edition de Luxe, printed on Hand-made Paper, and limited to 250 copies. Demy 4to, 42s. net.

Highways and Byways in Middlesex. By WALTER JERROLD. With Illustrations by Hugh Thomson, and a Map. Extra Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

The Education of Uncle Paul. By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD, Author of "Jimbo: A Phantasy." [Tuesday.]

Open Country. By MAURICE HEWLETT.

Stradella: An Old Italian Love Tale. By F. MARION CRAWFORD.

The Key of the Unknown. By ROSA N. CAREY.

Robert Emmet: A Historical Romance. By STEPHEN GWYNN.

The Story of the Little Merman. A Story for Children. By ETHEL READER. With 8 Illustrations by Frank C. Papé. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE GEM SERIES.

Miniature Volumes, bound in Peltine Leather, Gilt, with Decorated Titles, F'cap 16mo, 1s. net each.

Christmas, Christmas Eve, and Christmas Day. By WASHINGTON IRVING. With Illustrations by Randolph Caldecott.

Country Pictures. By MARY RUSSELL MITFORD. With Illustrations by Hugh Thomson.

Faithless Sally Brown, and other Poems. By THOMAS HOOD. With Illustrations by Charles E. Brock.

Goblin Market. By CHRISTINA G. ROSSETTI. With Illustrations by Laurence Housman.

In Memoriam. By LORD TENNYSON.

Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam. Fourth Edition. Translated by Edward FitzGerald.

St. Paul: a Poem. By FREDERIC W. H. MYERS.

Actions and Reactions. By Rudyard Kipling.

UNIFORM EDITION—Scarlet cloth, Extra Crown 8vo, 6s.
POCKET EDITION—India Paper, Limp Leather, F'cap 8vo, 5s. net.

Lord Kelvin's Early Home.

Being the Recollections of his Sister, the late Mrs. Elizabeth King. With Illustrations. 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

[November 19.]

CHEAPER RE-ISSUE.

Memorials of Edward Burne-Jones. By G. B. J. Cheaper Re-issue. With 2 Photogravure Plates and other Illustrations. 2 vols. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Life of Robert Machray, D.D., LL.D., D.C.L., Archbishop of Rupert's Land, Primate of All Canada. By his Nephew, ROBERT MACHRAY. With Photogravure and other Illustrations. 8vo, 21s. net.

Aesthetic as Science of Expression and General Linguistic. Translated from the Italian of Benedetto Croce, by DOUGLAS AINSLIE, B.A. (Oxon). 8vo, 10s. net.

Aristophanes and the Political Parties at Athens. By MAURICE CROiset. Translated by James Loeb. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Essays on Greek Literature. By R. V. TYRRELL, Litt.D., D.C.L., LL.D., &c. Crown 8vo., 4s. net. Contents:—Pindar's Odes of Victory—Sophocles—The New Papyri—The Poems of Bacchylides—Plutarch.

The Principles of Religious Development. A Psychological and Philosophical Study. By GEORGE GALLOWAY, M.A., B.D., D.Phil. 8vo, 10s. net.

An Amplifier Sky. A Volume of Poems. By LANCE FALLAW. Crown 8vo, 3s. net.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED AND ENLARGED.
An Introductory Logic. By Professor James Edwin Creighton. Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged, with the addition of new Problems and Examples. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

Select Orations Illustrating American Political History. Selected and Edited by Professor S. B. Harding, Ph.D. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Macmillan's Illustrated Catalogue post free on application.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

The Nation

Reviews.

MARIE ANTOINETTE.*

IN a publisher's hors d'œuvre which adorns the cover of this volume, the reader is informed that Mr. Belloc treats his subject "with considerable simplicity." The statement is calculated to whet the appetite of all who delight in Mr. Belloc's work; but the spectator who beholds the prologue of this impressive tragedy is soon relieved of the fear awakened by that singular foreword. It is soon apparent that Mr. Belloc has not lost himself, and that he is still himself. The reader is soon enfolded in the convolutions of the author's capacious mind, and with him gazes at the march of the centuries that preceded the Diplomatic Revolution of the years 1755-1756. The narrative is characteristic. It oscillates between brooding introspection and tangential rhapsodies. We once heard a lady express delight in a lecturer because "My dear, you never know what he is going to say next!" That is part of the secret of the charm of Mr. Belloc.

His paradox is never so daring as when the theme of religion glints before his rapt vision. And this often happens. It is difficult to say whether the first chapter belongs to the sphere of history or of neo-Catholic propaganda. The author traces the causes of the Diplomatic Revolution—in other words, the Franco-Austrian Alliance of 1755-1756—back to the Reformation. The "great schism" broke up the unity of Europe, dividing it into the States of the South, representing Faith and Tradition, against the robber States of the North, Great Britain and Prussia. These last showed their real bent when Frederick the Great seized Silesia, and England harried the peaceful French in their colonies and on the high seas. It was the work of Maria Theresa, Kaunitz and Louis XV. to punish the robbers, restore the Faith, and preserve the unity of Europe. Such is the thesis. We will not labor to refute it, for those who know the other side of the Silesian question, and have heard of the policy of Dupleix and Montcalm, will perceive its hollowness. It runs on all fours with the singular statement that, had the vast disturbance of the Reformation impaired the traditions of France, as it did of England, European civilisation must have perished, or that the second manifestation of "the atheist theory," on which the rise of Prussia was based, was Bismarck's forgery (sic) of the Ems telegram in 1870. Again, those who know the facts will shrug their shoulders and read on, fully conscious of this much—that if the solidarity of Europe were an actual and blessed fact up to the year 1740, there is small chance of its being restored (as Mr. Belloc seems to hint) by the combined efforts of those champions of the Faith—France, Austria, Italy, and Spain.

But all this is but the airy vestibule of the fabric. Premonitory signs must, however, always be noted in the case of so artistic a writer as Mr. Belloc. For, according to him, that singularly unscrupulous statesman, Kaunitz, had in view the restoration of the true religion when he framed the French alliance and furthered Maria Theresa's scheme of the marriage of the little Marie Antoinette to the grandson of Louis XV. The natal signs were portentous. The day before the birth of the Princess an earthquake brought swift doom on the heads of the faithful who were crowding the churches of Lisbon at High Mass on All Saints' Day. Earth, water, and fire conspired to work havoc. And at that very time the envoys of Maria Theresa were there to request that the King and Queen of Portugal would be sponsors for the child. Certainly the omens were not favorable.

Mr. Belloc tells, in his rapid, picturesque style, the story of the training of Marie Antoinette, or, rather, of the failure to train her, and he sketches pointedly the long vista of consequences resulting from the ignorance and levity of this vivacious girl when transferred prematurely to that centre of starched etiquette and venomous intrigue, the Court of Versailles. Seeing that her marriage with the future Louis XVI. was but a boy and girl affair, Mr. Belloc seems to us to insist needlessly on the lack of issue of the first years. But we must refer our readers to his pages on that curious topic. Undoubtedly her influence over her husband increased when a son was born—the unfortunate child who died in the early days of the Revolution; but it is questionable whether the influence of l'Autrichienne on French policy was so great as has often been represented. Certainly the tittle-tattle of Versailles and Paris magnified it tenfold, as when the subsidy of 15,000,000 louis to Austria in 1778 became "a whole convoy of gold"—a thing flung in her teeth as she went to the scaffold. It is not easy to understand the unpopularity of this charming young Queen. Of course, she was extravagant, but less so than the mistresses of Louis XV.; she gambled, but for smaller sums than very many of the nobles; she had her own private theatre at the Trianon, and acted and sang (far from well) at it; but then a private theatre was a usual adjunct to a great mansion. In this connection we note that Mr. Belloc deals out lusty blows at the riotous display of London Jews, the wicked extravagance and worse of the London newspapers, the Stock Exchange, and the wealthy generally. Certainly it adds to the fun of this historical mêlée to see Mr. Belloc bowling over every figure that crosses the beam of his ever-revolving vision. But does it advance the subject at issue? Of what avail is it to establish the thesis that France was very poor then, and very wealthy now, while England was then bursting with riches, which now (strange to say) are depleted and vanishing? Or is it germane to the subject to compare the debts of Marie Antoinette, which were an affair of State, with those of Pitt and Fox, which were not? And why does Mr. Belloc fling out the remark that England "taxes" India?

Returning from these Quixotic quests to the main track, constantly crossed by alluring glades down which our Knight Errant eagerly plunges after some heretic, we cannot but be struck by the vigor of his portrait sketches and the charm of his style. His portraits generally err by excess, but they bite the imagination. We may demur to the glorification of Kaunitz, the undue depreciation of Joseph II., the constant sneers against "the Huguenot," Necker, and all others who had strayed from the one fold, but the vigor of the characterisation excites our admiration. So does the style. It is artistically varied—sometimes sonorous, always vigorous and pointed, and it has that power of arresting thought by unexpected turns and graces, which delights the reader of Burke. Above all, it bodies forth men and things in a charmingly visual form. Mr. Belloc has been at pains to gaze at many of the scenes which he describes, and he sharpens the outline of his narrative by convincingly pictorial touches. Examples of this are the reception of the child-bride by Louis XV. and the Dauphin in a wooded glade of the road near Compiègne, some scenes in the Diamond Necklace affair, the march of the deputies to the Church of St. Louis at Versailles in May, 1789 (a brief account, but comparable with Carlyle's, and more accurate in one important detail), and the following passage, describing the deputies of France filing away from Salle des Menus Plaisirs, which the King and Court had closed against them (June 20th, 1789):—

"That very middle-class sight, a great mob of umbrellas wandering in the streets, was full of will: wandering from one place to another, they landed at last in a tennis court which was free, just where a narrow side street of the southern town makes an elbow. Into that shelter they poured; and over against them, watching all they did from above, from his home just across, was Barentin, Keeper of the Seals. He saw the umbrellas folded at the door, the hundreds pressing in, damply: he saw through the lights of the Court their damp foot-prints on the concrete of the hall—a table brought."

The details are very slight, almost trivial, but they stand out with the sharpness of an etching. The unfortunate thing is that two lines suffice to deal with the resulting Tennis Court Oath, the import of which the reader is left to guess. Some scenes Mr. Belloc passes by, if the etching fit is not upon him. The most curious of these omissions is the Feast of the Federation (July 14th, 1790), to which Carlyle devotes immortal pages. Seeing that the King and Queen were there, that Marie Antoinette for once behaved tactfully and enjoyed the last sweets of popularity, it is singular that Mr. Belloc missed such an opportunity. We would gladly have sacrificed some of his earlier broodings over her lack of children, or her premonitions of maternity, for three vivid pages on the Feast of Pikes.

* "Marie Antoinette." By H. Belloc. Methuen. 15s. net.

Thereafter the tragedy rapidly darkened. We join issue with Mr. Belloc in his assertion that "for Mirabeau failure was only possible with death"—still more that his success in maintaining the fabric of the French Monarchy would have made of the nineteenth century "a time of easy reaction" (p. 240). Certainly the man had vast energy. But in the winter of 1790-1, when his plan of escape for the King and Queen was nearing completion, the opposing forces were well-nigh invincible, even had the King, the Queen, and he all pulled heartily together—an impossible supposition. The National Assembly, the Jacobins' Club, with its network of branches, all the National Guards, and perhaps half of the regular army, along with the vast mass of the people (for even la Vendée had not yet begun to stir), all this would have formed a phalanx unbreakable by the iron will of Mirabeau, the wavering wills of King and Queen, and the few mercenary regiments which alone were to be wholly trusted. The fact is, the plan came too late to save the Monarchy. All it could have done, surely, would have been to consign those ill-matched Sovereigns to a swift and glorious doom.

But we are straying after the phantom of prophecy which so often beckons Mr. Belloc aside into religious quagmires. The story of the fall of the Monarchy here unrolls itself as impressively as ever, marred, however, by the author's odd refusal to see anything very important in the decision of Louis XVI. to leave the palace and repair to the Legislative Assembly hard by. Was it, then, merely a "personal act" and "no capitulation"? Louis doubtless thought so, with his usual lack of insight; but all who surrounded him knew that it was the deathblow to the old Monarchy. Contemporaries state that the King, on hearing that very dubious counsel from Roederer, looked fixedly at him, to see if it were a snare, then at his Queen, who quietly said, "Let us go." The story is suspect; for Marie Antoinette had both the pride that spurns retreat and the quick woman's wit to see that it spelt disaster. The closing phases of the life of King and Queen are here very suggestively linked with the changing fortunes of the war on the frontier. Students must have noticed the close connection between the war and the Terror; but Mr. Belloc, with his usual vivacity, links it up far closer. Very impressive are the final paragraphs, alternating between the hours of struggle at Wattingnies, in French Flanders, and the trial and execution of the Queen at Paris. We will not spoil these fine passages by attempting to summarise them. Their argument is at several points disputable; their force and charm cannot be denied.

We think this the best of Mr. Belloc's historical works, and that is saying much. Few writers have had so keen an eye for the inner realities, the picturesque glimpses, the subtle concatenation of things, and he infuses into his narrative a native force and charm that arrest the attention even when they fail to convince the reason. At times he fails deplorably, when a petulant or dogmatic fit overtakes him. Gibes at Jews and journalists, sneers at "our dunderheads of Westminster" (there is an even worse lapse of taste on page 195), alternating with a suggestion that St. Bartholomew was a mere uprising of poor oppressed Catholics against wealthy Huguenots, show that the author often forgets whether he is writing a novel or history. He should remember that Clio looks ill either in monastic garb or in dressing-gown and slippers. If he will erase nine-tenths of these petulant or egotistical outbursts, if he will curb his boyish delight in dealing out pinpricks to heretics, if he will learn, not only to visualise scenes, but patiently to realise facts as they are, he will succeed, not only in throwing off a brilliantly subjective narrative, but in attaining that more enduring quality, objectivity.

MR. POPE.*

"I do not speak of the Virgils and Alexander Popes, and who can say how many more whose names I dare not mention for fear of offending. They are as stuffed birds or beasts in a museum; serviceable, no doubt, from a scientific standpoint, but with no vivid or vivifying hold upon us. They seem to be alive, but are not."

Thus wrote one of the most broad-minded and human of modern men of letters, the late Samuel Butler. Butler's demand is that the candidate for immortality shall exclaim, with Abou ben Adhem, "write me as one who loves his fellow-man." And few will dispute that Dr. Johnson might have had Pope in his mind when he declared that he loved "a good hater." "The portentous cub never forgives," said Bentley. Let us pass to one or two earlier judgments. Johnson, almost inevitably, compares Pope with his great predecessor, "glorious John," remarking that Dryden knew more of man in his general nature, and Pope in his local manners. "The notions of Dryden were formed by comprehensive speculation, and those of Pope by minute attention." Pope, in fact, pressed into the service of poetry the methods of the modern scientific investigator, who, from repeated experiments, establishes a generalisation. Dryden leaped to his conviction from the sympathetic vibrations of heart.

Byron, himself the child of the romantic movement, was for re-forging the fetters which Pope had bound round literature, and declared frankly that he thought all modern poets were in the wrong, not excepting himself. After going over Moore's poems and his own and some others side by side with Pope's, he insisted that the later work would not stand. "Depend upon it, it is all Horace then, and Claudian now, among us; and if I had to begin again, I would model myself accordingly."

Hazlitt remarks: "He was a wit and critic, a man of sense, observation, and the world. He saw Nature only dressed by art. (How one's thoughts here are forced to Pope's garden and his grotto, and how Landor's famous line beats on the ear in protest!) Hazlitt's astonishing conclusion is: "If I had to choose, there are but one or two persons—and but one or two—that I should like to have been better than Pope." But Hazlitt also, we must remember, was "a good hater."

Macaulay concerns himself less with the man of letters than with the man. "He was all stiletto and mask. To injure, to insult, and to save himself the consequences of injury and insult by lying and equivocating, was the habit of his life. . . . He puffed himself, and abused his enemies, under feigned names. . . . Besides his frauds of malignity, of fear, of interest, and of vanity, there were frauds which he seems to have committed from love of fraud alone. . . . Whatever his object might be, the indirect road to it was that which he preferred." The last phrase recalls Lord Orrery's summary of Pope: "Mens curva in corpore curvo."

As to Newman, "George Paston" only conjectures that he had Pope in mind when he pronounces that the great author, whatsoever other gifts be his, must possess, in a large sense, the gift of expression; but the conjecture is certainly plausible. Newman's words are: "He expresses what all feel and cannot say, and his sayings pass into proverbs among his people, and his phrases become household words and idioms of their daily speech, which is tessellated with the rich fragments of his language, as we see in foreign lands the marbles of Roman grandeur worked into the walls and pavements of modern palaces." The difficulty encountered in subscribing to this pronouncement of Newman's is that among the great names in English literature it will only apply to Shakespeare and to Pope, though it will apply almost as emphatically to one other English writer, popular enough in his day, but not even then acclaimed as great, Young, of the "Night Thoughts."

Of the writer whose mind and heart are thus variously estimated, "George Paston" has presented us only with a sympathetic picture, such as we are accustomed to expect from her pen. She describes the man, his contemporaries, and his times. If there were any further frailties of his to draw from their dread abode, she has refused to be accomplice in the task. An uncommon feature of this study of a poet is the incorporation in the narrative of an outline of the principal poems, with occasional critical comments. This, in the case of Pope, is very helpful, for in, perhaps, a larger measure than was the case with any other poet of his standing, Pope's poems were a reflection of his daily life. The diarist notes his observations and reflections, not in locked private pages for his own eye alone, but in volumes which are set before the public as each one is filled up. His nearest approaches to cipher, the disembowelled surnames, were all easily recognisable to his contemporaries, and even now there are few that cannot be identified with tolerable certainty.

* "Mr. Pope: His Life and Times." By George Paston. Two Volumes. Hutchinson. 24s. net.

What in Pope's circumstances might have proved a disability beyond remedy, the fact that he was born of Catholic parents, was, as it turned out, the pivot upon which hung his worldly success. The elder Pope had made a comfortable little fortune in trade, and had retired to rural pleasures in Windsor Forest. Even though his co-religionists, of whom there was quite a little colony in the district, had been disposed to neighborliness beyond the ordinary, it would have been neighborliness with reserves, for they were all of much higher standing. The bright, eager, intelligent boy, however, already only too plainly handicapped by physical deficiencies, was able to use them as a step in his ascent. What was a condescension to the retired draper was seized by the gifted, ambitious son as a claim to equal friendship. By the time when, at the age of twenty-five, Pope was the most fashionable poet of the day, he had for some years been on terms of intimacy with the loftily placed and the long descended. Whether he contemplated marriage as a surety against possible future repudiation by his aristocratic friends nothing remains to tell us. He may have indulged in tender passages with Martha (Patty) Blount, which raised expectations that were never fulfilled. But, either from indecision or from real disinclination to an irretrievable step, he made his frail health an excuse for never carrying the project through. His tender relations with the lady lasted throughout his life; he invested money for her; he provided handsomely for her in his will. On the sudden death of his father, he wrote to her in terms which, perhaps, reveal his human side more openly than any utterance of his save the "Ah, Editha! Matrum Optima! Mulierum Amantissima! Vale" of the inscription to his mother's memory. "My dear father died last night," he tells her. "Believe, since I do not forget you this moment, I never shall." Yet we have the oft-told tale of Martha Blount's journey to Twickenham during the poet's last illness, her landing from the wherry at the foot of the garden, and her apparently brutal remark to Lord Marchmont, who handed her out, when she perceived Pope sitting with Lord Bolingbroke upon the lawn, "What! is he not dead yet?" It would be the simplest and most generous explanation of such speech to believe that it came from an embittered heart.

It is very easy to conceive that robust health might have given the world a more tolerant and genial man. It is not unreasonable to deduce from the facts we know that Pope possessed the spirit of the viveur, held in check by the "little crooked body," and that, untrammelled by deformity, his heart might have expanded in place of distilling gall. But when every damaging circumstance which can be gleaned has been laid in the scale against him; his breach of faith with Bolingbroke over the "Spirit of Patriotism"; his acceptance of a bribe from the Duchess of Marlborough for the suppression of the "Character of Atossa," which he subsequently caused to be printed; his inhumanly cruel handling of his lampooners, whom a man of his abilities and acknowledged eminence could have afforded to leave unanswered; when all has been said, acts of spontaneous kindness, and in the case of Savage, for instance, of open-handedness, can be adduced in plenty. Even his resentment for Dennis was dropped when the critic became blind and poor; and against the condemnation of Bentley and Cibber and Lady Mary Montagu can be opposed the loyal admiration of Swift and Gay, Arbuthnot and Warburton. Mrs. Piozzi records an interview with the Prioress of a convent in Paris, a niece of the heroine of "The Rape of the Lock," by whom she was told that Mr. Pope's "numberless caprices would have employed ten servants to wait on him." Yet his friends willingly tolerated his exactions, and he himself constantly apologised for them. His need for affection through that long disease, his life, was urgent, but the response was prompt and unfailing. As for his poetry, to paraphrase the passage quoted above from Johnson, those who seek to rule him out of Parnassus merely define their own limitations.

THE LAST PHASE OF THE OLD REGIME.*

THE period covered in the first volume of Sir Herbert Maxwell's history has been described by Dr. Redlich as belonging not to the nineteenth but to the eighteenth century. Some modern historians lament that the eighteenth century ever came to an end, and the only statesmen they can admire are those who tried to postpone its disappearance as long as possible. Sir Herbert Maxwell, though a Conservative, does not take that view, nor does he write in that spirit. He is enthusiastic over the Reform Bill, and he has little patience with the quibbles by which "the dishonest system, which, professedly representative, had become flagrantly nominee," has been praised and defended. Perhaps, as his history develops, we shall find that the reason he regards this great measure with composure and satisfaction is that he sees that it did not disturb the distribution of class power very violently, and that the governing oligarchy of the eighteenth century has not suffered the dreadful eclipse which it anticipated in the nineteenth. "If we take the Bill, or even give improvements of it, you may rely upon it that neither Lord Grey nor any nobleman of his order, nor any gentleman of his caste, will govern the country six weeks after the Reformed Bill will meet, and that the race of English gentlemen will not last long afterwards. That is my sincere opinion." Such was the Duke of Wellington's prophecy in 1832, and it only shows how amazingly a public man can misread the world he lives in. We know to-day that the power of the English aristocracy—the "caste," as Wellington significantly calls it—was far too firmly and deeply laid in the great social system it had established to be shaken by a dozen Parliaments elected on a middle-class suffrage. Yet Wellington was not more strangely misled than others who had better opportunities of judging, and if the forces that resisted Reform fought under the wild illusions of terror, the forces that carried it by storm owed much to still wilder illusions of hope.

Sir Herbert Maxwell has no very original contribution to make to our knowledge of his period; nor does he offer us any new discoveries or any new solutions. But he has many qualifications for the more modest task he has set himself. He writes pleasantly, and his narrative is agreeable to read. Further, though a party man, he is not bitterly partisan. Indeed, his book, when compared with certain books recently published on the history of England, illustrates the advantages which a historian can derive from actual participation in affairs. If party breeds its own vices of temper and intellect, there is a narrower world than the world of politicians, and in that world party spirit itself would be a liberalising influence. No man is so much the prey of mean prejudices as the man who thinks that he is above party when he is really below it, and the superior and arid critic who snaps and snarls at every opinion he does not share, every public man he does not admire, may learn something even from the politician whom he thinks he can despise. Sir Herbert Maxwell has his favorites, and they are not ours, but his partialities do not make him intolerant or ungenerous.

Sir Herbert Maxwell's general treatment of his period is conceived in the modern Conservative spirit. He gives, as we think, a mistaken impression of the foreign policy of Castlereagh and of Pitt in representing Canning as their successor. Mr. Temperley has shown that neither Canning nor Castlereagh's friends took this view at the time, that it was not the view taken by the European Chancelleries, and that, as far as Castlereagh's own policy is concerned, there is overwhelming evidence that Canning forced his views on the Cabinet in spite of Castlereagh's opposition.

* "A Century of Empire." By Rt. Hon. Sir Herbert Maxwell, F.R.S. Arnold. In Three Vols. Vol. I. 1801-1832. 14s. net.

Castlereagh himself said, in a letter to Bathurst, that he had "tried to present something which would meet Alexander's ideas"; there was not much of Canning's spirit about that attempt. Sir Herbert Maxwell gives us, too, the regular Conservative view of the Six Acts and the general policy of repression that followed peace. But he does not say anything that is likely to alter the opinions of those of his readers who condemn those measures of coercion. Another respect in which the volume resembles Conservative histories of this period is in its disregard of the great questions and movements that were raging outside Parliament. Sir Herbert Maxwell's readers would take away the impression that soon after the Peace there was a dangerous outburst of sedition, due to the success with which agitators played on the economic misery of the time; that that misery was the result of the sudden change from war to peace and the introduction of machinery; and that no statesmanship could have done anything to relieve it. After this social England drops out until we come to the Bristol riots. This survey, which gives a strangely incomplete, and therefore a very misleading, picture, omits even the domestic reforms which are associated with the names of Canning and Peel. It misses, indeed, the most important feature of the times. Mr. Wells has described the impression that the negligence and confusion of our civilisation would make on a visitor from another planet, and the surprise with which he would learn that a condition which he had supposed was the temporary result of a migration or upheaval was accepted as the permanent lot of humanity. That picture exactly describes the England of Castlereagh and Sidmouth. Momentous changes were passing over the life of the country, and its rulers had as little idea of controlling them or of tempering their violence as they had of controlling the moon. Historians like Sir Herbert Maxwell look on these movements in much the same fatalist spirit. The unhappy artisans, they argue, who were wreaking their spite on machinery, could not be expected to understand that the Parliamentary vote would not protect them from the sharp edge of economic law. From this they pass, naturally, to the view which Macaulay satirised as the view that the only duties of a Government were the duties of a hangman. Yet in truth it is just when such changes are at work that vigilance and initiative are most needed in a Government. To sit still in an industrial revolution or a series of revolutions is to acquiesce in the degradation of the poor and the weak. The oligarchy sat still with a pistol in its hand for use against those whose despair drove them to strike.

The men who thought that, if the poor had a Parliamentary vote, the conditions of which they were the helpless victims, would be changed, were dimly right. If the poor had been enfranchised, it would not have prevented the introduction of machinery, it is true, but England would not have remained a society in which the rich could exploit the poor to their hearts' content, driving them from their common rights, keeping their little children in the factories to work day and night, and denying to them education, decent towns, or any of the elements of civilised life. The governing class so conducted its policy as to aggrandise the rich and to cripple the poor. The enclosures, which flung the village population into the abyss of pauperism, gave to the landlord the benefit of the famine prices, and to the manufacturers the benefit of cheap labor. Mr. Hobson's warning of the danger of leaving the rich to swallow all the surplus profits and of starving the State finds its best illustration in the monstrous order in defence of which the Tories fought against the Reformers. It would be difficult to estimate the penalty which the nation has had to pay since for those wasteful days of social anarchy and class plunder.

THE GREAT BRITISH DICKENS.*

It is close upon a hundred years since Dickens was born. It is all but forty since he died. The dates involved are 1812 and 1870. This is worth remembering, when it is also remembered how much is yet left in Dickens of what we loosely, but not inaccurately, call force. He began to move in 1836 (the year of "Pickwick"), and has not once left the track. He started at top speed, and the distinguished "publishing party" whose faithful imprint attaches to his wares has no difficulty in proving to us that he is "still running." That aged performer, "Culture," who carried for a generation the money of all superior punters, dropped long since exhausted in the path. The great middle-class champion foots it as game as ever. What a wind!

Mr. Teignmouth Shore submits (or, more precisely, glances at) the question whether Dickens's personality "would have been worth studying had he not been one of the most influential, as well as famous, of English writers." Presumably, some doubt is here implied. Our own doubts upon the subject—let us presume to say it—are non-existent. Were such a question raised respecting Sterne, for instance, we might hesitate indeed. Sterne late in life blazed into fame as an author, and was during his few remaining years a personage in society. Were it, however, submitted in debate that the "man Sterne," apart from the authorship of "Tristram" and the "Sentimental Journey," was a slight and futile and unedifying (if most amusing) creature, how many among us would be quick to lift cudgel in defence of him? The case of Dickens we take to be altogether different.

Dickens (whether in all respects we like him) is quint-essentially a man; he is a man of his time; a man of two hemispheres. We may say farther that he was for a very long time not only the best known, but the most popular, man in England and in America. He was our most celebrated character. He was almost the most celebrated character in the United States.

Nor, we are quite certain, was his celebrity due in whole to the fact that he was the most widely-read and most applauded novelist in the English language. Among the devourers of romance—splendid romance, by all means—the elder Dumas, on the flood-tide of his renown, had a prodigious following; but, as a man, what was Dumas's position or authority in comparison with Dickens's? Dickens had the undefined and indefinable quality of personal ascendancy. If he were not always absolutely sure of his place in "society," he had always the multitude at his back. Had he announced at a public dinner that he had perfected Swift's suggestion for extracting sunbeams out of cucumbers, the "Times" would have had a leader next morning, and the man in the street would have been asking the price of shares. Fortunate, indeed, was it for Dickens himself as for his legion of admirers that he had not the craze for speculation that laid poor Balzac low. If no other English writer of fiction has had the homage of so vast a crowd of readers, no other English writer—whether of fiction or anything else—has filled so large a space in the world that is not literary.

Like Napoleon, Dickens wears the rose of youth upon him long after he has blushed at his first fame. Napoleon at twenty-six was teaching new tricks in war to the veterans of Europe. Dickens was twenty-four when he came full-armed with the new humor of "Pickwick." It is Youth, in fact (and he really is entitled to the capital Y.), that makes the first appeal to us in Dickens: Youth radiant, irradiating, indomitable, and seemingly eternal. The last word we use not unadvisedly, for the sense of youth, dominant and dominating, goes with us through the larger half of Dickens's career. We lose it suddenly—and not without a kind of shock. We lose it (towards his late prime), not in his writings, not in his speeches, not in his letters to friends: it vanishes on a sudden from his pictures. The beautiful young face that Maclise has given us, with its bright, eloquent eyes, nervous mouth, and locks that the ladies (and Disraeli) called hyacinthine, has all at once taken on a cast of age, sternness, and hardness. The eye is there, as brilliant as of old—the challenging eye that the Kembles and Kean and Irving had in the theatre, and Gladstone in his Parliament—but all the lines of the face have hardened. Its seductiveness has merged in assertiveness, but we read in it also something of the pace of life.

One of the most strenuous existences in modern literature is Carlyle's. Carlyle's output is enormous, and enormous also is the expenditure of vital energy upon it. But Dickens also has his very big shelf of books, and the whole of this work is of the pure creative imagination. Carlyle lives, we may say, within the four walls of his study; is satisfied, between the hours of herculean toil, to peer at the world

* "Charles Dickens and his Friends." By W. Teignmouth Shore. Cassell. 6s. net.

HODDER & STOUGHTON

WINSTON CHURCHILL.

LIBERALISM AND THE SOCIAL PROBLEM.

BY THE RIGHT HONOURABLE
WINSTON S. CHURCHILL, M.P.

READY IMMEDIATELY.

3/6 net.

Hodder & Stoughton, London.

THE NEW SOCIALISM.

An Impartial Inquiry. By JANE T. STODDART. 5/- net.

"It supplies the information that can be had nowhere else in English. A book to be read and re-read—a book which for its learning, its candour, its simplicity deserves to rank with the very best of its kind."—BRITISH WEEKLY. "An instructive volume which will be of considerable value to serious students of the subjects."—TIMES. "A most useful compilation."—LIVERPOOL POST. "Cannot but prove instructive."—SCOTSMAN. "It deserves special attention."—BIRMINGHAM GAZETTE.

GEORGE MEREDITH.

A Primer to the Novels. By JAMES MOFFATT, D.D. 6/- net.

"Dr. Moffatt begins with a sketch of Meredith's general aims and method, and follows this up with outlines and analyses of the different novels. Dr. Moffatt is able to incorporate many interesting facts concerning the books in his pages, and he evidently writes with full knowledge. It is sometimes urged that aids of this kind take away the keen edge of interest when the works of which they treat come to be read, but this is hardly likely to be the case with Meredith's novels, and many, we are sure, will find Dr. Moffatt's guide exceedingly helpful."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

Now Ready.

HERALDS OF REVOLT.

Studies in Modern Literature and Dogma. By WILLIAM BARRY, D.D.

New and Cheaper Edition 6s.

"Canon Barry," says the GLOBE, "has taken a certain tendency in literature which, whether it masquerades as romanticist, realist, or merely sensual, is at bottom that of 'the Spirit which denies,' and it is his object to show us into what an abyss that tendency must eventually plunge the world. His 'Heralds of Revolt' are George Eliot, Mr. Short-house—looking rather strange, we confess, in this gallery—Carlyle, Amiel, Heine, most of the modern French Pagans, John Addington Symonds, Walter Pater, and Nietzsche. . . . To understand the force of Canon Barry's argument his book must be read as a whole, and we know no time more in need than is the present of the inexorable logic by which he reaches his conclusion in the philosophy of Nietzsche."

Ready Shortly.

CONSTANTINOPLE & TURKEY IN 1909.

A Diary of Travelling Experiences. By PROF. SIR W. M. RAMSAY, LL.D. With many Photographs taken by Lady Ramsay. 10/6 net.

Sir W. M. Ramsay, accompanied by Lady Ramsay and their eldest daughter, went to Constantinople in company with the advance guard of the Army of Liberty. They lived in the capital for seventeen days, until the siege was ended and the new Government established. They took many very interesting and successful photographs of the most striking scenes in this eventful period, both among the advancing soldiers on the railway, and in the city. They travelled thereafter for two months on the edge of the region of massacre, and over much of the central parts of Asiatic Turkey, whose loyalty to the new Government was a matter of great uncertainty, and a cause of great anxiety in Constantinople and Europe generally. Their experiences were gained among the people themselves, not at second-hand; and constitute an interesting and valuable record of a great historical event. It has not the form of a historical narrative written afterwards from a study of documents, but records day by day the impressions and the uncertainties amid which the people of Turkey had to live.

Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Sq., London, E.C.

LLOYD GEORGE.

THE PEOPLE'S BUDGET.

EXPLAINED BY THE RIGHT HONOURABLE
D. LLOYD GEORGE, M.P.

READY IMMEDIATELY.

Paper, 1/-; Cloth, 2/-

Hodder & Stoughton, London.

Nearly Ready.

LETTERS FROM CHINA.

With particular Reference to the Empress-Dowager and the Women of China. By SARAH PIKE CONGER.

Profusely Illustrated - 12s.

The author of these letters was not only instrumental in restoring good feeling between the Court and the Powers after the Boxer outbreaks, but she was admitted, to a degree previously unapproached, into the social and intimate domestic life of China. Her present work is, therefore, not only a glowing account of Chinese life, a unique story of the Boxer outbreak, and an informative commentary on the place of China in world politics, but it is a vivid work of description, written while impressions were fresh by a woman with a keen eye for colour and a temperament which allowed her to see, as a whole and sanely, the drama in which she was herself taking so prominent a part.

T.J.MACNAMARA.
THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

LETTERS TO A WORKING MAN

By DR. T. J. MACNAMARA.

READY IMMEDIATELY.

SIXPENCE.

Hodder & Stoughton, London.

from the roof of an omnibus. The overflowing novels of Dickens show us only one side of him. After lunch, the door of the workroom is shut and he is ready for anything and everything that comes. He walks like a jockey getting flesh off. He clamors to his friends to meet him at dinner. He rushes into the country, crosses the Atlantic, dances over Europe. He is the man most demanded in England for the chair of a charity dinner: no one to equal him at loosening the purse-strings. He has readings to prepare, plays to stage-manage and to act in. And wherever he goes, he is the light and centre and controlling power of the life around him. He is like Napoleon again in his unwillingness—nay, his inability—to play second fiddle. Everything flows from him and towards him. At such a pace does he live and move up to the very end.

His friends, his intimates, we note, are drawn almost entirely from his own sex. He had countless admirers among women; but he has not, like Chateaubriand, his bevy of attendant nymphs. Living as he did so incessantly in the public gaze, this would scarcely have been possible. His generation was agreed in the main in esteeming and liking him. Mr. Shore says:—

"Of few men is the opinion of their contemporaries so strongly favorable as it is in the case of Dickens, and the evidence is all the more powerful in that it comes from all sorts and conditions of men and women, chiefly, however, from the former. Few women of any great strength of character or power of will appear to have been among his intimates."

To George Eliot he was "not distinguished-looking in any way"; but an opinion such as this is very rarely met with. G. H. Lewes found him "a delightful companion," but adds to this: "I came away more impressed with the fulness of life and energy than with any sense of distinction." He lacked atmosphere a little, no doubt; and for all his sympathies, and the intense expression of them, we may perceive in him something superficial. Lewes thought him "softest outside, hardest at the core"; but it is a verdict we shrink from. It seems to us that he shone with the middle-class virtues at their best. His practical aims were high, and he was very much in earnest about them. A masterful man, domineering even, "and not over fond of those" who denied him his way; but—all through life—what he takes in hand to do he tries with his might to do well. Carlyle passed on him a eulogium as unqualified almost as he ever gave to anyone:—

"The good, the gentle, high-gifted, ever-friendly, noble Dickens—every inch of him an Honest Man."

Mr. Teignmouth Shore's plot is, as he says, "but loosely jointed," and his scenario "most vague"; but the rambling method of his book takes nothing from its human interest.

A TOURIST IN ITALY.*

We must confess ourselves in some ways a little disappointed in Mr. Henry James's description of Italian cities and scenery. We do not question the sincerity of his love of Italy, but, after all, such love is best testified to and best communicated to others, not by being analysed and examined as an emotion, but by being used to illumine the things on which it is cast. A disinterested love forgets itself, does not dwell upon its own sensations, but dwells rather on the objects which inspire it; and we, who are helped to see by its light, realise its depth and genuineness in the insight and intimacy revealed in its descriptions. It is a gain to us, too, and we, too, share its benefits. The lover holds the torch, but we see by it. But Mr. James's love is not quite of this kind. Eloquent as he often is, and interesting and suggestive as he often is, he is usually more concerned with his feelings towards Italy than with Italy herself. As soon as he becomes aware of an emotion his instinct is to trot off with it, like a dog with a bone, to some quiet retreat where he can discuss it at leisure. He is, at such moments, like all introspective people, extremely impatient of interruption; indeed, we have seldom come across a sightseer so harassed by fellow-tourists and perennially displeased with them as Mr. James is. His pleasure is of the delicate kind that is at the mercy of the first stranger who comes along. "Tenderly fond you become," he writes as long ago as 1873 of Venice; "there is something indefinable in those depths of personal acquaintance that gradually establish themselves. The place seems to personify itself, to become human and sentient and conscious of your affection. You desire to embrace it, to caress it, to possess it; and gradually a soft sense of possession grows up and your visit becomes a perpetual love affair." Of course, to bring this off, to bring these delicate emotions to fruition, needs great care and skill, and it is easy to sympathise with Mr. James's feelings when he finds himself suddenly interrupted and half a morning's work spoilt by the chattering of a parcel of Germans in the Piazza, or the silly remarks of some English and American visitors to the Ducal Palace. His cosy tête-à-tête disturbed, Venice "exists only as a battered peep-show and bazaar." The fact is, common sight-seers ought to have a day or two in the week set apart for them, and at other times ought not to be allowed about.

It is the same with every place. Among many visits to Pompeii only one yielded Mr. James anything of importance, and this was when he enjoyed what he calls "the sweet chance of a late hour or two, the hour of the lengthening shadows, absolutely alone." Other times he had been there he had been "beset with traps and shocks and vulgar importunities," and his visits had been "fatal discouragements." Not till this fated Sabbath eve, when "all the Cockneys of creation" have been providentially banished, is it given to him "to open himself as never before to the fond, luxurious fallacy of a close communion" with all that remains of Rome's Brighton.

Really, one cannot help thinking, it is possible to overdo this sort of thing, to overdo the sentimental aspect of travel. Feeling and emotion are all very well, but they are apt to grow rather thin and anæmic unless they are dieted on intellectual ideas and nourished by rational interests. How much richer and stronger are the very emotions and feelings of one who has penetrated into the nature and pith of his subject than of those writers who occupy themselves with weaving fine-spun webs of feeling out of their own sensibility. It is not, moreover, the deep-thinking traveller who goes into hysterics at the sight of a fellow-countryman. Doubtless there are times and seasons when he would wish to be alone, nor are such opportunities ever lacking; but loneliness is not his perpetual guest. He would understand, know, enter into the meaning of things. What is it to him that others also would know and understand? Let them, too, prosper in their undertaking. Why should their presence pollute the springs of knowledge? You do not find a traveller of this calibre fainting at the sight of a Baedeker, or seizing occasions for the display of his emotional sensibility. Yet it is precisely his emotions which are of value; which have stuff in them and are communicable. It is for him that the doors of the past are opened and old scenes re-enact themselves and the dead live.

But, indeed, there is something in the atmosphere of Italy itself which seems to rebuke Mr. James's over-fastidiousness. Italy is never self-conscious and self-analytical. Whether it be that Nature there, in a more winning mood, tempts people to freer abandonment and a more self-forgetful acceptance of her genial influence, or whether it be, as is, perhaps, still more the case, the strong afterglow of paganism lingering on which prompts the Latin blood to a franker enjoyment of the life of the present, it is at least certain that in Italy the mental disquietude, the anxiety and the doubts which are so apt to arise from a too close examination of our own feelings, seem out of place. How many have felt, is it not one of the main sources of the attraction of Italy, that there for a while, at least—

"the heavy and the weary weight
Of all this unintelligible world
Is lightened";

that the genius of the country lures them to forget their mental and spiritual anxieties and misgivings, and that the sunshine and blue sea and the vineyards and the "sun-burnt mirth" of peasants and children suddenly seem to present life under a new aspect, as a thing justified in itself and containing in itself sufficing elements of joy. It may be that this is not a profound philosophy, but to tired and overtaxed hearts and minds how real and vital, nevertheless, is that "tranquil restoration," arising from the child-like

* "Italian Hours." By Henry James. Illustrated by Joseph Pennell. Heinemann. 25s. net.

WILLIAMS and NORGATE

Crown Theological Library.

The late DR. MARCUS DODS.—"By introducing to the English-speaking public specimens of the work of such outstanding critics and theologians, your 'Crown' has done a wonderful service to theological learning in this country."

Rev. Principal P. T. FORSYTH.—"As a whole, it is an admirable series, and opens to the English reader at a low price some books which are of prime importance for religious thought."

MODERNITY AND THE CHURCHES

By Professor PERCY GARDNER,
Litt. D., Oxford.
Almost Ready. Crown 8vo. 5s.

LIFE OF THE SPIRIT

By RUDOLF EUCKEN, D.D., Professor of Philosophy in Jena.
Second Edition ready. Cr. 8vo., clo. 5s.

THE OLD EGYPTIAN FAITH

By Professor EDOUARD NAVILLE.
Translated by Rev. Colin Campbell,
M.A., D.D.
Almost Ready. Illustrated. 5s.

THE RELIGION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

By KARL MARTI, Professor of Old Testament Theology at Bern. 4s. 6d.

Dr. HARNACK'S NEW TESTAMENT STUDIES

Rev. CANON SANDAY, in THE LIFE OF CHRIST IN RECENT RESEARCH:—
"Anyone else might be proud to have produced one such volume in the time, for they both bristle with scientifically sifted detail, but Harnack can only be compared with himself. We can put no limits to his power of production."
Vol. II. Just Ready. Crown 8vo, cloth 6s. Vol. I. Ready. Crown 8vo., cloth 6s.
The Sayings of Jesus. Luke, the Physician.
Vol. III. Just Ready. Cloth 6s.
The Acts of the Apostles.

Ready. Cloth 5s.
WHAT IS CHRISTIANITY?
By Dr. ADOLF HARNACK.

ESSAYS ON THE SOCIAL GOSPEL

By ADOLF HARNACK and
Dr. HERRMANN.

Ready. Crown 8vo., 6s.
NATURALISM AND RELIGION
By RUDOLF OTTO, Professor of Theology in the University of Göttingen.

Ready. Crown 8vo., 5s.
FUNDAMENTAL TRUTHS OF
THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION
By R. SEEBERG, Professor of Systematic Theology in Berlin.

Ready. Cloth 6s.
THE CHILD AND RELIGION
Eleven Essays. By Leading Thinkers.

EARLY HEBREW STORY

By JOHN P. PETERS. D.D. of New York.

Ready. Cloth 5s.
THE COMMUNION OF THE CHRISTIAN WITH GOD
By Prof. WILHELM HERRMANN.

Ready. Crown 8vo., 5s.
THE HISTORICAL EVIDENCE FOR THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST
By KIRSOPP LAKE, M.A. (Oxon.)

HIBBERT JOURNAL SUPPLEMENT

NOW READY ENTITLED

JESUS or CHRIST?

The volume comprises contributions from the undermentioned writers, which have been written independently, and published bound in cloth, at five shillings net (postage 4d. extra).

THE BISHOP OF SOUTHWARK
CANON H. SCOTT HOLLAND
THE REV. FATHER JOSEPH RICKABY,
S.J.
THE LATE REV. GEORGE TYRRELL
REV. PRINCIPAL A. E. CARVIE, D.D.
REV. R. J. CAMPBELL, M.A.
PROFESSOR B. W. BACON, D.D.
REV. JAMES DRUMMOND, D.D.

REV. PRINCIPAL J. E. CARPENTER, D.D.
SIR OLIVER LODGE
PROFESSOR HENRY JONES
PROFESSOR PERCY GARDNER
MR. JAMES COLLIER
PROFESSOR H. WEINEL
PROFESSOR P. SCHMIEDEL
PROFESSOR NATHAN SODERBLOM
(Upsala)

WORKS BY HERBERT SPENCER.

In two volumes. Buckram, with a number of Illustrations, some in Photogravure, 28s. net, 29s. post free. Popular Edition, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY

A System of Synthetic Philosophy. s. d.

FIRST PRINCIPLES. Thoroughly Revised. Popular re-issue now ready... 7 6
PRINCIPLES OF BIOLOGY. 2 Vols. (Revised and Enlarged) ... 36 0
PRINCIPLES OF PSYCHOLOGY. 2 Vols. ... 36 0
PRINCIPLES OF SOCIOLOGY. Vol. I. ... 21 0
Ditto, Vol. II. ... 18 0
Ditto, Vol. III. ... 16 0
PRINCIPLES OF ETHICS. Vol. I. ... 15 0
Ditto, Vol. II. ... 12 6
JUSTICE. (Separately) ... 6 0

OTHER WORKS. s. d.

THE DATA OF ETHICS, uniform with First Principles, cloth ... net 3 0
THE STUDY OF SOCIOLOGY ... 10 8
EDUCATION (Cheap Edition) ... 2 6
ESSAYS. 3 Vols. ... 30s. (or each Vol. 10s.)
FACTS AND COMMENTS ... 6 0
VARIOUS FRAGMENTS, Enlarged Edition ... 8 0
SOCIAL STATICS AND MAN v. STATE ... 10 0
MAN v. STATE (Separately) ... 1 0
AGAINST THE METRIC SYSTEM. Third Edition, with Additions ... 0 3

Ready. Crown 8vo. Cloth 5s. net.

SCIENCE, MATTER AND IMMORTALITY

By Dr. RONALD CAMPBELL MACFIE,
Author of "Romance of Medicine," &c.

BLAISE PASCAL

A Study in Religious Psychology.

By HUMFREY R. JORDAN.
Ready. Crown 8vo. Cloth 4s. 6d. net.

THE ETHICS OF PROGRESS

By Rev. CHAS. F. DOLE.
Demy 8vo. Cloth 6s. net.

Ready. Demy 8vo. 336pp. 6s. net.

MAN AND THE BIBLE:

A Review of the Place of the Bible in Human History.

By J. ALLANSON PICTON, M.A.
(Lond.), author of "The Mystery of Matter," "The Religion of the Universe," &c.

"It is delightful to recognise the mental grasp, the wide-ranging and accurate scholarship, and the trenchant vigour of style which characterise this volume."

—CHRISTIAN WORLD.

Ready. Crown 8vo. Cloth 4s. 6d. net.

MAN'S ORIGIN, DESTINY AND DUTY

By HUGH MACCOLL.

"A fresh and suggestive attempt to establish Christian Ethics on a non-miraculous basis. The book is full of interest."

Ready. Demy 8vo., cloth, 10s. 6d.

THE RELIGIONS OF AUTHORITY AND THE RELIGION OF THE SPIRIT

By the late AUGUSTE SABATIER,
Professor of the University of Paris.

INTRODUCTION TO THE PRE- PARATION OF ORGANIC COMPOUNDS

By Prof. EMIL FISCHER of Berlin.
Translated with the author's sanction,
from the new eighth German edition,
by R. V. STANFORD, B.Sc., Ph.D., &c.
Ready. 4s. net.

New Edition, entirely Reset, with much new matter and maps. 2 Vols.
Demy 8vo. Cloth 25s. net.

THE MISSION AND EXPANSION OF CHRISTIANITY IN THE FIRST THREE CENTURIES

By ADOLF HARNACK, D.D., Berlin.
Translated and Edited by Rev. JAS.
MOFFATT, D.D.

Digest of Mr. HERBERT SPENCER'S
Works. Fifth and Enlarged Edition.
The Philosophy completed now ready.
8vo, cloth, price 21s.

EPITOME OF THE SYNTHETIC PHILOSOPHY OF HERBERT SPENCER

By F. HOWARD COLLINS. With a
Preface by HERBERT SPENCER.

A postcard will bring a complete list of volumes in our libraries and a list of Autumn publications.

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

surrender of self to Nature's aspects and influences which Italy encourages and makes easy. Read almost any book of travel, and under the dry descriptions of Renaissance painters and Brunelleschi's dome you will find constant allusions to scenes of wayside gaiety, village festivals, and such minor incidents of everyday intercourse as seemed to illustrate the diffused and prevalent spirit of happiness and friendly courtesy. Italy is all smiles, and it is these that count for most. People imagine they go to study pictures and statues, but they are quite mistaken. Why do they never go near the National Gallery if they are so fond of pictures, or the British Museum if they are so keen on statues? No, the pictures and the statues are the excuse, the ostensible reason; what draws them really is the skies, the flowers, the sunny, mellow landscapes, and that quality among the people which seems the natural response to all this, the spirit of pagan, frank enjoyment which to a northern temperament is such a revelation.

It would be unfair to Mr. James to say that he does not recognise something of this, but while recognising it, he is unable to catch the contagion himself, or enter wholeheartedly into the prevalent humor. He is forever examining his own feelings and dissecting his own emotions, and we are bound to say that the process often leads to disquisitions which are apt to prove obscure if not incomprehensible. "I find myself," he writes, for instance, of Naples, "noting with interest—and just to be able to emphasise it is what inspires me with these remarks—that, in spite of the milder and smoother, and, perhaps, pictorially speaking, considerably emptier, Neapolitan face of things, things in general, of our later time, I recognised in my final impression a grateful, a beguiling serenity." And his final reflection, in view of the Neapolitan bay, is this: "All one could do, at the heart of the over-arching crystal, and in the presence of the relegated city, the far-trailing Mount, the grand Sorrentine headland, the islands incomparably stationed and related, was to wonder what may well become of the so many other elements of any poor human and social complexus, what might become of any successfully-working or only struggling and floundering civilisation at all, when high Natural Elegance proceeds to take such exclusive charge and recklessly assume, as it were, all the responsibilities." The worst of such sentences as these is that the difficulty of interpreting them is apt to be followed by a doubt as to whether the gain was worth the trouble. In any case, they reveal the writer as one who treats his subject from without. Ingenious, subtle, introspective, they have nothing of the outgoing freshness and frankness which belong to Italian life and scenery and which seem, in a more especial degree, to bathe those islands and headlands of which their author is here speaking. Much of the book is in a simpler style and is sure to please; still, it is essentially the book of a stranger, the book—if its author will forgive us for using the word—of a tourist.

We must not forget the illustrations, of which there are over sixty, in pencil and colored chalks, by Mr. Pennell. They are drawn with a remarkable, sometimes perhaps a rather negligent, vigor, Mr. Pennell's mastery of effect having tempted him in some cases, especially in the representation of architectural detail on rich façades, to trust almost unduly to the suggestions of a few dots and scratches. A dark ground, it may be added, is bound to produce a sombre effect, and the use of brown paper for these drawings almost precludes the attempt to suggest Italian light and sunshine. In spite, however, of these drawbacks the sketches in their easy skill and power will remain among the book's chief attractions.

THE ETHIC OF JESUS.*

THE increasing importance attached to the ethical side of Christianity, and the necessity for vindicating its ethical value, are witnessed to by the growing number of books issued on the theme. We are still far behind Germany in this regard, but we are getting on. It may be questioned, however, whether any really outstanding book on the topic has appeared; and we hardly think that the adjective can be applied to Dr. Stalker's book. It has, nevertheless, a solid worth and value, and, within its limits, is an informing piece of work. It should be said at the outset that the volume does not profess to deal with Christian ethics as a whole, but only with such ethical teaching as is contained in Jesus' own words, and contained, for a further limitation, in words which the Synoptists record. Whether such a study does not lose a considerable part of its value by thus limiting itself, is a question which recurs perpetually while one reads, and which remains at the close.

The plan of Dr. Stalker's book is quite simple. He follows the method of ethical writers generally, and treats first of "the Highest Good," then of "Virtue," and last of "Duty." In the teaching of Jesus, the highest good is "the kingdom of God," or "righteousness," with the "blessedness" which attends it, and it is with Jesus' utterances upon these themes, and upon "missing the highest good," or "sin," that the first section is concerned. Under "Virtue," Dr. Stalker deals, in successive chapters, with "repentance," "faith," "the imitation of Christ," and "the Cross and offences." While in the third section, that devoted to "Duty," the topics are "the love of God," "the things of God" (worship, the Sabbath, reading of Scripture, &c.), "the love of man," "the things of man" (almsgiving, evangelisation), "the family," and "the State."

We do not imagine that Dr. Stalker would claim to have said anything very original under any of these heads. "Sound" is, perhaps, the epithet which comes most readily to one's lips as describing the chapters. The style is remarkably lucid, but does not aim at adornment, poetry, or special grace; and we are taken in safe "pedestrian" fashion over the road. In atmosphere the entire book is somewhat cold, recalling that of the lecture-room in which ideas are marshalled slowly and with careful precision in order that there may be time to take them down. This doubtless has its advantages, but one cannot help wishing sometimes for a little more glow. The theme, one would suppose, should now and then inspire it. But the value of the studies is in their summarising and bringing together of ideas which, though not new, are not co-ordinated in the ordinary man's mind. Dr. Stalker, as it were, puts a hand upon familiar, but loosely-lying, thoughts, and, having massed them, presents them to us in his open palm. It is a real service. And it should be said, also, that here and there we get a sidelight—thrown out almost parenthetically—which has a real freshness of its own. For instance, in respect of Christ's utterances in the house of the Pharisee, Dr. Stalker remarks:

"the appearance of harshness vanishes, if we conceive Him to have uttered the words, as would have been fit and natural on such an occasion, with a kindly smile. By people incapable of understanding Him the tradition has been invented that He was never seen to laugh, but there are not a few of His dark sayings which become luminous the moment we admit the notion that He may have uttered them in a tone of pleasantry."

And again, in respect of the seemingly contradictory maxims, "He that is not with us is against us," and "He that is not against us is for us"—

"the one is a safe guide for judging ourselves, and the other is equally a useful guide in judging others."

These flashes are so delightful that one wishes there were more.

It has to be said, however, that the plan, at any rate in our opinion, greatly limits the value of the book; and, indeed, we gravely doubt whether a treatise on Christian ethics, or on part of it, can be wisely constructed in this way. For Christianity, though it has ethical consequences, is not primarily a system of ethics, but something more; and the moment one begins to follow the line of common ethical treatment, difficulties arise. Dr. Stalker formulates the "Highest Good," quite rightly, as being "righteousness." But that means (remembering the New Testament connotation of the term) that we are forced upon the line of religion, as distinct from ethics, at once. And then something else follows. We perceive immediately that the other sections, "Virtue" and "Duty," occupy a quite different place in the Christian system from that which they occupy elsewhere. They are not merely additional topics—two other parts of one whole. The things dealt with under "Virtue"—such things as "repentance" and "faith"—are, in Christianity, the means by which the highest good is to be won. And the things dealt with under "Duty"—

* "The Ethic of Jesus According to the Synoptic Gospels." By Rev. James Stalker, D.D. Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d.

G. P. Putnam's Sons' New List

LIFE OF JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH. The Story of the Development of a Great Personality. By Sir C. HUBERT H. PARRY, Bart., Mus. Doc., Director of the Royal College of Music, &c. Illustrated, 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net.

Considering the importance of the man who is the subject of this life, and the authority of Sir Hubert Parry as a critic and writer, no student of music can afford to be a stranger to this thorough and comprehensive work.

WHAT HAVE THE GREEKS DONE FOR MODERN CIVILISATION?

By Prof. JOHN PENTLAND MAHAFFY, C.Y.O., D.C.L. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

"They reveal Prof. Mahaffy reasserting in his bright and breezy style the moral of the lessons which a life-long study of Hellenic art and history has impressed on his alert mind."—SCOTSMAN.

MADAME, MOTHER OF THE REGENT (1652-1722).

By ARVEDE BARINE, Author of "La Grand Mademoiselle," "Louis XIV. and La Grande Mademoiselle," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, in box, 12s. 6d.

"A wonderfully vivid presentation of a remarkable woman living in remarkable circumstances, a notable addition to the memoir literature of a period that has been much exploited by less able writers."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

THE MASTERY OF DESTINY.

By JAMES ALLEN, Author of "As a Man Thinketh," "From Poverty to Power," "All These Things Added," &c. 16mo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

The chapters and subjects dealt with are as follows: I.—Deeds, Character, and Destiny. II.—The Science of Self-Control. III.—Cause and Effect in Human Conduct. IV.—Training of the Will. V.—Thoroughness. VI.—Mind-Building and Life-Building. VII.—Cultivation of Concentration. VIII.—Practice of Meditation. IX.—The Power of Purpose. X.—The Joy of Accomplishment.

FERNANDO CORTES AND HIS CONQUEST OF MEXICO, 1485-1547.

By FRANCIS AUGUSTUS MacNUTT, Author of "Bartholomew de Las Casas," Editor of the "Letters of Cortes," &c. ("Heroes of the Nations" Series). Fully Illustrated, crown 8vo, cloth extra, 5s.

"Mr. MacNutt has written a fascinating book. He has not failed his heroic subject. One might almost say that he has allowed it to write itself. And that is high praise."—DAILY NEWS.

"Mr. MacNutt has done his work well and sympathetically. The book is clearly written."—GLOBE.

"The book worthily carries on a notable series of popular biographies."—SCOTSMAN.

"It deserves to be widely read, for Prescott is out of date, and no other volume known to us presents the facts so tersely."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

CHARACTERS AND EVENTS OF ROMAN HISTORY.

From Cæsar to Nero.

By GUGLIELMO FERRERO, Author of "The Greatness and Decline of Rome," &c. 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

"He is the master of a clear and eloquent style."—SPECTATOR.

"A thoroughly readable, stimulating book."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"Signor Ferrero is not only a distinguished and brilliant scholar, but he has something of Macaulay's gift of being able to make history as entertaining as a good novel."—DAILY NEWS.

HEAVENLY HERETICS.

By LYMAN P. POWELL, Author of "Christian Science," "The Emmanuel Movement," "The Art of Natural Sleep," &c. Crown 8vo. Cloth, 5s.

OLD ROSE AND SILVER.

By MYRTLE REED, Author of "Lavender and Old Lace," "The Master's Violin," "Flower of the Dusk," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, uncut edges, 6s.

"It is a most likeable love story, told with an opulence of diction by one who is an exquisite weaver of silky sentences. Excellently bound and artistically produced, it forms a handsome gift-book."—SCOTSMAN.

THE ROSARY.

By FLORENCE L. BARCLAY. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

A delightful love story—a love story conducted along lines that are refreshingly novel. The story is told with a charm of style that will captivate the reader.

MY LADY OF THE SOUTH.

By RANDALL PARRISH, author of "When Wilderness was King," "My Lady of the North," &c. Illustrated in colour, crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

Mr. Parrish is famed for his stirring, virile, romantic novels. This one may be regarded as his best.

THE WIVING OF LANCE CLEAVERAGE.

By Miss ALICE MacGOWAN, author of "Judith of the Cumberlands." Illustrated in colour, crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

"Another series of powerful sketches, instinct with local colour, of the ways of young men and maidens, and of older people, in the matters of courtship, wiving, quarrelling, and making up again."—SCOTSMAN.

NEW LIST NOW READY.

24, BEDFORD STREET, STRAND, London and New York.

Messrs. BELL'S BOOKS.

With 48 full-page Illustrations and a Map. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

SICILY, THE GARDEN OF THE MEDITERRANEAN.

By WILL S. MONROE.

Author of "Turkey and the Turks," "In Viking-land," &c.

Now Ready. Fcap. 8vo. 6s.

A HANDBOOK TO DANTE.

By F. J. SNELL, M.A.,

Late Scholar of Balliol College, Oxford,

Author of "The Age of Chaucer," &c.

This volume is uniform with Mrs. Sutherland Orr's well-known "Handbook to Browning," and Mr. Morton Luce's "Handbook to Tennyson," and "Handbook to Shakespeare."

MASTERS OF LITERATURE.

A Series of Handy Single Volumes, containing the Finest passages from the Works of Great Writers in Prose and Verse, with full Biographical and Critical Introduction and Editorial connections.

Crown 8vo, Illustrated, 3s. 6d. net each.

NEW VOLUMES.

DEFOE.

By JOHN MASEFIELD.

CARLYLE.

By A. W. EVANS.

THACKERAY.

By G. K. CHESTERTON. [Ready Shortly.]

EMERSON.

By G. H. PERRIS. [Ready Shortly.]

"This series has the admirable purpose of saving the time of those readers whose aspirations towards general culture are handicapped by want of leisure. . . . Professor Grant and Saintsbury could hardly have done their work better. None of the character-studies and incidents selected can be regarded as inferior to the highest achievements of Scott or Fielding. . . . They should be helpful to a wide class of readers."—Outlook.

Write for Prospectus and Full List.

The QUEEN'S TREASURES Series.

With 8 Coloured Plates and Decorated Title-page, Covers and End-papers, small crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net each.

JUST PUBLISHED.

CRANFORD.

By MRS. GASKELL. Illustrated by M. V. WHEELHOUSE.

Full List and Colour Plate will be sent on application.

BOHN'S CLASSICAL LIBRARY.

NEW VOLUMES. Now Ready. 3s. 6d.

THE PLAYS OF AESCHYLUS.

A New Prose Translation from a Revised Text by

WALTER HEADLAM, Litt.D., and

C. E. S. HEADLAM, M.A.

READY WEDNESDAY NEXT.

VOL. I.

THE ILIAD OF HOMER.

Newly translated into English Prose by E. H. BLAKENEY M.A., Head Master of the King's School, Ely. In 2 vols. 3s. 6d. each. Vol. I. containing books I.—XII.

A Complete list of Bohn's Libraries, which now include upwards of 800 volumes, will be sent on application.

MR. FRANK HIRD'S NEW NOVEL. Cloth 6s.

THE DEEPER STAIN.

By FRANK HIRD, Author of "King Fritz's A.D.C."

"Mr. Hird's new novel will maintain and increase his reputation, because its characterisation is strong and faithful, and its description vivid and true. Beatrice Stratton, the very type of noble womanhood, and her husband, John Houghton, the representative of so much that is admirable in British manhood, will remain among the great figures of fiction."—Manchester Courier.

THE WORLD'S AUTHORITY.

WEBSTER'S

INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY.

TWENTIETH CENTURY EDITION.

With an Appendix of 25,000 Words, Phrases, and Definitions.

2,348 Pages. 5,000 Illustrations, Bound in Sheepskin, £2.

Write for Detailed Prospectus, with specimen pages, hundreds of opinions from eminent men, prices of various styles of binding, and particulars of the system of payment by easy instalments.

LONDON:

GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal St., W.C.

such as man's relations to man, the family, and the State—which in other ethical systems are the means of attaining the highest good, are in the Christian system the consequences following upon its attainment. If we formulate the "Highest Good" as happiness, for instance, then the rectifying of mutual relations becomes a means to it. But when we formulate the Highest Good as "righteousness," the Highest Good has first to be attained, at least partially, in order that these other things may be truly controlled. And in this way we come to see what a really satisfying treatment of Christian ethics must be. It must make a veritable dynamic connection between the "Highest Good," or righteousness, once attained, and "Duty"—must show how the Christian conception of goodness provides for an inevitable working out of virtues on the practical side, thus emphasising the importance of both, not exalting one to the detriment of the other, and preventing that divorce between Christian faith and Christian ethics which is one of the evils of our time. It is in this direction that most studies of Christian ethics are so poor. We know of only one English book (there are some German ones) in which such an attempt is made. Yet it is the one thing needful. It is not enough to show that in the sayings of Jesus, or in their implications, many ethical suggestions and commands are to be found. A right ethic must be shown as related organically—like child to parent—to the interior "righteousness" won from and through Christ. Only thus does Christianity, as a matter of fact, get a guarantee of permanence. Even if, so far as ethical suggestion is concerned, Jesus was far before His age, it might be said that at any rate the world has overtaken Him now. But if from a true religious relation to Jesus a true ethic follows almost automatically (this, of course, implies that many who have supposed themselves to be in such a true religious relation have not really been so, and this is perhaps just the lesson needful to be learnt by not a few), then Christianity keeps and must keep its place. It is from this side that the study of Christian ethics needs to be taken up. True, Dr. Stalker declares in his epilogue that "Christ must give what He demands," and there are more allusions than one to the supernatural help He offers; but more than this is required. What has to be shown is how, if man once wins the "Highest Good," relates himself aright to Jesus, right practice follows "as the night the day"—by the mere working out of latent force.

Of course, the reply may be given that this was not in the scheme. And we are content to take Dr. Stalker's book for what it is in the meantime, thankful for whatever new light, or re-kindling of old light, it brings. But we could wish that in this, and in other books on Christian ethics, the problem spoken of—which is really the heart of the whole matter—had been at least glanced at. For people who read one book are not always safe to read another, even for the further explication of the same theme. And it is a grave question whether a study of Christian ethics, a study of ethical precepts involved in the mere words of Jesus, as distinct from the ethic involved (like a flower in the bud) in a true religious relation with Him, may not to some extent divert the mind from the more important thing, and lead it to put the accent wrongly. However this may be, we are persuaded that not until more attention is paid to such constructive ethical work as we have indicated, will Christian ethics become the fruitful study it ought to be.

H. W. C.

MEMORIALS OF ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.*

WHEN Dean Church died in 1890 an article appeared in the "Spectator," presumably from the pen of the Editor, Mr. Richard Holt Hutton, entitled "The Effacement of St. Paul's." Well, there are various kinds of effacement; and though it is sadly true that the Metropolitan Cathedral has since that year no longer held the place that it once held in the affection of men of letters, or in the esteem of those who delight to hear preaching on lines that assumed that all things remained as they were from the beginning (for Liddon also died in 1890), still St. Paul's holds to-day a place of high consideration as the principal church not only of the City of London but of the Anglican communion as a whole. As such it is a centre of interest to visitors from all parts of the country and of the Empire. Nor do foreign visitors fail to enter it, and to come away perplexed as to what it stands for, Catholicism or Protestantism; for indeed it is precisely in accord with neither. Archdeacon Sinclair's newly-published account of the Cathedral, though it makes no pretence to originality, and bears no marks of profound research or scholarship—the author humbly acknowledges his obligations to the "Index Volume and Epitome of the Dictionary of National Biography"—will give the average inquirer all, and more than all, that he wants to know about its history, its architecture (both old and new St. Paul's), and its contents. A considerable portion of the book is taken from Dean Milman's "Annals of St. Paul's," and other well-known works—always with full and appreciative acknowledgment—and here we have a brief and interesting history of England from the Londoner's and from the ecclesiastic's point of view. Then, for the last half of the nineteenth century (1853-1900), we are given copious extracts from Verger Green's Diary, followed by a similar chronicle of events for the twentieth century down to date. It is all very interesting, especially to those who have followed, whether with sympathy or mistrust, the extraordinary change that has come over the Church of England during the last fifty years, more interesting and instructive than a learned essay or summary would have been; for here we have the actual record of facts, many of them trivial, it is true, but hardly any without some significance. From such a record there is necessarily absent anything to show what St. Paul's stands for in the religious life—in a deep and serious sense—of the people. The spirit is that of Henry Machyn, the City undertaker, whose diary is here largely quoted, and who viewed what passed in the reign of Edward VI. and of Mary, and in the earlier years of Elizabeth, from the undertaker's point of view, the splendor of funeral processions being to him the true test of national greatness. So here it is largely a record of Royal visits and of State funerals, and of similar occasions which touch the imagination of the man in the street, but do not inspire him to any heroic action in consequence. St. Paul's strikes us, as we read these pages, as a valuable and, indeed, necessary asset in the life of the people, but not as counting for much as a centre of spiritual life, in spite of the endless series of "painful" sermons preached there week by week, and in spite even of the rhetoric and the lofty aspirations of Canon Scott Holland, whom the University of Oxford recently certified as preaching under divine inspiration. It may be the dullness of the age which leaves things so; and yet the age is not dull in other departments—only in the hushed shadow of ecclesiastical buildings does a kind of spiritual apathy prevail. The same is true of Westminster Abbey, where the mantle of Dean Stanley is no longer worn, and where dusty muniments and petty details of ritual are thought more of than the present pressing need of moral and intellectual enlightenment in the spiritual side of the nation's life.

But more should be said about the book now before us, and in praise of it. The illustrations, by Mr. Louis Weirter, R.B.A., are excellent. Ample information is also given about the music, the bells, the monuments, the new mosaics; and there is a chapter specially devoted to "Paul's Cross," a memorial of which, on the same site, where a fountain now stands, is about to be erected. A list of the gifts recently made to the Cathedral is of interest, but the dates should have been given also. Finally, there is a fairly comprehensive bibliography, and a good index, without which a book of this kind is comparatively useless. Archdeacon Sinclair may be sincerely congratulated on the publication of this work.

NEW GLIMPSES OF MARIA EDGEWORTH.*

As might be expected from a lady whose father was four times married, and whose brothers and sisters therefore counted well-nigh a score, the family history of Maria Edge-

* "Memorials of St. Paul's Cathedral." By Archdeacon Sinclair. Chapman & Hall. 16s. net.

* "Maria Edgeworth and her Circle in the Days of Buonaparte and Bourbon." By Constance Hill. With numerous illustrations by Ellen G. Hill, and Reproductions of Contemporary Portraits. John Lane. 21s. net.

Just published. Large Cr. 8vo. 640 pp. Cloth, 6s. net.

THE PRINCE OF DESTINY.A Romance. By SARATH KUMAR GHOSH. Author of "1,001 Indian Nights."Being a presentment of India by an Indian, with its eternal patience, religious fervour, and passionate love. The book also revealsBRITAIN'S PERIL IN INDIA.In the circumstances depicted it would need the extraordinary love of an extraordinary man like the hero to save Britain's cause.Above all, this romance reproduces the atmosphere of India as no other work has ever done, and is a storehouse of Indian information which could not be obtained from any other source. Withal, it unfolds a story full of dramatic interest and instinct with deep emotions.THE NATION says:—"Deals in a mystic, splendid and Oriental manner with the destinies of India."THE BOOKMAN says:—"We have read no book in which the atmosphere of India is so wonderfully reproduced."

Published last week. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

PROGRESSIVE REDEMPTION.

The Catholic Church, its Functions and Offices in the World reviewed in the Light of the Ancient Mysteries and Modern Science.

By Rev. HOLDEN E. SAMPSON,

Author of "Progressive Creation" (see below).

This book is eminently indispensable to the practical labourer in the many fields of effort for the betterment of mankind and "reform" in human conditions, in which every individual soul who is not entirely selfish cannot help being employed. It gives in clear and forcible logic an exposure of the defects in modern efforts of humanity and reform, whether political, social, or religious, and breaks into pieces the delusions of sanguine thinkers and workers, who think that permanent and beneficial results will follow the methods of Christianization, philanthropy and social reform, which are carried out without reference to the Divine methods, embodied in the Catholic Church.

Now ready. Two de uy 8vo vols. Over 1,000 pp. Cloth, 21s. net.

PROGRESSIVE CREATION.A Reconciliation of Religion with Science.By Rev. HOLDEN E. SAMPSON.

A book that has confessedly baffled the reviewers, and of which Mr. Arthur E. Waite has said, "It is of the quality of Revelation."

Just Issued. Medium 8vo. 436 pp. Illustrated, cloth, 15s. net.

CLINICAL COMMENTARIES DEDUCED FROM THEMORPHOLOGY OF THE HUMAN BODY.By Prof. ACHILLE DEGIOVANNI, Director of the General Medical Clinic, University of Padua. Translated from the Second Italian Edition by JOHN JOSEPH EYRE, M.R.C.P., L.R.C.S.I. D.P.H., (Camb.)Send for Descriptive importantCirculars of these and other Books.LONDON:
REBMAN, Ltd.,29 Shaftesbury Ave
W.C.FOR YOUR LIBRARY LIST.*FOLK-LORE &
FOLK STORIES OF WALES.By MARIE TREVELYAN.
Preface by E. SIDNEY HART-
LAND, F.S.A. Fcap. 4to, cloth gilt, 10s. 6d. net.THE HISTORY OF PEMBROKESHIRE.By Rev. JAMES PHILLIPS.
Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net."Full of interesting details, ecclesiastical as well as secular."—
*Spectator.THE CAT IN HIS-TORY, LEGEND,
AND ART.Written and Illustrated by ANNE MARKS. Crown 4to, cloth gilt, 6s. net.The cult of the cat must prove of interest even to those who are not professed lovers of the animal.VERSES IN TWILIGHT.By the Rev. PHILLIP WIN-
TER DE QUETTEVILLE
Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.
net (by post, 2s. 9d.)A volume of secular and religious verses, the sweet melody of which will charm the reader.Write for Catalogue No. N102 of *Antiquarian and General Literature.LONDON: ELLIOT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C*THOUGHTS FROM MANY CLIMES.Quotations in English, French, and Italian, with the English translations of the Italian, with two Dialogues by
E. CARSON. Demy 16mo,
Japanese vellum gilt, gilt top,
2s. 6d. net. Velvet leather, gilt edges, silk register, 5s.
net.A book of meditative thoughts culled from French, Italian, and English authors, arranged for daily readings.LITERARY BYE-PATHS, VAGARIESBy THOMAS NEWBIGGING
Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.A series of interesting essays on out-of-the-way subjects, with the true literary note that will appeal to all book-lovers.PHILIP MENZE:*A Story of Commercial Life. By H. C. KNIGHT.
Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.This story, of especial interest to "Gentlemen of the Road," will prove very attractive to all business men and women.FOR THREE KINGDOMS.By H. C. CROSFIELD.
Frontispiece by Mr. Noyes
Lewis, Crown 8vo, 6s.Recollections of Robert Warden, a servant of King James. Full of stirring incidents, a story that grips the reader from beginning to end.GREENING'S LATEST FICTION.Another DON Q. Story.DON Q.'S LOVE STORY.By K. & HESKETH PRICHARD.

By the Author of "THE FINANCIER."

THE DISC.By HARRIS BURLAND.First Edition exhausted. Second Edition ready*

By the Author of "THE DUPE."

THE HOUSE OF TERROR.By GERALD BISS.

By the Author of "HENRY OF NAVARRE."

FOR CHARLES THE ROVER.By MAY WYNNE.

By the Author of "THE BISHOP'S EMERALDS."

THE SECRET OF THE RAFT.By HOUGHTON TOWNLEY.The most Audacious and Humorous Book of the Season.BOOM!By WILLIAM CAINE.*Other Good Fiction in Demand.

THE HUMAN MOLE	COLIN COLLINS
THE WANTON	FRANCES FORBES-ROBERTSON
THE MARQUIS CATILINI	ROWLAND STRONG
THE MASTER SCHEMER	VERE CAMPBELL
THE SPITFIRE	EDWARD PEPE
MOON OF VALLEYS	DAVID WHITELAW
RE-BIRTH	RATHMELL WILSON
ADVENTURES OF SUSAN	CYRUS BRADY
SEALED ORDERS	A. E. CAREY
THE WITCH QUEEN OF KHEM	ENA FITZGERALD
HER SUBURBAN HIGHNESS	GURNER GILLMAN
THE SERPENT AND THE CROSS	STEPHEN ANDREW

Important Announcement.

A New Romance by the Author of

"THE SCARLET PIMPERNEL."Messrs. Greening beg to announce that next week they will publishTHE NEST OF THE SPARROWHAWK.By BARONESS ORCZY.To prevent disappointment, order from your bookseller or library at once.*NOW READY.*SIR WALTER RALEGH.By STEPHEN LOVELL and WILLIAM DEVEREUX.The Story of the play by William Devereux now being successfully performed by Mr. Lewis Waller at the Lyric Theatre.At all Libraries. SIX SHILLINGS EACH.*GREENING & CO., LTD., 91, St. Martin's Lane, W.C

worth is interminable. There is a considerable library on the subject. We have Edgeworth's own "Memoirs," continued by his daughter; we have the "Letters" edited by Mr. Augustus Hare; we have brief biographies by Miss Helen Zimmern, Lady Ritchie, and Miss Emily Lawless, and a few favored ones have read the "M memoir of Maria Edgeworth" by her third step-mother, printed in three volumes for private circulation in 1867, and still awaiting publication. Every new biography contains some hitherto unpublished material. Miss Lawless provided a great deal, and now Miss Constance Hill has further added to our knowledge. We owe Miss Hill grateful thanks for attractive presentations of Fanny Burney and Jane Austen. The volume before us approaches more nearly than any of her works to "book-making," so largely does it consist of quotations. The copious extracts from the Comtesse de Boigne are clearly superfluous, as that lady's "Memoirs" have been recently presented to the public in good English dress, and have been read, we imagine, by the very people who will be attracted to this book. But it is impossible to quarrel with Miss Hill, or fairly to describe her as a "book-maker." She has woven her multitudinous quotations with singular deftness, and she has added a considerable number of fragments from hitherto unpublished letters by Maria Edgeworth.

Miss Hill, indeed, has done her work so well that we wish that she had extended it. She confines herself to Miss Edgeworth's life during two prolonged visits to Paris, and to her stay in London, and she has nothing to say about the Irish life of her heroine, although that also was in the days of Bourbon and Bonaparte. Miss Hill spells it as doubtless Maria would have done—Buonaparte. It is true that Maria Edgeworth was an Englishwoman, her parents on both sides were essentially English, and she was born in this country. Still her literary fame is derived from Ireland, her home for a long period of years, although not, be it remembered, for the most impressionable part of her life. It is with Edgeworthstown that we most associate her; and one would like to have seen a new biography that covered the whole of her life, and that included all the material provided by the fourth Mrs. Edgeworth in the privately printed "M memoir" to which we have referred. It is as an Irish novelist, as the author of "Castle Rackrent" and "The Absentee," that Miss Edgeworth lives for us. Sir Walter Scott was indeed generously uncritical (to say nothing of his noble modesty) when he declared that he wrote his novels because he desired to do for Scotland what Miss Edgeworth had done for Ireland. Maria Edgeworth really did nothing for Ireland. Scott, with Burns, rekindled a passionate fervor of nationality. Miss Edgeworth accomplished no such service (how could she with her environment?) as that of binding together the forces which rent Ireland in twain. The great writer who is to do this for her has not yet been born. Perhaps as an example of her failure we may quote a sentence in Miss Helen Zimmern's "Life of Maria Edgeworth," from which we learn that:—

"Ireland is not amongst those countries that arouse in the hearts of strangers a desire to pitch their tents, and to judge from the readiness with which her own children leave her, we cannot suppose that they find her a fascinating land. And little wonder, when we consider the state of ferment and disorder which in a greater or less degree has always prevailed there."

The passage shows the negative effect which a reading of Maria Edgeworth's books produces upon the stranger. Miss Zimmern, we believe, is an Anglo-German. Clearly she knows nothing of the devotion to country which is probably more marked in the Irish than in any other European race. It is not, however, to the Maria Edgeworth of Edgeworthstown, Co. Longford, that we are introduced in Miss Constance Hill's pages; it is solely Maria on her travels. She was in Paris in 1802, where she met Mme. Récamier, then at the height of her charm and beauty, and she met her again in 1820 in the days of her poverty.

The relationship of the Edgeworths to the Abbé Edgeworth who had attended Louis XVI. on the scaffold, gave Maria and her father entrance to all the Royalist circles, which under the First Consul were re-establishing themselves in Paris. One gathers from Miss Hill's narrative that Napoleon tried to be gracious to the Edgeworths, but the father would seem to have treated the First Consul very discourteously. Napoleon took his revenge, for Lovell

Edgeworth, a brother of Maria's, was confined for twelve years in a French fortress. After this visit to Paris comes a visit to London. That was in 1813. We have here a glimpse of a personality of that period who is little remembered in our own. Maria writes:—

"Lydia White has been very kind to us, and eager to bring together people who would suit and please us; very agreeable dinner at her house. She conducts those bel esprit parties so well; her vivacity breaks through the constraint of those who stand upon great reputations and are afraid of committing themselves."

Perhaps the best description of the Edgeworths in this visit is one we find in Byron's letters:—

"I thought Edgeworth a fine old fellow . . . active, brisk, and tireless. He was seventy, but did not look fifty—no, nor forty-eight even. . . . Edgeworth bounced about and talked loud and long. . . . He was not much admired in London. The fact was, everybody cared more about her. She was a nice, little, unassuming 'Jeanie Deans-looking body,' as we Scotch say; and, if not handsome, certainly not ill-looking. Her conversation was as quiet as herself. One would never have guessed she could write her name; whereas her father talked, not as if he could write nothing else, but as if nothing else was worth writing."

Miss Hill tells a good story, which has, however, been told before, of the Prince Regent. Lord Whitworth had just been appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. It is the fourth Mrs. Edgeworth who is writing:—

"It is said that at dinner at the Prince Regent's the other day the Prince drank Lord Whitworth's health, saying, 'I am greatly obliged to you, my Lord, for accepting the government of a country which nothing but a sense of duty could induce you to do. I have already offered it to two dukes and an earl in vain.' By this speech the unlucky Regent offended all the noblemen in question, insulted Ireland, and did not please Lord Whitworth."

Maria was again in Paris at the time of the Restoration of Louis XVIII., and we learn from the unpublished manuscripts that while Louis was passing through the streets she heard a body of soldiers repeatedly calling out, "Vive l'Empereur! Vive Napoleon!"

She was there a third time in 1820, and the most charming episode in the whole book is the account of a visit to Madame Récamier at the Abbaye aux Bois. These were the days when Madame Récamier, no longer young, was living in a small room in a convent up seventy-eight steps. "Lady Elizabeth," Miss Edgeworth says, "asked us to go with her and Miss Canning to the opera, but we were engaged with Madame Récamier, and as she is no longer rich and prosperous, I could not break the engagement." There are many accounts of Madame Récamier in this period of her life, but not one more pleasing than is here afforded. It was at the Abbaye aux Bois that Miss Edgeworth met Madame de Boigne, whose recently published diary has made her so familiar to our literary world.

There is also a very brisk account of Coppet after Mme. de Staël's death, which occurred in 1817. Altogether, the book, in spite of the exceptional number of quotations it contains from not unfamiliar works, has a very distinct charm, and it is enhanced by Miss Ellen Hill's attractive illustrations.

DO YOU ASPIRE TO BECOME AN AUTHOR OR JOURNALIST?

If you do, then we can tell you how to make the best use of your talents, how to avoid the heartache of returned MSS. how to "get there" by the shortest route.

Naturally, it takes some time to find your proper groove, the channel most suited to your particular bent, but if you have ability we say, unhesitatingly, "it can be done." You want to serve a short "Apprenticeship" under our guidance. We say short, advisedly, because the very Newness of Discovered Genius finds a ready market, if directed into the proper channel.

It may be that you have a special aptitude for essay writing perhaps you are a correspondent whose letters confer the greatest pleasure on the recipient; in either case there is the probability of turning your gift to the very best account. Do so, get advice from those who can advise you. Send a note to-day to the

LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE,
Room 26, 9, Arundel Street, Strand, W.C.

Some Recent R.T.S. Books

A COMPANION VOLUME TO "SCENES IN THE LIFE OF OUR LORD."
Folio (16½ in by 12½ in), handsomely bound in white cloth, full gilt, 16/- net.

THE GOSPEL IN THE OLD TESTAMENT

Containing 24 Original Coloured Pictures (mounted on stout artistic paper) by HAROLD COPPING, with Descriptive Letterpress by the Lord Bishop of Durham. Price 16/- net. Also bound in full Persian, gilt side and back, 24/- net.
THE GUARDIAN says:—"This is an exceedingly handsome volume, admirably produced in all respects. Mr. Copping's pictures are clever as well as attractive, and full of sympathy with his subject. The colouring and drawing are delightful throughout. The Bishop of Durham's letterpress is by way of being a devotional commentary, and is simple and adequate."
THE STANDARD says:—"The pictures are strong and vivid in conception, while the execution is marked by power and reverence."

New Edition, with 8 new Coloured Plates by HAROLD COPPING.

SCENES FROM THE LIFE OF ST. PAUL

By the Rev. J. S. Howson, D.D., late Dean of Chester. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 3/6.

This work from the pen of the late Dean Howson reflects on every page an intimate and peculiar knowledge of all that touches the character and work of St. Paul. Although not a formal Life of the Apostle, it presents in the clearest possible light the outstanding features of his character and career. Helpful in every line to the Bible student, it abounds in practical comment, and in suggestive treatment of striking episodes recorded in the "Acts." The Coloured Illustrations are from Drawings by Mr. Harold Copping, whose work in SCENES IN THE LIFE OF OUR LORD and THE GOSPEL IN THE OLD TESTAMENT has been so strikingly successful.

S. R. CROCKETT'S NEW STORY.

THE MEN OF THE MOUNTAIN

A Stirring Tale of the Franco-German War of 1870-1871.

By S. R. CROCKETT, Author of "The White Plumes of Navarre," "The Lilac Sunbonnet," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6/-.
THE TIMES says:—"This is an historical romance, as knowing and telling as Mr. Crockett's usually are, of the French 'Year Terrible'—that is 1871, mainly on the Franco-Swiss Frontier, and with a young Protestant pastor for its central figure."
THE SPECTATOR says:—"We have never seen anything better from his pen."
THE SCOTSMAN says:—"The story is told with Mr. Crockett's accustomed vigour of manner, and is always romantic and picturesque."
THE PALL MALL GAZETTE says:—"The hero is a fine type of principle and devotion, and his patient and heroic service to his people is crowned with a courtship that is portrayed in subtle but effective lines."

A NEW STORY BY THE AUTHOR OF "ANDREW GOODFELLOW," ETC.

LOVE, THE INTRUDER. A MODERN ROMANCE.

By HELEN H. WATSON, Author of "Andrew Goodfellow," &c. With 4 Illustrations by VICTOR PROUT. Large Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6/-.
THE TIMES says:—"It is a very commendable love story of the domestic kind; mostly in the west country, the hall, and the farmhouse."
THE DAILY TELEGRAPH says:—"We cordially recommend this fresh and human story to the mothers of girls. It would make an ideal Christmas present for an English girl, divine, demure."
THE DAILY MAIL says:—"The story is very pleasantly written."
THE SCOTSMAN says:—"The story has the charm of unexpected development."

A Magnificent Gift-Book.

THE BOY'S OWN ANNUAL

Large demy 4to (11½ in by 8½ in), 332 pages, with 12 coloured or tinted plates and hundreds of other pictures, handsome cloth gilt, 8/-. 332 Large Pages, containing:—Long stories by Dr. GORDON STABLES, R.N., F. H. BOLTON, ADRIAN LEIGH, JOHN LEA, ALFRED COLBECK, REGINALD H. POOLE; 51 Shorter Stories, 30 Adventures on Land and Sea, 12 Indoor Amusements, 16 Outdoor Amusements, 12 Coloured Plates, 500 Other Pictures. Papers by Experts on Cricket, Football, Photography, Athletics, Stamp Collecting, Boating, Boys' Pets, How to make Useful Articles; Games for all Seasons; and scores of other eye-opening, mind-forming, idle-hand employing, helpful papers, such as will attract and elevate the reader.

AN IDEAL GIFT FOR A GIRL.

THE GIRL'S OWN ANNUAL

First Volume of New Series. Large demy 4to (11½ in by 8½ in), 332 pages, with 12 coloured or tinted plates and hundreds of other pictures, handsome cloth gilt, 8/-. 768 Large Pages. 12 coloured or tinted Plates and hundreds of other illustrations. Long Stories by FLORENCE MORSE KINGSLEY, MARY GAUNT, CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS, and KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN. 40 Shorter Tales by well-known Authors. Musical Papers by JOSEPH HOFFMAN, MORITZ MOSZKOWSK, MADAME MELBA, and MARIE HALL. Papers on Art, Photography, Cookery, Dressmaking, Church Work, Music, Nature Study, Girls' Employments, Needlework (Plain and Fancy), Recreations, Medical Papers, Household Economy, &c.; and a great variety of other helpful reading for sensible girls and their mothers.

JUST READY. Demy 8vo, profusely illustrated, 5/- net.

THE HANDY NATURAL HISTORY (MAMMALS.)

By ERNEST PROTHEROE, F.Z.S. Profusely and accurately illustrated, with Coloured Frontispiece and Title-Page. 32 Coloured Plates, 48 Black and White Plates. 114 illustrations in the Text. Demy 8vo, Cloth gilt, 5/- net.
THE STANDARD says:—"It is a highly interesting volume." THE RECORD says:—"It is a delightful book."
THE SCOTSMAN says:—"It is an excellent popular natural history."
THE DAILY MAIL says:—"Its lucidity, its accuracy, its brightness, make it a good book to have at hand."
THE MORNING LEADER says:—"Mr. Protheroe is to be congratulated upon a most delightful book."
THE WESTMINSTER GAZETTE says:—"It is a very generous five shillingsworth of pleasant Natural History."

W. G. LAWES, OF SAVAGE ISLAND AND NEW GUINEA.

By JOSEPH KING.

With Preface by DR. WARDLAW THOMPSON. Map, Portrait, and many illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6/- net.
THE STANDARD says:—"It is the life of one of those strong yet modest men who are the salt of the Empire."

GEORGE GRENFELL: Congo Missionary and Explorer.

By Rev. GEORGE HAWKER.

With Photogravure Portrait, Maps, and 32 pages of Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6/- net. Second Edition.
THE DAILY NEWS says:—"It is a Missionary Story that takes rank with the best of recent years, both in interest and in variety."
THE BRITISH WEEKLY says:—"It is a book of fascinating interest."
THE DAILY CHRONICLE says:—"It is a delightful book."

Please ask for the "R.T.S." recent Books at the Shops.

London: 4, BOUVERIE STREET and 65, ST. PAUL'S, E.C.

MR. JOHN LANE has pleasure in announcing that he has just issued the NEW POEMS OF WILLIAM WATSON, being the first volume of verse that has come from the pen of the poet since 1903.

NOTABLE BOOKS IN MR. JOHN LANE'S LIST.

History and Biography.

THE LIFE OF JOAN OF ARC.

By ANATOLE FRANCE, a Translation by WINIFRED STEPHENS. With 2 photogravure Portraits, 6 black and white Illustrations and a Plan. 2 vols. Demy 8vo. 25s. net. [Now ready.]

The publication of this book has been delayed until now in order to allow of the contents being made as perfect as possible, incorporating the very latest corrections and additions. The translation is a rendering of the last French Edition, and has been carefully carried out under the supervision of M. ANATOLE FRANCE himself.

WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY.

A Biography by LEWIS MELVILLE. With 2 Photogravures and numerous other Illustrations. 2 vols. Demy 8vo. 25s. net.

"The work will be prized by every lover of literature both as an invaluable storehouse of facts and as a biography not unworthy of its subject."—Scotsman.

THE LAST JOURNALS OF HORACE WALPOLE

During the reign of George III. from 1771 to 1783.

With Notes by DR. DORAN. Edited with an Introduction by A. FRANCIS STEUART, and containing numerous Portraits (2 in Photogravure) reproduced from Contemporary Pictures, Engravings, &c. 2 vols. Demy 8vo. 25s. net.

"It is pleasant to have the work reissued in so excellent a form as this. . . . His writings are not only valuable as historical contributions; they are delightful as literature. In his witty way Walpole was a masterly phrase-maker."—Daily Telegraph.

GIOVANNI BOCCACCIO: A Biographical Study.

By EDWARD HUTTON. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and numerous other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 16s. net. [Just out.]

MARIA EDGEWORTH AND HER CIRCLE: in the Days of Bonaparte and Bourbon.

By CONSTANCE HILL, Author of "Jane Austen: Her Homes and Her Friends." With numerous Illustrations by ELLEN G. HILL, and reproductions of Contemporary Portraits, &c. Demy 8vo. 21s. net.

"A new book by Miss Constance Hill is a delight."—Daily Telegraph.

THE DAYS OF THE DIRECTOIRE.

By ALFRED ALLINSON. With 48 full-page Illustrations, including many of the Costumes of the Directoire Period. Demy 8vo. 16s. net.

"An eminently readable study."—Scotsman.

"The best things in this book are the pictures; they are excellent and well produced."—Pall Mall Gazette.

MADAME DE MAINTENON: Her Life and Times, 1635-1719.

By C. C. DYSON. With 1 Photogravure Plate and 16 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Dyson is a sound and discriminating biographer; and the vicissitudes of his heroine's career make the book interesting."—Observer.

GEORGE BERNARD SHAW.

By G. K. CHESTERTON. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

"Only one could have presented so sane, vivid, and generous a portrait of his mind. . . . This book is at once appreciative and polemical. He has taken a serious man seriously. . . . It is, in short, a vital work; and the author has never expressed with more decision and humour and abundance his own vigorous and congenial philosophy. . . . In a word, this wise and candid study of a remarkable personality is hardly less impressive for its merely rhetorical qualities than for its deeper qualities of insight, spirituality, and good feeling."—Morning Post.

Poetry and Art.

NEW POEMS.

By WILLIAM WATSON. Crown 8vo, 5s. net. Also a Limited Edition of 75 copies on Japanese Hand-made Vellum, £1 1s. net. This is the first volume of poetry that has come from the pen of Mr. William Watson since 1903.

"In this noble volume there is an emotional depth, an intellectual variety, and a passionate splendour of inspiration and of craftsmanship which would suffice to establish a great reputation."—JAMES DOUGLAS, in the Star.

NEW POEMS.

By RICHARD LE GALLIENNE. Crown 8vo. 5s. net. "His hand has lost nothing of its cunning."—Daily Telegraph.

A BOOK OF SATYRS.

By AUSTIN OSMAN SPARE. Large folio. 21s. net.

THE SONG OF SIXPENCE PICTURE BOOK.

By WALTER CRANE. 4s. 6d.

Containing "Sing a Song of Sixpence"—"Princess Belle Etoile"—"An A B C of Old Friends." Each separately, 1s. each, with New Cover and End-papers, uniform with the rest of Mr. Walter Crane's Toy Books.

Anatole France in English.

NOW READY.—A Translation by A. W. EVANS of L'ILE DES PINGOUINS

(PENGUIN ISLAND)

By ANATOLE FRANCE.

Being the IXth Volume of the Uniform 6s. Edition of The Works of ANATOLE FRANCE in English. PUBLISHED—THE WHITE STONE—THAIS—BALTHASAR—THE WELL OF ST. CLARE—THE GARDEN OF EPICURUS—THE CRIME OF SILVESTRE BONNARD—MOTHER OF PEARL—THE RED LILY.

Travel.

THE SOUL OF A TURK.

Record of a Trip to Bagdad. By Mrs. DE BUNSEN. With 8 Full-page Illustrations, demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. "A delightfully written narrative of adventurous travel."—Spectator.

BOSNIA AND HERZEGOVINA.

By MAUD M. HOLBACH. With 48 Illustrations by OTTO HOLBACH, and a Map, crown 8vo. 5s. net. "An excellent, chatty, and picturesque travel companion."—Pall Mall Gazette.

New Novels.

GERMAINE.

By H. C. ROWLAND. 6s. "From its first page this novel quickens the reader with its intense vitality and individuality."—World.

THE HOLY MOUNTAIN.

By STEPHEN REYNOLDS. 6s. "A very striking book."—Standard.

TRIAL BY MARRIAGE.

By W. S. JACKSON, Author of "Nine Points of the Law." 6s. "Sparkling and incisive . . . undeniably entertaining."—Evening Standard.

THE EAGLE'S NEST.

By ALLAN MCAULAY. 6s. "A brilliant tour de force."—Athenæum.

THE ODD MAN.

By ARNOLD HOLCOMBE. 6s. "One of the most refreshing and amusing books that we have read for some months. . . . A book to put on one's shelves."—Morning Post.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON & NEW YORK.

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 8.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1909.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K. 4d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	313	The Political Position of
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		Women Graduates. By L.
The History of a Crime.—		Garrett Anderson, M.D., B.S.	331
Chapter I. ...	316	"Land for the Asking." By
The Retort of the Commons ...	317	County Councillor, Builder,
A Half Way House to Freedom 318		and W. J. Johnston ...	331
The New Indian Constitution 319		High Albania. By M. E.
Our Ancient Ally ...	320	Durham ...	332
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		John Milton. By W. Grinton
Ten Years After ...	322	Berry ...	332
An American Leader ...	323	Charles Kingsley and Women's
Methods of Justice ...	324	Suffrage. By C. E. Maurice	333
The Charity of the Middle Ages 325		Pragmatism. By L. Crook ...	333
SHORT STUDIES:—		Mr. "Ellis Barker" With Us.
A Parting. By John Gals-		By J. A. S. ...	333
worthy ...	326	Woman Suffrage and Forceful
PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS:—		Feeding. By Ennis Richmond	333
Lord No Zoo. By the Right Hon.		Women and the Laws. By
George W. E. Russell ...	327	Alberta Russell ...	334
THE DRAMA:—		POETRY:—
Lord Gorell's Amendment.		The Welsh Sea. By James
By H. Granville Barker ...	328	Elroy Flecker ...	334
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		REVIEWS:—
The Lord Advocate and Mr.		Lyric Beauty ...	334
Balfour. By a Liberal		Sir William Huggins's Dis-
Member ...	330	coveries ...	335
The Ultimate ... Basis of		The Martyr of the Marriage
Authority. By John Massie,		Laws ...	337
M.P. ...	330	The Last of Explorers ...	337
"Making the Foreigner Pay."		The Rise of Christianity ...	338
By C. F. Cazenove ...	330	Sir Wilfrid Lawson ...	340
		Robert Emmet ...	342
		THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By
		Lucellum ...	344

The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

ON Tuesday Lord Lansdowne gave notice in the House of Lords that on the motion for the second reading of the Finance Bill he would move

"That this House is not justified in giving its consent to this Bill until it has been submitted to the country."

If the seventeenth century Peers had submitted a similar resolution to Puritan democracy, they would have answered for it with their heads. To-day the milder Liberal retort will be the destruction of the veto. It seems to us impossible that the Government can suffer debate on such a resolution without declaring it to be outside the law, to say nothing of the Order Book of the House, for with its passage the present force and balance of the Constitution cease to exist. We hope that within a few hours of its passage a National Convention will be summoned in the capital, and that Sir Henry Norman, the organiser of the brilliant Budget campaign, will be put in command of machinery for stirring the whole country into instant alarm and agitation.

* * *

SUBVERSIVE as is the resolution, it has been recommended in the most quavering notes by Mr. Balfour and by the Tory Press, which has clearly been instructed to deprecate its significance, and suggest that the Peers only want to make a single breach in the Constitution, and that a little one. This is not surprising in view of the statement that the King's remonstrances have been utterly disregarded, that this mad motion is, in the main, the work of Lord Cawdor, Lord Milner, and Lord Curzon—three of the worst judgments in the Peers—and that both its shame-faced authors were dragged into responsibility for it.

ON Thursday, Mr. Balfour, for whose Manchester speech the Lansdowne motion was plainly arranged, followed the National Union of Conservative Associations in a spiritless defence of it, which the "Morning Post" described as "a perfect lecture to doubting Thomases"—by the greatest doubter of all. His speech was that of a sickened and anxious man. The greater part of it was spent in recommending an unexplained form of Protection to Lancashire, which lives on Free Trade, in denying Home Rule to Ireland, and in saying that the Budget was Socialistic because it taxed a man according to the kind of wealth he possessed, and divided land values between the ratepayer and the taxpayer, instead of giving them all to the former! On these grounds he declared that Lord Lansdowne was "right" in "submitting" the Budget to the country because the great function of the Lords was to see that the Government was a "popular Government," i.e., popular with the House of Lords. He spoke dubiously about the election, wet-blanketing the revolutionary appeal, and merely hoping that the country would show "moderation" and "resolution."

* * *

MEANWHILE the heaviest disappointment to a depressed and already half-beaten party has been the response of the City to the Lansdowne resolution. The expectation was that the City would leap to meet the Lords' rally against "revolution," and that Consols would flare up like a rocket, even if they presently came down like a stick. Nothing of the kind. A state of utter flatness and despondency fell upon the stock markets, clearly apprehensive of a loan and a long period of agitation and unsettlement, for all of which they will have to thank the Lords. The truth is that the Stock Exchange is not out for revolution. It even went in a patriotic way to the Chancellor, and freely offering him its toll of a quarter of a million, came to a handsome agreement with him. It would have nothing to do with the Rothschild petition, which has in consequence been a complete fiasco.

* * *

ON Thursday Mr. Haldane, addressing the members of the Eighty Club, made a splendidly thorough exposition of Liberal duty, in face of the crisis, excommunicating even the disappearing Perks and all his works. He declared the Cabinet and the party to be absolutely united, stated that the three issues for the election must be Free Trade, the Budget, and the Lords, showed that Lord Milner's call for twenty millions from foreign imports led straight to heavy food taxes, and that they, in their turn, were a short cut to Socialism, and insisted that the alternative to the Budget was a Constitutional Revolution, followed by Protection. The country therefore had reached a pass in which the Liberals must fight the Constitutional issue again and again, till they won. Let them remember the example of the Romans who, when Hannibal was at the City gates, decreed punishment to all who pronounced the word "Peace." So should it be to any Liberal who at this juncture went back on his Liberalism.

MR. CHURCHILL, who was subject to a silly outrage by a suffragette, made a brilliant speech at Bristol, in which he ridiculed the notion of calling the Budget revolutionary because of Mr. Lloyd-George's speeches, or because it "tacked" on to a land tax the machinery for collecting it. Even if it were as bad as the Tories pretended, they could put it right in a few months. But no; the "proud Tory faction" could not wait till the dish came round to them; in their ungovernable haste, they must needs kick the table down. He stated the official Treasury calculation of what the action of the Lords might cost the nation to be fifty millions, an estimate which practically agrees with Lord Welby's estimate, in the "Daily Chronicle," of forty-nine millions. The Lords would then come whining to the Commons to repair the mischief they had done; and, though they had all the responsibility, the Government, as the King's servants, would try and save something from the wreck, and see to it that the people did not lose too much money. We hope, however, that the Commons will not make things too easy for the wreckers. The action of the Lords struck at the King's prerogative, at the power of the Commons, and at the whole structure of civil government, and there should be no delay and no compromise in meeting them.

* * *

THE visit of King Manuel of Portugal to the King had its official culmination in a Guildhall reception on Wednesday. The toasts referred to that ancient alliance which historians like to consider as a continuous influence since the days of Edward I. It certainly was remembered and acknowledged by the elder Pitt, and it was the pivot of our Peninsular policy, though had it not existed then it would have been necessary to invent—or impose—it. King Manuel, whose simplicity and seriousness of purpose are said to impress all observers favorably, dropped one significant hint in his speech. Political ties, he said, are already as close as they can be. It is the commercial relationship which Portugal is now anxious to develop.

* * *

WE have received from a Liberal peer, too late for our present issue, a very strong protest against the action of the Government in coming to an agreed or half-agreed settlement with the Lords upon the Irish Land Bill. Something, no doubt, must be done to save social order in Ireland, which will be gravely threatened by the failure of the Bill. But it is a strange spectacle to see a Liberal peer engaged at this juncture for three or four hours in moving amendments to the Bill, some of which he described as "concessions." Lord Crewe practically apologised for the rejection of the Lords' amendments by the House of Commons, and declared that this action was not meant to be "disrespectful" to the Lords. There was no clear statement of what the Ministry had resisted and what it had given away, but on at least two points of great importance the Irish Party refuse their assent. The same course is being followed with regard to the Housing Bill, which, originally a weak measure, has been further compromised by the Minister in charge, who even rejected the strengthening amendments moved by the Bishops. These proceedings seem to us pessimi exempli. Why should not the Government have declared that they will have no more mangling of Commons' Bills?

* * *

By far the most powerful intellectual endorsement of the Budget has come from Professor Marshall, the doyen of the modern school of British economists, and the most highly trained and richly furnished, as well as the most cautious and deliberate mind, now engaged in this country upon this science. Professor Marshall vindicated his own proposals of a new burden on urban land-owners as a necessary investment for the "physical, mental, and moral nurture of the people." He said that he would have put his fresh-air tax at ten millions a year, but he welcomed the more moderate proposals of the Budget.

* * *

PROFESSOR MARSHALL concluded as follows, in a passage which we hope will be written upon thousands of hoardings all over the country:—

"The proposal made in the present Budget to isolate future accretions of 'public value' and to tax them only was not open to me. I regard it as in many ways a great improvement. Those Socialistic aims, which tend towards the supersession of the responsibility of the individual for his own career, seem to me the gravest of all the dangers that loom on the social horizon. But in so far as the Budget proposes to check the appropriation of what is really public property by private persons, and in so far as it proposes to bring under taxation some real income, which has escaped taxation merely because it does not appear above the surface in a money form, I regard it as sound finance. In so far as its proceeds are to be applied to social problems, where a little money may do much towards raising the level of life of the people and increasing their happiness, it seems to me a Social Welfare Budget. I do not profess to have mastered all its details; but, on the whole, I incline to think it merits that name."

It cannot be too widely known that the Lords treat the promotion of "social welfare" as "revolutionary." As minor signs of educated opinion, we note that the Oxford Union has only rejected by eight votes (308 to 316) a motion declaring the House of Lords to be a menace to the State, and that at a meeting of the Cambridge Economic Society, attended by young economists of distinction, like Mr. Keynes and Mr. H. O. Meredith, only one speaker opposed the Budget, and he on the ground that he was a Tariff Reformer.

* * *

A FRESH example of Mr. Balfour's extreme laxity in the management of the Tory Party has occurred at Portsmouth. Sir John Baker, one of the Liberal members, having died, the official Unionist candidate, Mr. Falle, has been hurried out of the way in order to make room for Lord Charles Beresford, who, in a great dockyard centre, is to work up a rattling naval campaign at a moment when he is at grave issue with the Admiralty on questions of discipline, and is subject to charges of false statements by its official head. It does not seem that a by-election will take place, because Parliament will probably be dissolved before it can be completed. But it seems to us to be a grave scandal for a political party to make our great naval station the cock-pit of Lord Charles Beresford's battle with Sir John Fisher.

* * *

MEANWHILE, we record with great satisfaction the news that Sir Arthur Wilson is to succeed Sir John Fisher as First Sea Lord on the latter's retirement and peerage. Even those who cherish the strongest view of Sir John Fisher's services as an administrator will congratulate the fleet and the Government on such an appointment. Sir Arthur Wilson is, by the consent of naval authorities all the world over, a great strategist and a great commander. He has long been acquainted with the problems of naval defence, both from Whitehall and from the high seas. But, above all, his is the name to conjure out of existence the disputes and scandals of the last few years, and close the era of Fisherites and Beresfordites. Moreover, we fancy that even the backers of these redoubtable champions rejoice to feel that we now have a man incapable of making a party in the Navy, and knowing how to serve as well as how to command.

* * *

THE duel between the Austrian and Russian semi-official Press over the real facts of last year's crisis still continues. To the impartial onlooker the result of all the revelations is to discredit M. Isvolsky and Count Aerenthal in about equal degrees. The main facts are fairly clear. Even before the Buchlau meeting M. Isvolsky had consented to the annexation of Bosnia, and apparently also of the Sanjak, in return for which the Dardanelles were to be opened to Russia. It is also probable that a Russian occupation of Constantinople in certain eventualities had been bartered for an Austrian occupation of Salonica. M. Isvolsky at this time had no thought of championing the Serbs. He was enraged only because the act to which he had assented was consummated before he understood that it was imminent. Prince Ferdinand is the scapegoat. He was in the plot, but spoiled its time-table because he had been incensed by the Austrian Emperor's refusal to bestow on him the Golden Fleece. That story has all the exquisite stamp of authenticity. The lesser Tsar has the soul of a court usher.

* * *

ON the eve of the proclamation of the Indian Reforms, whose purport we describe elsewhere, two bombs were thrown at the carriage of Lord and Lady Minto, as they were driving through Ahmedabad. They fell on sandy ground, and did not explode, but a sweeper who broke one of them against a cart was badly injured. The outrage has happily attracted little notice, and the chief serious obstacle to the success of the Reforms is the deportations—which we hope will soon cease—and the coolness of the Hindu community, who have been partly estranged by the concessions to the Mohammedans.

* * *

LIKE all the Great Powers, amid the process of "rattling into barbarism," France is facing a heavy deficit and an interesting Budget. The lukewarmness of the Radicals and the opposition of the Senate has enforced the postponement of the perennial income-tax scheme. M. Cochery proposes to fill up the hole with taxes on tobacco, alcohol, and wine licences. The "trade" is up in arms, and has held a "monster" demonstration in Paris. More serious is the revolt among the more opportunist Radicals. The General Election is due in May. Why cannot M. Cochery balance his Budget with Treasury bonds? They are very popular with the bankers and the small investors, whereas the "trade" is strong in every constituency. The Minister of Finance fills the least popular office in France. M. Cochery's predecessor was sacrificed to the middle-class dislike of the income-tax. He himself has been this week in imminent peril. M. Briand, however, with a manner that is all quietness and moderation, is, in reality, much less "squeezable" than M. Clemenceau, who had a way of covering his yielding with bluster. The battle in the Chamber, however, has yet to come, and the battle in the Senate will be still more uncertain. The Senate conceives that it is already conceding too much by passing a contributory pensions scheme in time for the elections, after hanging it up for four years. The two-Chamber issue, which focusses a class conflict, may before long be almost as interesting in France as it is with us, and M. Jaurès, in his eloquent way, is already drawing parallels.

IN the small hours of Sunday morning Madame Steinheil was acquitted of the murder of her husband and mother. Few verdicts have been more wildly welcomed even by Paris. The grace and dramatic skill of the lady, no less than her eventful "past," had made her interesting, while the terrible torment of her protracted examination and trial by a puzzled police, a sensational Press, and a harsh judge, had stirred an entirely proper feeling of pity. Her psychology is very puzzling. She had good reason for despising her husband, and she is said to have been a good daughter. Some distinguished men, from the late President Faure downward, had succumbed to her charm. Her bewildering lies seemed equally inconsistent with guilt and with innocence. The evidence against her was mere conjecture. Her own story was improbable. Yet the tale of the three men in gabardines and a red-haired woman who bound her, while they robbed and murdered, derived some plausibility from the fact that the gabardines had been stolen before the murders from the property room of a theatre. The three men may, none the less, have been her accomplices. On any theory it is difficult to explain why at one stage she tried to inculcate her servants. The problem is not likely now to be solved—the possible trails which might have been followed are now too old to be traced. But the trial is likely to exert a permanent and salutary effect by the attention which it has called to the defects in French judicial procedure.

* * *

THE Turkish Parliament and the Persian Mejlis have both met during the past week, but to our thinking the most interesting event relating to Eastern politics has been the lecture of Sir W. Willcocks to the Royal Geographical Society. The great engineer, fresh from his triumphs on the Nile, is sanguine of success in his schemes for restoring Mesopotamia to civilisation. His surveys have gone far enough to allow him to sketch the outline of his plans. His first task (already begun) will be to deliver the Euphrates valley from the floods which have vexed it from the time of Noah. An outlet for the flood-waters will be provided by diverting them into the course of the scriptural river Pison. At present the farmers of the valley reckon on losing their whole crops every third year by flood. These operations alone may add a million tons of wheat and two million cwt. of cotton to the world's supplies at a cost of only £350,000. Barrages on the Euphrates and Tigris, two main canals, and a plan for using the sunken lake of Akkarkuf for the decanting of silt will complete the eventual scheme.

* * *

SIR W. WILLCOCKS is not content with sea transport or with the long and costly German Bagdad route as a means of bringing the immense potential riches of his Garden of Eden to the world's markets. He argues for direct Western communication over the desert by rail to Damascus and the Syrian coast. The length of the line would be only 550 miles, and the cost some £2,200,000. This is, of course, the revival of a much earlier English scheme. It will, no doubt, be disliked by the Germans, but if Mesopotamia has anything like the possibilities which are now predicted by sober and experienced engineers, there is nothing excessive in the provision of an alternative and much shorter route. The Young Turks are naturally friendly to the scheme, and they see safety in a plan which will interest two Powers instead of one in what may soon be their richest province. A wise diplomacy would seek betimes to prepare co-operation rather than rivalry.

Politics and Affairs.

THE HISTORY OF A CRIME.—CHAPTER I.

WE need spend little time in discussing the canting formula in which Lord Lansdowne at once advances and masks the design of the peers to depose every power in the Constitution but their own. Lord Lansdowne's criminal resolution equally insults and degrades the King, the Commons, and the People. From the first power it takes the authority to order a dissolution of Parliament on the advice of his responsible Ministers, depending on a majority of the House of Commons. The second power it strikes, for the first time for three hundred years, through its untouched and unquestioned control of taxation. The third power it deprives of half the value of their vote, for it asks them to transfer the right to appoint and dismiss Ministers from the men whom they can touch to a set of self-constituted judges, sitting as gods above them. The Lords pretend to "submit" a single issue to the present voters in order that for the future all voters who desire progress may have to submit all issues—including taxation—to their decision. The last point could not be put more forcibly than by the "Manchester Guardian":—

"Every Opposition candidate . . . who does not clear himself of complicity in the plot for giving to the House of Lords the present final power of the House of Commons over finance and changes of Ministry is guilty of an intrigue, not against the Liberal Government or against the present Liberal majority in the Commons, but against every voter, Liberal or Conservative, whose vote he seeks. He is an accessory to a scheme for robbing them of part of their vote's worth in political power, and he stands before the electors in a position morally as unsound as that of a business man who seeks a post in a firm in order to injure it for a rival firm's advantage, or a land steward who applies to be entrusted with an estate with the unconfessed purpose of lowering its value."

Therefore let the man who votes for the Peers at the coming election know that in so doing he confesses, not only that his fathers' blood was shed for nought, but that he, a common laboring fellow, is safer, for his own good, in putting his vote in the political bank opened for him by his betters, where he will get it back one day with a discount of about seventy-five per cent.

But for the moment sharp, immediate, political consequences depend upon this Lansdowne motion. In the first place—always on the hypothesis that there is such a thing as a Constitution—it is OUT OF ORDER, for the Lords, as Mr. Balfour says, cannot touch finance. In the second place, it is UNCONSTITUTIONAL, for the double reason that it violates the prerogative of the Crown and the privileges of the Commons. How can the King's servants and the people's Executive meet a DISORDERLY, UNCONSTITUTIONAL, and REVOLUTIONARY motion? How—if the Lord Chancellor cannot at once stop it from being debated, as the Speaker of the House of Commons can stop all matters lying outside the province of that Assembly—save by a resolution denying the competence of the peers to proceed? Let the Lords vote that down if they please, and in so doing formally add to what is in itself an act of treason to the State. But we cannot imagine how an Administration, resolved to discharge their trust to the Constitution, can allow such a motion to remain on the Order Book until they have to admit duress, and can thus doubly stamp the illegality of the original procedure.

Let us remark in passing that that procedure remains without stated cause or excuse. We observe that the reed shaken by each wind of pernicious doctrine has made another tremulous appearance before the sturdy people of the North who cast him out four years ago. Then Free Trade had to go because Mr. Balfour dared not say that he believed in it. Now, our Constitution must be smashed because, still wandering in his metaphysical mist, this invertebrate trifler sees plain, if mistaken, men eager for some kind of issue, and cannot, because it is not in his nature, help them out. The Budget is to be destroyed, a deficit of fifty millions is to be incurred, trade is to be damnified and a violent political storm is to sweep through the country, for weeks or months no man is to know for certainty whether he need pay his debt to the State, the House of Commons is to be set under the heel of a handful of nobodies, and all for what? Because the Budget distinguishes between a man who works for his money and a man who makes others work for him, and because it taxes land and proposes to divide the proceeds between the taxpayers and the ratepayers, instead of putting them all into the ratepayers' pockets! No other complaint did Mr. Balfour make against Mr. George's proposals. No plea for the overturning of secular liberty was advanced but that the House which hates everything Liberal, democratic, generous, progressive, enlightened, and free—everything, in short, that touches its pride and its purse—was the appointed and rightful authority for discovering, not, if you please, when a Bill or a policy was right, but when a Government was "popular" or no. It is barely necessary to add the Liberal comment. We know well enough that the Lords only "submit" to the people things which they hate, and that this self-regarding fury has reached a point when no Liberal Government can count on a year's life at their hands, and no power in the Constitution, not the King himself, or the oldest and simplest custom of Parliament, is secure.

The Tories, therefore, are going to their second débâcle as they went to their first, stumbling into Revolution as they stumbled into Protection. All the more necessary is it for us to have a clear, strong, and, above all, a united lead. We are not speaking of Liberalism only. This is to be an ad hoc election. For the Budget two forces in Parliament have equally contended; and if a prize were to be given for steady and enthusiastic support, we should not know whether to award it to the Liberal or to the Labor Party. To both these sections a common platform and advocacy are assigned by the fact that the Lords, now visibly threatening all progress save at the cost of Revolution, deny a career to Liberalism, Nonconformity, and social reform, and say to Poverty in the name of Property, "Your back shall bear the whole burden of the State, and that burden we, and not your representatives, will adjust." Such a crisis calls for a full treaty between Liberalism and Labor, and we make a special appeal to the Prime Minister, whose eyes have witnessed the unshaken devotion of the Labor Party to the first object of his Government, and who has, in a singular degree, earned the confidence of its members, to sign and approve such an instrument. We do not think—no one thinks—that Labor representation can remain as it stands in this Parliament. It must grow. There are still a number of almost purely industrial constituencies to which labor representation is thoroughly appropriate, and which can never be held for progress on any other basis. Let us be at once wise and generous, and admitting only brotherhood of arms in the great conflict before us, confess that it is to the advantage of the common cause that Labor should have its full say in the momentous decision that awaits us. Later on paths may diverge. We are not pledged to all that Labor wants, nor is Labor limited to Liberal doctrine. But to-day, as we have one aim and one enemy, and the same tremendous stake to play in the safeguarding, not only of the people's food, but of democratic and representative government, let us present one invincible line of battle. If any man wants marching orders for this campaign, let him take them from the attitude of the Republican Party of France in 1877, when MacMahon, under aristocratic and clerical dictation, pointed the double weapon of the coup d'état and the plébiscite at the heart of French democracy, as Lord Lansdowne presents it to our heart to-day. The motto of every Republican group, moderate or advanced, then was: "Elect the 363"—i.e., the representatives of Republicanism in the outgoing Parliament. Unionism exercised the same measure of discipline over the Election of 1886, when every member who had opposed the Home Rule Bill, Liberal or Conservative, secured the Unionist vote. In that spirit alone can we at once secure the full effective power of the popular vote against the Lords, and save the future for progressive democracy.

THE RETORT OF THE COMMONS.

THE challenge of the Lords throws on the Liberal and Labor parties a double duty. The first is that of vindicating the undivided financial authority of the House of Commons, the second that of securing the ultimate control of government, administrative, financial, and legislative, for the people. If the first question stood alone, no dissolution would be necessary or advisable. The House of Commons would vindicate its position by re-asserting and extending the financial resolutions and refusing supplies by any other method, and, in point of fact, as we shall see, this is the first step to be taken. But it does not meet the whole situation, because it leaves the further claim of the Lords to control legislation unimpaired. This claim ought in our judgment to have been fought long ago. The battle has been put off in the hope of averting a direct conflict between the Houses. But the only result of postponement has been the constant encroachment by the Lords upon fresh territory. Apart from the Budget, what shadow of excuse was there, for example, for the rejection of the London Elections Bill? What possible explanation can be given of this action, but the naked partisanship which has impelled the Lords to resist everything calculated to improve the position of popular candidates and diminish the handicap on the poorer classes of electors? The invasion of the sphere of finance is merely the crown and coping-stone of the edifice of assumed power, which the Upper House has been building up during the quarter of a century that has followed the compromise of 1884. The conflict is at length finally forced on the popular parties, and it must be fought to a finish. This cannot be done by a House of Commons already four years old on the strength of its own prescriptive rights and privileges alone. It must go back to the people for renewed authority and propound to them a reform which will not merely sweep away the formal intervention of the Lords in finance, but their substantial power of thwarting the elected representatives of the people in legislation. The issue will be clear cut between the representative and the hereditary principle, between democracy and privilege. We may thank the House of Lords for presenting it with such incisive clearness and completeness. It has underlain all political issues for many years, but reformers, immersed as they are each in his own special sphere of interest, have been slow to grasp it as a whole. It is now once for all the dividing line of parties, and even were the first battle lost, which we have not the smallest reason to expect, the campaign will go on till the victory is won. No Liberal Government will again take office without the necessary security for overriding the veto of the hereditary Conservatives.

The principal care of the Liberal leaders, acting, as we do not doubt they will, in full concert and harmony with the leaders of Labor, will be to place this broad issue before the country. The Lords have provoked the battle, but the Government will choose the ground and settle the stakes. They will not admit that the financial powers of the House of Commons are at issue. They will treat the behavior of the Lords from the first as constituting a Revolution—a Revolution clothed, no doubt, with a certain form of legal procedure, but none the less a Revolution. The rejection of the Budget is indeed a greater innovation than the refusal of the Royal Assent to a Bill passed by both Houses would be. For that Assent has, in fact, been refused in past history, though we have to go back a couple of centuries to find an instance, but the rejection of the entire vote of money for the year is wholly without precedent or parallel. It creates a situation which is not merely anomalous but in the strict sense revolutionary. For, in a constitution destitute of written formulæ, and resting almost entirely on custom and tradition, whoever breaks, by the sudden use of obsolete forms, with the more vital of these traditions has destroyed the basis of reliance on the system as a whole.

The Government has, as Mr. Churchill has justly urged, the duty of rescuing public affairs from the chaos into which the Lords threaten to plunge them. It has also the permanent interests of the community to safeguard, and these are bound up with the principles of the Constitution. It must therefore avoid any form of procedure which would have even the appearance of yielding to an unconstitutional claim. As it will refuse to divide the Budget, so it cannot consent to ask the authority of the Lords for any portion of the taxes or for any temporary and provisional collection. It must fall back on the authority of the Commons, and the more boldly it asserts that authority the more it will win favor with the country. It will start the fight with the prestige of a strong assertion of the rights of the Commons in finance, and will carry the war into the enemy's country by the demand for equal rights in legislation. But how is this authority of the Commons to be asserted? The simplest method is that advocated in these columns last week of procedure by Resolution. Beginning with a declaratory Resolution affirming the undivided authority of the Commons in finance on the precedent of 1860, the House would proceed to resolve that the provisions of the Budget hold good until the Finance Bill for the year 1909-1910 passes into law. This would be to depart from the ordinary course in the collection of taxes in this respect only that the date of the Bill is postponed, and that it will be carried into effect by a new Parliament. If necessary, the new Parliament would carry an Act of Indemnity which will quash any proceedings that may have been taken in the interval in opposition to the authority of the Commons. But we are not to assume without proof that any such Act will be required. The collection of taxes on the authority of the Resolutions has never been challenged.

An alternative method has found favor in some quarters, and has been advocated with his usual incisiveness of statement by Mr. Arthur Chamberlain. His suggestion is that the Prime Minister, following the example of Earl Grey in 1832, should advise the King to create, or give him permission to create, as many peers as would be necessary to overcome the opposition to the Budget, and so supply the needs of the Exchequer for the year. Now this proposal as it stands appears to us inadmissible. We have on previous occasions shown that the wholesale creation of peers would be legitimate for one purpose only, for a purpose which would be final, for the purpose of abolishing the absolute veto of the Lords alike on legislation and finance. On the other hand we have always recognised that a point must come in the progress of the struggle between the Houses at which the possibility of a wholesale creation will have to be faced. If the Government win in January, as they will win, their first proceeding after passing the Finance Bill must be to regulate the relation between the two Houses. For this purpose no resolution framed by the House of Commons alone will any longer suffice. It will be necessary to proceed by Bill, and we can hardly assume that the Lords will accept like lambs a Bill curtailing their own powers. The creation of peers will have to be held in reserve as a possibility in order to secure the measures necessary, as Mr. Haldane puts it, to the smoother working of the Constitution. What the details of such a Bill will be we do not for the moment inquire. But on one thing all shades of Liberal opinion are now agreed—that the veto in its present form cannot remain. They are also agreed that the present Government cannot retain office, nor can any future Liberal leaders take office, without a preliminary assurance from the King that the powers necessary to overcome the resistance of the House of Lords will be available for them. We think that the moment has come for a plain declaration by the Prime Minister in this sense. It can only clear the position and help to consolidate the forces of democracy if our leaders now state quite plainly to the world that the fight is not confined to finance but concerns the whole question of the position of a hereditary second Chamber in the Constitution. To the creation of peers as a necessary step to the settlement of the entire issue the party would reluctantly consent as an alternative necessity imposed by constitutional forms. Whether this can help us in the immediate crisis is more difficult to say. The financial trouble arises from the dissolution of Parliament, and to help in this respect the creation would be necessary at once. From the Liberal point of view, there need be no objection to such a step, provided that it were accompanied with the definite pledge that on returning to power the majority so obtained were used for the settlement of the whole constitutional question. From the Conservative point of view, a different objection might be taken. Our opponents might urge that this would be to create a Liberal House of Lords, which would grievously hamper them if, against expectation, they should obtain a majority. We realise the force of this objection, but our opponents, on their side, must realise that, if they do not wish to drive us to extremes that may be as unpleasant for them as for us, they must be careful how they, on their side, strain the forms of the Constitution.

A HALF-WAY HOUSE TO FREEDOM.

"In view of the danger that official control over plays before their production may hinder the growth of a great and serious national drama, and of the grave injury that such hindrance would do to the development of thought and of art, we consider that the licensing authority, which we desire to see maintained, should not have power to impose a veto on the production of plays."—Extract from the Report of the Joint Committee on the Censorship.

It is, we think, unfortunate, that the Joint Committee on the Censorship of stage plays should have devoted one part of its report to destroying or, at least, neutralising the moral effect of the other, so that the dramatic authors have the melancholy satisfaction of winning their case without getting their judgment. How far their contention is endorsed by the very mixed body of legislators and lawyers to whom it was referred, readers of page nine of the report can see. The Committee acknowledge the important fact that the stage is now attracting writers of character and intellect who desire to present "sincere and serious dramas," critical, i.e., reforming, in their tendency. They admit the right of entry upon the stage of "ideas and situations" "disturbing" to existing conventions, and they conclude that room must be found for the problem play as well for the theatre of amusement. Most significant of all, they confess the obstacle which the absolute censorship on production places upon the "growth of a great and serious national drama." Do they therefore propose to abolish this hindrance to the flow of dramatic ideas and methods, which they insist are necessary to the progress of "thought and art"? In form they do. But in fact they set it up again, in the shape of a perfect forest of prohibitions which, like the wall of young trees that Robinson Crusoe planted round his fastness, may grow so thick as to prevent the master from entering the house prepared for him. Now there is one obvious objection to the dual system of licensed and unlicensed plays which the Committee must set up. It discredits the Censorship at once, for it must identify it mainly with that kind of play which seeks it as a cover for puerility, and not infrequently for indecent suggestion, and for the class of manager who desires an easy way out of his personal responsibility. From this time forward the Lord Chamberlain's licence will shelter the worse and poorer and often the more vicious play; its cover will be withheld from the finer and sincerer work. But at least we might have expected the Committee to acknowledge some kind of equality between the two kinds of dramatic production which they sanction. So far from doing this, they insist upon clothing the "sincere and serious" drama with a specially devised livery of shame. In future the unlicensed play—and we feel confident that this will be the form generally chosen by the best authors—is to be exposed not only to the necessary and proper action of the law on the ground of indecency, but a new and secret court of inquisition, whose subject-matter is to be the treatment of difficult matters of taste, judgment, and opinion, is to be carved out of the Privy Council. The action of this body can be so severe that it can not only suspend the production of a play for ten years, but can forbid its appearance for ever, save on the condition of passing the Censorship. It can hear in camerâ, and the author is thus cut off from all power of effective representation or appeal. It is easy to see how unfairly such a system may work. Take, for example, two of the batch of offences which will render a play liable to the action of our new Star Chamber for Serious Dramatists—namely, that it is calculated to "conduce to crime and vice," and that it may "impair friendly relations with any Foreign Power." At this moment not merely one or two but a whole system of plays is running under the protection of the Censorship, whose subject is the glorification of theft. Such are "Raffles," and "Arsène Lupin," and other grafts of the noble stock of "Jack Sheppard." But supposing some English Brioux takes it into his head to satirise our not impeccable administration of justice? How many Tory judges and Privy Councillors would not hold such criticism to be an endorsement of crime? Lord Althorp had no qualms in licensing a direct dramatic appeal for conscription, but he held that a parody of "An Englishman's Home" was an insult to a Foreign Power. Are we to trust an in camerâ Committee of the Privy Council with the power of vetoing a dramatic setting of Mr. Hall Caine's apology for Egyptian Nationalism?

But if, as Liberals, we find it hard to defend the powers and constitution of the new Censorship, we find it still harder to excuse the attempt of the Committee to incite the landlords of theatres to drive the unlicensed play from pillar to post, until at last, we suppose, it finds refuge in some shabby Alsatia of Soho. It would, we think, have been fair for the Committee, seeing that they confer the right of existence on the unlicensed play, and even base their hopes of the British drama on its continuance, to suggest the repeal of the clause in many theatre leases which forbids its performance. In place of that act of common justice, they actually invite the landlord to force such a prohibition on the dramatic author, and recommend, not that all leases which contain this clause should be construed as if they did not contain it, but that all leases which do not contain it should be construed as if they did. We cannot imagine anything more unjust; and we can only hope that the serious authors will stand firmly together, that they will decline to pass under the Censorship, and that, if they are barred out of the majority of the London theatres, they will combine to form and sustain that Independent Theatre to which, at least, the Report, with its many deficiencies, does open a way. We do not think that they will have long to wait for complete freedom. For, indeed, all that is weakest and most illogical in this report is bound to fall by its own weight. As Mr. Granville Barker points out in the unanswerable article we print elsewhere, the optional Censorship was forced on the Committee by an administrative, no less than a moral, necessity. They were bound to establish the single Censorship for theatres and music-halls for the simple reason that under the present system a vast body of dramatic work, in the shape of so-called "sketches," which are actually but not legally dramas in little, has entirely escaped Mr. Redford's eye, and that the real play-houses which present a mixed musical and dramatic programme have for years been free—subject to fear of the local authority—to revel in the seven deadly sins that are now to be laid to the account of the dramatic authors. Now all this light-going machinery of sketch or short play, song, patter, gesture, and innuendo is to come directly under the Censor. Is he going to touch it? Everyone knows that he neither can nor will do anything of the kind, and that there is no substantial reason why he should. The new order will therefore be a charter of freedom for the music-hall. But, as far as a network of prohibitions can make it, it will be a sign of dependence, even of repression, for the serious drama. This is quite intolerable. The Committee have just left the door of freedom ajar. The Government which acts upon their report will have to fling it wide open.

THE NEW INDIAN CONSTITUTION.

ELEVEN months have passed since Lord Morley laid before this country and India the great scheme of reform that will always connect his name with Indian history. It will be remembered that the proposal aimed at an extension of political and legislative rights, the intention being to reduce the predominance of the official element upon the various governing councils, and to afford to Indians a greater part in the management of their own affairs. With these objects Lord Morley proposed the development of both the Executive and Legislative Councils. The reform of local self-government under the Municipalities, Taluka or District Boards, and Panchayats or old Councils of Five in the village communes, was set aside, perhaps to avoid over-weighting the measure, perhaps in the hope that the vast report of the recent Decentralisation Commission might some day be digested.

In the general scheme of reform we ought certainly to include Lord Morley's very important step in nominating two Indians (a Hindu and a Mohammedan) to the India Council in Whitehall. But, as regards India herself, the first step was the recommendation that an Indian should be appointed on the Viceregal Executive Council as soon as occasion offered (as has since been done), and that the Executive Councils of the Governors of Bombay and Madras should be raised to four members apiece, one being an Indian, while smaller Executive Councils, each with an Indian representative, were to be established in course of time in the remaining five Provinces under Lieutenant-Governors not appointed from England. The introduction of an Indian representative, or rather nominee, upon the Executive Councils was in itself a most valuable concession to the long-standing demands of the constitutional Indian reformers as represented by the National Congress.

But, after all, the longest step in the reform scheme was the expansion of the Legislative Councils by a great increase of the numbers and of the non-official members in each. The final regulations under which these Legislative Councils are to start their new career next January were issued last Monday in a special Gazette at Calcutta, and in the main they follow the outline drawn by Lord Morley in his original proposals. In numbers some of the new Councils will exceed the maximum first laid down, and some fall far below it. According to the telegraphic summary, for instance, the Viceroy's Legislative Council (including the Viceroy) will run to sixty-eight instead of sixty (up to now it has numbered only twenty-four), while the Burma Council, which might number thirty, will only count eighteen. But the point does not lie so much in the numbers as in the fact that even on the Viceroy's Council the official members will retain only a majority of three, and in the Councils of the seven Provinces the official majority disappears altogether. In cases of obvious danger, the Viceroy retains the right of veto against the majority, but, as Lord Morley wisely said in introducing his measure:—

"Perhaps more often, there may be opposition on the part of non-official members to legislation that the Government desires. . . . If such a combination of all the non-official members against the Government were to occur, that might be a very good reason for thinking that the proposed measure was really open to objection, and should not be proceeded with."

The total number of members for all the Councils together has now been raised from 126 to 370 (against a possible maximum of 400), and the elected members from 39 to 135. The numbers alone are significant, though it is true that the members will not represent districts or constituencies in the British sense, but rather classes and interests. In some cases they will even represent religious distinctions, and we regret that throughout the discussion of the reforms so much prominence has been given to the Mohammedan claim for separate electorates. We may put the Mohammedans in the eight Provinces (including the Central Provinces which do not possess a Council) at about 54,000,000, against 160,000,000 Hindus, and, of course, it is right that they should have their representation. It would have been an admirable opportunity for trying a proportional scheme. But the device which has been followed by the spokesmen of official Anglo-Indians and the Mohammedans themselves of belauding the Mohammedans and proclaiming that their loyalty and past services entitle them to a higher representation than their numbers justify, can but irritate the Hindus, against whom it is an oblique insinuation. It is, indeed, only too clear that this method of reviving the ancient but dying strife between Hindu and Mohammedan has put obstacles in the way of the whole scheme of reform, and made it far more difficult for moderate reformers like Mr. Gokhale to commend it to their followers, or to the more definitely Nationalist party, as an earnest of that gradual and peaceful extension of the full rights of citizenship which they desire. It would have been fairer and far more advantageous for both the great religions in the end to have imposed a system of proportional representation, or even to have left the elections open. For even Madras, an almost fanatical centre of Hinduism, has hitherto steadily returned a distinguished Mohammedan citizen to the Viceregal Council.

We might dwell on other important points—the peculiar provision that the Imperial or Provincial Government may forbid the candidature of an undesirable person before the election, and the concession (one of the most valuable of all) that the unofficial members may ask questions and move resolutions at the meetings of the Council, especially upon the annual consideration of the Budget, whereas hitherto each has read an academic essay that might as well have remained unwritten. But we leave the Councils Bill with confident hopes for its future, and with sincere congratulations to Lord Morley for his persistence in carrying through the reform in the face of prejudice and powerful opposition. We would only further remind him and the Indian Government that close upon a year has passed since nine of our Indian fellow-subjects were deported without trial, without charge, without reason given, and they still remain in gaol. We had hoped that the King's Birthday would have been taken as an opportunity for their release, but nothing has been done. In the case of Lala Lajput Rai, the most conspicuous of the deported prisoners hitherto, even so steady a Government organ as the "Pioneer" has admitted that injustice was permitted, and Lala Lajput Rai himself has won two libel actions in the Courts (one in Calcutta and one in London) on the ground of the utterly false charges brought against him. All who are personally acquainted with such men as Mr. Ashwini Dutt, of Barisal, and Mr. Krishna Kumar Mitra, of Calcutta, now imprisoned without trial, find the utmost difficulty in believing that the unknown charges against them are any better founded. In the name of our high character for justice, on which more than anything our power over India rests, we would plead either for an open trial or release for men who have already suffered a serious penalty on a suspicion the reasons for which are kept hidden from the light of truth.

OUR ANCIENT ALLY.

It is creditable to human nature that the visit of the young King of Portugal to England should have called forth something more than the formal cordiality which all such ceremonies evoke. The figure of a mere boy, genial, simple, and generous, summoned to the throne in a period of mortal crisis, after a tragedy in which both brother and father perished, makes a powerful appeal to our natural sympathies. There stands behind him, moreover, the rather mysterious and legendary tradition of our ancient alliance. Few of those who repeat that conventional phrase are aware that it really corresponds to an actual and far from negligible fact in world politics. It rather recalls memories of the brave days when port was a political drink, of the Peninsular War, and of the Queen whom Charles II. so gaily wronged. It stands for the hereditary ailments of our aristocracy, and for some of the sublimer passages in Meredith. But, in truth, there is hardly a land in Europe with which we have to-day so few sentimental ties. The cemeteries of Portugal are filled with English graves. Its history for nearly a generation after Wellington's occupation was almost that of an English dependency. Nowhere did Palmerston meddle and intrigue so steadily. But there is no cult of Portugal among us. Greece has her phil-Hellenes, and Bulgaria her firm friends. But Portugal stirs no sentiment. She has gone out of our daily lives, and that at a moment when she is very consciously within the calculations of our Foreign Office. We are under an obligation, which we are far from seeking to ignore, to defend her Atlantic coast with our fleet. Her culture is French. Her finance depends almost absolutely from Paris. But it is on her "ancient alliance" with us that her policy is really based.

It is a curious speculation to enquire what cause it was which really sapped the energy of a people who came so near to greatness on the seas. One can hardly read the narratives of the early navigators without suspecting that these hardy voyages, from which it was an untold good fortune if one ship in two returned, actually depleted the stock of her energetic men of action. The dissipation of the remainder over vast colonies, most of them unhealthy, did the rest. To-day we have seen too much of her apparently hopeless disorganisation to feel sanguine. Her only saviour, the dictator Franco, was little more, one fears, than an adventurer, who acted in collusion with King Carlos to seize power at the price of acquiescence in the royal tampering with the national finances. The two parties which ultimately saved the Constitution were also saving an immemorial spoils system. The Republican group, which alone gives promise of any radical change, has evidently too slender a hold on mass opinion to work with effect. The essential fact of Portuguese politics is an illiteracy which throws even that of Russia into shade, and behind the intellectual stagnation is an economic despair which translates itself into a steady flow of peasant emigration to Brazil. Wealth is to be made only by the monopolies, and they are in foreign hands. The African Colonies sleep in a tranquil decay, which is broken only by the occasional arrival of Boer immigrants, or of foreign railway prospectors. Only the cocoa islands coin money for Portuguese proprietors, and they depend on a system of slavery.

It is, in short, the weakness of Portugal which makes the alliance a traditional necessity. Fortune has scattered her possessions over ocean ways which are of the first strategic importance to ourselves. Her Atlantic coast and her islands would make the Mediterranean route insecure if they were in hostile hands. Her African possessions flank the older and alternative route to India. Delagoa Bay is the key to the Rand. Her Asiatic possessions may acquire importance when the fate of China is in the balance. Her staggering finances, her weak defences, alike oblige her to look for allies. Nor can Powers which are struggling to maintain a European balance afford to ignore her. There are from time to time recurring crises in which some fact or rumor suddenly reminds us of the pieces in the world's war game which are under her flag. The Kaiser is allowed to send his marines over her railway to salute Kruger at Pretoria. Delagoa Bay becomes the key to our own strategy, or gossip declares that Germany is acquiring one of her Atlantic islands as a sanatorium or a coaling station. The round is varied by speculations about King Manuel's marriage, and yet again the quidnuncs are discussing who has the reversion of her colonies, if the fear of bankruptcy should compel her to pledge them. She contrives to derive a back-handed consolation from her very weakness. Her situation is invariably interesting, and it is interesting to more than one Power. Weakness is fatal only when it excites in the breast of a single Empire an exclusive interest.

There lay in the past, no doubt, the reason of the extreme forbearance which our diplomacy showed towards the Portuguese slave trade, while it was still undisguised. We paid our subsidies in the form of a remitted loan; we made our protests, and still it went on. That also is doubtless the reason why our official remonstrances at the survival of the system in Angola and San Thomé have been so very sparing of Portuguese susceptibilities. We should do well to remember that only the strongest Naval Power is in a position to give Portugal the guarantees which she requires. We are at least as indispensable to her as she is interesting to us. For the moment the usual paper promises are all that has been obtained. There is a promise to repatriate the slaves on San Thomé, and an undertaking to see that their recruitment is really voluntary. Certain of the more notorious man-hunting grounds are said to have been closed. Laborers are also being fetched from Mosambique, but at a wage so trivial, when compared with what they might earn on the Rand, that it is difficult to believe that they can have been obtained in the open labor market. But the reforms are under the charge of men notorious for their connivance in the open slave-trading of the past, and in Lisbon there is as yet no effective pressure for amendment. A better use might have been made of the ancient alliance. The protection which it gives to Portugal is not a trivial boon. Some price we might exact, and the price which would redeem much that has been sordid in this long connection would be the coming at last of freedom to this West African Coast.

Life and Letters.

TEN YEARS AFTER.

MR. TAYLOR of the Balance Club was a good deal exercised in mind, for he had heard members saying in the smoking-room that in the following week the Lords were going to reject the Budget for the first time in history. He cared nothing for history, and having expectations from an invalid uncle, he strongly objected to the Budget, though when the Club put up the price of a small whisky-and-soda from fivepence to sixpence, he had paid the round sum like a man, in the interest of national defence, and had even called for another. But now he was told that the Lords by killing the Budget would shake all securities and cost the country an extra £50,000,000. That, he feared, might have some effect on his income of £2,000 a year, derived from his father's investments, and he was rather fond of maintaining in his philosophic way that happiness depends, not on the bulk of one's income, but on the margin in one's pocket. His margin, his happiness, was threatened by the Lords, and though he revered them as the owners of great country houses, he could not help wondering if there might not be something in Liberal principles after all. For if a whisky-and-soda went up to sevenpence, it would be as inconvenient a sum as fivepence, with the inconvenience all on the wrong side.

In his perplexity, he went round the Club collecting the Conservative papers in the hope that they might confirm his convictions, for he was a conscientious man. The "Daily Mail," the "Spectator," the "Daily Express," the "Times," the "Daily Telegraph," the "Observer"—he found all the party organs, except the "Sporting Times," which was in use. Piling them on his knees, he sank into a deep armchair and began to read. With every paragraph his apprehensions melted away, and a consoling peace stole over his senses. He felt assured the Lords would do him no harm. They were not the people to threaten property. They were the natural protectors of men of position and intelligence, and would display a fellow-feeling towards people of his class. Into their hands he and the nation could safely commit themselves. He had hardly read more than one and a half of the papers when, with a feeling of tranquillity that only an assured competence can afford, he fell asleep.

When he awoke, ten years later, the country was preparing for the General Election of 1920. Meeting his old friend, Mr. Sinclair, in Piccadilly, he heard that the Lords had just ordered a dissolution because the first Liberal Government that had been in power since 1909 had refused to double the tax on bread for fear of exciting the working population to violence.

"It is mere cowardice on the Government's part," Sinclair said. "The working classes showed no indignation at the Lords' conduct in 1909, and have shown none since. The old talk about the English people's love of freedom was nothing but a myth, and the lower orders know very well that their very existence depends upon the Lords, for it is impossible to live without either land or wealth. As to violence, there is not the slightest fear of that, since the Lords control army, navy, and police."

"I did not know that was the function of the Lords?" said Mr. Taylor.

"Yes," his friend replied; "they control all the services by their established right of refusing supplies. Landowners and men with a stake in the country are the natural defenders of law and order, since it is for their benefit that law and order primarily exist. Nothing of late years has been more remarkable than the revival of the grand old saying that property has its duties as well as its rights. The Lords have shown themselves nobly resolved to act on it, and the first duty of the governing classes is to govern."

"Then property must be secure," sighed Mr. Taylor with relief.

"It is doubly secure," Mr. Sinclair answered. "A benign feeling of security is extended throughout the country. Even the lower classes share in it, for their labor is constant and never stops. For fear of interrupting it and reducing the weekly wages, the Lords have lately abolished the Sunday idleness, and in gratitude the people now call Sunday the Lords' Day."

"I am glad the lower orders are having a busy time," said Mr. Taylor sympathetically.

"Nothing is so terrible as unemployment," Mr. Sinclair replied. "But come for a run over the country in my aeroplane, and see for yourself."

Flying low, they sped over crowded cities and squalid towns and patches of fields where depressed-looking laborers were plodding about in the mud. But here and there they flew across vast estates of park and woods, and in the middle of one of these they descended on a hill from which the chimneys of factories, pits, and innumerable little streets could be dimly discerned beyond a distant ring fence.

"One can breathe here," said Mr. Taylor comfortably.

"Yes," said Mr. Sinclair, "This estate is an example of forethought and public spirit. The owner is determined to allow no encroachment on the people's future inheritance. That town outside is overcrowded already. They are living at an average of six to a room, and if this splendid estate were built over now, where would they have to live in another twenty years? But the owner holds the land for future generations. Meantime, it grows in value every year, and the wealth of the country is enormously increased without any effort. That is what we mean by the magic of property. When at last the owner permits building, the ground-rents will multiply his wealth ten or twenty times over, and his consumption of that wealth will supply employment for ten or twenty times more labor. For wealth has a double beneficence, blessing him who enjoys and him who works for another's enjoyment. So true is it that the interests of capital and labor are identical."

They entered the great town outside the barbed wire fence, and passed among the ignoble and monotonous streets, varied only by blocks of artisans' buildings, pits, factories, churches, and schools. The workpeople were hurrying about, their faces bloodless and famished, their clothes dingy with third-hand use. Outside a soup-kitchen a long string of men and women stood waiting.

"Strike?" asked Mr. Taylor. "Everyone looks very hungry."

"Hunger is the best incentive to work," his friend replied. "The first food-taxes which the Lords imposed some years ago soon taught us that. They raised the cost of living so much that the people worked twice as hard and produced twice as much wealth, by which the whole community benefits. For a time, certainly, there was considerable starvation, but the wealthy tempered the wind by their generosity in subscribing to soup-kitchens like that one, which is maintained entirely by the landowners of the town, and the population is now dying down to its natural limits. The majority of the workpeople you see are in excellent condition for producing more wealth, and the rich people in the country were never so well off. It is, in reality, on their wealth that the poor live, though one hardly likes to call them parasites."

Walking down the main street, they entered a political meeting, into which a few shivering men and women had loitered for warmth. The candidate for the approaching election was speaking, though his return was unopposed, since it made no difference who got in for the House of Commons. Mr. Taylor entered just in time for the peroration, in which the candidate was extolling the Lords for doubling the bread tax.

"What's the good of cheap food if you've got no wages to buy it with?" he was asking. "Increase prices all round and you induce landowners and capitalists to invest more of their wealth in the certainty of larger returns, and their wealth means more wages for you. The House of Lords may not be very clever; we don't set much store by clever people in this country;

we like something solid and sensible; but the House of Lords does at least understand the inner working of these great economic laws, and they pledge their word to you that they will be right in doubling all taxes on foreign imports so that both agriculture and manufacture may share in that abundant and increasing prosperity which we see around us."

"Didn't people once say something about taxation and representation going together?" Mr. Taylor asked his friend in a low voice. But he had hardly spoken when he was seized by six powerful stewards and flung out of the hall with the greatest violence.

"You may thank your lucky stars you didn't ask that question of the speaker," said his friend, "or you'd have got a month's hard labor for disturbance. The tyranny of the majority must be controlled at all costs."

Pursuing their way in the aeroplane, Mr. Taylor caught sight of a seaport crowded with huge battleships.

"That," said Mr. Sinclair, "is a division of our glorious fleet. We spend £90,000,000 a year on our fleet so as to make the foreigner pay. He has not begun to pay yet, but by broadening the basis of taxation the Lords support the fleet without effort and secure a general average of contented poverty among the working classes. As you know, equality is an excellent thing for a nation."

"You would not have us all equal?" cried Mr. Taylor with a shiver.

"Oh no," his friend replied smiling. "There must, of course, be the wealthy, who enjoy their natural revenues from trusts, loans, or the possession of towns and lands. But a steady average of strenuous poverty increases the dignity of a nation and promotes the new way of life. 'The private wealth small, the public great,' as our old Latin poet said. The Lords have lately much increased the body of public wealth by abolishing the income-tax and setting that large amount free for investment. But if you say the people look miserable, I reply the country was never more powerful. That fleet could sink all the navies of Europe, and we continually add to it so as to increase our security, enrich the shipbuilding Trusts, and distribute their wealth among the workers, all at the same time."

Flitting back to London, Mr. Taylor dismounted in Parliament Square, and seeing a lady whom he recognised as the finest orator of Queen's Hall and Hyde Park, he asked his friend whether women had got the vote.

"We wouldn't have your silly vote at a gift," she exclaimed as she swept past, with eyes fixed on revolution.

Then indeed Mr. Taylor realised the full consequences of the Lords' action in rejecting the Budget.

AN AMERICAN LEADER.

No more inspiring and convincing vindication of progressive principles in politics has appeared in our time than these three portly volumes of the recollections of an American statesman ("The Reminiscences of Carl Schurz," Murray), whose very name is little known in this country. Mainly concerned with the momentous events of the Civil War and the period of reconstruction, they give a truer presentation of the political and social conditions of the country and a keener and more accurate analysis of the national and personal forces than are contained in any of the formal histories of the epoch with which we are acquainted. This is attributable to the splendid personal qualities of Carl Schurz, and to the position of independence without isolation which he was able to maintain throughout his active career. Always in the thick of the fight, usually a strong partisan, he yet managed always to preserve such coolness and detachment as are needed for the historian. Even where, as is occasionally the case, his own personal honor is in question, no malice appears in his defence, no vindictive feeling towards his traducers.

Born of good country stock in a little village near Cologne, he had scarcely entered student life at Bonn before the revolutionary movement, which had for some years been gathering, came to a head in '48. Young Schurz, a vigorous, enthusiastic lad of nineteen years, full of Heine and of the new Liberal spirit, soon found himself a leader among the students and tasted the perils of participation in the armed movement which, national in its first aim, was converted into a rebellion by the obstinacy and illiberalism of Frederick William. After a period of exciting and dangerous adventures as a lieutenant of his friend and teacher, Kinkel, one of the most prominent personages of the '48 movement, he found himself an exile from his country, and after a short sojourn in Paris and in London, drifted with his girl-wife to the United States. A convinced Republican, he soon found his feet, his voice, and a full career in his adopted country. It was an era of stirring movements, and young Schurz planted himself in the thick of them. After making himself well acquainted with conditions in the East, he settled for a time, first as farmer, soon as lawyer and politician, in a little town of Wisconsin, then the "far West," where thousands of his countrymen had found a home. Handsome in person, eloquent and thoroughly sympathetic with the working of popular institutions, he soon won great influence as a speaker, and, first among the German-speaking population, afterwards among the wider public, became a man of political importance. Of singular interest is his account of the moral and intellectual forces which the new institutions and atmosphere of democracy brought to bear upon the hordes of immigrants from lands of despotic rule, who now found themselves called upon to make their own local and State governments. Schurz soon found a call for his talents as orator and organiser in the wider field of national politics. It was by no means the coarse and sordid work too commonly associated with American politicians. Beneath all the surface waves and currents of self-interest and party faction, there has always lived in America a passionate feeling for the great experiment of democracy. This enthusiasm always inspired Schurz. Of his great gathering at Faneuil Hall in Boston upon Jefferson's birthday in 1859, he writes, "I spoke with great fervor, dwelling upon the idea which has been a leit motiv, a leading motive, with me during my whole public life in America; the peculiar significance of the position occupied by this Republic in the progress of mankind towards democratic government and the consequent responsibility of the American people to the civilised world." When the present writer talked with Mr. Schurz six years ago upon the drift of the United States towards Imperialism, he found that it was this betrayal of the great democratic mission of America which more than anything else weighed down the spirit of the aged statesman.

But it soon ceased to be a time for dwelling upon political abstractions, however elevated, for it became evident that the arrogant encroachments of the Slave Power were endangering the concrete liberties of the several States and of their individual citizens. The endeavors to enforce the powers conferred on slave-owners by the Dred Scot decision first roused the North to the full perils of the situation, while the combat between Douglas and Lincoln for the control of Republican policy in the opening conflict enforced the supreme urgency of the issue. Vivid and convincing is the story of the great encounters and of the seething stir of passions everywhere unloosed as the issues of slavery and the Union took clear shape in the common mind of the people. No such exhibition of the reality of politics in a democracy has ever been afforded elsewhere, and this second volume of Carl Schurz is undoubtedly a document of the first importance in the interpretation of democracy. Schurz was everywhere, saw every important personage, was present at most of the critical events, and kept accurate records. A close personal friend and a genuine admirer of Lincoln, he took an active part in the presidential campaign which set Lincoln at the White House to face Secession.

From a vigorous recruiting work on the outbreak of the war, Carl Schurz was taken to serve a short term of diplomatic office as United States Minister at Madrid. Soon, however, seeking a reason to return to America, he threw himself into the struggle, now military, not political, between North and South, rising to high command, and acquitting himself with personal distinction on several bloody fields.

After the war was over, when the assassination of Lincoln raised Andrew Johnson to the post of supreme honor and difficulty, Schurz undertook a most laborious and important investigation into the condition of the Southern States, with the view of advising a policy of reconstruction. Unfortunately Johnson, weak, ill-advised, and intemperate, disregarding the warnings of Schurz and of the Unionist leaders in the South, plunged upon a policy, which, had it been maintained, must have undone all the solid gains of the war, so far as the condition of the negroes was concerned. Those, and they are many, who lightly condemn the repressive hand which the Federal Government so long retained upon "the late rebel States" and, in particular, the amendments conferring a negro franchise, might read with great profit the clear evidence which Mr. Schurz affords of the intentions and endeavors of the Southern States to restore slavery after the war, with or without the connivance of the Federal Government.

Betaking himself, though hardly "settling down," to journalism, first in Detroit, soon after at St. Louis, Mr. Schurz shortly found himself, still a young man of forty, seated as Senator for Missouri in the highest legislative body of the country. It was characteristic of the man that his first step was a point-blank refusal to support the new President, Grant, in his endeavor to bring San Domingo into the American system, his chief reason being that "acquisition and possession of such tropical countries, with indigestible, unassimilable populations, would be highly obnoxious to the nature of our Republican system of Government," the deadliest of all arguments against Imperialism.

"I stand in the Republican Party as an independent man." No one acquainted with the meaning of "party" in America can fail to realise the nobility and the difficulty of endeavoring to live up to this principle. Yet Mr. Schurz did it, and it gave him, not, indeed, long enjoyment of high office, or such popularity as fell to a Blaine or a McKinley, but a very solid and wholesome influence over public life for several decades. His independence showed itself at once in a revolt inside the Republican Party against the repressive measures adopted by Grant against the Ku Klux riots in the South. Indeed, with the brief exception of a spell of office under Hayes, as Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Schurz found himself always in a minority of Liberal reformers. On every great issue of the time he took a strong, straight line. In office he distinguished himself as a pioneer in Civil Service reform, to which he devoted himself with immense energy in later years. Outspoken Free Trader, sound currency man, anti-Imperialist, he rang true Liberal on every great public question. Closely associated with Mr. Roosevelt on many reform movements, he severed himself at once from him when he began to stir the spirit of war and conquest, and his latest public utterances were in repudiation of the Philippine policy.

In the course of his long public life Mr. Schurz was brought into personal contact with many of the most remarkable men of the century both in Europe and in America. In his youth Marx, Mazzini, Kossuth, and other leaders of revolt crossed his path, and one of the most impressive chapters in his middle life contains his talks with Bismarck. But the unique value of the work is derived from the air of absolute and penetrating veracity conveyed in every statement and every judgment. Courageous, energetic, industrious, sympathetic with every honest ideal, he found himself in a country where these qualities commanded success and brought good fame. It was the career of a great Liberal statesman, and its possibility is an effective answer to those who croak about the failure of American democracy.

METHODS OF JUSTICE.

WE do not pretend to admire that feature of French criminal procedure which combines the functions of presiding judge with that of prosecuting counsel, but much of the outcry that has been raised in this country by the Steinheil case is ill-founded. Our attention would be much better directed to the defects of justice among ourselves. During the Dreyfus case we called the Heavens to witness our indignation at the refusal of the right of appeal to a man who had been unjustly condemned. The case called for indignation, but meanwhile we ourselves had at that time no Court of Appeal—except on points of law—for any sort of criminal, whether his offence was against the State or a private person. Since that time we have rectified the omission, but there remain plenty of defects in our criminal law which might more suitably occupy the British Press than the iniquities of a system which it does not understand. The contrast between French and English modes of procedure has its roots far back in history, and the simple truth is that the English system has remained nearer to the original barbaric court than the French. The early courts of Europe, after the settlement of the barbarians, had neither coercive authority nor any regular methods of trying the material facts of the cases that came before them. They were rather of the nature of institutions for the suppression of the blood feud, either by reducing it to the regular forms and limited dimensions of a judicial duel, or by substituting certain tests of the goodness of their cause to which contending parties might subject themselves. Such tests were the oath taken by each of the parties along with a required number of compurgators, and the ordeal to which resort might be had, particularly if the oath was not decisive. The court at this stage prescribed a "task," as Pollock and Maitland call it, to the litigant. If he performed it successfully his cause was won. There was no troublesome enquiry into mere facts, and no wearying examination or cross-examination of witnesses. The oath duly taken in full and solemn form was sufficient, or, if not, there was the ordeal. This was the old "accusatory" process, which represents justice in the stage where the rule of the strong hand is being first brought into some control by a public authority.

It was a very new departure when a public authority took upon itself to enquire into crime, to bring the criminal to justice, to investigate the facts of the case by evidence, and to inflict its own punishment through its own officers. This was the method of the "inquest," or inquisition, which we hear of in connection with episcopal courts as early as the ninth century, but which only made its way by very slow steps into the ordinary working of justice, and in this country never entirely triumphed over the "accusatory" method. Our "coroner's quest" represents one element in the system, the public enquiry into all cases of sudden and violent death with a view to discovering whether a homicide has been committed. Another element is represented by the presentment of cases for trial by the Grand Jury. A third, and by far the most important, is the remission of special questions of fact to a number of men representing "the country," whose sworn testimony was found to be a better mode of deciding the truth or falsity of a claim than the successful handling of hot iron or the ordeal by battle. So successful, in fact, was this method that the body of sworn witnesses evolved into the jury who tried the substance of the case, while the function of the judge was gradually limited to that of conducting the enquiry and expounding the law. But it was only by slow degrees and by some strange devices—including the torture of the peine forte et dure—that the practice could be established of compelling an accused person to forego his right to the combat or the ordeal, and "put himself upon his country," and it was by a far longer and slower process that juries won their way to independence. The transition from ordeal to evidence took place in England mainly in the thirteenth century—though in the reign of Edward I. champions could still be hired at need for a judicial combat. It was contemporaneous but more complete in France, where the "accusatory" method wholly gave place to the inquisitorial.

The jury system did not develop, and torture—never, it would seem, strictly legal in England—grew to the dimensions of a scandal. The more modern French methods have borrowed much of what is best from the English, including, as a pivotal point, the jury, and the very case which has stirred so much indignation shows that the forensic attitude assumed by the judge is by no means decisive of the event of the trial. The modern French judge, in fact, is the representative of an inquisitor. It is his business to probe and get to the heart of the accused. He is there to discover and punish crime. But he has behind him the jury whom he has to convince. The English judge has a different history. He is not appointed to discover and punish the criminal, but to preside at a contest between a prosecutor, very often a private person, and a defendant. He is to see fair play between them, to declare the law, sum up the facts for the jury, and pronounce sentence at need. Both systems have their faults, and we doubt whether our descendants will view with more surprise the interrogation of Mme. Steinheil, or our own view that truth is to be discovered not by impartial investigations but by pitting advocate against advocate, examination against cross-examination, form and quibble against quibble and form. At any rate, our history does not show such haste in securing the rights of the accused as to enable us to look down on the French system from the remote heights of pure equity. It was long before the accused with us obtained the full title to the services of counsel, and even then to place himself on the same level with the prosecution in this respect he had to abandon the right to speak on his own behalf. It is only eleven years since we extended to a man accused of the gravest crimes the right to give evidence on oath in his own defence, or to call his wife's testimony to his aid. The idea of impartial justice is very elementary, and we speak of it as though it were part of the air we breathe. In reality it is a late product of social progress imperfectly attained even to this day. Probably, if we go into the whole matter, we shall find that in the impartial, equitable, and rational treatment of crime both England and France have much to learn, and that each country would be better employed in copying what is good in the other than in denouncing what is bad.

THE CHARITY OF THE MIDDLE AGES.

OF all the pleasanter vices, the idealistic interpretation of the Middle Ages is perhaps the least noxious and the most alluring. One turns but too gladly from the controversies that rage around our own dehumanised Poor Law to the graces and humanities of medieval charity. Here are no economics, here is no organisation. Manchester was still a sleepy village which boasted no School. Men gave from impulse, and liked to think of those who received only as the blessed occasions of good-will. The sick poor were "the sore members of Christ." Ever the leper begged with the halo of the Gospel around him, and the Dukes of those days took warning from the Dives of the Miracle Play. We are all familiar with the rôle of the monasteries in medieval charity, but the immense development of the hospitals has only now been investigated by a competent student. Miss Clay has succeeded in compiling a list of no less than 750 of these 'spitals.* The total impression one derives from her analysis is of an active and very genial benevolence. The mere number of these houses in a population much less than that of modern London is enormous. They cared for the leper and the sick poor, for the aged and the orphan, for the broken soldier and the shipwrecked or homeless sailor. Some specialised in attending to wayfarers and pilgrims, and planted themselves by the gates of the town. Others, until leprosy died out, were lazaretto-houses; some were primarily for the poor clergy. A few specialised quaintly, as a supplement to direct persecution, in caring for the converted Jews. Others were primarily alms-houses set apart for the permanent residence of the aged and destitute. Most of them, however, were promiscuous to a degree which would fill Mrs. Webb with horror. Tramps and pilgrims, the aged and the sick, soldiers, sailors, and idiots, poor married mothers and "yong wymmen that have mysse done" dwelt somehow together under the same roof, and the large tolerance that spoke so few moral judgments made their association endurable.

One might go on from this broad survey to a closer investigation in the same mood of envious wonder. A pity which did not seek to degrade its victim was everywhere the presiding spirit. One foundation specifies minutely the provision that shall be made for the tramp and the wayfarer:—

"In regard to poor people who are received late at night and go forth early in the morning, let the warden take care that their feet are washed, and, as far as possible, their necessities attended to."

It was a casual ward without the stone-heap. Discipline there was, but it was commonly that of the fraternity, one might almost say of the club. The consent of the Colchester lepers, for example, was necessary before a new member could be admitted. Sometimes, indeed, as in the Bristol sailors' home, the organisation was that of a benefit society, to whose privileges only members who had contributed for seven years were admitted. The "cases" became brothers and sisters of the foundation, and the whole spirit of its rule of life was that of a preparation of the broken in this life for a better world. The material conditions of existence in these hospitals must have varied enormously. But in one case there is a record of meat three times a week, of vegetables in abundance, and of the glorious allowance of one gallon of beer a day. The older and wealthier foundations paraded a certain pomp and grace of architecture. Their chapels, in which all but the bed-ridden were expected to keep the canonical hours, are sometimes perfect and even elaborate specimens of the style in which they are built. The hospital itself was built sometimes with tenelements, sometimes with cubicles, and sometimes with dormitories. But there was always a great refectory with a vast inglenook which was the centre of the fraternal life of the place. In some of the larger hospitals there were elaborate preparations to facilitate the cleanliness of the inmates, from weekly baths to weekly visits of the barber, and the phrases in which the rules were drafted, suggest rather the hospitable provision of comforts than the penal discipline of a modern workhouse. There are details, moreover, which prove that over some of these 'spitals there brooded a spirit of more than apostolic charity. The statutes of Chichester, for example, provide that "if a brother under the instigation of the devil fall into immorality out of which scandal arises, or if he strike or wound the brethren," he must be expelled if incorrigible. "But let this be done, not with cruelty and tempest of words, but with gentleness and compassion." One might in this strain fill a volume with praises of the generosity of pious donors, and sketches of the gentleness and goodwill that reigned in these medieval "God's Houses," in the manner of a sunset picture by Fred Walker.

But were the Middle Ages really charitable and humane? There is much in Miss Clay's records which suggests a less comfortable judgment. The real test of the charity of the Middle Ages was the leper. History loves to record the exceptional tales of love and heroism which grow frequent in the twelfth century. Queen Maud would kiss the diseased feet of the most loathsome lepers, declaring that in so doing she touched the feet of the Eternal King. There was a Bishop of Lincoln who acted in the same spirit, and the greatest of all the leaders in this movement was St. Francis. But such sacrifices suggest to our mind rather a conscious and passionate protest against the brutality of the rest of the world, than a natural expression of pity. While a few saints acted thus, the general attitude was one of angry loathing which passed easily into active cruelty. Miss Clay surmises—and the evidence is pretty clear—that the instinct which shunned and segregated the leper was aesthetic rather than hygienic. Men were not yet afraid of infection or contagion. They hated the sight of a hideous affliction. Hating first, they came to fear. All France could become convulsed over a legendary conspiracy between the lepers, the Jews, and the Saracens to poison the wells. That panic set men burning lepers alive by the score, and not in France alone. The natural sentiment of the Middle Ages was even to think of lepers as the enemies of the human race. They were suspected, after the peril of infection began to be realised, of a malicious desire to revenge themselves on fortune by deliberately infecting as many of their fellows as they could. London, indeed, kept three lazaret-houses. But one reads that it also maintained two officers whose sole duty it was to make a daily round of these hospitals to flog the lepers for any contumacy which they might have committed. The main impression one derives is almost of a war between the sick and the whole, in which, indeed, it may well have happened that these outcasts became actual outlaws and combined for defence or revenge. The teaching of the Church was officially condensed in a precept which bade lepers "to bear themselves as more despised and more humble than the rest of their fellowmen." Nor can one conceive a more cruel form than the office by which the Church expelled the certified leper from the congregation of the living. It was a symbolical burial service. The leper lay in the posture of a corpse on the floor of the church, and rose up only that the priest might sprinkle with a spade three handfuls of earth upon his feet. It was a childish world which could devise a mummery so brutal and ghastly as this, and one suspects that it really regarded the leper much as children in a City slum to-day regard a broken and half-witted hunchback, whom they alternately torment and flee. Nor was the imposing mechanism of charity which endowed the hospitals altogether disinterested. In the later centuries their funds were mainly provided by the sale of pardons. They were largely used by the rich and powerful. Edward I. filled the almshouses with the aged servants of the Court. Nobles and princes quartered their retainers on them when they travelled. It sometimes happened that the wardens were detected in filling them with "paying guests." The brethren who served and controlled the hospitals were vowed to poverty and the renunciation of all their goods. But when one finds in the statutes of a hospital the terrible provision that a brother detected in leaving property at his death shall be "cast out from Christian burial," the inference is not that poverty was an ideal willingly embraced. It is rather that it was an ideal which pious founders almost despaired of enforcing.

* "The Medieval Hospitals of England." By Rotha Mary Clay. The Antiquary's Books. Methuen.

It is difficult to believe that the brotherly pity of the Middle Ages can ever have been a habit generally observed. It is certain that scarcely a memory of it remained when the Reformation arrived. We read no more of the provision of shelter and water for wayfaring men. Instead, the vagrant is lashed by statute from town to town. Under Edward VI. he is even converted into a chattel slave, with a ring round his neck and a brand upon his skin. The destruction of the hospitals accompanied the dissolution of the monasteries. It was not, indeed, complete, for some of the most venerable foundations, like Saint Cross at Winchester, survive to this day. But no hospital attached to a monastery was spared, and of the rest the greater number perished. St. James's Palace was built on the site of a 'spital for women. The Savoy, but newly built, was turned from its purpose. The City of London was fain to buy back Bedlam after the Crown had confiscated it, and to endow St. Bartholomew's after Henry VIII. had closed it. Yet there can never have been a time when England stood in greater need of charity. One reads in Brinklow's "Lamentacyon of a Christian agaynst the Cytie of London" (1545), how "London being one of the flowers of the worlde, as touchinge worldlye riches, hath so manye, yea innumerable of poore people forced to go from dore to dore . . . and dye for lacke of ayde of the riche."

The Crown did well out of this spoliation. The gentry did better. The Dukes of that day no doubt had their excuses. They annexed the dissolute monasteries that they might have the wherewithal to give and to employ.

The Reformation was not always so ruthless. One might suppose from Franz Hals's canvases that half the respectable matrons of Holland were engaged in managing the orphan hospitals. But in England, because the basis of conviction was weaker, it was important that the economic foundation should be stronger. Our Protestant nobility defended the faith because it was also defending its hearths and homes. It made an end of mediæval charity. But it entrenched the Thirty-Nine articles on its whilom abbey lands.

Short Studies.

A PARTING.

WHEN one is walking languidly under those trees where a few gold leaves are still hanging, and the scent of brown drying leaves underfoot, and the sweet, pungent scent of leaf bonfires is in the air, and the pursuing rustle of one's dog padding amongst leaf-mortality steals along close behind; then the beauty, and the pale, lingering sunshine, and the sadness are almost more than one can bear. It is all a wistful incarnation of the ghost that will sometimes visit even the sanest soul with the words: Death! And then?

On such a day there is no refuge. It does not seem worth while to take interest in a world touched with mortality, it is even impossible to differentiate between the prosperous and the unfortunate; for the pleasures and pains of the body, riches and destitution, seem like twin sisters in the presence of that rustling of dead leaves. The pale candles of life are flickering, waiting to resign, and join darkness.

On such a day the sky is the greatest comfort a man can have; for though he feels terribly that it will never part, and let his eyes peer on and on till they see the top of eternity, still it is high, free, has a semblance of immortality, and perhaps is made up of all the spirit breath that has abandoned dead leaves and the corpses of men.

On such a day when love, like a discouraged bird, moves her wings faintly, it is well to stand still, and look long at the sky. The haunting scents, the pursuing rustle, may then for a brief while become deserters; for up there it seems as though the wings of Harmony were still moving.

It was on such a day that in Kensington Gardens I saw the parting of two poor souls. They had been sitting side by side in the dim alley of chestnut trees which leads down past the Speke monument to the Serpentine—a tall, burly, bearded man, and a white wisp of a girl. There was nothing in any way remarkable about them; the man just an ordinary business type, the girl, probably, a governess. And they sat so motionless, talking in such low voices that I had quite forgotten them; for on that day, the tide of interest in one's fellow-creatures was at low ebb. But suddenly I became conscious that they had risen. Half-hidden by the trunk of the chestnut tree, whose few broad leaves were so like hands stretched out to the pale sunlight, they stood close together, indifferent to my presence; and there was that in the way they were looking at each other which made one's heart ache. Deep down in the eyes of both, life was surely dying—dying quietly as ever were leaves just about to fall. And I knew, as certainly as though all their little history had been made plain, that this was a last meeting. Some fatal force was severing them, and though neither confessed, both knew that it was for ever.

"And you'll write to me?"

"And when I come back?" . . .

But the words were spoken as though all words had the same lack of meaning to two desperate hearts each trying to comfort the other. From their talk it was clear that they were not man and wife, but it was certain too, by the way they touched and looked at one another, that this was the parting of those who had been lovers; the least of their looks and touches was full of passion, quivering, alive. The girl had a little gold crucifix bound on her breast, and while the man talked, his thick fingers kept playing with it, turning it over and over, evidently without knowing what they were handling. She wore, too, a narrow band of ruby-colored velvet at her neck; and when he touched it, her eyes, of that pale blue the color of flax flowers, darkened as if with delight. Her face, which was rather foreign-looking, with its high cheek-bones and ashen hair, had something of the wilted whiteness of a flower, turned up to him, and her hands, stroking and twisting at his sleeves, could no more keep still than her rapid, whispering voice with its little un-English accent. And he—that burly fellow—it was queer to see the twitching and quivering of his face, as though all the memories common to these two were trying to break through the thick mask of his flesh.

It must have been something very fateful to drag them apart in the full tide of their passion; or was this perhaps only one more of those most pitiful of all episodes, when the twin grim facts of money and reputation have tramped in on love? It was hard to tell which was the stronger emotion on those faces so close to one another, pity for self, or pity for the other heart, about to be left lonely, to be bereft of its little share of immortality.

And then, without even a glance round to see if anyone were looking, they clung together. There could—they felt—be no doing that in the street or at the railway station; but here, in shadow, under trees that knew well enough what partings were like, with no one to see them except one indifferent stranger and a spaniel dog stirring the dead leaves with its long, black nose—here they could try once again to forget.

Whatever their poor story—commonplace and little noble in the world's eye—they, thus clinging together, in their love and in the presence of its death, were symbolic of a world touched with mortality, where all things seemed to love, and yet lose love, and pass out into nothingness. There was no statue in all those Gardens like this dark, pitiful group of two blotted into each other's arms, trying for a last moment to crush sorrow to death within the prison of their joined lips.

But when that kiss was over—what then? Would they have courage to turn and walk different ways, leaving their hearts hanging here in the air, framed by the sparse, wan leaves, and taking away, instead, within each of them a little hollow of rustling sound?

They had not that courage. They went together, their arms listless, the man trying to bear himself indifferently, the girl crying ever so quietly. And as they came nearer and nearer to the Gate, they walked always slower, till they had passed through it, and stood still on the edge of the pavement. And as though indeed they had left their hearts clinging in the air of the Gardens, evermore to haunt under those trees, they hardly even touched one another, but with one long, pitiful look, parted; he to his cab, she to stand looking after it.

The sky had changed. It was still high, but as grey as a dove's wing; sunless, compounded of unshed tears. And a little cold, talking wind had risen, so that when a leaf fell, it fled away, turned over, fluttered, and dropped. In this wind people hurried as though it were telling them things they wished not to hear; and the numbers of little birds balancing on the bared boughs seemed very silent; one could not tell whether they were happy.

In the alley of chestnut trees I tried to find the place where those two hearts had been left. The wind had blown over; it was lost in the wilderness of grey air. But though I could not see it, I knew it was there, that kiss for ever imprinted on the pale sunlight. And I hunted for it, desiring its warmth on this day that was like the death of love. I could not find it, and slowly walked home, the chill scents dying round me, the pursuing rustle of my dog, padding in leaf-mortality, creeping along behind.

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

Present-Day Problems.

LORD NO ZOO.

WHEN Toby Chuzzlewit lay a-dying, he was asked this solemn question, "Who was your grandfather?" He replied, "The Lord No Zoo," whereupon the chronicler remarks, "It may be said—it has been said, for human wickedness has no limits—that there is no Lord of that name, and that among the titles which have become extinct none at all resembling this, in sound even, is to be discovered." If this be so, we must, I fear, dismiss Mr. Chuzzlewit's vaunted ancestor to the realm of myth and fable; but a careful study (such as existing circumstances have induced some publicists to make) of the roll of the House of Lords reveals the existence of a good many peers of whom little more is known than is known of Lord No Zoo. Indeed, that nobleman's title may be taken, without offence, as the type or representative of that miscellaneous throng, who, variously described as "Backwoodsmen," "wild peers," or "wreckers," are going to destroy the Budget.

"What will the Lords do?" is a question which has been asked with tolerable frequency during the last six months; but it may be fairly questioned whether the great majority of those who have asked or answered it have any clear notion of the persons to whom it applies. In short, the general public does not realise Lord No Zoo. When serious-minded people talk of "the Lords," or speculate on their intentions, they have in mind a class of men which has nothing in common with the house of No Zoo. The Lords, as we generally conceive of them—Lords who generally transact the legislative business of the House of Peers—are men well known, in many cases highly distinguished, at least as virtuous and respectable as their neighbors; men with public reputations to maintain, and with "records" of usefulness and dignity which they would be loath to sully. When, in ordinary times, we speak of "The Lords" as a legislative force, we think of men accomplished and experienced as the late Lord Salisbury or the present Lord Lansdowne; men of consistent probity and uprightness, such as the late Duke of Devonshire or the present Lord Spencer; philanthropists like the great Lord Shaftesbury; religious leaders like the present Duke of Norfolk and Lord Halifax; men like the late Duke of Westminster or the present Lord Cadogan, who combine immense wealth with generous philanthropy; men who by sheer force of intellect and energy have forced their way into the House of Lords—such as the first Lord Cairns and the present Lord Loreburn, who would be chosen by acclamation into any Senate, on account of the real contribution which their learning and experience can make to the service of the State.

This, or something like this, was the type of man with whom, in calculating the probable action of the House of Lords, we have usually had to reckon. The fact that the great majority of them sat in Parliament by virtue of birth only, and would have sat there just the same whatever their characters or careers had been, was indeed a standing annoyance to believers in representative self-government. But the great majority even of Liberals fell back upon the consideration that the system worked out in practice better than in theory seemed possible; that the two Front Benches in the House of Lords were occupied, as a rule, by men of character, who had some pretensions to statesmanship, and that the bulk of their supporters, though not in all cases pre-eminent for virtue or intellect, might be trusted to follow them along the paths of probity, moderation, and common-sense.

This was a view which might, not unreasonably, be taken by each side of the other; and, when tried by the test of practice, it was not found wanting. The Irish Land Act of 1881 and the Franchise Act of 1884 became law, because both sides were guided by prudence and public spirit. The Home Rule Bill of 1893 and the Education Bill of 1906 were rejected, because both sides realised that neither Bill was popular. All the decent semblances of fighting were gone through on all four occasions, and the result in each case represented the common sense of both sides. The Tory Lords knew when to yield and when to stand firm; and the Liberal Lords knew when they had, and when they had not, a case which they could press to a fighting issue. Similar instances might be multiplied, but they are needless.

It was government by "understanding," and give-and-take; and, though not democratically ideal, it saved us from shocks and collisions. Within the last two or three years the system of government by mutual understanding between the two Front Benches in the House of Lords has begun to break down. The cause of the change is not clear. It may be the greater activity, and even secret violence, of the Liquor Trade. It may be that influences, less sagacious and more partizan than those of an earlier date, have begun to infest the Tory Front Bench. It may be merely that, the popularity of the Liberal Government having naturally waned after four years' power, the Tory leaders see a chance of returning to office, and that is a prospect which seduces even the most virtuous and patriotic of public men.

Yet, in spite of all these forces which make for discord, I personally believe that Lord Lansdowne and his colleagues would, after counting the cost, let the Budget pass—if they could only reckon on the support of Lord No Zoo. There's the rub. Lord Lansdowne and Lord Cadogan and Lord St. Aldwyn may wish for peace, and may be able to influence the rank and file of their ordinary supporters. But Lord No Zoo and his congeners are skulking in the background. Nobody knows them. Nobody can get at them. Nobody can persuade them. Nobody can terrify them. Nobody can read their mental processes. There are plenty of Peers who are known—Peers who move in Society, who are amenable to the just influence of the Crown, whose interests bind them to the chariot-wheels of party, who have something in the past to be grateful for, or something to hope for in the future—and to these a pressure, not less effective because secret, can be applied. But Lord No Zoo and his friends are inaccessible. They live in the remotest wilds, where they are paramount. They never consort with their equals, never hear what is going on in the world. They know very well that, come what may, they will not be made Knights of the Garter or Lords Lieutenant. They rather enjoy the opportunity of showing their independence, boasting that they don't care a brass farthing for Lord Lansdowne, and professing a robust confidence in their ability to safeguard their own interests.

Their one notion of politics is to get the Radicals out of office, and, if they think that by throwing out the Budget they can compass that end, their vote is assured beforehand. So, when the momentous day of the Division in the Lords arrives, Lord No Zoo and his companions will arrive from Northumberland and Cornwall, Suffolk and Shropshire, and we shall see the real rulers of the House of Lords. And now I have to walk warily. The Lord No Zoo of my youth was much given to excess of wine—indeed, was rarely sober after dinner. He scarcely ever left his ancestral hall; but, having come up, in the interests of religion, to vote against the Irish Church Bill, he wandered into the House of Commons, got past the door-keeper, and sat down on one of the green benches. Presently he turned to an M.P. next whom he was sitting, and said, "Can you tell me if the gentleman who is now speaking is Lord Salisbury?" and was with difficulty hustled out by the door behind the Chair. Let us, in order to avoid personalities, expand the name of No Zoo till it covers all the Backwoodsmen, past and present. There was Lord No Zoo the dipsomaniac, and Lord No Zoo the kleptomaniac, and Lord No Zoo whose keeper had to conduct him to the door of the House; and Lord No Zoo who was a patron of forty livings and died in a house of ill fame; and Lord No Zoo who beat his wife, and Lord No Zoo who cheated at cards; and Lord No Zoo who fought his footman; and Lord No Zoo, who, according to a recent book of Memoirs, exhibited his dead wife's decayed teeth to a bachelor friend; besides a host of No Zoos who were merely non-entities. I have deliberately used the past tense, and said "was"; but let no one dream that the House of No Zoo is extinct.

"Lord Churston made a short speech. He said he supposed they wanted to know what the House of Lords was going to do with the Budget. Well, he was not going to tell them. He did not know what was going to happen, but he thought it would be all right. He would not say more than that. He thought that when a gentleman of Scotch extraction came down and talked about not being able to find money for the old age pensions he was not only a liar, but a ——— liar. He did not say the House of Lords would kick out the Budget neck and crop, but he did not think it would live very long."

Here are the oratory and the statesmanship of the Backwoods. Against Lord Churston and Lord No Zoo even the gods—let alone Lord Lansdowne—fight in vain.

GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL.

The Drama.

LORD GORELL'S AMENDMENT.

To me the most interesting passage in the Censorship Report occurs towards the end of the Minutes of the Committee's proceedings, and runs thus:—

Paragraph 19 is further considered.

It is moved by Lord Gorell to leave out the last three lines of the paragraph, and to insert:—"We consider that an optional censorship is not logical, although it might work if the powers of licence and of prohibition subsequent to performance were in the same authority with adequate competent advice. Rather than separate these powers, as was suggested by some witnesses, it would be advisable to abolish prior licence altogether. We consider that the choice therefore lies between control prior to or subsequent to performance, and that having regard to all the difficulties of the matter, the system of licence before production should be abolished, and that reliance should be placed on subsequent effective control."

On Question:—

CONTENTS (2).

Lord Gorell.
Mr. Robert Harcourt.

NON-CONTENTS (6).

Earl of Plymouth.
Lord Willoughby de Broke.
Lord Ribblesdale.
Lord Newton.
Mr. Alfred Mason.
Mr. Herbert Samuel.

It is resolved in the negative.

Paragraph 19 is read and agreed to.

The italics are mine. Now this simply means that Lord Gorell, for obvious reasons the most judiciously-minded man on the Committee, at the end of the enquiry into which he went, as was evident from his early questions to witnesses, with no opinions formed, has come to a conclusion, not only that the Dramatists' contentions are theoretically just (that the Committee has handsomely and unanimously admitted), but that it is perfectly feasible to treat the Theatre as all other arts and professions are treated, condemning its misdeeds after commitment, not before. It is to be observed that this amendment to the draft report was not moved until close upon the end of the Committee's last sitting. One knows of the weariness that infects any committee towards the end of its buffeting by conflicting interests, of the scamper towards signature of a report, once that happy release is in sight. In this instance one readily understands how overworked Parliamentarians might complain that they really had had enough of it; after disposing of Clause 69, it was too bad to be brought back again to Clause 19. But still, when Lord Gorell, belatedly but very definitely, put forward this reasoned amendment of his, it might have been worth while to adjourn for its better consideration.

For what is the position?

The Committee admit the claims of the Dramatists by recommending that all powers of veto upon the production of a play should be removed, that there should be established a system of Optional Censorship. This is all to the good, a distinct advance, and doubtless represents a real conversion of some members who set to work upon the matter in what was apparently a rather hostile spirit.

But behind this pious opinion there is the question of administration. Indeed, to the practical legislator the whole question must ultimately resolve itself into one of administration, and it is the recognition of this fact that underlies and prompts Lord Gorell's amendment.

Optional Censorship already exists. It exists in Leeds, Sheffield, and Bradford, Stratford, Newcastle, and Croydon (to name only the towns that are so noted in Appendix D). Variety Theatres are there conducted under a double licence, one for music and dancing, and one for stage plays. By this means the managers are rendered immune from prosecution for the production of sketches, and released from the concordat arrived at on this subject between the Theatres and Music Halls. That is to say, their sketches are no longer sketches but stage plays. And as practically any personal entertainment involving costume or action has been held to be a stage play, probably nine out of every ten turns at these variety theatres legally come within the scope of the Theatres Act of 1843. But are these turns submitted to the Lord Chamberlain? Not at all.

Here, then, we have optional censorship, and there is nothing that I can see to prevent the practice of granting double licences becoming universal. The only formal barrier exists in London in the shape of an agreement between the County Council and the Lord Chamberlain to grant only one kind of licence to one building; but this I take it is not irrevocable. It is true that the plays or sketches performed under these circumstances are at present only one-act plays; but if it is entirely open to a manager working under a Theatre Licence to send in a one-act play for censorship or not as he chooses, how can you deprive him of that discretion over a three-act play? At a pinch all he need do is to label it: one act and three scenes. But if all this may be done in Bradford, why may it not be done in London? The answer is, of course, that it depends at present upon the amount of influence that can be brought to bear against such a solution by the Lord Chamberlain, or by local or business interests; in London, doubtless, the Lord Chamberlain's influence might remain potent for some time to come. And it is to remedy this ludicrously partial state of things and to regularise the gross breaches of the law, winked at by the Lord Chamberlain for years past, that the Committee have unanimously recommended the establishment of a single licence for all places of entertainment. But a single licence in the very nature of it can carry, as does a double licence, no less freedom to every sort and kind of entertainment, theatrical and otherwise, than Optional Censorship, and it would have helped to clear thinking in the matter if the Report had called attention to this fact.

Now what have been the results of optional censorships at Stratford, Croydon, Newcastle, Leeds, Bradford, etc.? In the first place, it is pretty certain that the managers have not taken up their option; none of the one-act plays they perform have been submitted to the Lord Chamberlain. In the second place, no serious complaint has been made about them, no complaint at all that has not been satisfactorily dealt with by the local authorities acting in their licensing capacity. To a plain man this would seem a good enough argument for abolishing the Censorship altogether, at any rate as a protection against indecency. For though it has been contended (I'm sure I don't know why) that a three-act play can be much more immoral than a one-act play, no one has been found of the opinion that a dramatist cannot be just as indecent in one act as in three. But no; the Committee, bound to admit that one-act indecencies and the possibility of one-act immoralities are easily dealt with by the force of public opinion and common law, are firmly resolved (always with the honorable exception of Lord Gorell and Mr. Harcourt) that five-act immoralities and three-act indecencies require for their suppression the creation of a brand new schedule of offences hitherto unknown in England, and even upon occasion the revival of the Star Chamber itself in the form of a Committee of the Privy Council. These compliments to the Theatre! This, though they will also be involving the peaceably jogging Music Halls in such a new and possibly exciting condition of things.

For instance, provision is made in the Report's scheme for a Music Hall singer being able to send his song to the Lord Chamberlain for a licence. This is a logical consequence of Single Licence plus Optional Censorship, and could not be avoided. Doubtless it will not be, and is not meant to be, taken advantage of. The Music-Hall singer is happy enough without Mr. Redford, and Mr. Redford as happy as may be without the Music-Hall singer. Had he to suppress every song which (I quote from the new schedule of offences) contains "offensive personalities," "represents in an invidious manner a living person," or is calculated (generously) to "conduce to crime or vice," he might well have to suppress half the songs brought to his notice, having first multiplied himself by twenty in order to deal with the job at all. At the other, or theatrical, end of the scale of entertainments under Single Licence and Optional Censorship, the Committee have made it clear that they expect ninety-nine out of every hundred plays still to be submitted to Mr. Redford. They even go so far as to suggest that the owners of theatres shall be entitled to add to any existing leases a clause that plays produced there must willy-nilly be submitted for Censorship. If this is meant to apply to owners of Variety Theatres the power is to be summarily given them, if the present legal definition of a stage play is to hold, to dislocate, not only the entertainments, but the Lord Chamberlain's office as well. Songs and duologues would be submitted by thousands weekly. And how it can be made to apply only to buildings holding a stage-play licence I don't quite see, since the kind of licence held may vary from year to year. But in any case one would have thought that if Optional Censorship were meant to be anything more than the mere automatic concession involved in regularising the actual status quo, the boot would have been upon the other leg; every theatre lease containing a clause forbidding unlicensed plays (and that is every theatre lease I ever heard of) should have been held not to contain that clause except upon specific confirmation by mutual consent of landlord and tenant. Why the landlord as such need be dragged into the matter at all, or made to concern himself any more than he naturally does with the respectability of his tenant I can't see, since the ultimate and just penalty proposed for repeated misconduct is that the licence shall be forfeited and be incapable of renewal for another five years to the same licensee. At most the loss of a licence might be made to imply the cancelling of a lease; and glad enough the landlord should be to be rid of a discreditable tenant. But no, the Committee, conscious of the virtue there is in overcoming obstacles, have determined that (the principle of freedom having been established) for practical purposes, the production of an unlicensed play shall remain a very difficult and heroic thing indeed.

There is no reason, I think, that the scheme should not work well enough for the present. The principle of the authors' contention is admitted, the path of dramatic progress is somewhat smoothed, and we must be thankful for small mercies. The rest is, as I have said, only a legalising of the present state of affairs. But for the future, when, by virtue of the single licence, conditions have quite changed, the line between Theatre and Music Hall has disappeared altogether, and some new composite form of entertainment flourishes—have the Committee read their report in the light of the possibilities then? Mr. Samuel has tried to be kind to everybody, to give to each importunate suitor as much as the screams and protestations of the others would allow. I venture to think that this was not the Committee's business. It was in their power to protest against a scandalous and illiberal aberration of the principles of justice and liberty. To their hands was committed a not unimportant thing, the destiny of English Dramatic Art. They might have reported with a single eye to that. But they have chosen instead to concern themselves, Martha-like, with the worries of the present situation, and if Mr. Herbert Samuel finds himself at the Home Office a few years hence reaping the whirlwind he is now so well-intentionally sowing, he must be comforted by the reflection that it is poetic justice descending on him.

Is it not plain that the opposition to the abolition of this one remaining English Censorship is a business opposition, natural enough in the managers, who find the prestige of the Lord Chamberlain's protection very useful in their business, but not really germane to the inwardness of the issue? Other public men must accept responsibility for their words and actions; preachers, editors, even politicians. Why must theatre managers alone be exempt?

A censorship is foreign to our whole system of government; moreover, in this case the very march of events has overwhelmed and discredited it. Is not an attempt to bolster up the remnant of its dignity predoomed to failure? We thank the Committee for their recognition of our claims, but the liberty promised us must be made real or we cannot rest satisfied. Complacency belongs to the past. If it is impossible to reconcile the future of the Drama with present business interests in it, then business interests must re-arrange themselves rather than a whole Art and a vital principle of English law be sacrificed to their convenience. At least so thought Lord Gorell, and it is a pity that the Committee even now do not afford themselves another sitting, to reconsider his amendment.

H. GRANVILLE BARKER.

Letters to the Editor.

THE LORD ADVOCATE AND MR. BALFOUR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—About a month ago a letter reached me from a man living in my constituency saying that some Liberals were spreading the report that Old Age Pensions would come to an end with this Government, and he asked me whether I approved of the circulation of such a statement. I replied that any such statement as this met with my strongest disapproval, because the Old Age Pensions Act, like so many other Acts of Parliament which owed their origin to Liberal Governments, was founded on a sense of justice of the whole community, that many Conservatives were now heartily ashamed of the bitter attacks which their leaders had levelled against it, especially in the House of Lords, and that no Government would dare to undo what this Government had done in regard to Old Age Pensions.

Differing widely from the conclusions arrived at by the Lord Advocate, is it even now too late for a private member to express the earnest hope that Mr. Balfour may see his way to withdraw the virulent and venomous charge brought against that gentleman? Can he think that any man who intended to say what he knew to be false would come down to the House of Commons and repeat the falsehood there face to face with his critics and opponents? Has such a thing ever been done? The Lord Advocate repeated, as nearly as possible verbatim, the arguments and figures he made use of outside the House. No one that heard him there could possibly doubt his sincerity, and whatever mistakes may have been made in the House of Commons, its cheers have never been given to an intentional lie. Mr. Balfour's reputation belongs to the country—not to his Party only. The Lord Advocate's figures may be all wrong (they have not, as yet, been proved to be so). His opinions are liable to error. He has never claimed infallibility.

Those who have often listened with intense admiration to Mr. Balfour, and who appreciate how much he has done to maintain the courtesy and chivalry of debate—these are the men of all and every side in political life who feel most the lapse of such a leader from the higher to the lower level.—Yours, &c.,

A LIBERAL MEMBER.

November 17th, 1909.

THE ULTIMATE BASIS OF AUTHORITY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am by this time well accustomed to the unconscious misrepresentation which your anonymous correspondent, "A Liberal Voter," thinks it worth while to put in writing.

I have never used the phrase, "Political society is based not on justice, but on force."

What I have often said is that "the last resort, the ultimate basis, of authority is force." This is a mere truth, and is a maxim of eminent political philosophers and historians such as Mr. James Bryce. Yet Mr. Bryce is a Liberal.

Justice is great, but does not, as yet, prevail, nor is it the last resort of authority. There are still too many people and too many States that do justly, not always because they like it, but often only because they must.

"A Liberal Voter's" practical politics should be to abolish at once the army and the police force. But ordinary men have to deal with things as they are, and not as they want them to be; still less as "A Liberal Voter" imagines them to be. I fear, however, it is useless to argue with a well-meaning imagination. Perhaps these few lines may serve to put the case before reasonable beings.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN MASSIE.

Oxford, November 13th, 1909.

"MAKING THE FOREIGNER PAY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—With deference, we suggest that Mr. Joseph's letter does not, except indirectly, illustrate either side of the fiscal question, because it relates to a commodity having no standard value. The prices in both markets are arbitrary; the diminution of value in America is probably determined mainly, not as Mr. Joseph thinks, by freight, profit, and duty, but by absence of demand. This is, no doubt, what you meant by "monopolist" price; but we think the term was hardly fortunate, because the word "monopoly" usually implies a distinct use or exchange value.

There is another factor which complicates any discussion of the effect of tariffs on the book trade—the difference of the Copyright Laws, which makes literary property a quite different thing when it crosses the Atlantic.

A concrete instance of an Anglo-American publishing arrangement may, however, interest your readers. A book is published here at 7s. 6d. net, and an edition consisting of a few hundred copies is sold, unbound, to an American publishing firm at 1s. 10d. Landing charges will probably bring the price up to 2s. a copy; the American publisher has to bind his purchases, to advertise and canvass the book. Were there no duty to be paid, he could publish the book at the equivalent, or very nearly the equivalent, of 7s. 6d. and make a reasonable profit. So far the business is clear enough. But the American Government charges a duty of twenty-five per cent., which, on 1s. 10d., equals 5½d. Thus, the American importer's prime cost is 1s. 10d., plus landing charges, plus 5½d., plus the cost of binding—say, altogether, approximately, 3s. He publishes the book in America at $2.50—three shillings more than the English published price. The American consumer consequently pays the duty at least six times over.

Let us add that, while this particular instance is a fair average case, the proportion paid by the American consumer would, with many books, not be so high. The book we have in mind was published at what one may call a reasonable competitive price, and the figures we have given reinforce your argument that, with goods produced under competition, the consumer in the protected country pays the duty. It may be stated, as a general rule, that prices in America for an identical book property are somewhat higher than in England. Many books are published in England at artificially high prices. We can give an instance of such a book in regard to which a very similar transaction took place; but, in this second case, the American published price is only the equivalent of a few pence higher than the English published price. In this case, therefore, the cost of the duty was apparently borne in very nearly equal proportions by the English exporter and the American importer.—Yours, &c.,

THE LITERARY AGENCY OF LONDON,

5, Henrietta Street, C. F. CAZENOVE,
Covent Garden, W.C.

November 17th, 1909.

THE POLITICAL POSITION OF WOMEN GRADUATES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In furtherance of the Parliamentary enfranchisement of duly qualified women, our Union, consisting of graduates of the University of London, desires to call attention to the position of women graduates of Universities which are entitled to send a representative to Parliament.

The University of London was the first in this country to admit women as candidates for degrees. In 1878 the Senate and Convocation obtained a Supplemental Charter making every degree, honor, and prize awarded by the University accessible to students of both sexes on precisely the same terms. On that occasion an address, signed by 1960 women, was presented to the Senate and Convocation, expressing gratitude for the generous action of the University in placing women in a position of free intellectual activity "unhindered by mistaken protection and unfettered by ancient prejudice."

The same enlightened policy was maintained in the University of London Act of 1898 which contains as a fundamental principle the declaration that "no disability shall be imposed on the ground of sex." Thus, in all University affairs men and women are accorded the same electoral and other rights, and they acquire them through exactly the same qualifications.

The granting of degrees in 1878 was promptly followed by the admission of women to Convocation which, besides being an advisory and elective body of the University, formed its Parliamentary constituency. The University, however, had not the power to prevent a differential treatment of its graduates in the election of their Parliamentary representative, for the denial of the vote to women in such elections rests on a general Act of Parliament. The register of Convocation is accordingly altered for the purpose of a Parliamentary election (and for that purpose only) by striking out all names of women, at present about one-sixth of the total number.

After graduating, a large proportion of the women thus unrepresented enter one or other of the professions. They serve the public as teachers in schools; they hold posts as lecturers and examiners in this and other Universities; they help to advance knowledge by original investigations, and those who enter the profession of medicine undertake heavy responsibility in every department of medical and surgical work. Even those who hold that women have not the ordinary human interest in the laws imposed upon them by Parliament—a contention which we utterly repudiate—must admit that members of the teaching profession of either sex constitute a class of persons specially qualified to form an opinion on educational and allied problems. These women prove by seeking admission to Convocation their interest in University affairs, yet they are debarred from any share in choosing the Parliamentary representatives, although the choice may greatly affect the welfare of their University.

After thirty years during which women have shown themselves capable of reaching as high an academic standard as men, we wish to renew the expression of gratitude to the University, and to point out that the old opposition, conceived in a spirit similar to that which to-day opposes the extension of the Parliamentary franchise to qualified women, is so far silenced that the example of London has been followed entirely or partially by all British Universities, except Oxford and Cambridge.

It is fitting, therefore, that graduates of the University of London should take their part in the removal of the artificial barriers still maintained against the full development of women's faculties and against the constitutional expression of their convictions. We wish to do our utmost to win for the nation the benefits to be derived from raising duly qualified women to the status of citizenship. In order to do so, however, we must make the case of women graduates known to a wider public, and particularly to those who already possess, in the Parliamentary vote, a constitutional and effective means of pressing their claim.

Further, in view of the approaching General Election, we would urge all graduates of the University of London—both men and women—who are in sympathy with the objects of this Union, to join it without loss of time.

Particulars and forms of membership can be obtained from the Hon. Secretary, Miss Jessie W. Scott, M.A., 114A, Harley Street, London, W.—Yours, &c.,

L. GARRETT ANDERSON, M.D., B.S.,
Chairman of Committee;

MARIAN BUSK, B.Sc., Hon. Treasurer;

E. HONOR BONE, M.D., B.S.,

HARRIETTE CHICK, D.Sc.,

JESSIE W. SCOTT, M.A.,

Hon. Secs., London Graduates' Union for Women's Suffrage.

November 17th, 1909.

"LAND FOR THE ASKING."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I do not know whether Mr. Ellis Barker's letter in your issue of the 6th inst. will be taken sufficiently seriously to justify comment, but I can hardly allow his remarks on the Tory democracy proposal for setting up peasant proprietorship to go unchallenged. Not a scrap of evidence of any sort does he produce in support of his theory that the small holder wants to own the land he occupies. I have been living in the midst of rural surroundings for the past twenty-eight years, and have been closely associated with agriculture during the whole of that time, and for the last two years I have been actively engaged in administering the Small Holdings Act, 1907, in a county where arrangements have been already made for leasing or purchasing some 2,700 acres for small holdings.

All our applicants had the option when applying of stating whether they wished to rent or purchase a holding, and I think I am safe in saying that not more than two per cent. were in favor of purchase. What they want is a fair rent and fixity of tenure; this appears to satisfy the vast majority, and they very rarely ask for more than a yearly tenancy when they can have the County Council for their landlord.

I quite agree with one remark of Mr. Barker's, that "political landlords are an abomination." A very large part of the dissatisfaction at present existing arises from the fact that landlords will bring politics into their dealings with their tenants, and the desire to escape from the "political landlord" is one of the chief reasons why the small men are so eagerly availing themselves of the advantages to be gained from the present Government's Small Holdings Act.—Yours, &c.,

COUNTY COUNCILLOR.

November 15th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—You do well to point out so forcibly the true meaning of Conservative land reform. What our landowners delight to see are such Socialistic and Fabian societies springing up, as, for example, "The Hampstead Garden Suburb Trust"—who boast of having made a most wonderful arrangement whereby they circumvent the greedy landowner, and then let out the fact that they paid £155,000 for 243 acres of land. They bought in bulk, as you see, and as they boast about, and paid just about ten to twelve times the agricultural value.

What other profit do our landowners want, or do they ever get more than this? The use of £6,000 a year immediately to hand, instead of doling out this large area of land bit by bit, or keeping it for agricultural purposes and drawing, say, £700 a year at the outside. All the work and worry of laying-out, planning, and selling done for them, and full building land price, at one bargain.

May I, as a builder, emphasise as much as I can what ought to be obvious—viz., that no proper or successful building or housing schemes can be made until land can be obtained nearer the agricultural value, even in suburbs?

One of the most striking object-lessons the world has seen is at Hampstead suburb, where you may see a huge block of what are no better than tenement dwellings, fifty to sixty of them, standing on half an acre of land. They are, I believe, intended to be for the use of poor old couples, but the rentals for one room and scullery are 3s. 6d. to 4s. 6d. a week.

This Trust needed this and other blocks to make up that fearful £6,000 a year outgo in interest on purchase price.

I say, let our building trade be stinted a bit longer, till the valuation is made, and the incidence of local and Imperial taxation gradually shifted away from buildings and other improvements on to one standard or basis, and that land value. Until that comes about, how can housing reformers and garden city promoters—with their finely devised and, at Hampstead, in the main beautifully carried out, schemes—be other than the mere tool or handmaiden of the owner of suburban land, who has taken toll for so many years that he honestly believes he has a divine right to go on taking?—Yours, &c.,

BUILDER.

November 17th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the article last week entitled "Land for the Asking," you outlined the tactics that are about to be adopted by the Tories to counteract the effect of the campaign for land reform in England, of which the Finance Bill is the beginning, and you suggest, quite rightly, that a very valuable lesson as to this may be drawn from Ireland. Land Reform in Ireland began in 1881, when Mr. Gladstone passed the Land Act of that year which established the Land Commission and enabled the tenants to get fair rents fixed. The fixing of fair rents meant, of course, the reduction of rent. A fair rent lasts for a judicial term, namely, fifteen years, and at the end of that period the tenant may apply again to the Land Commission to have his rent reconsidered. The average reduction all over Ireland in respect of first judicial terms was 20.7 per cent. The average reduction in respect of second judicial terms has been 19.6 per cent. The Land Act of 1881 simply deprived the landlord of the unearned increment value added to the land by the capital and industry of the tenant. Instead of handing over the equivalent of that increment value to the State, as the Finance Bill proposes to do, the Act of 1881 gave it to the tenant. That is the only difference in principle between the Irish Act and the proposals of the present year. In 1885, when the effect of the Act of 1881 was becoming apparent and the tremendousness of the revolution effected by that legislation was beginning to be felt, the Tories, through the instrumentality of Lord Ashbourne, hurried through Parliament the first of the Land Purchase Acts, during their short period of power in 1885.

That was the beginning of Land Purchase in Ireland, a scheme which was devised and elaborated by the Tories in the interests of the Irish landlords for the purpose of defeating the fair rent legislation of Mr. Gladstone. Additional Acts were passed in furtherance of that scheme by the Tories in 1887, 1891, 1896, and, finally, 1903. The Liberal Party never identified itself with, nor made itself responsible for, the policy of Land Purchase, which at the present moment is revealed as a huge swindle by which the taxpayers of the United Kingdom and the tenantry of Ireland have been defrauded. The system of inspection in the earlier Land Purchase Acts, which enabled the Land Commission to refuse to make a loan where the land did not afford sufficient security for the proposed loan, was some slight check upon this fraud. That procedure provided some degree of protection to the tenants, and prevented them from making the improvident bargains that they otherwise would have made.

The Mephistophelian scheme devised by Mr. Wyndham and Lord Dunraven in 1903, however, swept all that away, allowing the tenant to enter into any bargain he liked, however improvident, so long as that bargain came within the wide limits of the zones, and obliging the Land Commission to advance the purchase money without any inspection of the lands or any consideration as to security. The result has been disaster from the point of view of both the taxpayers and the tenants. The land hunger of the poverty-stricken Irish tenantry is something stupendous. The reports of half a dozen Royal Commissions in the 'Sixties and 'Seventies bear testimony to the fact that that land hunger brought about an utter recklessness which was being rapidly followed by national bankruptcy and social ruin.

Mr. Gladstone's Act came in time to save the country from the improvidence brought about by it. The landlords had an absolute monopoly of the land, and the State intervened in 1881 to regulate how much they should be allowed to take out of the land in the shape of rent. The Act of 1881 has been very properly called the Magna Charta of the Irish tenant, but its effect has been almost entirely nullified by the scheme of 1903. The State, which in 1881 had declared legislatively that the tenant should not be left to enter into contracts with his landlord and that the former must be protected from the latter, proceeded to withdraw that protection in 1903. The tenants were given, for all practical purposes, complete freedom of contract, with the same result as that which happened previously to 1881. Freedom of contract for the Irish tenants means the freedom of contract that the lamb has in his dealings with the wolf. The prices for land that have ruled in Ireland since 1903 would make the hair of a London property broker stand on end. Mr. Wyndham, with complete knowledge of the rental and acreage of agricultural Ireland, calculated in that year that the whole transaction would be carried through for a sum of one hundred and twelve millions.

We now know that twice that amount will be required before it is complete. The error in Mr. Wyndham's calculation consisted in his failure to take into consideration the rapacity of the Irish landlord, and the Land Bill of the present session, which was intended to restore some little protection, however inadequate, to the tenants, has been in effect thrown out by the House of Landlords. The total result of the whole matter is that the tenants of Ireland are now purchasing their holdings on the basis of the rents that they were paying previously to 1881, and in that way the fruits of Mr. Gladstone's fair-rent legislation are being filched from them.

It is perfectly plain that the same scheme of fraud is being considered by the Tory leaders in England. Says Sir Gilbert Parker and company: "Your rents are about to be cut down. Why not sell out at once and pocket the capitalised value of what you are now receiving, or what you hope to receive in the future?" The plan is a repetition of the Irish scheme, and it is to be hoped that England will profit by the unfortunate experiences of the taxpayers and peasantry of this country.—Yours, &c.,

W. J. JOHNSTON.

32, Elgin Road, Dublin,
November 17th, 1909.

HIGH ALBANIA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I should be obliged if you would allow me to correct a misunderstanding in the long review given of my book, "High Albania," in your issue of November 13th. The reviewer says I have no scientific anthropological interest in the people. Whereas it was solely for anthropological reasons that I undertook a journey in the wildest parts of the land, and I was all the time engaged in collecting details and specimens for several members of the Royal Institute of Anthropology, of which I am a member. In order that South Albania should in no way be misjudged, I expressly state in my first page that the conditions prevailing there are very different.

As to the political events in the rest of Turkey which your reviewer accuses me of passing over in silence, that I did so in no way indicates political bias on my part. Politics were not my concern; I recorded only those events that came under my immediate notice.

I regret that your reviewer should lay so much stress on the more uncivilised characteristics of the North Albanians, and have omitted to point out their great hospitality, generosity, and bravery, and the very honorable way in which their word is kept. For this I strove throughout to emphasise.—Yours, &c.,

M. E. DURHAM.

116A, King Henry's Road, N.W.
November 16th, 1909.

JOHN MILTON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you permit me a word concerning your—on the whole, kindly—notice of my little book on Milton?

Your reviewer complains that I exhort or advise the "young student" on every other page. Even granting that your reviewer uses the words loosely, I must say that the statement is widely inaccurate. Further, it is misleading to suggest, as your reviewer does, that I employ myself in giving advice and in exhortation to the young student rather than attending to my business and criticising Milton.

It appears that I have "emphatically the schoolmaster touch." Perhaps. However, I'm not a schoolmaster—only a journalist.

Your reviewer considers that my explanation of the words, "Eikon Basilike" is rather superfluous. The book was written principally for the use of the older scholars in the higher grade and secondary schools controlled by the various public education authorities throughout the country. In the majority of these schools no Greek is taught. Do you think it "rather superfluous" to explain the meaning of "Eikon Basilike" to a lad of fifteen or sixteen who does not know any Greek?

These are matters of fact. On matters of opinion I have, of course, no right to challenge your reviewer in your own columns.—Yours, &c.,
W. GRINTON BERRY.
November 17th, 1909.

CHARLES KINGSLEY AND WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I do not know whence "G. S." has drawn his opinions about Charles Kingsley, but I can testify that I heard Kingsley make a strong speech in favor of Female Suffrage, into which he introduced a warm eulogy of Mill's book on the "Subjection of Women."

At a later time, Kingsley felt that a disagreeable element was forcing itself to the front in the Suffrage agitation; and I think that a letter of his to Mrs. Peter Taylor, bearing on that side of the subject, is printed in his Life. But, in the same letter, he writes as one approving Mrs. Taylor's own action.—Yours, &c.,

C. E. MAURICE.

Eirene Cottage, Gainsborough Gardens,
Hampstead,
November 16th, 1909.

PRAGMATISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your article in your last issue, entitled "The Jest of Pilate," strikes me as being a little confused. As a regular reader of THE NATION, and a humble admirer of Professor James, may I be allowed a few lines of your space?

When two views are presented for decision as to their truthfulness, each of which have some evidence, you advocate suspension of judgment. These are the words of your article:—

"Both of them by hypothesis have some evidence in their favor. That evidence is equal, and therefore not only not decisive, but incapable of weighting the scale with so much as a balance of probability one way rather than another. In such a situation, the degree of 'asceticism,' which any rational man requires, is a suspense of judgment."

This position, at first sight, seems very reasonable, I admit. But is it practicable? I think not. This impartial superhuman being has not yet been evolved.

Such a method would be very satisfactory were it not for the fact that it neglects one very large aspect of the question altogether—the practical aspect. Are not our beliefs the tools by which we live, humanly created for human purposes, forged in the workshop of our own experience? Is there any one of them that is true and not useful in some way or other? Should we believe any of them if they were not useful? Surely the only proof which we have of their truth is their usefulness. I know of no other proof in the last resort.

The whole question of religious faith hangs upon whether we accept this method of suspension of judgment or not. Let me take an instance that is not very favorable to my case, because the evidence is nearly all one way. Certain scientists have long been fond of demonstrating that the world will run down, that its fund of energy will run out, and the human race be exterminated; most of the evidence appears to be on their side, yet how many people believe that to-day? Do not most of us, on the contrary, believe in some purpose in this earth which we can serve solely and simply because it works to believe in it, because we could not live without believing in it. In real life we always have to decide and act one way or the other, we have to believe in a thing and see if it works. This is the true experimental method, and the only hopeful method as far as results are concerned.

The rationalistic method of suspension of judgment may be all right for things that do not matter on a purely intellectual plane, but, if widely adopted, it would lead to a barren scepticism which would ultimately lead to pessimism and death.—Yours, &c.,
L. CROOK.

Wimbledon,

November 14th, 1909.

MR. "ELLIS BARKER" WITH US.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Ellis Barker, alias Eltzbacher, has recently cut a sorry figure in your pages. In his unconsciously humorous publication entitled "101 Points Against Free Trade," he has thoroughly satisfied himself that Britain is a decadent country, fast going to the dogs; he asserts that "Free Trade means low salaries and wages"; that "most of our workers are badly paid" (the "our" is good); that "Protection causes high wages"; that "Tariff Reform means better wages"; that "poverty is terribly prevalent" here; that the Germans are wealthier than the Britons (whom he calls "44 million Englishmen"!); "who are employed in stagnant and declining industries"; that "hampered and restricted" Britain is "helpless" with her Free Trade, &c., &c., ad nauseam.

Now, Sir, what I want to know is why, if all this be anything like true, Mr. Eltzbacher ever left his happy paradise of Protected Germany to settle in such a wretched country.

If he must leave vaunted Germany, why didn't he proceed to one of the many blissful tariff countries, instead of coming to a nation so singularly consistent in its adherence to those principles which he professes to find so much at fault, and which result in the national ruin he depicts?

It is surely not too much to expect Mr. Eltzbacher to perceive how incongruous and unintelligent is his protesting presence among us, and to request that he will act accordingly.—Yours, &c.,

J. A. S.

Glasgow, November 17th, 1909.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE AND FORCIBLE FEEDING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—One cannot attend a meeting on the subject of woman suffrage, or discuss its present position privately, without the question being asked by someone, in reference to the forced feeding, "What else can the authorities do?" There is only one answer to the question, viz., "They cannot do this."

Forced feeding is not an alternative: it is an impossibility.

If our penal system is such that torture can find a place and be justified, that system is wrong and must be re-cast. The more the system "justifies" the torture, the more the system stands condemned. This "reductio ad impossibile" of our penal system has not before become an accomplished fact, because men hitherto have never been able to keep up a hunger-strike more than twenty-four hours, it has been left to the endurance of women to bring this matter to a head. The feeling in the country shows how acutely this point is realised.

Whatever may be our opinion on woman suffrage, we must acknowledge that we owe a debt to the women now in prison, if on this count alone.—Yours, &c.,

ENNIS RICHMOND.

West Heath School,
Hampstead, N.W.

WOMEN AND THE LAWS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A correspondent in your issue of last week asserts that women cannot complain of want of legal or social consideration, arising out of their unenfranchised condition. I would like to draw his attention to certain remarks made by Burke in 1792. Writing to Sir Hercules Langrishe, M.P., on the Penal Laws against Irish Catholics, he said:—"They who are excluded from votes . . . are excluded not from the State, but from the British Constitution. . . . The disenfranchised part cannot, I say, think themselves in a happy state to be utterly excluded from all its direct and all its consequential advantages. The popular part of the Constitution must be to them by far the most odious part of it. To them it is not an actual and, if possible, still less a virtual representation. It is, indeed, the direct contrary. It is the power unlimited placed in the hands of an adverse description, because it is an adverse description. And if they who compose the privilege body have not an interest, they must but too frequently have motives of pride, passion, petulance, peevish jealousy or tyrannic suspicion to urge them to treat the excluded people with contempt and rigor." . . .

These words are equally applicable to the disenfranchised women of to-day, who, although absolutely unrepresented, find that Parliament does not scruple to deal with laws which vitally affect them in their very home lives.—Yours, &c.,

ALBERTA RUSSELL.

26, Franconia Road, S.W.
November 13th, 1909.

[An important letter on "Taxing the Foreigner," by Mr. Rowland Hunt, has been unavoidably held over till next week.]

Poetry.

THE WELSH SEA.

HERE like a green and golden snake
The twisting waters flow,
And whisper how the dead men wake
Who died too long ago
For us to care or know.

And here, O dreamer, you may trace,
When all the waters shine,
Graved on the dark sea's jewel face,
A faint and fearful sign,
The Old Embankment line;

And you may learn of Dyfed's reign,
And sing Nemedian tales
Of kings who rowed on ships from Spain,
And lent their swords to Wales:
Listen, for Evening pales;

Listen, for they of ghostly speech,
Who died when Christ was born,
May dance upon the golden beach
That once was golden corn,
And wind their battle horn.

Listen, for Ocean moans and stirs
And blinks a thousand eyes,
And she will tell you how the years
Reveal their mysteries
To Oceans, who are wise.

JAMES ELROY FLECKER.

Reviews.

LYRIC BEAUTY.*

To an honest critical mind the most remarkable thing about the verse which is being written to-day must surely be the high pitch of beauty to which it frequently attains. No doubt, a great deal of the day's verse is very transient sort of stuff, poetry only in typographical appearance, foredoomed to make a rapid return to the paper mills. But looking narrowly into it for pure aesthetic satisfaction, we must find that a large proportion even of our less famous poets easily achieve something more than tolerable mediocrity, a quite positive, and often quite potent, beauty. Here are three new books of verse. The authors' names are certainly not unknown to persons of culture, but we doubt if any of them would be selected as foremost writers of the day. Yet for the sheer beauty of verse, for beauty of sound, and the internal beauty of imagery and epithets and the other poetic devices, these three books are quite remarkable, and one of them is very remarkable. In this matter (it may almost be asserted) there is work in them that is on a level with some of our classic poetry. It is easy to say that this beauty is derivative. So it is, and so it must be. Any person who writes poetry nowadays has, besides his natural endowment of genius, a further endowment of the whole mass of poetic beauty made by the English poets who preceded him; and it is inevitable and proper that this second accidental endowment should appear in his work. And not only will his work be tinged by all the verbal decency achieved by the poets before him. Certain philosophical and mystical ideas of beauty, of the First Beauty, which were with difficulty won to, or, perhaps, unconsciously possessed, by former poets, are now the conscious common property of all poets. Anyone now, provided he is really a poet, can kindle his verse with these excellent ideas. We find Mr. Alfred Noyes, for instance, singing thus of Beauty working through the appearances of the world:

She, the unchanging, shepherds their changes,
Bids them mingle and form and flow,
Flowers and flocks and the great hill-ranges
Follow her cry and go.

By his expression of it, Mr. Noyes has certainly made that transcendental idea of beauty his own. But it is an idea that has been familiar to the poetic side of his mind from his infancy, just as railway trains have been familiar to the practical side of his mind. As, for the material conveniences of life, we all stand on the achievements of our ancestors, so it is with the poets of to-day for what we may call the conveniences of their art. They begin their careers on their predecessors' lofty achievements of beauty, in practice and in idea. We should not be surprised to find, then, that there is by no means any lack of beauty in modern verse. And it behoves criticism to-day more than ever to look into the spirit that wields this beauty. Of the three books before us, the wielding passion that appears in Mrs. Taylor's "Rose and Vine" is far more vehement than in the other two. Mr. Noyes, in "The Enchanted Island," strikes one as being a trifle cold in the management of his poetic apparatus. Most of the attributes that poetry should possess are easily discoverable in Mr. Noyes's work. But the spirit underneath these attributes seems to us—shall we say?—too business-like in its employment of them; by which we mean that the business of employing them does not sufficiently excite it. We may be quite wrong as regards Mr. Noyes personally; he may be full of passion when he writes. But we do not get that impression from reading his poetry; somehow the passion does not get into his writing. The impression we get is of a man setting out to write charming poetry, and succeeding admirably; but his knowledge of how to do it is so exact and certain that he seems to be insufficiently exhilarated by the performance. In the case of Mr. Henry Newbolt the moving spirit of the verse is not vehement, but neither is it cold; it is quiet, but strong and very genuine.

Mrs. Annand Taylor's "Rose and Vine" is, as we

* "Rose and Vine." By Rachel Annand Taylor. Elkin Mathews. 5s. net.

"The Enchanted Island." By Alfred Noyes. Blackwood. 5s. net.

"Songs of Memory and Hope." By Henry Newbolt. Murray. 3s. 6d. net.

have said, a very remarkable volume. Though the tendency is for modern poetry to make as great a use as possible of the materials of poetic beauty, seldom do we meet with such a lavish and gorgeous display of them as in this book. Like the vow the mother makes for her children in one of her poems, seems to be the vow Mrs. Taylor has made for her verses, that they ... shall dance

With all the rapturous delicate circumstance
Of dancing.

All the words which the ordinary man calls "poetry words" we shall find employed, and well employed, in this book. So also shall we find instances of all those sensuous experiences which are traditionally held suitable for poetic purposes. Sumptuous is the word for the trappings of Mrs. Taylor's poetry. The thought is dressed in astonishing riches; the whole book is full of musics and colors and fragrances, of gold and opals ("wild with fire"), of taffeta, miniver, and arras, of exquisite bowls and thuribles. But Mrs. Taylor uses as a rule a very definite selection from the riches of the sensuous world, perhaps a too limited selection. Evidently she has found a group of images that perfectly suits her needs, and she employs the same group again and again. We know not how many times the rose and the vine of the book's title appear, nor how often in her poetry we meet with violets and violins, green skies, and silver evening stars. This makes the poetry individual, but it is a questionable method of attaining individuality. Without doubt, Mrs. Taylor's limited imagery is something of a mannerism; but, as far as it goes in the present volume, we are very ready to put up with it. But surely one whose mind is so stored with sensible beauty has no need to fix herself in a narrow convention of her own, however splendid the convention she has devised may be. For few people have been so entirely at one with all the manifold traditions of beauty in the world as Mrs. Taylor. In all her poems we can feel the worship which finds overt expression in "The Joys of Art"; we must quote the poem:—

As a dancer dancing in a shower of roses before her King
(A dreamer dark, the King)
Throws back her head like a wind-loved flower, and makes her cymbals ring,
(O'er her lit eyes they ring);
As a fair white dancer strange of heart, and crowned and shod with gold.
My soul exults before the Art, the magian Art of old.

There is a fine rapture in that, married to a perfectly wrought image; and we may note that the best line in it, the third, is the one which is most free from her special convention of imagery. Nor does she respond only to art; whatever ecstasy man has attained to, religious, æsthetic, or sensuous, she is familiar with. In one fine poem, "The Visions," she doubts whether to follow the saints of Judaea,

Holy and white and wounded
Like stained ivory, or Sophocles and the rapture of poesy, or Antinous "the dreamer of all the senses know," or the grail-knights on their mystic quest. And so we find, as we wish we had room to show, that all her poems are drenched with beauty of idea, beauty of image, beauty of phrase. There is an obvious danger in this; poetry has often stifled under such luxuries. But Mrs. Taylor is a genuine poet; we have not to reprove her, by quoting against herself from her own Neo-Platonic dirge:—

The soul that was more beautiful
Lies drowned in pleasure's crystal pool.

For one thing, sensuous delight with her is raised to a fire of passion; so that her poetry, instead of being trapped in opacous gorgeousness, is dressed in imagery as if in luminous flames. Also, she nearly always vivifies her imagery with some symbolic intent. As a symbolist, indeed, she does very well; and she can even liken a lady to "mournful Latin litanies" without being affected. But chiefly her poetry bears up under its costume of riches because it is, in its primary essence, such a strong, exultant, vehement spirit. As a last sample of Mrs. Taylor's manner, we quote the opening lines from one of her most obviously symbolist poems:—

In lands like faded arras-broideries
Where dead green skies are veiled with golden trees,
With golden trees, from whose frail branches young
Star-tangled jasmine in great ropes is hung,—

There, while the morning star is fluting low,
The amazing silver Unicorns must go. . . .

Those who wish to know what these "amazing silver Unicorns" are, and to read a poem (along with several others) that they will not easily forget, must make themselves possessors of Mrs. Taylor's "Rose and Vine."

Books protect themselves from the onslaughts of criticism as beasts protect themselves from their enemies. Either, with a disconcerting rage, they take the offensive themselves and tame the critic by their sacred wrath; and this is how Mrs. Taylor's "Rose and Vine" does it. Or else they defend themselves in an armor of unexceptionability; and this is how Mr. Noyes's and Mr. Newbolt's books do it. We can object nothing to Mr. Noyes's diction, except an occasional incongruity when his theme is what Dr. Johnson would have called "vulgar." His metre sings admirably, especially in his "Actæon"; and we like his frank way of dealing with modernity, and his fresh way of dealing with old matters. He makes a good choice of lyrical subjects, too; but he is best when he can mingle seamance with humor and pictorial writing, as in his version of "Bacchus and the Pirates," which is a really excellent poem. But we cannot think that "The Enchanted Island" will much enhance the high reputation he has properly gained by his former books. Mr. Newbolt, on the other hand, gives us work in his new volume that is better than anything of its kind he has done previously. For the most part, it is in a quieter vein than his fine and vigorous ballads; but he has never before used his fantasy (as in "Dream Market"), or described nature (as in "The Return of Summer"), so charmingly as in this book. In the latter kind of his poetry, his nature-description, his observation is as close as his phrasing is happy. When, for example, in describing the call of a nuthatch, he says the bird "keeps chucking stones along a frozen pond," we must surely feel that a natural sound has never been better enclosed in a single line of poetry.

These three books are lyric poetry, and in all three the beauty of the verse is noteworthy. This is the main thing that is demanded of the lyric nowadays; and the lyric is obviously preferred now by the cultured and elect few that still read poetry. Is the lyric of exquisite beauty therefore to be considered the poetic form of the future? And may we take the high achievement of these three books to mean that such lyric is the form natural to the day? Whatever be answered to the latter question, as regards the former we shall venture on a heresy, and say that we believe not. We believe that the lyric poets of to-day, in perfecting one side of their art, have estranged themselves from another, equally important side, the expression of human nature. A man must be a fool or a criminal to misprise beauty in poetry; yet a too deliberate pursuit of beauty may take half the power from poetry. All the great lyrical poets of the past—Sappho, Catullus, Goethe, Heine, Burns, Wordsworth—show that the lyric can be as intimate with sheer human nature as drama itself. If this intimacy can be restored to the lyric, then it may prevail in the future. But, in any case, the poetry that will prevail will be something less ascetically intent on the pursuit of beauty than the lyric of to-day, something that will not shrink from the most direct dealings with raw human nature, heart, mind, and spirit.

SIR WILLIAM HUGGINS'S DISCOVERIES.*

IN 1856, three years before Darwin supplied the key in his "Origin of Species" to the evolution of man from lower life-forms, and Kirchhoff had unlocked the secret of the chemical constitution of the sun, Sir William (then Mr.) Huggins built a modest observatory at Tulse Hill which was to become world-famous in the annals of astronomical discovery. For he "builded wiser than he knew." At that time it seemed that the work of the observer of "that inverted bowl we call the sky" was limited to the conventional lines of his predecessors. At intervals another minor planet would swim "into his ken"; or a new star flash and become extinguished; or, as recently in the case of Jupiter, another satellite be added to the list of "companions"; or the number of stars whose distances can be reckoned in light-years increased. But that the mystery of the stuff of which the heavenly bodies are made would be solved was a speculation dismissed well-nigh as soon as broached, for how was it possible to establish any physical relation between the chemistry of the earth and that of a mass of matter ninety-three million miles distant?

* "The Scientific Papers of Sir William Huggins, K.C.B., O.M., &c." Edited by Sir William and Lady Huggins, Hon. M.R.Ast. S. With sixty-six illustrations. Wesley & Son. 31s. 6d. net.

As M. Declaux acutely said, "It is because science is sure of nothing that it is ever advancing." And in 1802 Wollaston's detection of four dark lines which crossed a sunray at right angles when broken on a prism, lines which are now numbered by thousands, set the workers in celestial physics on a quest whose result, in the hands of Kirchhoff, was the discovery that sodium, iron, and other terrestrial elements are present in the sun. Thereby Sir William Huggins, "dissatisfied," he tells us, "with the routine character of ordinary astronomical work," received the impetus to the application of the spectroscope to analysis of the light from the so-called "fixed" stars, whereby their chemistry might perchance be also known. His researches, carried on for some time in conjunction with the late Dr. Allen Miller (and during many years, to the present time, in still happier collaboration with Lady Huggins), began in 1863. In that year Huxley, pushing Darwin's theory to its inevitable conclusion, demonstrated the fundamental unity of man, psychically as well as physically, with every living thing, a demonstration which synchronised with the proofs of fundamental unity of sun and stars, and the dependence of the organic on the inorganic being no matter of question, the inter-relation of all phenomena was made manifest. It was the birth of the New Anthropology and the New Astronomy.

Of the triumphs achieved, "transcending the wildest dreams of an earlier time," by Sir William Huggins, as, practically, the founder of the science of astrophysics, this majestic volume, and a preceding one entitled "An Atlas of Representative Stellar Spectra," are alike the witnesses and the record. Discoveries are not reached per saltum, and Sir William shows how the researches of Wollaston, Fraunhofer, Angstrom, and others "who died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded to them," made his success possible. Fraunhofer employed some of the letters of the alphabet to denote the more prominent lines, beginning with A in the red or least bent or refracted part of the spectrum, H denoting the violet or most refracted part of the spectrum, and D, famous as furnishing the earliest key, denoting two lines in the yellow portion, which are due to the omnipresent element sodium. When common salt is burnt in a spirit lamp, it gives a spectrum of two nearly coincident bright lines, which, superposed on the sun's spectrum, are seen to be in an identical position with two dark lines therein. According to an unvarying law as explained by Kirchhoff, "when a group of bright lines coincides with a similar group of dark lines, we know that the terrestrial substances producing the former are present in the atmosphere of the sun," the vaporised element absorbing the same kind of rays that it emits, but in larger quantity. It would be interesting, but space forbids, to show how modern geologists are finding in the annual rate at which sodium is being carried by all the rivers to the oceans one of the data for determining the age of the earth. Explanations of the method employed is given in Professor Joly's recent volume on "Radio-activity and Geology." Here it must suffice to say that, as the amount of salt in the sea is known in its entirety within a fair percentage, analysis shows what addition is being made, the result giving an estimate of about 90 to 100 million years.

Returning to the spectrum, Kirchhoff identified sixty lines (since increased to more than 2,000) as due to the presence of iron, and to this is added proof of the presence of calcium, magnesium, helium (which was not discovered on the earth till some time afterwards), copper, zinc, and other metals. As the planets are not original sources of light, their spectra resemble the sun's spectrum, but somewhat modified by the absorptive character of their atmospheres.

But, in securing such results, the method of analysis is simplicity itself compared with that which had to be devised when the spectroscope attacked the problem of stars whose distance is measurable, not in miles, but in "light-years." For starlight appears as only a tremulous point, which the most powerful telescope can increase in brightness, but cannot convert into a disc. To broaden it into a short line, the star's image has to be thrown upon a narrow slit; a spectroscope is fixed to the eye end of the telescope, and then, by means of a small reflecting prism placed before one-half of the slit, light from a terrestrial source at the side of the telescope is sent into the instrument, together with the star's light, thereby forming a spectrum by the side of the stellar spectrum for comparison with it. Thus was prepared the apparatus for analysis of light radiated at the speed of above eleven millions of miles per minute from bodies which, in the case of Vega, is only one forty thousand millionth part of the light received from the sun, and the fact revealed that sodium, magnesium, and iron are present in that star, in Sirius, Pollux, and, without doubt, in all like self-luminous bodies in the infinite spaces. In addition to this, the nature of the thousands of nebulae was, once and for all, settled. The resolution of large numbers of these into clusters of minute stars by powerful telescopes lent strong support to the theory that all of them were of the same constitution. But in 1864 Sir William Huggins's examination of the spectra of certain nebulae disclosed the presence of bright lines, three of which are due to hydrogen. Thus the gaseous nature—protoplasm of sidereal systems—of all true nebulae (in which the imposing nebula in Orion is included) was demonstrated, and, broadly speaking, the like applies to the vagrant bodies known as comets. Marvellous as is the work done by the eye, penetrated with billions of light-waves every second from the sun and star, fatigue and impairment of vision are its fate, and its use is, fortunately, now largely superseded by the invention of the gelatine dry-plate process, which Sir William was the first to adopt. By this means the labors of the astronomer are enormously lessened, the photographic dry plate, placed within the telescope, receives impressions of myriads of stars, invisible to man, and, what is of much import, reproduces those portions of the solar spectrum which lie beyond the infra-red and the ultra-violet. But the story of what photography has done to advance astronomy would fill a volume.

"Ohne Hast, aber ohne Rast," Sir William applied the spectroscope to the problem of star direction, measuring the rate at which bodies at inconceivable distances may be approaching or receding from our system. This was arrived at by calculating the relative displacement of the lines in the spectrum, as, for example, a minute shift of the F or hydrogen line in the spectrum of Sirius indicated that that star is receding from the solar system at a speed of eighteen to twenty-two miles per second of time. "Under favorable circumstances," Sir William says, "the spectroscope enables us to measure to within a mile per second, or even less, the rate of motion . . . any small want of coincidence of the stellar lines with the same lines produced upon the earth may safely be interpreted as revealing the velocity of approach or of recession between the star and the earth." As for the movement of our system, it appears to be towards a point in the constellation Hercules, while recent observation lends support to a theory that the stellar system, as a whole, comprises two general drifts of stars rushing in nearly opposite directions. As the spectroscope reveals what appear to be stages of condensation in the matter of the universe, it is probable that the conclusions as to star evolution and dissolution drawn from their colors will be found to be valid. That fascinating branch of cosmic dynamics has not escaped the vigilant eye of Sir William Huggins; but the life-history of stars remains among speculations which may be converted into certainties when we know more about the disintegration of the so-called elements.

To this list of great achievements (1) the establishment of the identity of stuff between our system and other stellar systems; (2) of the direction in which the stars are moving; (3) of the nature of many of the nebulae; (4) the revelation of the invisible by the application of photography—enough in themselves to represent the ceaseless labors of a long life—there might be added others, such, for example, as the method of viewing the prominences in the unclipped sun; but their secondary importance is warrant for omission from the present attempt to compress in untechnical language the main contents of a volume with which the expert alone can adequately deal. It is a tale of wonder, the effect of which is deepened by the absence of all rhetoric and the presence of modesty in the narration. Dulled must be the intelligence which fails to be quickened thereby to ponderings over man's stupendous advance in knowledge, or to be touched by the reflection with what added pathos the final monition, "thus far shalt thou go, and no farther," comes home to the rare truth-seeking souls typified by the author whose discoveries are the subject-matter of this volume.

THE MARTYR OF THE MARRIAGE LAWS.*

IN Caroline Sheridan, afterwards Mrs. Norton, the brilliance of the Sheridan family and the charm of those beautiful and talented women whom it was the habit of the Sheridan family to marry, reached their highest development. Beauty, wit, artistic, musical, and literary talent, personal charm, and large intelligence all were hers. Yet it was not by any of these endowments, but rather by her extraordinary sufferings, that Mrs. Norton influenced the history of her time. She was the martyr of the unfair marriage law of England, and by her martyrdom became, in a large measure, the emancipator of English wives and mothers.

Her mother, the widow of Richard Brindley, Sheridan's eldest son, was left with seven young children to support, and with an income which, by the social standards to which she was accustomed, was insufficient. To her, the early marriage of her beautiful daughters was—as it would have been to most women of her day and degree—a prime object; and in 1827 Caroline, the second of these daughters, being then nineteen, or possibly younger (there is some uncertainty as to the year of her birth), became the wife of Mr. George Norton, a younger brother of Lord Grantley. The bride's previous knowledge of her bridegroom was small, and horrible, indeed, must the revelation of his real self have been to the ardent, high-spirited, quick-tempered girl who, in her own home, had known nothing but affection and sympathetic gaiety. She was to learn that she had put herself under the bondage of a man who was mean, malignant, and coldly, perseveringly cruel, and whose whole view of life, moreover, was in direct antagonism to her own. Within a few weeks of their marriage he was treating her with personal violence, and during their life together was always ill-conditioned, jealous, and overbearing. His family, composed largely of persons as unamiable as himself, resented her influence with her husband, her lack of fortune, and her Whig politics, while her family, with far more justice, resented deeply the brutalities to which she was exposed. There were, of course, smoother intervals; he had certainly been much in love with her and he valued the addition to their income which her literary work brought in; her generous, affectionate disposition responded quickly to any kindness, and the children who were born formed a strong link between their uncongenial parents.

In 1830, when the small appointment held by Mr. Norton was threatened with abolition, he naturally wished for another, and, Tory though he was, set on his wife to make applications to the Whig statesmen then in power who had been friends of her grandfather. Thus she was brought into contact with Lord Melbourne, afterwards Prime Minister, who presently procured for Mr. Norton an appointment as a Metropolitan Police Magistrate. A friendship, consistently promoted by her husband, grew up between Mrs. Norton and Lord Melbourne, whose genial temper, range of information and spacious views, must have contrasted delightfully with the ill-humored narrowness of Norton, and whose age—he was nearly thirty years her senior—may have seemed to her a sufficient protection against scandal.

In 1835 she left her husband, but yielding, against the advice of her family, to his remorseful entreaties, went back. The next year, after a violent quarrel, she left him again. From this time he seems to have been possessed by a desire to injure her. He took away and kept from her three children; he gave public notice, though he must have known it to be inoperative, that he would not be liable for her debts; he retained her clothes, jewels, and personal possessions, including the income of £50 a year left by her father; and he brought an action for damages—in those days the first step towards a divorce—against Lord Melbourne. The evidence produced was of the flimsiest; no witnesses were called for the defence and the jury gave a verdict in Lord Melbourne's favor without leaving the box. But Mrs. Norton had no status in the case; she had no legal means of rebutting the flagrantly false charges made against her, and her previous condonation of her husband's offences deprived her of the right to divorce him. For four years not only did she never see her children, but she often did not know where they were. She set herself to try and get the law altered that allowed a married woman no claim to her own children, and there can be no doubt that her two pamphlets largely assisted the passing in 1839 of an Act that opened for mothers a possibility of access to their children. Mr. Norton, not waiting for its compulsion, now permitted his wife to see her boys occasionally, and the death of the youngest from an accident so far softened the father's heart that he suffered the barrier to fall, and thenceforward she had much of their company. Moreover, in 1848 he signed an agreement by which he was to allow her £500 a year. Three years later her mother died, whereupon a life interest in Mrs. Norton's little patrimony of £1,500 fell into her husband's hands, while she inherited an income carefully secured to her of £480. He announced to her that he should withdraw her allowance, and did so, six months before she could receive any part of her mother's legacy. She then learned that since the English law recognised no contract between man and wife, his signed promise was not binding. Trusting to it, she had naturally incurred liabilities which she was now rendered unable to meet. One of her creditors sued Mr. Norton, who resisted payment on the ground that his wife had a sufficient income of her own. He seized (as the law allowed) upon her bank book and her publishers' agreements and compelled her to undergo a cruel and insulting cross-examination, in the course of which the old charge against her and Lord Melbourne was revived. Once more she turned her mind towards a reform of the law which permitted her husband, because he was her husband, to cheat her with impunity and to assume control of her money affairs long after she was separated from him. The two pamphlets which she wrote on this topic are among the best of her works, glowing with lofty indignation, yet reasonable and cogent. To them was certainly due those clauses of the Marriage Act of 1857, which allowed the Court to order the payment of separate maintenance to a wife, enabled her to inherit and bequeath property like a single woman, protected the earnings of a deserted wife, and enabled a separated wife to contract, sue, or be sued. Thus to the wrongs of Caroline Norton England owes the first steps in that legal recognition of the married woman as a person instead of a property, which is not yet complete. For this, if this were all, she fully deserves that clear, impartial, and interesting record which Miss Perkins has produced. But this is not all, as a personality, many-sided and delightful, Mrs. Norton is well worth knowing; while her cruel story is stranger and more exciting than that of many a novel.

THE LAST OF EXPLORERS.*

IN the year of Stanley's death the present reviewer, who happened to be on the Congo and in other parts of Central Africa, was much struck by the rapidity with which history was moving there. Only sixteen years had then passed since the third and last of Stanley's great expeditions—the passage up the river and through the unknown forest to Albert Nyanza and the Ruwenzori range or Mountains of the Moon; yet already the man and his labors were surrounded with mythical splendor, and anyone who remembered Stanley or had even known one of his companions could claim a veteran's reflected glory. Till Stanley came, for thousands of years the history of Central Africa had remained unknown and its destinies had probably witnessed little change. But now, within a generation, the whole conception of that vast land was altered, and during its

* "The Life of Mrs. Norton." By Miss Jane Gray Perkins. With portraits. Murray. 12s. net.

* "The Autobiography of Sir Henry Morton Stanley." Edited by his Wife, Dorothy Stanley. Sampson Low, Marston & Co. 21s. net.

explorer's lifetime the story of his achievements had come to belong to an almost inconceivable past.

When we think that less than forty years ago Stanley found Livingstone on Lake Tanganyika devoting the remaining months of his heroic life to establishing his theory that the Lualaba was the Upper Nile; when we remember that others maintained it was the Niger, and that only thirty-five years have gone since Stanley followed down its course, still in doubt which of the great rivers it might be, till at last it swung westward and south-west and proved to be the main stream of the Congo itself—then we realise what extraordinary an advance in knowledge the world owes to this one man. We may set Columbus apart for the result of his exploration, but Stanley ranks with the other greatest explorers of the world—with Marco Polo, and Vasco di Gama, and Cook, and Mungo Park, and Livingstone himself. And as he was among the greatest of explorers, he was also the very last the world can know. For no matter how crowded with flying visitors the Poles may become, their area is small and their geography uninteresting to mankind, compared with the heart of the great tropical continent that Stanley revealed.

In this so-called "Autobiography," Stanley tells the story of little more than his first twenty years. He wrote it only down to the end of the American Civil War, but the remainder is admirably told by Lady Stanley, with the help of letters, scraps of diary, and a few extracts from the published books. Undoubtedly, Stanley's reputation will gain from the picture. In his own part of it, especially in his Introduction, his most obvious weaknesses reappear—his rather defiant self-assertion, his rather big manner of expression, and his confident appeal to Providence. But we can make greater allowance for such weaknesses now that we know the hard facts of life that caused them, and the book reveals a sympathetic and winning side to his nature that those who did not know him can seldom have suspected. We see it in the generosity of his praise, in his power of attracting devoted service, in his tenderness to suffering, and, as Lady Stanley says, a certain touch of the "Ewigweibliche" which is felt at the root of his character.

He had some cause for his belief in a special Providence, for destiny was very kind to him. From babyhood he was exposed to every sort of discomfort and hardship that could prepare him for the great enterprise of his life. He escaped the spoiling influence of a mother's coddling, for his mother evidently hated him, and in early childhood he was tricked into a Welsh workhouse school, and the boy whose character survives a workhouse school will not fail for want of toughness. His education was continued on the same lines, for, after running away from the school, he served as cabin-boy in a sailing ship under a savage master. Then came the first gleam of happiness in his career, for by mere chance he was adopted by a Southern States American, from whom he took the name of Stanley, having been John Rowlands before. Even then the fate which was hammering him into its proper instrument did not allow him to deteriorate, for the Civil War broke out, and by a peculiar gift that reached him through the post, he was constrained to volunteer in the "Dixie Greys" of the Confederate Army:—

"About this time," he writes, that is just at the outbreak of the war, "I received a parcel which I half suspected, as the address was written in a feminine hand, to be a token of some lady's regard; but, on opening it, I discovered it to be a chemise and petticoat, such as a negro lady's-maid might wear. I hastily hid it from view, and retired to the back room, that my burning cheeks might not betray me to some onlooker. In the afternoon, Dr. Goree called, and was excessively cordial and kind. He asked me if I did not intend to join the valiant children of Arkansas to fight, and I answered 'Yes.'"

So he earned his hard experience, not only in fighting (he was present at the terrible days of Shiloh), but in camping, which is far more trying and more valuable to the explorer.

It is very significant that while he was serving with the Southern Army, he invented a method of sinking the camp fire below the surface, so as to make it more convenient both for cooking and warmth. This carefulness of detail distinguished him all through life. Writing of the years in the workhouse school, he says:—

"How I came to manifest the passion of a fanatic for order and cleanliness I know not, yet when it was my turn to clean up and make the beds, I was seized with a consuming desire to exhibit everything at its best, to arrange the beds without a single crease or pucker, to make the folds with mathematical exactness, to dust and polish cupboards and window-sills until they were speckless, and to make the flagstones shine like mirrors. 'There,' I would say to my companions detailed to these duties, my eyes sparkling with pride, 'that is the way to wash a floor. Let us make the beds fit for princes to sleep in.'"

The present reviewer, who has spent the best years of his life in camps and wanderings, could not, certainly, have foretold that such a boy would become one of the greatest explorers, but he could have said without hesitation that he was of the stuff great explorers are made of. The same rare quality—the housekeeper's and organiser's quality—remained with him to the end. After his active life was over—far too early over, as one cannot but think—and he was preparing his pleasant home in Surrey, Lady Stanley writes:—

"He had even replenished the store-room, fitting it up as for an expedition, or to stand a siege. There were great canisters of rice, tapioca, flour enough for a garrison, soap, cheese, groceries of all kinds, everything we could possibly require, and each jar and tin was neatly ticketed in his handwriting, besides careful lists, written in a store-book, so that I might know, at a glance, the goodly contents of the room."

Unless a man is prepared to organise and toil at details like that, he has no right to think of adventure and exploration; he had better stay in civilisation, where others will do it all for him without his knowledge.

But, in spite of his capacity and courage, in spite of his success and the splendor of his fame, a peculiar irony marked all Stanley's greatest achievements. No one could have served a finer apprenticeship, for, after enlisting on both sides in the Civil War, he acted as correspondent in Asia Minor, in Abyssinia, in Spain, in the Caucasus, and Persia; and yet when he was sent upon his first great expedition into Africa to find Livingstone, he succeeded, indeed, in his quest, but the glorious old explorer refused to return with him and remained to die in solitude. The second great expedition, in which he circumnavigated Victoria Nyanza and Tanganyika, and then explored the course of the Congo to its mouth, resulted in the formation of the Congo State, which has become one of the plague-spots of mankind, and has, perhaps, brought more execration upon European civilisation than any other exploitation of Africa, even than the Portuguese slave-trade in Angola. Similarly, the third great expedition accomplished, it is true, its immediate aim, though at a terrible cost of life and suffering. Emin Pasha was rescued; but, owing to some national or personal peculiarity, he was almost indifferent to his rescue, and presently, having gone over to the enemy, he met exactly the kind of death from which Stanley came to preserve him.

It was a terrible fate to sit at home and hear news of the mismanagement of the Congo passing from bad to worse. It was wounding to listen to the detraction and incredulity with which all his reports were received in turn by people who had never travelled outside the frontiers of England or the tourist resorts, and chose to make light of an explorer who went neither as missionary nor as soldier. But it must have been worst of all to face the indifference of officials or Parliamentarians, who hated to be disturbed in their routine by a "mere journalist," and kept their eyes fixed on the exigencies of the party pump when the whole destiny of Central Africa was in the balance. What with Congo Reform Associations, Albert Hall meetings, and the infinite circumlocutions of diplomacy, we are paying pretty dearly for their neglect; but the unnumbered villages of Central Africa are paying a far heavier toll, and for no unrighteousness of their own.

"Who hath believed our report?" has always been the cry of men whose vision has reached beyond the common range. It was often Stanley's cry, but the full honor has come to him in the end, and his example is a lasting encouragement to all whose report, however slighted by invidious or indifferent persons, nevertheless remains true.

THE RISE OF CHRISTIANITY.*

THE rise of the Christian religion in the first three centuries from the position of an obscure, despised, and persecuted sect to official recognition as the exclusive religion of the

* "Early Church History." By Henry Melvill Gwatkin, Professor of Ecclesiastical History, Cambridge. Macmillan. Two Vols. 17s. net.

THE . . . MEDICI PRINTS.

THE MEDICI SOCIETY exists for the purpose of bringing within reach of all the finest obtainable replicas, in the colours of the Originals, of the finest works of the Great Masters of Painting. Speaking of one of the latest issues, the Burlington Magazine (Oct., 1909) said :—" Among modern publishers of prints The Medici Society has already achieved notable distinction for the excellence of its colour facsimiles, but an even greater credit attaches to the taste with which the subjects have been chosen. . . . Prints like this, which are at once true in general effect and will stand the test of the microscope in their details, can never be superseded." The Nation critic, in an article (Nov. 6th, 1909) examining the advance made in colour-reproduction, refers to the Medici Prints as " a class of work that, apart from its enormous educative value, has come to be something of first-hand æsthetic worth."

PRINTS NOW READY (those marked * ready shortly) :—

ITALIAN SCHOOLS.

PAINTER	SUBJECT	PRICE s. d.
BELLINI, GIAN...	...The Madonna of the Trees...	15 0
BOTTICELLIMadonna and Child (Milan)	12 6
"The Vision of St. Augustine	10 6
"The Birth of Venus ...	30 0
BRAMANTINOPutto with Grapes ...	12 6
CARPACCIO, VITT.	...The Vision of St. Ursula ...	30 0
CREDI, L. DIThe Annunciation ...	17 6
FORLÌ, M. DAThe Archangel Gabriel ...	17 6
FRANCESCA, P. DELLA...	...Portrait of a Lady (Milan)...	15 0
GIORGIONEEvander and Aeneas ...	30 0
"Figures in a Landscape ...	21 0
LEONARDOThe Last Supper ...	25 0
"Head of Christ ...	12 6
LIPPI, FILIPPOHead of the Virgin (Uffizi)...	10 6
LIPPI, FILIPPINOThe Virgin in Adoration ...	17 6
LUINI, B.Head of the Virgin (Brera)...	12 6
MANTEGNA, A....	...The Madonna with Cherubim	20 0
PISANELLOThe Vision of St. Eustace ...	17 6
PREDIS, A. DIBeatrice d'Este (Milan) ...	12 6
" " " "	" " " " (London) ...	31 6
 Edition limited to 300 Numbered Copies.
RAPHAELThe Madonna in Green ...	21 0
"Madonna della Colonna ...	17 6
TINTORETTOBacchus and Ariadne (Venice)	17 6
TITIAN ...	" " " " (London)	30 0
"The Madonna of the Cherries	25 0

ENGLISH SCHOOL.

PAINTER	SUBJECT	PRICE s. d.
GAINSBOROUGH	...The Painter's Daughters ...	15 0
HOPPNERThe Countess of Oxford ...	15 0
REYNOLDSThe Holy Family ...	15 0
ROMNEYLady Hamilton with a Goat ...	25 0
ROSSETTILady Lilith ...	25 0

FLEMISH AND DUTCH SCHOOLS.

HALS, FRANZ	...Family Group ...	21 0
HOOCH, P. DE	...Interior with Soldiers ...	15 0
MATSYS, Q.The Magdalen ...	17 6
RUBENSFruitfulness ...	12 6
TERBORCH, G.	...The Concert ...	17 6
VERMEER, JAN	...The Pearl Necklace ...	17 6
VOS, C. DEPortrait of a Lady ...	17 6

NATIONAL PORTRAIT SERIES.

JANSSEN, C.John Milton (Æt. 10) ...	12 6
UNKNOWNWilliam Shakespeare ...	15 0
ZUCCHERO*	...Queen Elizabeth with Rainbow	15 0
	After publication	17 6

OTHER SCHOOLS.

CLOUET, FR....	...Elizabeth of Austria ...	15
HOLBEIN, HANS*	...Christina, Duchess of Milan	15 0
	After publication	17 6

(The same in monochrome (24 in. by 11 in.) 5/-)

Packing and Postage of all Prints is extra, at 6d. each ; additional copies (up to 6) in same parcel, 1d. each beyond the first. Flat packing extra. FRAMES, suitable for all subjects, including replicas of fine originals contemporary with the pictures reproduced, are a speciality of the Society. For particulars see prospectus.

All lovers of Art are invited to pay an early visit to The Medici Galleries to inspect The Medici Society's THIRD WINTER EXHIBITION, comprising some 400 "Old Masters."

ARUNDELS Now³ on view (until Dec. 24th), an Exhibition of the Complete Series of the Reproductions of the Old ARUNDEL SOCIETY.

ALBRECHT DÜRER A Series of 64 selected Drawings, chiefly from the Albertina Library, Vienna, (including several water-colours) now ready at prices from 2s. to 15s. each. The Illustrated Catalogue, post free 1s. stamps ; unillustrated, 2d. stamps.

PRIMITIVES Some 100 colour-collotype facsimiles after paintings by the Early Flemish, German and Italian Schools. Special Illustrated List, post free 6d. stamps.

The Medici Society's completely illustrated Prospectus, containing particulars of suitable FRAMES, the ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION, etc., post free, 6d. stamps. Summary lists post free.

PHILIP LEE WARNER Publisher to The Medici Society, Ltd., 38, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

Roman Empire is one of the most interesting as well as one of the most astonishing events in the annals of the Western world. What are the conditions which produced this marvellous change in the status of the Christian faith? Why is it that a belief which arose in the humblest circles of society should have ultimately succeeded in seating itself on the throne of the Caesars? Why is it that an obscure band of wandering Orientals should have been able to impose their religious ideas upon the highest culture of the West? Why is it that the great gods of Greece and Rome, with their magnificent temples and majestic traditions, should have fallen one by one before the victorious advance of the carpenter of Nazareth? These are some of the questions which the historian of the first three centuries of the Christian Church has to attempt to answer. But how scanty are the materials he has for answering them! How little we know of the early origins of Christianity! The Gospels are in their present form products of the second or third Christian generation. They are works of edification rather than precise historical narratives. They were written with the object of deepening the faith of the believer rather than of imparting historical information. It is not a fides historica but a fides divina which inspires the early memorials of the Christian Church. What we get from them in the way of accurate information is an account of the state of mind of the early Christian societies and only incidentally a glimpse at the development of outward events. But this glimpse, when we succeed in getting it, is deeply interesting. Apart from St. Paul and one or two of the apostles, the Christian faith was spread first of all, as Dr. Gwatkin tells us, by a crowd of obscure missionaries. "Some of them might devote themselves to the work and wander like apostles; but every Christian was a missionary in his place and measure, and the common intercourse of trade and life spread the Gospel far and wide. Even women took their share in the work as we see in Priscilla's case; and from slaves and freedmen it reached slaves and freedmen, and not uncommonly their masters also. Every church was in a real sense a missionary society."

What was the inward motive which inspired this society with such burning zeal and devotion? Among the earliest believers it was the attractiveness of the personality of their Master: it was what we would now describe in modern terms as the personal magnetism of Jesus Christ. His earliest followers had formed no definite theological theories of the relation of their Master to the Godhead; they devoted themselves to him because he drew them to him; because they felt that he was a man of God. We have recently had one or two belated attempts to question the historical existence of the Founder of the Christian faith. We have had the old idea revived that Christianity did not proceed from a historic personality at all; but from the social and economic conditions of the Roman Empire. It is perfectly true that the ideas and circumstances of the time favored the development of the new religion. But ideas and circumstances do not of themselves create great movements. They provide the material for them. But the movements ultimately proceed from some great human impulse, and this impulse is given by a human personality. All the historic evidence, in particular the evidence of St. Paul, points to the fact that the personality who created the Christian Church is Jesus of Nazareth, and it is a pseudo-criticism which would cavil at this conclusion. In making Jesus Christ the central figure of its faith, the Christian Church is on solid historical ground. But the belief in his pre-eminence does not exclude the fact that Christianity incorporated many pre-Christian and non-Christian materials into itself. One of the weaknesses of Professor Gwatkin's book is that it is not quite up to date upon points of this kind. An overwhelming mass of evidence is now before us to show that Christianity is not an autonomous but a syncretic religion. It has drawn many of its materials from Persian, Babylonian, Jewish, and other Oriental sources. The New Testament itself contains many traces of this process, and it would have been of great value to the English reader if Dr. Gwatkin, in discussing the rise of Christianity, had shown us more of the extraneous sources from which the forms of Christian thought have sprung. To have done this would have been strictly in keeping with the plan of his work. This plan, he tells us in his preface, is to trace the growth of Christianity in its connexion with the general history of the time. But in a field which opens up such a wide vista we must not complain if some points are not dealt with as fully as could be wished.

In the first three centuries of its existence the Christian Church had a two-fold task before it. It had on the one hand to propagate and organise the new faith, and on the other to fight against the forces which were antagonistic to it in the Jewish and Pagan world. The propagation of the faith was carried on at first by great personalities like Jesus, St. Paul, and the author of the fourth Gospel. When these commanding personalities disappeared, their place was taken, not by others, but by a flexible and compact organisation—the Church—with the bishops at its head. The free and unfettered spirit with which the Christian faith originally set out upon its mission had ultimately to take refuge within the borders of a church. It had to submit to all the limitations which such a step involved; such as a rule of faith, an ecclesiastical order, a professional clergy, a strict system of discipline. It had to sacrifice its spontaneity and much of its liberty in order that it might live. This sacrifice enabled the Christian faith to overcome the forces opposed to it in ancient society. Its first, and perhaps its bitterest, foe was Judaism. It succeeded in beating down the hostility of the mother from whose bosom it had sprung; but it only did this by making concessions to the older faith and allowing many Jewish conceptions to find a home within the church. It overcame the insidious and subverting atmosphere of Greek speculation. But it has ever since borne the marks of this great crisis. Mere orthodoxy has been made the test of faith; and a religion which in its essence and its power is a spirit and a life has been compelled to adopt the barren intellectualism of a creed. The greatest outward triumph of the Christian religion was when it finally forced its way to the front as the religion of imperial Rome. But it had to pay the price of this pre-eminence by permitting the spirit of Caesarism to enter into its vitals and dominate its outward life. When Christianity emerges into the light at the end of the third century as the official religion of the empire, with its hierarchy, its worship, and its creeds, we see at once that it has been living among strangers; it has lost the primitive simplicity of its early years.

Professor Gwatkin's learned volumes help us to understand how this great transformation took place. He frankly tells us that he does not think history can be written without a subjective bias. He starts from the pre-suppositions of what may be described as liberal orthodoxy. To all who are in sympathy with this point of view, Dr. Gwatkin's history of the Christian Church in the first three centuries is a work which ought to be read.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON.*

THE late Sir Wilfrid Lawson did not die without leaving a fairly ample personal record of his political life and opinions, and under Mr. George Russell's skilful touch this collection of personal memoranda loses nothing of its proper effect. But the best thing about Sir Wilfrid was, after all, his personality, and that delightful essence distils but faintly from the written page, however faithful the hand that set it there. Sir Wilfrid's character was always pure gold; and it was never tried by office, by dignities, by any one of the commoner allurements of politics. It was joined to a most simple and modest demeanor, to perfect temper and courtliness, and to a zeal for the good of mankind into whose pious zeal no note of self or even of vanity entered.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson entered Parliament in 1859 in company with his uncle, Sir James Graham, to whose character and opinions, it may be remarked, he bore not a shadow of likeness. He entered it as an independent Radical, a Nationalist, a friend of peace, a "Little Englander," and a temperance reformer on lines of "total abstinence," then an unfamiliar and highly unpopular social habit. All these banners he carried through the succeeding Parliaments, not one of which, save perhaps the last, was entirely to his mind. Neither personal friendship, nor political ties, nor

* Sir Wilfrid Lawson. A Memoir. Edited by the Right Hon. George W. E. Russell. Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d. net.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.THE MEDICI.

By Colonel G. F. YOUNG, C.B. Illustrated. 2 vols. 36s. net

This is the most elaborate and complete account of the Medici family which has yet been written, and treats of them from their rise in 1400 to their end in 1745. In their time they played many important parts, and the narrative of their history makes a book which not only the reading public, but students, will be anxious to read.

The CORRESPONDENCE OF PRISCILLA COUNTESS OF WESTMORLAND.

Edited by her Daughter, Lady ROSE WEIGALL. With Portraits. Demy 8vo. 14s. net.

THE RISE OF LOUIS NAPOLEON.

By F. A. SIMPSON, M.A., Formerly Exhibitioner of Queen's College, Oxford. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. net.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE CHIEF CAMPAIGNS IN EUROPE SINCE 1792.

By General A. VON HORSETZKY, G.O.C., the 1st Austro-Hungarian Army Corps. Translated by Lieutenant K. B. FERGUSON, R.G.A., Maps. 18s. net.

THE GREAT WALL OF CHINA.

By Dr. W. E. GEIL. Illustrated. 21s. net.

New 6s. Novels.

DIAMOND CUT PASTE
WITH THE MERRY AUSTRIANS VALLEY OF THE KINGS
THE FLORENTINE FRAME
THE HAVEN
TENANTS OF PIXY FARM
NAMELESS
IN THE SHADE

By A. and E. Castle
By Amy McLaren
By Marmaduke Pickthall
By Elizabeth Robins
By Eden Phillpotts
By Maude Goldring
By the Hon Mrs. W. Forbes
By Valentina Hawtrey

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, London, W.

Messrs. CONSTABLE & Co.THE LIFE OF RICHARD BRINSLEY SHERIDAN

By WALTER SICHEL, Author of "Emma, Lady Hamilton." In Two volumes. Fully Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 31s. 6d. net.

HOGARTH'S LONDON

By H. B. WHEATLEY, F.S.A. Profusely Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

THE GIRLHOOD OF QUEEN ELIZABETH

A Narrative in Contemporary Letters.

By F. A. MUMBY. With an Introduction by R. S. RAIT, M.A. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

LONDON LIFE OF YESTERDAY

By ARTHUR COMPTON-RICKETT, M.A., LL.D. (Cantab). Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE BOOK OF CUPID

Being an Anthology from the English Poets.

With an Introduction by HENRY NEWBOLT, and 25 Illustrations by The Lady HYLTON. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

CERES' RUNAWAY AND OTHER ESSAYS

By ALICE MEYNELL. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

BRITAIN AT BAY

By SPENSER WILKINSON. 6s. net.

THE TWO MOST BEAUTIFUL BOOKS OF THE SEASON.THE DESERTED VILLAGE

By OLIVER GOLDSMITH. With 40 Full-page Plates in Colour and numerous Drawings in the Text, by W. LEE HANKEY. 4to, cloth, 15s. net. Edition de Luxe, limited to 250 Copies, 42s. net.

MR. RACKHAM'S MASTERPIECE.THE FAIRY TALES OF THE BROTHERS GRIMMWith 40 Full-page Plates in Colour and 70 Drawings in the Text by ARTHUR RACKHAM. 4to, cloth, 15s. net. "The best of Mr. Rackham's work."—Westminster Gazette.Miss SILBERRAD'S NEW NOVEL.*ORDINARY PEOPLE

By UNA L. SILBERRAD. 6s.

CONSTABLE & CO LTD London WC

Macmillan's New Books.Indian Speeches, 1907-1909,

BY

Viscount Morley.

Demy 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

[Nov. 26.]

Col. Patterson's New Book.In the Grip of the Nyika.

Further Adventures in British East Africa. By LIEUT.-COLONEL J. H. PATTERSON, D.S.O., Author of "The Man-Eaters of Tsavo." With Illustrations, 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [Tuesday.]

Lord Kelvin's Early Home.

Being the Recollections of his Sister, the late Mrs. Elizabeth King, together with some Family Letters and a supplementary Chapter by the Editor, ELIZABETH THOMSON KING. With Illustrations, 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

Essays on Greek Literature.

By R. Y. TYRRELL, Litt.D., D.C.L., LL.D., &c. Crown 8vo, 4s. net.

The Acharnians of Aristophanes.

With Introduction, English Prose Translation, Critical Notes, and Commentary. By W. J. M. STARKIE, M.A. 8vo, 10s. net. [Classical Library.]

Sophocles in English Verse.

Part I. Oedipus the King Oedipus at Kolonus Antigone. By ARTHUR S. WAY, D.Lit. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

New 6s. Novels.The Education of Uncle Paul.

Algernon Blackwood,

Author of "Jimbo," etc.

The story of the inner life of an imaginative and mystical man of mature years, who is led by a little child to "find" himself.

Robert Emmet. An Historical Romance.

Stephen Gwynn.

Daily Telegraph.—"Mr. Stephen Gwynn is to be congratulated on a fine piece of work; the writing is excellent, the emotion is never forced, and the situations are led up to and described with an ease and force which prove him a master of romance."

Seventh Edition. Just Published.

A Handbook of Public International Law.

By T. J. LAWRENCE, M.A., LL.D. Globe 8vo, 3s.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

"THE THRUSH,"A MONTHLY PERIODICAL FOR THE PUBLICATION OF ORIGINAL POETRY and LITERARY ARTICLES.

The following are among the Contributors to the December Number:—

Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch (Q.); Mr. A. C. Benson; Mr. Norman Gale; the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, LL.D.; Mr. Alfred Percival Graves; Mr. Walter De La Mare; Mr. Gerald Gould; Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer (Editor of "English Review"); Mr. Fitzgerald Marriott, F.R.G.S.; Mr. Allen Upward; Lady Lindsay; Miss Constance Sutcliffe; Miss Ethel Clifford (Mrs. Wentworth Dilke).

Price ONE SHILLING net.—12/- per annum Post Free.

Publishers: Messrs. Chapman & Hall.

the counsels and passions of the hour, were able to turn him by a hair's breadth from the pursuit of one of them. In the process he not only came in collision with all the Tory Governments of his time, but with most of the intervening Liberal Administrations—with Disraeli on the Jingoism of the seventies, with Gladstone on Egypt and on Ireland, with the Liberal Imperialists on the Transvaal, with Palmerston on everything. A statesman he would not allow himself to be called; and he once thanked Heaven that, among all the bad names people had called him, they had "never called him that." But Lawson was a true father of modern Radicalism. Its later economic leanings were unfamiliar to him; and, Garibaldian as he was, he opposed even humanitarian intervention in foreign politics. A clergyman who had gone "fanti" over the Ashanti War had expressed his delight that we were attacking a "stronghold of Satan." "If we were to attack all the strongholds of Satan," said Lawson in a sentence which made even the saturnine Disraeli laugh aloud, "we should require Supplementary Estimates." But the uprightness of Lawson's judgment and his inflexible political morals made him an almost perfect representative of Cobdenism—that is to say, of Cobdenism lit up with moral fervor. "A democrat" he called himself, with justice, though his editor remarks, with some shrewdness, that Lawson's formula of letting the people manage their own affairs in their own way did not work out perfectly in its application to the Permissive Bill. Lawson hated the drink trade, and his earnestness and insight made him a great leader in a moral crusade. There came a point in the Alliance propaganda when other qualities were needed, which it was not in Lawson's nature to supply. It is easy to understand that such a man, with his exquisite humility and unselfish sweetness of bearing, was adored in his family circle, and that even his Tory neighbors in Cumberland liked the squire of Brayton, who rode straight in the hunting-field as well as in politics. Chivalry is not quite a good enough word to use of such a personality as Lawson's; but, at least, it brings his high courage and gentle grace to the remembrance of those who knew and loved him.

ROBERT EMMET.*

STORIES of "execrable rebellions" and "horrid conspiracies" on the part of the "ill-affected Irish and their barbarous and inhumane leaders" were wont to be pleasing to law-abiding English citizens, and we trust that Mr. Stephen Gwynn's historical romance of Robert Emmet's rash project to seize Dublin Castle in 1803, will prove no exception. Luckily, times have changed, and it is possible for so good a Home Ruler as Mr. Gwynn to draw a sympathetic picture of Emmet's character and conduct without his readers questioning his motives or challenging seriously his verdict. Emmet's plot was, in truth, an ill-timed, unhappy affair, and, luckily for Ireland, its complete failure spelt disaster only for its begetter and for a few of his associates. Just as when a forest fire has been stamped out we find some outlying patch flaring up unexpectedly, so this isolated conspiracy was an offshoot of the serious conflagration of '98. The story is an interesting one presenting some curious features, and Mr. Gwynn has handled it with equal insight and impartiality.

The estimable Sir John Temple, Master of the Rolls, in his famous, discreditable "History of the Irish Rebellion of 1641," expressed his astonishment that such a "mischievous plot should, without any noise, be brought to such maturity, as to arrive at the very point of execution, without any notice or intimation given . . . before the very evening before the day on which it was generally to be put into execution." History repeated itself in 1803, and Mr. Stephen Gwynn quotes in his Notes a passage from a contemporary memoir of an officer of the 32nd Infantry: "Miss Wolfe . . . fled to the Castle, and made her way to the Secretary, to whom she gave the first intimation of the breaking out of the insurrection that had been received there. All who heard her laughed at the statement; one said that she was mad, another that she was in love; but a sudden rush through the gates by the 62nd Regiment put an end to their unseasonable jesting." Sir Richard Temple, a century and a-half before, had remarked: "I have observed, in the nature of the Irish, such a kind of dull and deep reservedness as makes them, with much silence and secrecy, to carry on their business," and Mr. Gwynn, in illustration of the fact that Emmet's extensive preparations were carried on unsuspected for four or five months, under the noses of the Castle authorities, and that "of all the prisoners not one would consent to identify him or bear witness against Emmet," makes Hope, a historical character, say: "Have I not always told you that in Ireland you will never be betrayed by the poor? I can remember thirty years of trouble in this country, but, north or south, I never knew a poor man turn traitor yet. . . . It is the man who has been brought up in comfort and luxury who tries to save his wealth when the danger comes near him."

Impracticable and hare-brained as Emmet's project has hitherto appeared in history, Mr. Gwynn makes it clear that it was the defection of the Wicklow and Kildare men, at the eleventh hour, which prevented a serious rising, and the mere accident of a street brawl which shattered the plan whereby Miles Byrne and his Wexford men could have seized, without hindrance, the unguarded Castle. And lucky it was that these several sections failed to act in concert, for in the light of Emmet's own experience Dublin could have known only a night of street butcheries, incendiaryism, and pillaging, and the recapture of the Castle, in a few hours, by the three thousand soldiers barracked in the city. The central point of interest in this abortive rising is the temperament of the ardent and sanguine enthusiast whose coolness and composure never seems to have deserted him in the face of fast multiplying dangers and insurmountable difficulties. Had Napoleon made any serious effort to land in Ireland at this juncture, there is small doubt but that Emmet would have played a most important part in Irish history. But he stood at the crisis alone, and, thereby, his epitaph, a patriot's, is all the more touching.

In his twenty-nine short chapters Mr. Gwynn has constructed a very lifelike picture of Dublin society of Emmet's day, and of the special circles affected by his plot. We see this slight, delicate young man, with "the concentrated gaze of a student," interviewing the Dublin mechanics, Quigley and Hope, and the ex-French officer, William Hamilton, in a chamber in the White Bull inn in Thomas Street. We see him renting a couple of secluded storehouses, enclosed by high walls, in quiet lanes off Thomas Street, fitting them up with a powder mill for the manufacture of hand grenades and rockets, and introducing friendly artisans, old "United Irishmen," and his intimate friends who there turned out "pikes by the hundred." We hear the conversations spread over a period of four months, between the enthusiast, his friend Russell, the emissary from France, Allen, Dowdall, and Byrne (all three of whom eventually escaped to France and distinguished themselves by their gallantry in the Irish Brigade), Grey and Cloney, "the heads of the organisation in the country," and we watch the spread of the organisation, till it is suddenly checked by the powder explosion in the house in Patrick Street. This dramatic episode is admirably handled by the author in Chapters XI.-XIV., and the reader can only hold his breath while the conspirators make their journeys to and fro, carrying away the stores of pikes, blunderbusses, pistols, and cartridges, while expecting the arrival of the police officers at every instant. Mr. Gwynn has fortified his narrative with some effective chapters on the romantic love passion between Emmet and Sarah Curran, the daughter of the great orator. He has introduced Curran's friend, MacNally, into the plot, the famous Nationalist advocate, who, while defending the United Irishmen in court, was betraying them all the time to the Government. This sinister figure, whose infamy has only been revealed of late years by the publication of the Castle archives, is also handled by Mr. Gwynn with marked success, the scenes in which he is seen worming out the secret of Emmet's hiding-place from the distraught girl being almost the only ones, we gather, for which there is no definite historical basis. The freshness and variety of the "romance" are undeniably heightened by the enforced shifting of the scene from the Dublin lanes and alleys to the prison and the dock. The account of the fiasco of the rising on the 23rd of July, of the refusal of the ignorant and inflamed Dublin rabble to follow poor Emmet

*"Robert Emmet." A Historical Romance. By Stephen Gwynn. Macmillan. 6s.

THE PRINCIPLES OF THE BUDGET

The Industrial System

AN ENQUIRY INTO EARNED AND UNEARNED INCOME

By J. A. MOBSON

Author of "The Evolution of Modern Capitalism," etc.

8vo. Price 7s. 6d. net. (Inland postage 5d.)

"If Mr. Hobson's work on the industrial system is a profound justification of the principles of the Budget, it contains in it the germ not of this Budget only, but of a series, and, indeed, of a scheme of social reform connected through the medium of finance with the first principles of economic theory."—The Nation.

"Mr. Hobson has given us, at the precise moment when it is needed, a book which is bound to stimulate thought upon a number of co-related problems."—The Westminster Gazette.

"Mr. Hobson is well informed, lucid, logical, and as dispassionate as a perceptible, though not obtrusive bias will permit. More than all, he is an independent observer and thinker of no mean power; and those qualities are conspicuous in the present volume which is at the same time the most important contribution he has yet made to economic literature, and the most systematic of various recent attempts to examine the economic framework of society and get at the real principles on which its stability depends."—The Times.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 39, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

THE ARCADIAN CALENDAR FOR 1910.

Invented by VERNON HILL. A Series of 12 Designs descriptive of the Months, together with a Cover and Title-page. Folio 8½ by 12 in. 3s. 6d. net.

VERNON HILL: A New Artist.

It is safe to assert that since the meteoric appearance of Aubrey Beardsley no new genius has appeared in the realm of black and white art whose work is so original, so daring, so decorative, so grotesque, and yet so poetic, as that of Vernon Hill. A youth only just past his teens, his inventions have the eternal quality of beauty, his imagination is so rich, so astonishing in its originality, and he is, besides, so gifted with rare humour, that his work defies comparison with anything known to us. Quaintly and delicately done, too, are the prose poems that accompany the pictures. In their own way, they are hardly less fantastic. Lovers of art will, however, within a few days, be given the opportunity, on the publication of "The Arcadian Calendar," of judging for themselves of the justice of this announcement.

THE ARCADIAN CALENDAR FOR 1910.

Invented by VERNON HILL. A Series of 12 Designs descriptive of the Months, together with a Cover and Title-page. Folio, 8½ by 12 in. 3s. 6d. net.

JOHN LANE, The Bodley Head VIGO ST., W.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,

LISTS SENT POST FREE. 53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

The 1s. Illustrated Bible, 1s. 3d. post free. The Red Letter Bible, from 5s. 4d.
The Indexed Salvation New Testament, 1s. 6d. post free. [post free]
The Red Letter New Testament, 1s., 1s. 6d. post free.
The Sunday School Prize Bible, with Coloured Illustration, 1s. 6d. post free.
Wide Margin Reference Bibles, from 3s. 9d. post free.
The Self-Explanatory Teachers' Bible, 12s. 6d., 15s., and 21s. post free.

PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS

Catalogue No. 367. Just Out.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, LTD.,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

Also a Useful and Comprehensive Catalogue of Current General Literature, Fiction, Science, Art, &c.

RILEY'S BILLIARD TABLES

Social amenities make necessary the entertainment of your friends. To entertain them successfully is not always easy. And nothing disheartens a host more than a slow evening. The evenings will always be a delight if you have a Billiard Table in the house. An adjournment to the Billiard Room is always welcomed.

RILEY'S COMBINED DINING AND BILLIARD TABLES

will be found most convenient where space is limited. Are made in all sizes. Fitted with Riley's patent automatic action, enabling the table to be converted from Dining to Billiard Table and vice versa in less than a minute. A handsome piece of furniture and a perfect billiard table.

Prices from £13 10s. CASH OR EASY PAYMENTS.

Riley's Standard Tables

(as used in the Championship matches).

These tables are designed on most artistic lines, and built of the finest materials in the best possible manner. They are fitted with low frost-proof cushions, patent pockets, and are fully warranted for ten years. Prices from 55 guineas upwards.

FREE On receipt of postcard, full detailed Illustrated Catalogue of Billiard and Dining Tables, and small or full sized tables and sundries.

E. J. RILEY, LTD. Willow Bank Works, ACCRINGTON.

London Showrooms: 147, ALDERSGATE STREET, E.C.

RILEY'S Billiard Tables.

"THE TRUE WAY OF LIFE."

By EDWARD GRUBB, M.A.

The BISHOP OF HEREFORD writes in a Foreword to the book:—

"We welcome the arguments set forth in this volume. We feel that the writer is doing the best national and international service, that he is in the direct line of those great preachers of national righteousness, the Hebrew Prophets, and we believe that his preaching of the true way of national and international relationships, as herein set forth, is destined to prevail, and that the time is coming when every monarch, statesman or diplomatist of good repute and all responsible leaders of public opinion will recognise that every nation or state or government is a morally responsible person; and that all governments claiming to be civilised should hold each other amenable to the universal moral law of veracity and fair dealing."

All the Profits on this book will be devoted to the furtherance of Anglo-German Friendship. To be obtained of all booksellers.

Price 1s. net. Post free 1s. 2d.

Headley Brothers, 14 Bishopgate Without, London, E.C.

who marched, clad in his green coat, white pantaloons, and high black boots, at the head of only fourteen associates, to within a hundred yards of the Castle gates, while the mob behind him was dragging "the humanest judge in Ireland from his coach and piking him to death," is extremely vivid. The last chapters supply the key to Emmet's character. His chivalrous conduct towards all his friends and companions, his resolution to go through with his "rising," "for the honor of ourselves and for the honor of Ireland," when his cooler-headed companions held back, his touching, misplaced confidence in the Castle officials, and in the turnkey, Dunn, who cheated his hopes of escape from gaol, and his manly and unshaken demeanor in court, when he abashed Lord Norbury, the "placeman," with a death speech that will always live in Irish oratory, all reveal that his nature was that of a singularly pure, high-souled idealist.

The only criticism we have to offer is that Emmet, in certain passages, talks too like a book, and that the tone of the conversations between Curran and MacNally is over modern. Mr. Gwynn, however, has done so well in this nervous and tersely written narrative that we trust he may find another opportunity before long to give us a new Irish historical novel.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning, Nov. 12.	Price Friday morning, Nov. 19.
Consols 2½ per cent.	82½	82½
German Threes	82½	83
Spanish Fours	94½	94½
Buenos Ayres Pacific	90	85½
Steel Common	91½	93

ON Wednesday morning the Stock Exchange politicians (the Tories, I mean) looked for a little boom as a result of the publication of the Lansdowne amendment and the prospect of the Budget being cast out. To their dismay, the serious members and the outside public took a different view. A disturbance of the money market and of public credit (to say nothing of the turmoil and expense of a General Election) is not regarded with equanimity by City interests. The opinion of Lord Welby, as an ex-Treasury official, with regard to the possible extent of the deficiency, carries weight, and Lord Swaythling's reasons for fearing difficulties in the money market cannot be treated with contempt. He is one of the cleverest and most experienced bankers in the City, and feels sure that if heavy borrowing should become necessary, and importers should be able to bring in any quantity of tea, the dearth of money would be very great. However, the City thinks it will muddle through, and that, somehow or other, the duties will continue to be collected, whether they are legal or not. I cannot help thinking that this will prove to be the case; for if the Resolutions have been good so far, they ought to be good enough to tide over the interregnum. But the shadow of a General Election, with all its distractions and expenses, has fallen over the Stock Exchange, and not even Thursday's Bank Return could dispel the gloom. The Kaffir market is particularly sad, and there is talk of failures. I should add that the Bank Return (with a five per cent. rate) showed a great increase in the reserve, which stands nearly as high as it did at this time last year, when the rate was only 2½ per cent. ! Meantime, the improvement of trade goes on, and the last Board of Trade returns of unemployment are the most favorable for a long time past. This is distinctly fortunate for the Government, though the cotton shortage is distinctly unfortunate. Cotton factories are on short time in all parts of the world, including Lancashire; but no one can find out whether the supposed shortage is, or is not, an American "fake." The Indian crop this year is nearly half the American crop, and India is remarkably prosperous in consequence. There is certainly every prospect of a boom year in India.

THE MEANING OF CAPITAL EXPORTS.

A correspondent has called my attention to a speech made at Dover by Mr. Wyndham on his favorite subject of the export of British capital. Mr. Wyndham, as we know, regards money lent to the foreigner or to the colonial as money lost, and believes that to finance your neighbors is not merely derogatory, but ruinous. Now Mr. Wyndham is perfectly entitled to his opinion on this point, though he is not likely to get much sympathy from financiers in the City; but he is not entitled to go round quoting figures without giving his authority or to draw conclusions from them that they will not properly bear. He says:—

"We have had a Budget. In the first nine months of this year the money put up for abroad was 132 millions; for home 16 millions. How can you get on in England if the money put up here is 16 millions? How much of that 16 millions was for manufactures? A little over two millions. (Sensation.) Do that and you are doomed to die as a nation."

This is in Mr. Wyndham's happiest style; but where does he get his figures from? He does not acknowledge their source, but apparently they come from the pages of the "Economist," which published a nine months' statement at the beginning of October. Incidentally Mr. Wyndham has embroidered the statistics before reproducing them, and where he gets his statement about only two millions being "put up" for manufactures, I do not know. It certainly does not come from the "Economist." The broad figures of the "Economist" were as follows:—

United Kingdom	£16,277,500
British Possessions	£64,767,100
Foreign countries	£67,723,400

Thus Mr. Wyndham, Imperialist that he is, claps together without distinction the money "put up" for the colonies and the money "put up" for abroad, from which we are forced to conclude that he objects as strongly to developing the Empire with British money as to developing foreign countries.

But what does Mr. Wyndham mean by that curious phrase—borrowed, I imagine, from the vocabulary of the cock-pit—"put up"? If it has any meaning it must mean "put into," or applied to certain purposes, and no doubt the speaker meant his audience to understand that his figures represent all the money applied to English industry. Of course, they represent nothing of the kind. They are taken from published prospectuses, prospectuses advertised in the Press and submitted to the general investor. They do not, and cannot, include capital put into industry by private capitalists on their own account. Nothing but a public transaction figures in these calculations, and so they do not pretend to tell the whole story. And this is a most important qualification, because English industry is financed—as the industries of newer countries are not—by private rather than by public subscription. For example, in the last few years enormous additions have been made to the cotton mills of Lancashire, and it is scarcely an exaggeration to say that the industry has been renovated. But it has all been done privately. There has been, so far as I know, no public offer of shares; all the re-building and re-machining has been done without the addition of £1,000 to the figures of capital applications. On the other hand, the development of Canada, Argentina, Mexico, and Brazil, the greatest foreign borrowers and the great builders of railways, is dependent mainly on joint stock companies and on public subscription.

LUCELLUM.

EVANS'

ANTISEPTIC THROAT PASTILLES

FOR YOUR THROAT AND VOICE.

These Pastilles have a world-wide reputation for their wonderfully soothing and beneficial effects in all Throat troubles.

Should you suffer from Loss of Voice, Hoarseness, Weakness, Irritation and Inflammation of the Vocal Organs, then give Evans' Antiseptic Throat Pastilles a trial. You will be delighted with the result. Give certain relief.

PREPARED TO A FORMULA OF THE LIVERPOOL THROAT HOSPITAL.

Of all Chemists, Stores, &c., 1/- and 4/8 per box. Send 1d. stamp for sample box to Evans & Sons, Lescher & Webb, Ltd., Hanover St., Liverpool.

Ask for EVANS' Pastilles and refuse imitations.

Rowntree's Cocoa

The flavour of Rowntree's
Elect Cocoa is a flavour that is remembered.
It lingers on the palate long after the delightfully fragrant beverage has been enjoyed.

Rowntree's Elect
Cocoa is delicious.

MAKERS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

Cycling

means cycling through rain sometimes—wet shoulders, wet knees, rain soaking into the shoes—wet through to the skin.

And then—a severe cold, or, worse still, rheumatism.

Next time you get wet, don't wait about. Take a

Mustard Bath,

a hot bath, to which have been added a couple of tablespoonfuls or so of

Colman's mustard

A simple thing to do—but well worth while.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.
In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

TANGYES

TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

*For Farm or Estate Work,
Country-House Lighting, &c.*

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.
SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.
REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

SOUTH PLACE INSTITUTE, E.C.

A Course of Four Lectures on

UNEMPLOYMENT

will be given on November 23rd and following Tuesdays, at 8 p.m., by

JOHN A. HOBSON, M.A.

(Author of "The Industrial System," &c.)

Particulars from Hon. Sec., 9, Clarence Road, Wood Green, N.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£12 12s. OPORTO, GIBRALTER, TANGIERS, ALGIERS,
PALERMO, February 15th.
£26 5s. PALESTINE, EGYPT, CONSTANTINOPLE, GREECE,
March 3rd.

Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

£7 7s. —SKI-ING, SKATING, TOBOGGANNING
TOURS, including Second-Class Return Ticket
and Accommodation Hotel Aubepine, Ballaigues. Also Hotels at Mantana, Villars. St. Beatenberg, Wengen, Lenzerheide, etc.—
Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, S.W.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School. G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Scholarship Examination in December.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

ST. GEORGE'S CLASSES, EDINBURGH.

(FOUNDED 1876)

TUITION BY CORRESPONDENCE.

Help and Direction for Home Students in Literature, Fine Art (Special Subject for 1909-10, "The National Gallery—Foreign Schools"), History, Geography, Philosophy, Languages, Science, &c.

The Classes, under the direction of an Honorary Committee of Ladies, are conducted by experienced tutors of high University attainment who work in direct communication with their students. Preparation for examinations. Fees from 12s. per term. Write for Prospectus to Secretary, St. George's Classes, Edinburgh.

SESAME HOUSE for Home-life Training and for Training of Children, Lady Nurses and Kindergarten. —For full particulars apply, the Principal Miss Emily Last, 43A, Acacia Road, London, N.W.

CO-EDUCATION.

SIDCOT SCHOOL, WINSOMBE, SOMERSET.

FOUNDED 1808.

80 BOYS. 64 GIRLS. Ages 11-18 years.

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

All particulars from Dr. BEVAN LEAN, Headmaster.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Healthy outdoor life, combined with thorough education on modern lines. Usual curriculum, including citizen-ship course, extension lectures &c. Preparation when required for University and other careers. Handicrafts, gardening, riding, nature study, archaeology, &c.

Principal: Miss AMY KEMP.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL.

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education, Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities.

Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

The Spring Term begins on January 18th.

For prospectus, etc., apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class, Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK.
K. M. ELLIS.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE,
SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

WHO WAS SWEDENBORG?

A Lecture on "EMANUEL SWEDENBORG: HIS LIFE AND CHARACTER."

will be sent FREE AND POST FREE to ALL applicants on their sending their names and addresses to the Secretary of the SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury-street, London, W.C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

Your Week End
Is Not Complete

WITHOUT

The Saturday
Westminster

(The Weekly Issue of "The Westminster Gazette.")

It is the only Weekly Magazine Review of the Kind.

"F.C.G.'s" Cartoons of the Week.

An Unique page of "Problems and Prizes,"

Book Reviews and Special Literary

Articles by the best known Writers.

ONE PENNY. Post 6/6 per annum (home), 8/8 (abroad).

Offices: Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash It

WILL BE REPLACED.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading,
Billiard and Smoking Rooms.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) Single from 3/6 to 6/0.

*Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.*

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill. E.C. : 70 & 71 Euston Square. W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN. Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence. 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR-YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL. Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL 120 rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCs.

CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE. 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone 3032 Royal, 3 wires

GRAPES HOTEL, Tarleton St. Snacks and Luncheons. Tel. 3074
Royal. G. Curta. Prop.

LLANDUDNO.

The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab. centre of Prom., facing sea

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).

ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.

RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant One Minute from Station

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish. Electric. Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons. Aft'noon Teas. Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s per day. Tel. 422.

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough. Prop

ALBERT HOTEL. Ordinary daily. Sunday Table d'Hôte. H. E. Taylor

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION
Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION
PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions
are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ... }	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages... ..	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0
Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:
13 Insertions	8d. per line.
52	6d. ..

THE INDEX TO VOLUME V. OF THE NATION

Is now ready, and can be obtained free
on application to the Manager.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

MELBA

An Authorized Biography by AGNES G. MURPHY. With Chapters by MADAME MELBA on The Art of Singing and on The Selection of Music as a Profession. Also an Introductory Note by J. A. FULLER

MAITLAND. With Photogravure Frontispiece, 37 Portraits, Views and Facsimiles, 16s. net.

THE FACE OF CHINA.

By E. G. KEMP, F.R.S.G.S. Travels in East, North, Central, and Western China. With some Account of the New Schools, Universities, and Missions, and the old Religious Sacred Places of Confucianism, Buddhism, and Taoism, and a Map of China. With 64 Illustrations after Water-Colours and Sepia Drawings by the Author, 20s. net; Large Paper, 42s. net.

The Scotsman says:—"Excellent use was made of her brush and pencil, as well as of her eyes and memory and the pages of her note-book."

The Morning Post says:—"A particularly well-illustrated book."

THE COLOUR OF ROME.

by OLAVE M. POTTER. With 60 Illustrations in Colours and Sepia by the Japanese Artist, YOSHIO MARKINO, who also contributes an Introductory Chapter. Fcap. 4to, 20s. net; Large Paper Parchment, 42s. net.

"Mr. Markino's illustrations—we have seen none to equal them . . . each is presented with such force and freshness that it is felt by the spectator as an experience of the scene itself. The combination of such clear, unspoiled eyesight with such a gift of execution is rare."—Nation.

NEW FLORENCE PRESS BOOKS.

Printed from a new fount of type specially designed by Mr. Herbert P. Horne after the finest examples of the Italian masters.

"A type that can hardly be praised too highly. It is entirely free from affectation or caprice, and, while delightful to the reading eye, loses nothing of character or distinction by its severe simplicity."—Times.

SONGS BEFORE SUNRISE. By Algernon Charles Swinburne.

English Edition limited to 500 copies on Hand-Made Paper, about 7½ in. by 9½ in., bound in paper boards, 26s. net; or in limp vellum, 36s. net. Also 10 Vellum Copies (all sold), bound in limp vellum, Ten Guineas net each. Applications for these copies should be made to the Booksellers.

THE LITTLE FLOWERS OF S. FRANCIS.

A newly revised and in parts Augmented Version of the Translation by Prof. T. W. ARNOLD. The Illustrations are reproduced in Colotype after the unique Drawings by an Unknown Hand contained in the MS. of the "Floretti" and "Life" preserved in the Laurentian Library. The Edition is limited to 500 copies on Hand-Made Paper, size about 9 in. by 11 in., bound in paper boards, 30s. net; or in limp vellum, 42s. net. Also 10 Vellum Copies (all sold), bound in limp vellum, Eight Guineas net each. Applications for these copies should be made to the Booksellers.

STORIES OF THE FRENCH ARTISTS, FROM CLOUET TO INGRES.

Drawn from Contemporary Records. Collected and Arranged by P. M. TURNER and C. H. COLLINS BAKER. With 8 Coloured Plates and 24 in Half-Tone. Cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net; Edition de Luxe, with 5 additional Plates, crown 4to, 15s. net.

THE CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE.

Translated by Dr. E. B. PUSEY. Edited by TEMPLE SCOTT. With an Introduction by Mrs. MEYNELL. Large crown 8vo, cloth, with 12 Plates in 4 Colours by MAXWELL ARMFIELD, 7s. 6d. net. Also an Edition de Luxe. Crown 4to, pure rag paper, with the Plates mounted, parchment, 15s. net; pigskin, with clasps, 25s. net.

NOTES ON THE SCIENCE OF PICTURE MAKING.

By C. J. HOLMES, M.A., Slade Professor of Fine Arts, University of Oxford. NEW EDITION REVISED. 7s. 6d. net.

THE PAINTERS OF VICENZA.

By TANCRED BORENIUS. With 15 Full-Page Plates. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

THE MIND OF THE ARTIST.

Thoughts and Sayings of Artists on their Art. Collected and arranged by Mrs. LAURENCE BINYON. With 8 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

THE MASTER OF GAME.

The Oldest English Book on Hunting. By EDWARD SECOND DUKE OF YORK. Edited by W. A. and F. BAILLIE-GROHMAN. With Introduction by THEODORE ROOSEVELT. Photogravure Frontispiece and 24 Full-Page Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net; parchment, 10s. 6d. net.

EPISTOLÆ OBSCURORUM VIRORUM (1515-1517).

The Latin Text of the Editiones Principes, with an English rendering, Copious Notes, and an Historical Introduction by FRANCIS GRIFFIN STOKES. English Edition limited to 500 numbered copies. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and Facsimile Title-Page. Royal 8vo, buckram, 25s. net.

NEW 6/- NOVELS

THE UNLUCKY MARK. (2nd imp.).
THE KNIGHT OF THE GOLDEN SWORD.
INFLUENCES.
KING HAL—of Heronsea.
THE SON OF MARY BETHEL.
PLAIN BROWN.

By F. E. PENNY.
By MICHAEL BARRINGTON.
By PAUL METHVEN.
By W. WILLMOTT DIXON.
By ELSA BARKER.
By COSMO HAMILTON.

THE RAINBOW BOOK.

By Mrs. M. H. SPIELMANN. With Coloured Frontispiece and 15 Illustrations by ARTHUR RACKHAM, A.R.W.S., and 21 in Black and White by many other well-known Artists. 5s. net.

THE ROSE AND THE RING.

By W. M. THACKERAY. With Coloured Frontispiece, 44 Illustrations (12 in Two Tints), and Decorative End-Papers by GORDON BROWNE. 3s. 6d. net.

THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH.

By CHARLES READE. With 20 Full-Page Four-Colour Plates after Water-Colours, and 10 after Drawings in Line, Title-Page, Cover Design, and End-Papers by BYAM SHAW, R.I. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 12s. 6d.; parchment, 16s. net.

TRAVELS WITH A DONKEY.

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. Newly set in special large type, with 12 Full-Page Reproductions from Water-Colours, and 12 Facsimile Drawings, by NOEL ROOKE. 7s. 6d. net; parchment, 10s. 6d. net.

THE RUSSIAN BASTILLE (the Fortress of Schluesselburg).

By I. P. YOVATSHEV. Translated by Dr. A. S. RAPPO-PORT, Author of "The Curse of the Romanovs." Demy 8vo, cloth, with 16 Plates, 7s. 6d. net.

ASTRONOMICAL CURIOSITIES.

By J. ELLARD-GORE, Author of "Studies in Astronomy," and Editor of "Flammariion's Astronomy." With 2 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

THE POWDER-PUFF: A Ladies' Breviary.

By FRANZ BLEI. Authorised Translation. Small crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

Essays on Love, Modesty, Mothers, A Law of Fashion, The Moral Illusion, The Kingdom of Heaven, The Symbol of Orpheus, The Jealousy of Men, The Adventuress Chastity, Veils, &c.

JOHN THORNDYKE'S CASES.

Related by CHRISTOPHER JERVIS, M.D., and Edited by R. AUSTIN FREEMAN, Author of "The Golden Pool," &c. With 6 Full-Page Illustrations by H. M. BROCK. 3s. 6d. net.

London : CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 9.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1909.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	349	The Second Appeal to Esau. By Professor G. M. Minchin	368
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		Stanley, Emin, and Living- stone. By A. Werner	369
"It Never Can Happen Again" 352		Pragmatism. By A. E. Y. and James Elroy Flecker	369
The Issues Before the People 353		The Ultimate Basis of Authority. By Bernard Houghton and M. A.	369
The Case of Finland ... 355		More Economics. By Tripos	370
The Great Days of 1832 ... 357		Charles Kingsley and Women's Suffrage. By G. A. Seebohm	370
ANOTHER PSYCHOLOGICAL MOMENT. By H. W. M.	358	POETRY:—
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		To Them that Darken Counsel. By Guy Kendall	370
A Revolution of the Rich ... 359		THE WORLD OF BOOKS ...	371
The Best of Three Worlds ... 360		REVIEWS:—
The Charm of Old Music ... 361		Professor Firth's Continuation of Gardiner. By G. M. Trevelyan	373
Broken Slumber ... 362		The Complete Story-Teller ... 373
SHORT STUDIES:—		Idealism and Life. By Pro- fessor L. T. Hobhouse	374
In a Little Town. By Anton Tchekov. Translated by Constance Garnett	363	Shelley for the Middle-Aged ... 375
COMMUNICATIONS:—		Cambridge Biblical Essays ... 375
The Character of the Indian Police. By Frederic Mackar- ness, M.P.	365	Success and Half-Success ... 376
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
How to Deal with the Lords. By Arthur Chamberlain	366	Life and Times of Bishop Challoner	378
Making the Foreigner Pay. By Rowland Hunt, M.P., and Inquirer	366	The Incomparable Siddons ... 378
The Crisis and Women's Suffrage. By Brougham Villiers	368	A Beau Sabreur—Maurice de Saxe	378
House of Commons Can- didates. By I. L. P.	368	Dean Lefroy	380
		THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By Lucellum	380

The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

LORD LANSDOWNE moved his resolution in the House of Lords on Monday in a speech of some cleverness, but much levity. He brushed the Constitutional arguments lightly aside, saying that in any case the struggle between the two Houses had "got to come," and "we" must ask "ourselves" whether "we" shall stand better or worse if it be shirked to-day. He thought that no serious financial deadlock would occur, unless the Government wanted to bring it about, but admitted that rejection might mean "temporary chaos," and handsomely offered the Government help to mitigate any inconvenience that might arise. Was the Budget so "perishable" that it could not keep six weeks? But in any case temporary chaos was better than the permanent chaos which the Budget would produce. He criticised all the taxes, just as if he were in the House of Commons—the super-tax, death duties, land taxes, licensing taxes—as bad and penalising, and hinted that the Licensing Bill and the Land Taxation Bill had been "tacked" on to the Budget without, however, moving to omit them as "foreign" matter.

* * *

THE speech, quiet in tone, but thoroughly revolutionary in matter, was answered by the Lord Chancellor with great directness. Legally, the House of Lords could reject the Budget; constitutionally, so long as we were governed by custom and usage, it could not. Nothing in the Budget was "tacked." Without valuation not a shilling of the land taxes could be collected, and the licensing clauses merely changed the incidence or increased the burden of existing taxes. The Money Bills which the Lords had rejected were merely the old-fashioned omnibus Bills, but to throw out the Budget was a direct invasion both of the prerogative of the Crown and of the privileges of the Commons.

* * *

THE Lord Chancellor defined the Constitutional position in the following impressive words:—

The power in this country is divided between King, Lords, and Commons. To the Crown belongs the supreme authority over all, checked by the doctrine of Ministerial responsibility, and by the power of the House of Commons to refuse supply. To the House of Commons belongs the control over the purse, and therefore the control over Ministers of the Crown, checked by the power of the prerogative of dissolution residing in the Crown. To the Lords belongs the supreme jurisdiction in the administration of justice—surely of itself a noble attribute—together with a full share in all legislation except finance. There is no check on this House, except the creation of peers. Such is the ancient and famous balance of power known to our Constitution, the envy of other nations, which your lordships are now being invited to overthrow.

LORD LOREBURN concluded that, as the result of the Lords' invasion of these rights, any future Liberal Government would ask for protection against them, a declaration echoed both by Lord Pentland and Lord Beauchamp, the latter of whom definitely declared, on behalf of the Government, that the Commons would never go on bended knees to the Peers to seek from them a new Budget or even a Bill of Indemnity. Both these speeches, delivered on Tuesday, and also the speech of Lord Russell, showed great strength and ability. Lord Russell's included a pointed criticism of Lord Revelstoke. The head of Baring's had ventured to doubt whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer understood the meaning of the word credit. Lord Russell retorted that this kind of City spirit hardly understood what was meant by social service and improvement.

* * *

THE only Constitutional point of any substance made by Lord Lansdowne was his quotation of an obiter dictum of Lord Spencer's in 1904, in which he declared that the Lords had the right to throw out a Money Bill. This nominal right has no doubt been just kept in verbal being by individual peers, though, as Lord Courtney says, if it is not dead, neither is it constitutionally alive. But the reference to the debate of 1904 shows how insincere is Lord Lansdowne's citation of it. Lord Spencer then used the phrase in form only to repudiate it in fact.
"I need hardly say," he added, "that I am not going to propose that the Finance Bill should be thrown out, but I do claim the right of the Lords to discuss a measure of this great importance." But in reality Lord Spencer's mild claim is less significant than Lord Lansdowne's practical repudiation of it. The circumstances were these. The first and second readings of the Budget of 1904 were set down in the Lords for the same day without giving the peers any notice. They protested vigorously, but their protests were resisted both by Lord Halsbury and by Lord Lansdowne, the former demanding the instant passage of the Bill (on July 29th) because on August 1st, one of the House of Commons's resolutions would determine. Lord Lansdowne insisted that the House could better debate finance on other Bills than on the Budget. That is to say, Lord Lansdowne would not risk "temporary chaos" for a day, much less for six weeks, and under the circumstances thought it ill-advised for the Lords even to discuss a Budget, to say nothing of rejecting it.

* * *

THE second day's debate, like the days that followed it, went badly for the amendment. Two formidable opponents appeared in Lord Cromer and Lord Lytton, representatives of the older and the younger schools of Conservatism. Both strongly opposed the Budget, Lord Cromer thinking it more unworkmanlike than unsound, and Lord Lytton disliking the class bias which he found in the land clauses and in the Chancellor's speeches. But both agreed in condemning the Lansdowne amendment. Lord Cromer thought the passionate faction fight which it would produce dangerous to the Empire, and certain to lead to a material change in the functions of the Second Chamber. Lord Lytton could not take the responsibility of refusing supplies on account of a Budget which was clearly popular. On the other hand, stalwarts like Lord Camperdown insisted that the House had nothing to do with "consequences," and that, by showing fight, it might gain rather than lose with its friends.

* * *

THIS "Balaclava" mood was severely damped down by Lord Rosebery on Wednesday night. His speech, brilliantly ironic in form, was divided between a recital of his Glasgow criticisms of the Budget and a sombre protest against the Lansdowne resolution. He still thought the Budget "crude and vindictive," and insisted that millions of money were leaving the country because of it, and that ships were hurrying across the Atlantic carrying bonds and stocks as ballast. But he feared that the wrong battle-ground had been chosen, that the stakes were too heavy, and that an unreformed hereditary House could not face the electorate. Some of the Lords were young, others had taken little part in public life. It would be better for most of the unknown Tory peers to retire and delegate 150 men to vote for them in the coming division. He trembled for the future power of the House of Lords, which was "the only remaining obstacle to Home Rule." Therefore he could not stake all his hopes of the future on the "tumultuous hazard of an election." Lord Milner, characteristically rejecting Lord Rosebery's policy, criticised the Budget less severely, and expressed complete confidence in his power to raise the whole of the deficit of thirteen millions by taxes on foreign imports.

* * *

A STILL heavier misfortune befell the stricken party on Thursday. Lord Balfour of Burleigh, a Unionist ex-Cabinet Minister of great power and steady courage of opinion, tore to shreds the constitutional basis of Lord Lansdowne's resolution, and prophetically warned his party of the fate that awaited them. The resolution attacked the old usage of the Constitution under which the House of Commons was supreme in the control of the Government of the day as well as of finance. A referendum on a Budget was impossible; if such an engine were set up, the control of the Commons would go, and the "most momentous change" ever effected in the Constitution would occur. The Lords were offending the deeper conservative instincts of the country, and it was fatal to associate the defence of the peers with an attack on the food of the people. If they won, their victory could only be temporary; if they lost, their credit and prestige were ended for ever. The speech had all the greater effect because Lord Balfour confessed a measured dislike of the Budget.

* * *

ANOTHER blow came from the Bishop of Hereford, who, disregarding the Primate's call to the Bishops to pass by (in strict accordance with historical precedent) on the other side, stoutly declared that it was their duty to plead for the "multitudinous poor." He supported the Budget because it was a "social welfare" Budget. Lord Lansdowne's resolution was purely revolutionary; whereas the Budget was a safeguard against revolution. If the Lords forced an appeal to the people, the answer would come back—"Never again in this country shall the fundamental liberties of the people be endangered by any privileged class." Later in the debate the Tory Lord Newton said that Lord Rosebery had pushed the peers to the brink of the precipice and then turned right-about-face. It remains to be said that the Liberal peers, the moderates included, have spoken with great ability and have stood like a rock for Constitutional right. The division takes place on Tuesday, and a great speech is expected from Lord Morley on Monday.

* * *

LORD REVELSTOKE is the head of Baring's, and his maiden speech against the Budget in the House of Lords aroused a good deal of interest. The language and form were quite good, but the substance was flimsy. That the head of a firm, whose main business it is, and long has been, to tempt English investors into foreign securities, should denounce this Government for driving capital abroad, is very strange. But the assertion, as Lord St. Davids showed in his thoroughly informed speech, is not founded on fact. The only figures available—those for capital issues in London—are against Lord Revelstoke. Then again, he tries to prove that the credit of the country has been shaken by this Administration, and refers to the fall in Consols and railway stocks. But the fall from 1897 or 1898 to 1905 under the late Government was heavier than the fall under the present Government, and it is absurd to talk about our credit being shattered when it is at least 25 per cent. better than that of Germany.

* * *

The main causes of the fall of Consols are, of course, three: (1) the Boer War; (2) the inclusion by Mr. Joseph Chamberlain of Colonial stocks in trustee securities, and (3) Mr. Wyndham's Irish Land Act. Lord Avebury's speech was worse than Lord Revelstoke's, for he made a good many of the usual "Avebury" howlers. Lord St. Davids showed how in the case of Argentina an investment of English capital is followed by large exports of English manufactures. Lord Milner admitted that exports of capital are normally proofs of prosperity—superfluous savings. But apparently when a Liberal Government is in office it must be presumed that home industries are being starved! The countries which "welcome" our capital and, of course, pay through the nose for it are not the richest but the poorest countries in the world.

* * *

OUTSIDE Parliament the most important speech has been made by Sir Edward Grey, the great Liberal Moderate, who insisted that the country was in the presence of a revolution, that the Lords had put back the clock, and that their breach of Constitutional practice was "a gambler's throw," and a direct attack on the privileges of the House of Commons. If the Liberals won, the Lords would have to accept "fair and reasonable means" for making the established opinion of the House of Commons prevail.

THE French Chamber is still occupied with a difficult Budget and unpopular taxation. M. Jaurès, in a brilliant oratorical effort, traced the deficits from which every European Power now suffers primarily to the "latent but chronic hostility of England and Germany." A vigorous intervention by the Premier was required to rally his majority. A long statement by M. Pichon seemed to prelude the entry of the Moroccan difficulty upon a fresh and very disquieting phase. Morocco, he explained, owes already £3,200,000, and will be required to pay an indemnity of £2,800,000 to cover the cost of the French expeditions, of which the main object certainly was to intervene (unsuccessfully as it happened) in the dynastic conflict. The occupation will not end, however, even with the payment of the indemnity. The Sultan will first have to organise an efficient police—which means, we suspect, a French police. He will be helped, if he consents, to float a loan in France—which again means French control in a more absolute form. He is also reminded of his many barbarities, particularly the "outrageous treatment inflicted on the Jews"—a reproach which France might more properly have addressed to her Russian ally. It is impossible to predict what the end of these negotiations will be. M. Doumer, an ardent colonial, reminded M. Pichon that it would be unsafe to embark on any extensive military adventure, since France required all her military strength in Europe.

* * *

THE impressive demonstration of last Saturday held in the Albert Hall under the presidency of the Archbishop of Canterbury against the misrule on the Congo has had a somewhat unexpected echo abroad. The "Kreuz Zeitung" in a leading article has registered the belief that this movement is sincerely humanitarian. It went on to declare that Germany also must insist on the observance of her treaty rights on the Congo, which she could do only in co-operation with Great Britain. The Bremen Chamber of Commerce has addressed a memorial in the same sense to the Archbishop of Canterbury. These symptoms make it easy to accept the statement in one of Mr. Morel's public speeches that German diplomacy is ready to act with our own. Indeed, we have always inclined to think that French rather than German opposition was the obstacle to any European action in the Congo question. The Belgian promises of reform are not unsatisfactory, and the system of forced labor has so far broken down that their sincerity need not be doubted. But the stronger the pressure from outside, the better will be the prospects of reform. There is as yet no regret for the past, and no repudiation of the principles on which the system of exploitation rests. In the absence of any change of mind we can only judge by results. Results as yet there are none.

* * *

THE affairs of Hungary are still in riotous confusion, and the chiefs of the now broken Coalition have once more been in consultation with the Crown in Vienna. The Cabinet has been, with brief intervals, in a state of suspended resignation since April. The Crown will not concede the demands which might, perhaps, enable the moderates under M. Kossuth and Counts Apponyi and Andrassy to rally a following. In the absence of any concessions the extremists under M. de Justh are daily gaining strength. Nor can one wonder at the reluctance of the Crown to bargain with the Magyar party of ascendancy. It stipulated, when it originally gave office to the Coalition, for a Universal Suffrage Law which would have been fair to the non-Magyar nationalities. The Coalition has not executed that promise; worse still, it has produced a scheme of plural voting which would only perpetuate the present Magyar hegemony. The one hopeful feature of the present dissensions among the Magyars is that they offer some hope to the oppressed nationalities. The Croatian members for the moment hold the balance in the Diet. M. de Justh, extremist patriot though he is, has actually been bidding for non-Magyar support. The days of the hegemony seem at last to be numbered.

* * *

THE able correspondent of the "Times" in Peking has written an account of the Chinese Provincial Assemblies, which met for the first time on October 14th. They are purely consultative, and leave the prerogatives of the official class untouched. But they are part of a carefully timed programme, which, in nine years from now, is to culminate in an Imperial Parliament at Peking. The ruling class refuses as yet to take the new institutions seriously, and professes to regard them as a mere safety-valve, and a machinery which will allow them the more readily to repress the reformers by forcing them into the open. But already the Assemblies have displayed a very independent spirit, and checked at least one unpopular tax. They are "formidable," "iconoclastic," and "patriotic," but as yet they lack leaders. Leaders, however, can never be developed under a secret despotism. One expects a Mirabeau only after the States General have met. Japanese opinion seems on the whole to be optimistic. But perhaps the Japanese hardly realise that the Chinese have to face a difficulty which did not exist in their own case—an alien dynasty, and an alien Manchu ruling caste, which is both reactionary and uncultured.

* * *

THE internal troubles of Greece have entered on a fresh and peculiarly undesirable phase. The Military League, after successfully ejecting a large number of senior officers from the army and navy, is now turning its attention to the Civil Services. It has published a scurrilous attack on Dr. Kavvadias, the head of the archæological department, and demanded the dismissal of four members of the diplomatic service. Its organ, the "Chronos," next announced that it would print a full list of other Civil servants whom it wished to proscribe. The persuasions of the Prime Minister have procured a delay in this publication, but the pressure is none the less privately exerted. There is no reason to suppose that it stands for anything more respectable than the desire of junior or disappointed officials to break their more successful competitors. Meanwhile, the Turks—very unwisely—have retorted on the chauvinistic side of this agitation by prohibiting the entry of most of the Greek newspapers into Turkey. Greece in this crisis is sadly deficient in statesmen. The real administrative ability of the race has gone into commerce.

* * *

MR. BALFOUR delivered the Romanes lecture at the Sheldonian Theatre on Wednesday on "Questionings on Criticism and Beauty." Curiously enough, he followed Tolstoy in criticising and almost rejecting the æsthetic judgment of art, and showed some hankering after the older custom of asking whether it served morality and religion, or helped the State, or served some practical end. Generally, he seemed to think that good resulted from the efforts of the school which sought to attach æsthetic enjoyment to morals or religion, or to some form of utility and race progress.

[The next issue of THE NATION will be a special number dealing with the gift-books of the season.]

Politics and Affairs.

"IT NEVER CAN HAPPEN AGAIN."

WE hope that no friend of the Constitution will assume that, because some of our new Revolutionists are shivering in mid-stream, the step taken by Lord Lansdowne either will or can be retraced. His resolution, which will be carried on Tuesday night, will be deprived of much even of its initial force by the knowledge that the ablest of the non-official leaders of the Unionist Party openly disapprove it, and the suspicion that many or most of their officials will vote for it with distrust and apprehension. But it will pass; and it remains only to face the unprecedented political situation that will thus arise in these islands. The Constitutional forces will be ranged, not necessarily by the will of all the parties, in two camps. On the one side will stand the Crown, the Commons, and the People—all of them, in a more or less degree, affronted and diminished in authority by the action of the peers; on the other side a part, and that the less popular and defensible part, of the hereditary power. So far as the Crown is concerned, we imagine that no immediate recourse will be had to it, and that only at a later stage can the King be asked, practically through the united request of the Commons and the People, to restore the disturbed balance of forces, and to secure us all against a similar disturbance of them in the future. For the moment, the battle lies between the House of Commons and the House of Lords. In the election to come there will be not Liberal or Tory or Labor candidates, so much as House of Commons candidates and House of Lords candidates, and we do not see why the party leaders should not, for this occasion only, rule out ordinary denominations, and thus sharply indicate the true point of division. For we have now at last to decide the question which has been at the back of the mind of every democratic statesman for the last twenty years. Is the governing force in this country to be representative or non-representative? This question comes home with equal force to the two divisions of men who adhere to progressive politics. The Liberal Party is called on to answer for its entire scheme of fiscal and legislative work; the Labor Party for its right to exist. Happily, the hard struggle to preserve these activities alive has centred in the denial by the Lords of the birthright of a free people; the right to be taxed only by those whom they elect. Every significant chapter in our history has centred round those rights. With their concession the British Constitution was born. With their destruction, it must die.

Thus plain in the sight of all men, English, Irish, Scottish, and Welsh, lies the issue. But if no man can quite turn from it, many will seek to evade it. We will deal with the most plausible of these pleas, as they appear in Lord Lansdowne's speech, before we return to the central point. Practically, they are contained in one contention, that the Budget is revolutionary in form and in fact, and that instead of casting it out forthwith, the House of Lords has chosen the mild course of "submitting" it to the people. Let us say at once on the point of reference, that the Lords have submitted nothing. They have refused supplies to the Crown for a stated period, intervening, with violence, in a transaction which, both formally and actually, takes place between the Commons and the Sovereign. No machinery for the "reference" of a Budget exists, nor can the wit of man devise it, for every tax would have to be submitted on its merits and by itself. Will the Lords "submit" the land taxes to a referendum? Or the super-tax? Or the new scale of death duties? And would they accept a submission to the great mass of consumers of every item of indirect taxation which the Budget contains? If so, we can promise them, not the moderate proposals of Mr. Lloyd George, but an invitation to a Budget which would not merely check the charitable emotions of the peers, but would end them altogether. No; the Budget is not, and cannot be, "submitted": it is killed, and the only hope that the Lords cherish of winning an already lost election is to rouse in their defence a mixed force of bribery, intimidation, and trade pressure, set up by untruthful and ignoble presentments of the fears of property.

We come then to the plea that the Budget is revolutionary. Here we have to deal with a contention so clearly dishonest that it answers itself. A Budget has no permanent character. It is a mere annual schedule of taxes, which can be filled in by each succeeding Government according to its will. The Lords have only to convert the people to their mind about this particular Budget, and then, without confusion, without any strain upon the British Constitution, it can be changed, and Lord Milner can carry out his threat of sweating thirteen millions out of the wages of the workmen and workwomen and the earnings and capital of the general body of consumers. That, indeed, would be a Revolution, compared with which this Budget would be trifling, and it happens to be the actual Tory alternative, now officially adopted by Lord Lansdowne. In a word, the Lords want a return at once to the Hungry 'Forties and to the Tyrannous 'Twenties. But there is a further test of the sincerity of this phase of Lord Lansdowne's attack on the Budget. He said, or hinted, that the taxes on land and licences had been "tacked"—i.e., that they contained matter "foreign" to a Finance Bill. If this was true, and if those clauses violated the historic resolution of the Lords against "tacking," the remedy would have been to move their excision on this ground. We do not believe that any "tacking" device would have passed either the House of Commons or the Cabinet, but certainly the Lords would have attempted to stop it, if there had been fair cause for such tactics. But neither in the Commons nor in the Lords was this line of action adopted. In place of it, the whole Bill was marked for destruction. By that act, the Lords admit the perfect relevance and propriety of these taxes. Lord Milner knows his business as a financial expert, whatever may be said of his statesmanship, and while he criticised the method and discredited the workmanship and yield of some of the Budget taxes, he abstained from the charges of "revolution" and of "tacking." Indeed the Lords, by rejecting the only procedure consistent with their argument, reveal their true end. That is to acquire the general control of taxation. This obtained, they will have secured the chief power in the State, and can estop every Liberal Government from free access to the Sovereign and to power, and from all living dependence on the House of Commons.

Here, then, is the stake, and Lord Rosebery is correct in describing it as a tolerably high one. The Liberal Party is faced, not merely with the loss of a popular Budget, built up, in Professor Marshall's words, as a means to "social welfare," but with a paralysis of the representative principle. The rights of the "passing majority" are to be taken away by a party which never "passes" before the people at all, and whose governing members Lord Rosebery advises to hide betimes, lest the electorate should catch a glimpse of them. In face of this emergency, the various ranks of the progressive army, which, we believe, will present an absolutely united front to their common enemy, make only one demand on their leaders, and that is an assurance that the fight will be joined on its full and true issue. The Lord Chancellor and Lord Pentland put the general point with no lack of precision. "It is, in my opinion, impossible," said Lord Loreburn, "that any Liberal Government should ever again bear the heavy burden of office unless it is secured against a repetition of treatment such as our measures have had to undergo for the last four years." "Their lordships knew perfectly well," said Lord Pentland, "that no Liberal Government would ever again be placed in power in this country unless it was ready to take steps to secure itself in future from the harassing opposition to which the present Government had been subjected." Not only, therefore, are the Government bound to see that the present denial by the Lords of the most fundamental of Constitutional rights is barred to them in future, but they must re-establish the whole way of progressive government. This issue does not raise the whole question of rule by two Houses or one. It does raise the acute problem of the quite modern usurpation of the peers. If the House of Lords had sought to retain only the revising and delaying powers which Bagehot and the general body of mid-century Constitutionalists freely conceded them, they might have rested in peace, and even done good work for the State. But now that they have changed, first to a body of rabid landlords and Tory partizans, and then to sheer revolutionists, no further terms can be held with them. This means an election on the Veto, and we have no doubt that before it opens the Prime Minister will define the general lines of his plan for rescuing the representative House from servitude to the peers. But the questions of the Lords and the Land go together. Twin problems, never far apart from each other, they are now indissolubly linked. The people of Great Britain want room to live and develop under a fixed Constitution and a vitally changed system of land tenure.

THE ISSUES BEFORE THE PEOPLE.

THE immediate task set to the Government by the House of Lords is the bringing home as clearly and forcibly as possible to the people of the country the nature of the revolution involved in the passage of Lord Lansdowne's motion. The questions raised by the Budget, great and urgent as they are, sink into insignificance by the side of the question raised by the rejection of the Budget. Let us see what that question is. Under our Constitution, as it has been framed, partly by law but mainly by usage, the House of Commons, as representing the people of the country, is the central and dominant authority. It maintains that position because the King, in whose name and by whose legal authority the whole work of administration is carried on, selects his Ministers from the leading men of the party which holds a majority in the House, and because Ministers retain their position only so long as they can command that majority. Why are Ministers thus dependent on the House of Commons, and on the House of Commons alone? The reply is very simple. It is that the House of Commons has the power of the purse. It alone can vote the taxes necessary to the work of administration, and appropriate them to their various purposes. The uncontrolled power of the purse is thus the foundation of the authority of the House of Commons, and the means of ensuring the responsibility of Ministers to the nation.

This power Lord Lansdowne's motion extinguishes. This motion being carried, the House of Lords asserts the right, not merely as now and again in old days to refuse a particular money Bill, but to stop the whole machinery of supply. If it has this power, it has also the power of forcing the dissolution of Parliament, since without supply Government cannot go on. Thus at a stroke it usurps, first, the principal prerogative of the Crown, the right of dissolution, and secondly, the principal right of the people, the right of saying through their representatives what moneys they will provide for the King's Government, and by what means. It follows next that no Government can retain power beyond a few months—and substantially this means that no Government can assume power at all—without gaining and maintaining the support of the House of Lords, since at any moment by the refusal of supply the House of Lords can prevent it from carrying on the work of administration. So far it would appear that the House of Lords has placed itself on an equality with the House of Commons, and has ousted the Crown from its main prerogative.

But the change is greater than that. The consequences of a dissolution are not equal for the two Houses. The Lords have no constituents to face, and no election bills to pay. To them a dissolution is no more than a prorogation. In case of a controversy between the Houses they have all to gain and nothing to lose. Hence their position becomes far stronger than that of the House of Commons. Equally, it is stronger than that of the Crown, for the King through his Ministers is responsible for the government of the country, and cannot with equanimity face a deadlock. The Lords have no such responsibility, and, as may be seen in Lord Lansdowne's airy references to the insignificance of a financial chaos, have no hesitation in creating a deadlock which they leave to others to overcome. It follows that if the action of the Lords be sustained they become without doubt masters of the country, and the hard-won Parliamentary franchise is shorn of three-fourths of its value. The House of Commons is reduced to a platform on which the opinions of the country may be registered, and resolutions passed, but by which and through which nothing can be done. The power of legislation it has already in large measure lost, and now with legislation go administration and finance.

Perhaps the most remarkable contribution to the debate this week has not been anything that has been heard in the House of Lords—though we do not forget the weighty speeches of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Pentland—but the letter of Professor Dicey in the "Times" and the reply of Sir Frederick Pollock. Professor Dicey has written on the Law of the Constitution, and no one has done more to enforce the general confidence in the rule of tradition and the moral efficacy of unbroken practice. Yet it is Professor Dicey of all men who comes forward to cancel the value of the whole of his work by justifying a reversal of a tradition which is absolutely unbroken. And what is his fear? It is that if the rights of the Lords be denied, "the majority of the House of Commons would henceforward be supreme." Well may Sir Frederick Pollock reply that this is precisely what he and others who learned constitutional law along with Professor Dicey always supposed them to be. For what does Professor Dicey say in his own work but that "the one essential principle of the Constitution is obedience by all persons to the deliberately expressed will of the House of Commons, and ultimately to the will of the nation as expressed through Parliament?" Both these principles are set at naught if the Lords can at will force a dissolution of Parliament. If they are at liberty to decide the points on which the nation has or has not expressed its will at an election, then it is they who are masters of the situation, and not the House of Commons nor the people as expressing their will through Parliament.

The issue, then, is simple. It is a direct question between political liberty and irresponsible oligarchic rule. It remains only for the Government to see that it is presented in its simplicity and its fulness to the electors. The first step to this end is to refuse all concession to the usurped authority of the House of Lords. There can exist, and there will exist, none of those neat little schemes which Lord Lansdowne, with very ill-timed levity, assumed Lord Crewe to have in readiness for carrying the country through the crisis by an arrangement between parties. The House of Lords has put itself outside the bounds of any possible arrangement. It will not accept the Budget as it stands. Thus no alternative to the Budget will go before it. There will be no temporary measure for the special authorisation of those taxes to which the Lords choose to give their consent, for any such Bill, whether directly or indirectly, would imply an admission of the right of the Lords to control taxation. The Commons will maintain their substantial rights as sanctioned by tradition. They will no doubt assert their authority by resolution, and may very well declare that the collection of taxes is sufficiently authorised in accordance with long-standing practice by their resolutions until the time at which the Finance Bill of the year becomes law. Meanwhile, they will lay their case before the constituencies, and demand from them authority to bring to an end a state of things which has for three years paralysed Liberal legislation, and is now equally paralysing Liberal administration and Liberal finance. That is to say, they will put the whole question of the veto, financial as well as legislative, before the country, and make it, so far as it is possible to make any one question, the single issue of the election. For the meantime, we can only trust that the good sense of the Courts will interpret the authority of the Resolutions in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution and the manifest requirement of the public welfare. If they refuse to do so, the responsibility will not be with the Government or the House of Commons. For the loss and confusion that will result the country will have to thank the Lords. It may be a sharp and expensive lesson. But it has to be learnt.

THE SOCIAL POLICY OF LIBERALISM.

THE present crisis in Liberalism is no chance happening, but the inevitable result of the endeavor to use the State as an instrument for realising liberty. Now liberty, it has been well said, consists not merely in the absence of restraint but in the presence of opportunity. The modern Liberal is not content with the unfair conditions of life's handicap. Individuals are not born with equal personal endowments, but it is the first business of civilised society to see that they are provided with equal opportunities, to make the best use of such capacities as they possess for their own advantage and for the commonweal. The growing determination to apply this principle has forced to the forefront of politics new social problems, the solution of which involves important limitations of "rights" of private industrial enterprise and private property. Sweating, unemployment, destitution, physical degeneration, and, in large measure, crime, are recognised as being in part at least the fruits of a bad social-economic environment traceable in the last resort to certain abuses of landlordism or industrial dominion. The strictly conservative element in the new Liberalism consists in a policy for securing a minimum standard of life and work for all effective members of the nation, with educative and humane consideration for all defective members. Thus Liberalism strengthens the foundation of modern society. But to this conservative policy a creative or progressive policy is organically related, aiming to discover and develop the potential resources of the nation, those properties of her land and labor which private enterprise is not adapted fully to evoke and utilise.

This social policy of modern Liberalism has not been planned with clear, far-sighted intention; it has been a slow, secret, many-rooted, obscure growth within the party. Perhaps for this very reason it is strong, persistent, and undeniable. But, though the earlier processes in such an organic change may often take place instinctively, there comes a time when clear recognition and a conscious focussing of social will are essential. That time has now arrived, and it is well that some of our leading statesmen are realising the necessity for a reformulation of Liberal principles and policy to accord with the new conditions of the task they are called upon to undertake. We have no hesitation in saying that the clearest, most eloquent, and most convincing exposition of this new Liberalism is to be found in the volume of collected speeches of Mr. Winston Churchill just published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton. Those born in a creed are often at a disadvantage for purposes of valuation and exposition with those who have achieved it. Mr. Churchill brought into Liberalism a certain impartiality and subtlety of appreciation hardly attainable among the traditional Liberals. The very title which he gives to this volume, "Liberalism and the Social Problem," indicates his rigor and accuracy of political judgment. For, though recent history has flung into strong relief issues of Empire and of foreign policy, besides fiscal and constitutional matters of the gravest moment, upon some of which Mr. Churchill can claim to speak with authority, it is the new resolve of Liberalism to confront the social problem that is the explanation of the new struggle. For the latest action of the House of Lords, unconstitutional, revolutionary though it be, was not unexpected. In a true sense, it was inevitable. For the new conservative and constructive Liberalism involves, as we have recognised, large interference with abuses of property and social power, represented to an overwhelming degree in the Tory Party. The policy involves what to the mind of great landowners, liquor lords, and other beneficiaries of vested and protected interests, will naturally appear "an attack upon their property." National defence, efficiency, development, cannot be compassed without an enlargement of public services, and a standard of life and work cannot be maintained without restrictions upon anti-social modes of land-owning and profit-making. Standing firmly by tradition and personal proclivity for public economy, Mr. Churchill is far too wise to confuse that term with parsimony, or to fail to recognise that, for such tasks as we denote, the modern State must require a large and growing revenue. Thus social reform compels a Liberal Government to recast its revenue system with a view to tracing forms of income and of property which possess a large and increasing ability to bear taxation. With bold penetration Mr. Churchill insists that this revenue policy demands that the State henceforth undertakes a scrutiny into "origins" of wealth. It is this proposal which stirs the passionate indignation alike of Mr. Balfour and the Dukes. It is to their mind an incendiary doctrine. It is not, indeed, novel. "Unearned increments" in land have long been recognised in theory: it is now proposed to translate theory into practice. Mr. Balfour complains that other "unearned increments" get off scot free. This is not true; but, if it were, it is likely to be remedied as Mr. Churchill's inquest into "origins" becomes fuller and more systematic, even though we may have to resign the attempt to make it perfect. In short, the new Liberal policy necessitates a revision of the meaning and the sanctions of "property," not for invasion or for confiscation, but for correct discrimination between "earned" property which cannot easily bear a tax, and "unearned" property which can and must be made to pay.

It is here that the Constitutional issues arise. The House of Lords stands for unearned property. "One-sided, hereditary, unpurged, unrepresentative, irresponsible, absentee," it proposes to stake its life against the necessities of the Liberal State in the defence of those political, economic, and social privileges which enable its members to live in leisure, dignity, and luxury at the expense of the industrious classes of the nation. There is, as Mr. Churchill indicates, no repudiation of property, but an insistence that property must be so ordered in its attainment and its uses that it be "associated in the minds of the mass of the people with ideas of justice and reason." Firmly and clearly does Mr. Churchill discriminate between Liberalism and Socialism. Monopolies must not remain in private hands, unearned wealth where it can be found must be intercepted for the State, an ever-widening area of public productive enterprise lies open to the Municipality and the State, the law must keep an effective control over the conditions of employment. But this growth of collective organisation is consistent with the maintenance of wide fields of private business enterprise utilising under wholesome limits the spirit of competition and of individual effort. This moving equilibrium of the forces of collectivism and individualism, not a contradiction or a compromise, but a harmony, is of the very essence of that social progress to which Liberalism commits itself with fresh faith and with growing courage, as the nature of her task becomes clearer to consciousness, and draws its inspiration from a firmer grasp upon the principles of social justice.

THE CASE OF FINLAND.

THERE are two reasons which make the fortunes of the unlucky Duchy of Finland in a peculiarly intimate way the concern of every good European. The population which is now awaiting from week to week the final destruction of its liberties at the hands of the Tsar, belongs to our Western world as does no other race in the Russian Empire, not even the Poles. Its civilisation has never been Oriental. Its religion is Lutheran. Its constitution has been from remote ages representative. The language, at least of its upper class, is Swedish. In all that makes the mentality of a people, in its logical obedience to democratic ideals, its steady faith in order, its respect for womanhood, it is not only Western, but a leader and a pioneer among Western peoples. Its windows have always looked towards Europe, and its universities have taken their full part in the intellectual life of their time. It is a party in Russia which is not merely reactionary, but Oriental, that once more conspires against its liberties. The conceptions of Pan-Slavism, alike in their exaltation of autocracy and in their obscurantist religious basis, are of the East. It is an affair of the outposts in a long war of two civilisations of which we are to-day the passive spectators. We have no rights of intervention. We have no status sanctioned by treaties. But the struggle none the less appeals to our sympathies and to our sense of fraternity as clearly as did the conflict between Christianity and Islam in the unhappiest epoch of Turkish misrule. In another, and even larger, sense the issue has a vital interest for Europe. It is the test of the ability of a great Power to over-ride treaties, to obliterate written guarantees, and to use the brute force of a hundred-and-fifty millions to trample on the rights of three. Finland, it is true, was added to the Russian Empire amid the convulsions of the Napoleonic wars that were fatal to the last relics of Swedish dominion. To the Russian reactionary school, the Duchy belongs to the Empire by the "right of conquest" alone. In that first triumph of force they see a sanction which over-rides the solemn promises and contracts that secured from the first invasion downwards the autonomy of the conquered province. If, after the lapse of a century, a Tsar may recur to this "right of conquest" to annul all that his predecessors gave and himself recognised, there remains in the structure of modern Europe one trace the less of any respect for law and right. Finland will not suffer alone. A blow will have been dealt indirectly at every race and people which has to dread the oppression of the strong. The checks upon unchartered authority will have been weakened, the currency of international honor will have been debased. The impotence of public opinion to restrain a lawless Power in the commission of palpable wrong will have been demonstrated in a way that must depress and discredit in every country the parties which deny the unlimited rights of force.

For the third time in four years the Finnish Diet has been dissolved by the Tsar. That, however, is the least of the calamities which the Duchy has to face. The steadiness of the national character, the unanimity of the national patriotism, acting through the mechanism of proportional representation, may be trusted to return a Parliament substantially identical with those which preceded it. A regiment of Cossacks is camped on Finnish soil. The administration is in the hands of soldiers, sailors, and officials. The Russian Cabinet has usurped the right to advise the Tsar as Grand Duke of Finland in all his dealings with the Diet of the Duchy. A military contribution has been imposed without the Diet's assent. But grave as these infractions of Finnish autonomy are, a worse menace is impending. The old pretext used with such deadly effect in 1899 has been revived. M. Stolypin is bent upon asserting the right of the central Government of Russia—which now means nominally the Duma—to legislate for Finland in all common affairs. There can be little doubt of what juridically the position of Finland properly is. She is an autonomous State, subject only to these disabilities—that her Grand Duke is always the Russian Emperor, that her foreign relations are controlled by him alone, and that her military forces are under his executive command. In all else she is independent of Russia. In this reading of her autonomy, European jurists—including even some distinguished Russian professors—are unanimous.

The evidence has just been collected and set forth, with a convincing display of erudition and good sense, by a notable Dutch authority, Professor van der Vlugt, of Leyden (Un nouveau conflit Russo-Finlandais). The practice of the past, wherever Finnish legislation might have affected Russian interests, was to arrange for a prior consultation between the Finnish Senate and the Russian Minister whose department was affected. Whatever case there may be for some more businesslike arrangement, there can be no justification for the procedure which M. Stolypin contemplates. He proposes by the act of the Russian Central Government alone to transfer what he is pleased to consider common affairs to the competence of the Russian legislature alone. The consent of the Finnish Diet will not even be sought. The methods of bribery by which the Irish Parliament was induced to surrender its autonomy were respectable by comparison with this threatened usurpation. Compensation to Finland there will be none, unless indeed she values the privilege of sending three or four members to the nearly impotent Russian Duma. But the whole extent of the revolution becomes apparent only when we enquire what is to be the range of these so-called "common affairs." They include not merely the army, the posts, the railways, navigation, customs and tariffs, but also the share of Finland in Imperial taxation, the maintenance of order, the judicial system and procedure, and all legislation affecting the rights of the press, of association, and of public meeting. The people of Finland, in short, will no longer tax themselves, no longer control their own police, and they will see their most fundamental liberties levelled down to the common measure of the Tsar's barbaric Empire. The Diet, if it lingers on, will be little more than a Zemstvo or County Council. The autonomy of Finland will be at an end, and, in all that makes life worth having, the conditions at Helsingfors will be no better than the conditions which rule at Odessa and Tomsk. The same police, the same censorship, the same insecurity of personal rights, will bespeak the triumph over the last free people of the Empire of the ideals of the Pan-Slavist reaction. It is hardly worth while to enquire what would remain from this wreck of Finnish autonomy. The little that might be left would doubtless disappear amid a state of siege controlled by some new Bobrikoff.

The Finnish people, at this painful crisis in its eventful history, preserves its wonted self-control. It will not play into the despot's hands by attempting an armed revolt which might seem to justify the aggression. Its weapon will doubtless be a passive resistance, in which the whole nation will refuse to assist the Tsar in his designs on its liberties. It will once more appeal to the conscience of Europe. Two articles by the ex-Premier Mechelin and Professor Reuter in the forthcoming "English Review" state its case, coldly but firmly, on the unanswerable ground of juridical argument. The answer, if Europe had as yet that solidarity towards which she is only struggling, would be a boycott of the Power which has defied the very conception of international good faith. No nation which respected itself would enter into an alliance with that Power, or receive its sovereign with public honors, or open its purse to its appeals for loans. That, unfortunately, is as yet an impracticable policy. But a Nemesis does none the less await so flagrant a breach of public faith. Even our own Tories perceive the need of a certain prudence in their interested fraternisation with such a Power. Our Foreign Office will look more minutely than was its wont into the wording of the Russian documents on which it relies in its dealings with its new associate in Persia and the Balkans. For if this crime is consummated, it will be a warning to all who care to read, that the reactionary influence, which is usually anti-British, as well as anti-popular, is dominant in the Tsar's councils. Whatever our rulers may desire, there can be no entente cordiale with a Power which commits such a baseness. They may choose to condone or ignore the oppressions which the Tsar perpetrates at home. But some respect for his plighted word is essential in any ally.

THE GREAT DAYS OF 1832.

IN the closing days of 1830, the year of the Revolution that drove Charles the Tenth from France, Lord Grey became Prime Minister, to carry a Reform which, as Charles Grey, the lieutenant of Charles Fox, he had proposed in the House of Commons in the year that Louis XVI. lost his head and the great Revolution terrified and maddened the rulers of England. Grey was on the verge of seventy. In a public life of forty-four years he had held office for a few months only. For twenty-three years he had led a bitter and beaten Opposition. He had seen the destruction of many hopes and the loss of many friends. He had been the ally of Burke in the impeachment of Warren Hastings, in the days before the French Revolution had scattered a great party of small aims, and inspired a small party with great aims. Of his great comrades, none remained to him. Fox, Sheridan, Whitbread—the men with whom he had shared the darkest hours of freedom—had died before the dawn; one of them of despair. In the forty years that divided England from the French Revolution, whose smoke still enveloped the fancies of the aristocracy, the nation had passed through endless war, unparalleled suffering, and the blind violence of the panic of her rulers. Sidmouth and Eldon were there to recall the brutal repressions of the second reign of terror; Grenville still lived, the cold spectre of the first. Canning, Grey's brilliant and bitter enemy, the genius of the "Anti-Jacobin," had followed his foe and colleague Castlereagh to the grave, but by one of the delicate touches of the irony of history there survived the butt of the Anti-Jacobin's predecessor and rival, and among the speeches against the Reform Bill was one from Lord Rolle, who assured the Peers that the Bill was not popular. So many, so fierce, and so ancient were the memories that gathered round Grey.

The colleagues with whom Grey set out on his great task were not revolutionaries. They included followers of Canning in Palmerston and Melbourne; cautious Whigs like Lansdowne; the dogged farmer Althorp, whom nothing but a tenacious sense of public duty kept in politics; the dashing Lambton; Brougham, for whom no Government could find a cage large enough; Holland, loyal to friends and to causes; Sir John Graham; and last, but not least, little Lord John, who was now to enjoy one of the two great moments of his life. They represented different temperatures of reform, different degrees of prudence, and their leader had lost the dash and ardor and the visions of his youth. Such were the men who faced and beat the Lords in the long struggle that ended in the summer of 1832.

The ground plan of the first Reform Bill was the work of a Committee of four. The Bill was prepared in a few weeks, and on March 1st, 1831, it was introduced by Lord John Russell, who, though not a member of the Cabinet, had well earned this honor. The scope of the Bill took everyone by surprise. It was received with incredulous and mocking laughter by the men who heard their sentence of death pronounced. Only Peel, the statesman who was to win his chief fame in a Reformed Parliament, sat anxious and unhappy. Out of doors it received the instant support of Cobbett, Place, and the political unions in which tradesmen and artisans had collected their strength, for the Bill had astonished the reformers as much as it had astonished the Borough-mongers. On March 21st London was illuminated to signalise the carrying of the second reading by a majority of one, and, as Place observes, "the windows in a very few houses of the inveterate Tories were partially broken." But there followed an inevitable defeat in Committee, and the only question was whether the Whigs could persuade the King to dissolve Parliament, or whether the Tories would compel resignation. For a time the issue trembled in the balance, but on April 22nd the King yielded, and Parliament was dissolved in a state of uproar, Brougham contriving, with Machiavellian address, to inflame the passion of the Lords in order to prevent their carrying Wharnccliffe's address praying the King not to dissolve, in the precious moments that were slipping away while the Royal coach was being hurried to the scene. The election that followed gave the Reformers a majority of over a hundred, and such was the popular feeling that the anti-Reform candidates fought with their lives in their hands. The return of such a Parliament on such a franchise could only have been caused by an avalanche.

The second Reform Bill passed its second reading in June by a majority of 136, and its third reading at the end of September by a majority of 109. It was now the turn of the Lords. Grey had shown in 1793 that 307 members of the House of Commons were returned by 154 patrons, so that the House of Lords took a very direct and immediate interest in any question of Reform. They thought indeed that Reform meant the immediate extinction of the domination and the plunder of the great families. "No evil," said the Duke of Wellington, "can arise from the rejection of the Bill at all equal to that which will arise from carrying it." Accordingly, they gave short shrift to the Bill, and on the 8th of October the second reading was rejected by 199 votes to 158. Hitherto the nation had shown great restraint, but this defiant challenge provoked an immediate reply. The country was in no mood for class arrogance. The demand for Reform came from a nation conscious of great wrongs and great misgovernment, too long endured. The Radicals, with their gospel of citizenship, had not preached or suffered for nothing. The middle-classes and the artisans knew that the rich who had the power had used it to throw taxation on the poor. Most important of all, Cobbett had swept, a splendid storm, across the England he loved and whose rulers he hated and despised. The people of England were united, and the alternative to Reform was not Reaction, but Revolution. That was the message of Bristol and Nottingham, and of the threatening unions. The scenes of the autumn of 1831 were no part of a melodrama or a harlequinade; they were not advertisement or demonstration; if the nation had not been massed behind them they would have been idle.

The Government were in a difficult position. They knew that these popular symptoms might have just the wrong effect on the King. Besides, they were not themselves revolutionaries, and they had already instituted a series of prosecutions against rioters. They now suppressed some of the unions, and the officer who had failed to subdue the Bristol riot was ordered to be court-martialled, and committed suicide. But the Government did not drop Reform. In December the third Bill was introduced; its second reading was carried by a majority of 162, and at the end of March, 1832, it went to the Lords, where, thanks to "the waverers," it was read a second time by a majority of nine. In April there was a great demonstration of the unions at Birmingham, with 150,000 persons present, at which the National Union threatened to refuse all taxes if the Lords threw out the Bill. Next month the blow fell, and the Bill was defeated in Committee by 151 to 116. The Ministry advised the King to create peers to carry the Bill, but the King, who had taken alarm at the popular agitations, refused their advice and accepted their resignations. Wellington, to whom he appealed, tried to form a Government, but the scheme was impossible from the first, and Peel set his face resolutely against it. The country was determined to make House of Lords Government impossible: the great towns swore to refuse taxes, and Place placarded London with his famous message, "To stop the Duke go for gold." On the 15th of May Wellington abandoned his efforts, and Grey returned. The King still hoped to escape from the necessity of making Peers, and urged Grey to modify the Bill, but Grey was firm. He then tried to get Wellington to make the Lords surrender, but though Wellington did not refuse, it was clear from the language of the Peers that the Bill was in danger. Grey and Brougham, therefore, made a second journey to Windsor. Their first journey had been made on May the 8th, when Brougham had told the King that sixty, or perhaps eighty, new creations might be necessary. Then the King refused, and Brougham has described how he and Grey returned to town and their disconsolate dinner off mutton chops and broiled kidneys at Hounslow. Now the conditions were different. The King had no alternative Government, and he yielded. "The same evening," says Brougham, "the King wrote in reply to the minute left with him by Lord Grey and myself that he authorised a creation of Peers to such an extent as would enable Lord Grey to carry the Bill, avoiding as far as possible any permanent addition to the Peerage by comprehending as large a proportion of the eldest sons of Peers and heirs of childless Peers as can be made available." The threat sufficed, and next month the Bill had passed the Lords by 106 to 22; the old régime was gone.

The friends of that régime hoped almost to the last to preserve it. They trusted to the wide differences and the old animosities between the Whigs and the Radicals.

Canning's friend, Ward, had once said that Reform was impossible, because Radicals could never coalesce with the Whigs. The impossible happened. When they were faced with the despotism of the House of Lords, gentle Whigs like Lansdowne, fierce Whigs like Durham, Benthamite Radicals like Place, Radicals without a philosophy but with piercing common-sense like Cobbett, Whigs in Parliament, and Radicals in the cold, prudence and passion, they all joined forces in one grand army. The widest diversities of class, of religion, of aim, of manners, of appearance were blended in this miscellaneous host, whom the House of Lords had welded into one mind. Men and opinions that had torn each other yesterday and were to tear each other to-morrow swore a truce of freedom and kept it. For one moment all the echoes of old quarrels were forgotten, and that moment settled for its generation the claim of the Lords to govern England.

ANOTHER "PSYCHOLOGICAL MOMENT."

EVEN our Masters must have their moments of relaxation from the cares of ruling us, and possibly it was with some relief that the House of Lords, suffering under the unwonted mental strain of a three days' debate, turned from Lord Lansdowne to Lord Rosebery. That humorous artist has long been their chief entertainer, and when his "turn" came, long experience told them they could be comfortably sure of their promised sensation. But on the occasion of the debate on the overthrow of the British Constitution, Lord Rosebery seemed to offer his admirers something more exciting than his average accomplishment. Was he not the Prophet of Glasgow; had he not there foretold the End of All Things if the Budget were allowed to pass into law, and was he not, therefore, in no small measure the author, if not the only begetter, of the Lansdowne Resolution? And here was just the moment for a vivifying, tonic effect. For, noble as had been Lord Lansdowne's opening, and satisfactory as had been his comprehensive defiance of the Law and Custom of the Constitution, the following debate had not gone so well. Not only had the Lord Chancellor been most unpleasantly plain as to the consequences of the Lansdowne motion, but two of the ablest of the Unionist peers, Lord Cromer and Lord Lytton, had made it quite clear that, in their opinion, their Lordships had committed a sad blunder. So the rather indeterminate faces on the back benches were looking a little glum; and to Lord No Zoo, at least, the familiar features of Lord Rosebery, wearing the actor's solemnity of look through their cheerful ruddiness of hue, were indeed a pleasant apparition.

I suppose that politics makes one hard-hearted, for if I retained the softness of youth, I think I should draw a veil over the sad scene which followed. At brief intervals it seemed as if Lord Rosebery's speech might go well. It was Glasgow over again, only better. The crisis, in Lord Rosebery's view, was really terrible. All the money was leaving the country; Lord Rothschild might be expected to sail at any moment, and already flotillas were speeding across the Atlantic with Bonds for Ballast. This was according to contract; but what were all these cursings worth when their author proceeded to make it perfectly plain that he did not propose to give effect to them, and that, in short, Property, Family, Religion might all go to perdition if only the House of Lords were kept in being? Even this conclusion might seem to have its flattering consolations, for it showed the great importance that the Second Chamber possessed in the eyes of its most brilliant ornament. For example, was not the House of Lords the only remaining barrier against Home Rule—against the passage of the Bill which Lord Rosebery moved from the other side of the Table sixteen years ago, with pathetic insistence on the continued obduracy of the "predominant partner"?

Unhappily, Lord Rosebery took no pains, or very little pains, to conceal the uncomplimentary character of his real reasons for wishing the House of Lords to pass the Budget. As he developed them, with cynical, almost with indecent, humor, one wondered whether a less well-bred assembly would have stood it. For the Lords to be led to the very edge of Revolution, to be tightly screwed and passionately stimulated to the point of smashing up a Radical House of Commons, and then to be warned of their complete incompetence for any such business—could there be a more ignoble conclusion? However, Lord Rosebery's anxiety on this point was too keen to allow any false delicacy. "My Lords" (I only slightly paraphrase his words), "some of you are young; most of you are very ignorant of politics. All of you on this side (except poor Lord Lansdowne, who could not help it) are so simple that you have walked straight into the trap that your enemies set for you. You have chosen to reject the Budget and make it popular, when you should have passed it and made some use of its inevitable unpopularity as soon as it was understood. You will not be reformed and brought up to date, and yet you propose to present yourselves to the people, with all your imperfections on your heads, as the chief organ for the government of this Empire. If you will go on with your gamble, pray see to it that the division-list on Lord Lansdowne's motion contains a fair proportion of names that will count. Perhaps if the greater part of you would withdraw altogether, and, disappearing as legislators, reappear in the more fitting and humble rôle of electors, you might collect 150 names that the electors would recognise and respect. If they see the whole of you, you are lost. Pray then consider this disinterested advice, and then your crazy rejection of the Budget may possess a little weight." On that strain the pleasantly attuned voice ceased its play of stormy and dulcet notes, and the speaker slipped away almost in silence to the cross-benches. From beginning to end the speech did not contain a hint of Liberalism. All that is dead in Lord Rosebery's bosom. But his fears and critical instincts are very much alive.

To this inspiring blast, the House of Lords—not Lord Rosebery's selected host of Gideon—will on Tuesday march to the destruction of the ancient walls of the Constitution. I am not sure that Lord Lansdowne's ingenious fencing has really helped the case which he was forced to submit. For he, like Mr. Balfour, is not a real Tory leader. His intellectual substance is good enough, but it differs from Lord Salisbury's as much as his precise little figure, with its Punch-like gestures, differs from his great predecessor's careless amplitude of presence and speech. Both the new chieftains seem unable to hold out against a kind of shallow bullying which great authority resists. Lord Lansdowne's speech on Monday traversed with a kind of gentlemanly assurance an immense field of historic rights and privileges where a man of true imagination and prudent strength of character would never have set foot. But the House of Lords possesses in its Camperdowns and Milners and Curzons a weight of sheer arrogance which he cannot repress. Wednesday saw the first serious movement of concern, even of affright. After Lord Rosebery's speech rumor at once connected it with a change of front on the part of the majority. As that little masterpiece of ironic humor was discussed in the tea-room, more than one saddened peer shook his head and wondered whether the Lansdowne resolution was, after all, a wise one. For what issue presents itself to a shivering and a shaken host? I have not yet met a Tory who expects to win, and some of the freest prophets of disaster sit by Lord Lansdowne's side. The fondest calculation of the Opposition is that they may get so near to the Ministerial strength that the Government, depending on the Irish vote, may be compelled to reshape the liquor duties. Behind these reserved and timid hopes, more than half akin to fear, lies the growing conviction that a false issue has been rashly chosen. It was determined by a House that knows quite as little of politics as Lord Rosebery declared. Now the men of experience have spoken, too late for retreat, not too late for regret and indecision. If now the Government were to lift a finger in the direction of compromise, it would be grasped with ill-concealed enthusiasm. But all such demi-issues are impossible. The Government and the party stand fixed to the point of the complete rehabilitation of the rights of the Commons, while the secret agreement with the liquor trade, the incessant and merciless drive of the Protectionists, remain the decisive elements in the interior counsels of the Tory Party. Lord Rosebery, that mirror of the State, has revealed them all. The acute and nervous critic has had another of his "psychological moments," and, through the ironical medium of his speech of Wednesday, one sees the fatal perturbations of the party that he has more than half-led to its doom.

H. W. M.

Life and Letters.

A REVOLUTION OF THE RICH.

OF all the British people the Lords are, for the moment, to be envied most. It is not merely that all eyes are bent on them, that they have emerged into daylight, and are spoken of as having quite an importance of their own. They have acquired a fresh and strange sensation; they feel themselves greater than they knew; they perceive in their natures the stir of mighty workings. They feel like the Egyptian calf when priests found under his tongue the symbol of the god; they feel like a dog-violet that has developed scent, or like a common oyster that has developed a pearl. They discover a new quality in their being, and enjoy the charm of unexpected revelations in themselves. They have been called Revolutionists.

Imagine the sensations of a Lord when his valet, softly entering with just a pleasing rattle of cups like silvery bells, wakes him in the morning with his tea and daily paper, and he discovers those filthy Radical prints are describing his action on the Budget as a Revolution! His sensations are then the queerest mixture of pleasure and pain. He, the representative of stability, the hereditary guardian of property, to be called a Revolutionist! It is almost unthinkable in its horror. But, at the same time, is there not something a little dashing, a little dare-devil, in the name—a little "wicked," as women say, and possibly attractive? It seems to imply a certain spirit, at all events a certain courage. He sees himself in a new and horrible, but rather exciting, aspect. So feels the ambitious parvenu when, at a City dinner, the first twinge of aristocracy's gout shoots through his toe. So feels the British matron when, waking in a fever hospital, she reads above her bed the label, "Scarlet: female: 403."

That scene in the House of Lords with which the Revolution opened—how well it concealed its revolutionary significance! It was afternoon, and the electric lamps struggled against the wintry river mist, but the decorated Chamber was nicely warmed to a regulated temperature, and the Lords reclined in comfort on stuffed leather seats. Every seat was full, and each was heavy with prosperity, for though you raked the kingdoms of the world you would hardly find that number of such wealthy men in a single one of them. Side by side with those whom the Bishop of Bristol justly called "the physical hereditary peers," sat the spiritual hereditary peers, whose lineage of holiness the Bishop traced back between twelve and thirteen centuries, and why he stopped short of nineteen centuries we cannot tell. There the spiritual descendants of Christ were seated in ecclesiastical splendor of lawn, representing (to quote the Bishop once more) "the terrible conditions of the very poor," and adding the considerable incomes of sanctity to the more secular riches around them. The gloomy, but august, place of assembly was further crowded with statesmen and counsellors, whose personal distinction, rather than physical hereditary right, gave them the claim to be present. They, too, were men of substance, living in comfort, well-dressed as any peer or bishop of them all; and among them sat a real and actual King, whose sporting interest in the scene endeared him to all sportsmen's hearts. To complete the sense of grandeur and security, there ran the double line of peeresses, who (to quote a reporter with knowledge of such things), "in their furs and winter clothes, gave sombre hues rather than brightness to the picture."

Such was the scene under which Revolution lurked in ambush, and how complete that ambush was! When we speak of Revolution we think of the fervid hands upstretched for liberty in the Tennis Court; we think of the Feast of Pikes, of women in their wretchedness drumming to Versailles, of levies in mass, and a nation risen from the lowest depths against tyrants. "Your mob," says the historian, speaking of Revolution's natural manifestation up to this year of grace:—

"Your mob is a genuine outburst of Nature; issuing from, or communicating with, the deepest deep of Nature. When so much goes grinning and grimacing as a lifeless Formality, and under the stiff buckram no heart can be felt beating, here once more, if nowhere else, is a Sincerity and Reality. Shudder at it; or even shriek over it, if thou must; nevertheless consider it. . . . The thing they will do is known to no man; least of all to themselves. It is the inflammablest immeasurable Firework, generating, consuming itself."

Who would have thought that the House of Lords could ever have shared the title of Revolutionist with that mob? The House of Lords which, so often in our history, did nothing in particular and did it very well—was that to become the inflammablest, immeasurable Firework, generating, consuming itself? Those comfortable gentlemen on padded leather, who had never known hunger since their baby bottle, who had never been driven by the lash of want, and had that morning, probably without exception, enjoyed warm baths—were they to be the genuine outburst of Nature, communicating with her deepest deep? These Lords, who so long had gone grinning and grimacing as a lifeless Formality—were they suddenly to become the symbols of sincerity and of the things that are real? We may shudder at it; but, nevertheless, we must consider it. For, indeed, the thing they will do is known to no man; least of all to themselves.

Listen again to the historian who sounded the depths of man's spirit:—

"Hunger and nakedness," he says, "and nightmare oppression lying heavy on Twenty-five million hearts; this, not the wounded vanities or contradicted philosophies of philosophical Advocates, rich Shopkeepers, rural Noblesse, was the prime mover in the French Revolution; as the like will be in all such Revolutions, in all countries."

The great historian who sounded the depths of the human spirit was obviously wrong. He would have to pay out more line for his plummet now. Here, among our British Revolutionists, is no hunger or nakedness, but flesh of good-liking and winter clothing of the best. No nightmare oppression lies heavy on those five hundred hearts. What, then, is the prime mover in their Revolution? Is it the fear of reducing the broad margin of their pleasures, the fear of being compelled to deny themselves the extra man to dress them, the extra motor to carry them about, the extra coppiece for their poultry? No other nightmare that we can see lies heavy on them. Quadruple the provisions of the Budget, and hardly one of them would yet be forced to work an hour a week for his life. Multiply the Budget by ten, and hunger and nakedness would still not have come within their sight. Hunger and nakedness, said the historian, will be in all countries the prime movers of Revolution. Would he were here now to see the Lords, marshalled in their stiff buckram, grinning and grimacing as lifeless formalities, as they set out to overthrow the established order of their country!

They are out for Revolution: they have raised the flag of disorder; they are prepared for the plunge into chaos—into "temporary chaos." We know what they would say to the bewildered anarchist, or to wild claimants of political rights, who thus threw the land into confusion and wasted her resources by millions together. But the Lords also are aware of the momentous issues to themselves. They will face the risk, says Lord Lansdowne. If need be, they will meet their doom, says the Duke of Norfolk. There is always something impressive about a man, no matter how humble his position, who goes out to meet his doom. Without calling ourselves Revolutionists like the Lords, we can all feel some touch of human pity, some glow of admiration for him who snatches up rifle, revolver, or even a long knife, and takes his stand upon the barricade, in protest against unendurable oppression. He is there for the simplest and highest right of man—the right of himself and his kind to live their own lives as long as they live at all. He has set everything at stake. Nothing but the shame of unbearable tyranny would have driven him to that last act of desperation. For him it is life or death; it is almost certain death, and nothing but an open shirt stands between him and doom. The guns are heard upon the street; the houses crash; the dust arises. Dark figures are seen stealing round the far-off corners; the air shrieks with bullets as their rifles flash in the gathering dusk. The man is at his place, waiting; he draws his old hat over his eyes; if freedom cannot be won, at least he may strike a blow at the agents of oppression. Such a man the present writer has often seen die, and when he sees the Duke of Norfolk going out to meet his doom like that, he will not withhold his admiration.

But the Lords risk nothing, and they know it. If the defeat of their Revolution is the worst their enemies can imagine, what will they suffer or lack? Lord Lansdowne drew a pathetic picture of a "breadwinner's heir" who might find himself so burdened with death duties owing to his great inheritance that he would be very unhappy. Lord Willoughby de Broke revealed the nature of his apprehensions by quoting a wretched parody, which "saw fox-hunting abolished by an order from the State." Such are the terrors which these Revolutionists are called upon to face. Truly, as Lord Ribblesdale well said, these are the sobs of the well-to-do, and nothing is more unimpressive than the crying of the comfortable. Strictly, we may say that the overthrow of an established constitution is always revolutionary. But there is something ludicrous, something that does not work out, in a Revolution for the defence of riches. If it were not for the thought of what must come, we might almost agree to drop the word, lest by its use for the action of Lords we besmirch the honor of those thousands who have died with heroic minds in the Revolutions of Liberty.

THE BEST OF THREE WORLDS.

A LITTLE biography which lies before us new from the Press illustrates, better than any other we have seen, a certain peculiarly British standard of success and the type of man fitted to attain it. Nonconformity as a school of personal character has, in addition to its great contribution to the spiritual life of the nation, played an important part in selecting and educating the modern business man. The son of a Wesleyan minister generally comes of sturdy stock. His upbringing impresses lessons of sobriety and thrift. His outlook upon life is serious, but the position of his father is one which represses excessive idealism. Starting with no nonsense about him, such a boy is likely to go to school with a desire to get on. If he is really clever, being more industrious than other clever boys, he will carry off the prizes; if he is not, he will yet secure the respect of his masters and a useful equipment for what he will have learned to call "the battle of life." After his school days are over, his parents will make a push to send him to college, where he will work hard and secure the prize for an essay on "The Influence of the Reformation on the Gentlemen of England, as shown by Spenser in his Faërie Queene." So our hero enters the arena. "A splendid education, a constitution like iron, and an unbounded belief in his own future, all these he possessed; but he still lacked the one thing which could turn them to account—a definite life-purpose." Before practising virtue, Aristotle recommends us to get a livelihood. The loftier life-purpose must then lie low awhile, for "business is business," and exacts its toll of rigorous devotion to the art of "getting-on." To not a few ambitious young Wesleyans the law has been the stepping-stone to greatness. But our hero, ever following the gleam, and recognising that professional success comes through specialism, fastens himself to Railway Law, and within four years of finishing his articles is legal adviser to the Metropolitan Railway at a critical period of extension and amalgamation. Thus, still a young man, he moves among the great, and grows inured to large financial operations. The commercial instinct, which, as his biographer informs us, "is merely power to see opportunities" is thus "early developed and sagaciously applied." In other words, "the life-purpose" led him at this stage into estate speculation. "He also made judicious deals in house property, occasionally reselling his purchases at a profit without having so much as seen the deeds. But all through the years his penetration has saved him from becoming identified with unsound or questionable undertakings."

What wonder that so sagacious a young man should soon be hand in glove with such magnates as Lord Penrhyn, Sir Edward William Watkin, and Mr. Thomas Andrew Walker, "an equally talented railway contractor." But "judgment" and "sagacity" would of themselves not ensure the life-purpose. Industry, and a ready sacrifice of all lighter purposes, are necessary. True greatness is needed for this, as the following story of Sir Robert Perks (for it is of no less a man we write) will serve to indicate. Mr. Perks had just managed to find time to marry. "On the following Christmas Day he was sitting at dinner at Wykham Park, when a telegram was put into his hand. 'Sir Edward Watkin arrives in London to-night from Manchester, and wishes to see Mr. Perks at Cleveland-row on important business.' Sir Robert handed the message to his wife. It was their first Christmas together after their marriage, so who can blame her that she suggested postponement? Her father supported her. 'Wire, saying you will be there to-morrow,' said he."

Was our "man of destiny" for one weak moment false to his "life-purpose," under such a temptation? Let his biographer complete the story.

"But Sir Robert saw that his opportunity had arrived, and at six o'clock that same evening he was waiting in the railway magnate's library. 'I wondered if you would come,' was the latter's only comment, as he pulled off his heavy fur coat. From that day forward for fourteen years Sir Robert was by Sir Edward Watkin's side in all his battles. Business simply poured into his lap.' Who, after this, will deny that it is character that tells, or will assert that the sordid annals of modern commerce give no scope for heroism?"

What wonder, when a little later on Sir Edward, "pointing straight across the Romney Marshes to Lydd Church, whose square tower was visible in the distance, exclaimed, 'Perks, we ought to have a railway right across there.' At once the idea flashed into Sir Robert's mind, 'Why should he not build the road?' And, turning to Sir Edward, he said, 'If you will allow me, Sir, I will build it.'" And built it was, with a liberal curve, which gives the traveller ample views of Littlestone-on-Sea, as he makes his deliberate approach to that paradise of golfers.

Such concentration and audacity will carry a man far. "The world," said the late FitzJames Stephen, "is made for hard practical men, who know what they want and mean to get it." And yet the saying is but a half-truth. The hard practical man will succeed the better if he keep an ideal aspect for his striving, and can see himself sustained and illuminated by some spiritual enthusiasm. The economy of these two worlds is doubtless difficult for some men to maintain. The loftier motive must not be allowed to be too dominant, or it will interfere with business. It is the peculiar genius of a Sir Robert Perks, as of a Rockefeller, that he can drive religion and business amicably in joint harness. The fervor of puritan piety yields definable economic values, for it couples industry, abstemiousness and forethought with a sense of providential guidance which gives free rein to bold business instinct, so leading its votary to profitable adventures. The doubts and difficulties, even the occasional qualms, of the "practical man" are greatly lightened by this sense of spiritual guidance in the business world.

In return for such assistance the successful business man will naturally feel disposed to do something big for religion, and, being "practical," he will realise his feeling in material shape. The Million-Guinea Fund, with its memorial palace on the site of the late Westminster Aquarium, was a happy and a characteristic achievement of the Methodist financier. From thinking in millions it is but a simple step to thinking in Empires. In 1886 Sir Robert's life purpose, which had never hitherto led him even to attend a political meeting, impelled him to add yet another world, that of politics, to business and religion, fusing the three activities under the congenial form of Methodist Imperialism. For what is Imperialism as expressed in the splendid policy of a Rhodes and a Rosebery but the sublimest union of a divine mission and a commercial asset? Unfortunately, the "guidance" which had served him so well in business played him false in the more slippery field of politics. In conjunction with his noble patron, he made many sacrifices of Liberal principles. With Lord Rosebery he renounced Home Rule, and helped to loose the dogs of war in South Africa. Unfortunately the great political contractor to whom he attached himself, as formerly to Sir William Watkin, has "let him down." Perksian "Methodism" plus finance is not just now an adequate equipment for a Liberal politician, whose tender conscience is newly shocked by a "predatory" Budget. Other leaguers, one or two brought up in the same stern school of puritan principles as he, have deserted their great chief. Almost alone faithful among the faithless, Sir Robert follows him into a dignified and, we trust and believe, a not unprofitable retirement.

For as, with the ample aid of photography, we register the gradation of Sir Robert Perks' ascent from a house at Highbury to a residence at Chislehurst, a mansion in Kensington Palace Gardens, and a "place" in Oxfordshire, we set no limit to the heights of his achievement when he has shaken off all taint of low associations and found the place among "the best people" to which his meritorious qualities entitle him. Such a life (Sir Robert Perks, Bart., M.P., by Denis Crane; Culley), with its vista of future glory, may be recommended as an excellent compendium of Smilesian philosophy. To the intelligent foreigner who desires to study the peculiar qualities of the English "art of getting on," the story will be of great service. Such readers will not refuse their assent to the final judgment of his biographer that "his career is not without suggestiveness, alike for its independence and its consistency, to those whose record is still in the making." It may help them to make the best of three worlds.

THE CHARM OF OLD MUSIC.

THERE is always something ghostly in a concert of old music. One listens to the fairy clatter of the harpsichord. One strains to catch under the harsher and robuster tones of the violins the modest sweetness of the viola di gamba—that "beautiful and ineffectual angel" among stringed instruments. The grave padouane sweeps along with its stately rhythms. But when the shock of surprise is over, when you have remembered of what angelic player in a Bellini altar-piece the bowing of the viol player reminds you, when you have trained your ear to blend the tinkle of the harpsichord with the sighing of the strings, there creeps over you the first touch of an uncanny presence. It is like the cold breath of wind, or the swish of an unseen skirt which accompanies the visitation of the ghost in the haunted castle. There is nothing of this ghostliness in an old picture. A cavalier of Franz Hals laughs and drinks on the canvas with the same robust coloring, the same material body, which was his glory in life. He casts a shadow where he stands. His song rouses an echo in the rafters. He seems as real as that old lady your great-grandmother, who used to alarm you in your childhood by enquiring in her hours of dotage what news there was of Boney, and whether the King were still mad, poor man. It is otherwise with old music. One may see an old canvas with contemporary eyes. But a suite by Christian Bach is never a personal experience. One cannot hear it for the first time. Some magic of reminiscence haunts the ear. One gazes into the faces of the audience, as Shelley used to interrogate the babies on Magdalen Bridge, to see dawning in them the recollection of an innate idea. It is some distant and baffling memory which stirs in the brain. One seeks for the clue as one tries half-awake to recover the plot of a dream. It is like hearing after twenty years the words of some childish spell that used to send us to sleep amid the hobgoblins and shadows of the nursery. Once, it seems to us, we had the ears that vibrated to these rhythms; once we had the feet that moved to these solemn measures. But there mingles with these physical recollections a more conscious historical effort. We see in a pageant before us the gay ladies who haunted Browning when he heard Galuppi's Toccata. We know how Christian Bach and C. F. Abel gave just such concerts as this in eighteenth century London. Dr. Burney disputed with them, when he had heard this very sonata, and Fanny watched the fine ladies in their audience that she might satirise them in "Evelina." The ghosts throng round us—ghosts from books, ghosts from fancy, ghosts from pictures, but above all that hereditary ghost which haunts our own ears, the ghost of that great-grandmother who clattered herself upon her harpsichord, while our grandfather played about her knees.

Such an experience is still a too rare pleasure. Miss Hannah Bryant provided it on Wednesday last in a programme of music revived for the first time in London. It was drawn from two centuries, and included works by J. H. Schein, who was born in 1586—a name unknown to Grove's "Dictionary"—and Christian Bach, who died in 1782. Three items in it must have been written somewhere about the second decade of the seventeenth century. The programme, in short, bridged the time from Shakespeare to Dr. Johnson. One listened, curious to understand from these specimens the place that such music had in the lives of such amateurs as Milton. The three specimens from the early seventeenth century had, to the unaccustomed ear, a startling similarity. One hardly distinguished what was personal in the styles of the three composers. They had all a naive and primitive solemnity—and it is solemnity which such a writer as Milton seems most often to associate with music. The strings moved steadily through padouane and allemande almost as voices move through a chorale, steady, unflagging, and balanced. There were neither pauses nor tricks of rhythm. Each instrument was continually occupied, and the effect on a small scale came near resembling that ultra-modern polyphony in orchestration which employs the full resources of the whole band from the first to the last bar of a composition. The effect was impressive, but it would also have been a little monotonous if it had not been strange. The most individual and the most pleasing of all three compositions was to our thinking the Pasameza of Thomas Simpson—an Englishman who found fame in Germany at a time when our native musicians were an article of export. Here were the beginnings of a free handling of the instruments, a striving for variety, a sense for the dramatic possibilities of relief and change. A century later the last trammels of this antique stiffness, this primitive straightforwardness, had wholly vanished, and the concerto by John Humphries (not to be confused with the vain little Pelham Humfrey of Pepys's diary), with which this delightful concert closed, sparkled with gaiety, audacity, and grace.

We have all of us dropped into the habit of thinking of music as the most universal of all the arts. It has no dialects; it has no dead languages. We are stirred by the manly sweep of an old crusader's hymn. Tchaikowsky moves us more readily than Elgar. Apart from its antiquarian interest, and its alluring historical suggestions, this old music means something to us. Its solemnity hushes, its grace delights us; our blood dances to its rhythms, and obeys in it a certain physical excitement. Yet the amateur who chooses to be honest with himself will make a frank confession. This old music carries with it no emotional appeal. It is as cold as some bridal robe in taffeta which hangs near the great coaches and the painted sedan chairs in the Musée de Cluny. You may listen to it for a couple of hours, admirably played as it was played by Miss Hannah Bryant and her colleagues. But your pulse beats no faster. You go out as you came in, curious, pleased, reflective, but unmoved. You have none of that sense that "virtue has gone out" of you, that you have come through a great, perhaps an awful experience, which weighs upon you after you have listened to great modern music. You are conscious of a dilettante satisfaction, but you have not partaken in a direct emotion.

Was it merely so that these old composers intended to affect us? Music is not, after all, a universal language. Listen to an Albanian ballad singer, with his nasal falsetto and his baffling quarter-tones. You are first amused, then bewildered, and at last moved to mere melancholy. His native hearers meanwhile have been lashed to passion, it may be a warlike and energetic passion. And so it must have been with this old music, which is to us so slight and quaint, even when it is also gracious and pleasing. Men wrote of it then as though it conveyed to them emotions as overwhelming as Beethoven or Tchaikowsky convey to us. It stirred them to tears, when we are coldly curious. That faint suggestion of a graceful melancholy, that just perceptible haunting of a tender sadness, which is for us so oddly sweet, was for them an overpowering experience, as the funeral march in the Eroica is for us. "I am never merry," said Shylock's Jessica, "when I hear sweet music." But merry is precisely what we are when we listen to these old-world passions. We smile one to another, as we listen, just as we smile at the emotions of a gracious child. To the Elizabethan it had "a dying fall—like the sweet south, that breathes upon a bank of violets." Those suggestions of shadowy courtiers moving in unreal measures in demolished halls, those were not the impressions which these solemn dances made on the ears of those for whom they were composed. "Even that vulgar and tavern-musick, which makes one man merry, another mad, strikes in me a deep fit of devotion and a profound contemplation of the first composer." So said Sir Thomas Browne, and so might we say of the secular music of our own time. But the musick which struck in him a "deep fit of devotion" has lost that power over us. We have trained our emotions to obey only the more powerful stimuli of more developed music. We cannot hear these old airs with natural ears. The harpsichord can carry us clattering into faerie, but it cannot stir a direct human emotion. It is for us primarily not a piano, as the viola di gamba is primarily not a cello. We err only when we conclude that because we listen coldly, these old composers wrote coldly. We open the gates of our hearts only to the assault of rushing eloquence in sound. In the old days a sweet suggestion, a gracious hint, carried the soul with violence and by storm.

BROKEN SLUMBER.

It is the season when the greater part of the out-of-doors world is supposed to be asleep. We see, on the face of things, little evidence of the multitudinous life that distracted us with its immense variety in summer, but it needs but little prying beneath the surface to find it in considerable force, and in not very comatose condition. A spadeful of earth turned up in the garden is fairly certain to reveal one of the fat caterpillars that battered lately on fuschia or geranium. It is not tucked away for a very elaborate sleep—just coiled head to tail in a chance cavity of the soil, and it wriggles just a little in its slumber when we turn it out. A sharp frost or two will do us some service among these faintly sleeping devastators and mothers of devastators. We are fortunate among all the inhabitants of the forty-third parallel in these mild winters that encourage only a half-hearted hibernation, which becomes the sleep of rotten death when a sudden abnormal chill breaks in.

A little further away, upon the moors, you will not find creatures taking their winter so frivolously. There, even the caterpillars that intend to take another bite in the spring before changing, take the trouble to wind themselves up for the winter in a waterproof and practically airproof case that will defy the keenest frost. They have the prospect of a good blanket of snow to keep out the most piercing arrows, whereas when snow visits our lowlands it is to the undoing of many creatures. We have seen it spotted far and near with the bodies of caterpillars, great and small, that have thought or felt that the sudden increase of temperature meant spring and all its bounties, and have therefore unburied themselves. Thus will a light sleeper kick the bed-clothes off before the coldest hour, while he who sleeps heavily is unconscious of, and unaffected by, all but the severest changes of temperature.

In the loose shelter of the ivy, and on the warm side of any board that leans against a wall you will find blue-bottles and other flies resting. They are not even so nearly asleep as the caterpillars, for they walk drowsily up and down when they are disturbed, only just lacking the alertness to fly. As for their cousin, the drone-fly, he is still abroad in sunny hours, pretending to take honey from the late ivy blooms and enjoying a warm perch on a sun-kissed stone. No insect is up earlier in spring than this, but there will be a month or two when the garden knows him not. To a far slighter creature belongs the honor of remaining on the wing the whole winter through, for on any sunny mid-day you will see a small company of gnats dance out from their shelter in the euonymus or other evergreen. There can be nothing for them to remain awake for but the bare dance, and we are inclined to say that the stoutest heart, and the bravest spirit in the garden belong to this despised and disliked mosquito.

The sleep of the queen wasp is by no means a half-hearted affair. In pulling down an old cottage we have found dozens of them. The walls were of double boards, the space between packed with moss, and we are told that they are uncommonly cosy walls. At any rate, it is probable that the queen wasps have slept in the moss for nearly two hundred years past. When we found them in October they were crawly things, and sometimes they whirled their wings and gave out a sleepy, whispered buzz, but those that we find now are so stiff in sleep that we cannot move their legs for fear of breaking them. It is like a miracle when the warmth of the fire pours life into these brittle things and makes them "bizz," and even get on the wing to fly away. The armored wasp and the softer tortoise-shell butterfly are true children of the sun. Its absence, even its semi-absence in the long twilight of the year, means complete sleep, and it is only when the hibernaculum has been chosen in a spot afterwards warmed by an artificial fire that they inspire newspaper paragraphs by coming abroad in the season of no flowers. Still more soundly sleep the humble bees, because they always choose wilder spots to lay up in. We never see them again till their appointed time. They sleep so soundly that they can never know if the shrewmouse finds them and eats them with keen gratitude—for the shrewmouse that seems to vanish with the harvest, and in the more decided Continental winter does vanish, is given to a sort of somnambulance in this country.

Only the dormouse of all that ilk really sleeps in our climate. Even he sleeps with a store handy, and almost certainly takes a meal in his sleep. The voles, on the other hand, scarcely make a pretence of sleeping, or even remaining at home, though they do lay up a generous store of nuts, acorns, hips and haws, or whatever grain is grown in their fields. In the coldest months they are foraging to and fro for the food they do not require, driving tunnels under the thin snow, falling victims to the owl even in the grim winter nights, while their cousins, the marmot, the lemming, and their brothers, the Continental voles, sleep fast under the real snow of a more earnest winter. The one clause in the vole's rule-of-thumb that will not vanish is its habit of making a winter store. That comes of the instinct of acquisitiveness that belongs to every created being. What child that sees the earth strewn in autumn with nuts, acorns, haws, and rowan berries, to say nothing of apples and pears, does not wish to gather them into a hoard for no particular reason, but just because they are gatherable things? And so the children of the wild will gather them whether hard winter comes after or no, as the bees store honey even in a land of perpetual summer. It is not a painful necessity that impels them, in the first place, to lay up store, but one of the greatest pleasures in life, that turns out to have been sensible as well as pleasant. Even those æsthetic souls, the birds, are given to hoarding, though not, perhaps, to drawing upon the hoard they make. The bower birds and our own magpies collect glittering and beautiful things; jays, rooks, and other crows bury walnuts, carrion, and other food; the coal tits that come to the bird-table carry away far more than they eat, to lose it in imagined hiding-places in the shrubbery. The storing habit, if it can be called so in their case, has not been turned to account by the birds. Who, after Gilbert White, can imagine a swallow moping through the winter in a hibernaculum? It is only the four-footed animals, and the wonderfully exceptional bee among winged things, that carry the carnal delights of hoarding to the length of making it a source of winter revel.

The reptiles are good sleepers. Their cold blood could not be moved to action by the warmest winter sun. Nothing short of the piercing rays of late April appears grateful to the grass snake. His winter begins as soon as September is gone, and for him the thermometer thereafter only sinks further and further below zero. Secure in the fastness of some distant hedgerow or dry wall, the viper and the grass snake never make a sensation by coming forth in the middle of winter. The slow-worm, on the other hand, equally a creature of the sun, does for some reason sometimes make the mistake of coming out to die on the frozen road. In a church not far away, many newts, both crested and smooth, are resting in the masonry, awaiting the call of the warming ponds in spring. For a Sunday or two, their sleep was so light that, when the church was warmed and the service well under weigh, they came out one by one into the aisle, much to the amusement of the children and the embarrassment of more nervous people. So do the bats stir in the high rafters, for, against all reason, the bat is, with us, one of the lightest of sleepers, coming out again and again as the winter wears, consuming a vast deal of energy in the chase of apparently non-existent insects. Even to stir in your sleep is to use up the food in your tissues. What a fearful draught must be made by the opening of all the tubes to the keen air of December or January! When a merciful winter has stopped the heart with cold, you no longer feel the frost nor respond to it as a living organism, you use up the store of food at a microscopic rate, and in spring you perform the miracle of becoming a live thing once more. It is the half-winters that make the severest demand on living things, and no doubt produce the hardest stock for any eventuality the world can offer. That is why the Englishman, the English rabbit, the English chickweed, have colonised the whole world.

Short Studies.

IN A LITTLE TOWN.

(From the Russian of Anton Tchekov.)

TRANSLATED BY CONSTANCE GARNETT.

THE earth was like an oven. The afternoon sun blazed with such energy that even the thermometer hanging in the excise officer's room lost its head; it ran up to 112.5, and stopped there irresolute. The inhabitants streamed with perspiration like overdriven horses, and were too lazy to mop their faces.

Two of the inhabitants were walking along the market-place in front of the closely-shuttered houses. One was Pocheshihin, the local treasury clerk, and the other was Optimov, the agent, for many years a correspondent of the "Son of the Fatherland" newspaper. They walked in silence, speechless from the heat. Optimov felt tempted to find fault with the local authorities for the dust and disorder of the marketplace, but, aware of the peace-loving disposition and moderate views of his companion, he said nothing.

In the middle of the market place Pocheshihin suddenly halted and began gazing into the sky.

"What are you looking at?"

"Those starlings that flew up. I wonder where they have settled. Clouds and clouds of them. . . . If one were to go and take a shot at them, and were to go and pick them up . . . and then were to go . . . They have settled in the Father Prebendary's garden!"

"Oh, no! They are not in the Father Prebendary's, they are in the Father Deacon's. If you did have a shot at them, you wouldn't kill anything. It's fine shot, and won't carry so far. And why should you kill them, anyway? They're birds destructive to the fruit, it's true, still they're fowls of the air, works of the Lord. The starling sings, you know. . . . And what does it sing, pray? A song of praise. . . . All ye fowls of the air, praise ye the Lord. No! I do believe they have settled in the Father Prebendary's garden."

Three old pilgrim women, wearing bark-shoes and carrying wallets, passed noiselessly by the speakers. Looking enquiringly at the gentlemen who were for some unknown reason staring at the Father Prebendary's house, they slackened their pace, and when they were a few yards off, stopped, glanced at them again, and fell to gazing at the same house themselves.

"Yes, you were right, they have settled in the Father Prebendary's," said Optimov. "His cherries are ripe now, so they have gone there to peck them."

From the garden gate emerged the Father Prebendary himself, accompanied by the sexton. Seeing the attention concentrated upon his abode, and wondering what people were staring at, he stopped, and he, too, as well as the sexton, began looking upwards to find out.

"The Father is going to a service somewhere, I suppose," said Pocheshihin. "The Lord be his succour!"

Some workmen who had been bathing in the river passed between the friends and the priest. Seeing the latter absorbed in contemplation of the heavens, and the pilgrim women, too, standing motionless with their eyes turned upwards, they stood still and stared in the same direction.

A small boy, leading a blind beggar, and a peasant, carrying a tub of stinking fish to throw into the market place, did the same.

"There must be something the matter, I should think," said Pocheshihin, "a fire or something. But there's no sign of smoke anywhere. Hey! Kouzma," he shouted to the peasant, "what's the matter?"

The peasant made some reply, but Pocheshihin and Optimov did not catch it. Sleepy-looking shopmen made their appearance at the doors of all the shops. Some plasterers at work on a warehouse near left their ladders and joined the workmen.

The fireman on duty in the watch-tower halted in his round, and after looking steadily at them for a few minutes, went down. The watch-tower was left deserted. This seemed suspicious.

"There must be a fire somewhere. Don't shove me, you damned swine!"

"Where do you see the fire? What fire? Pass on, gentlemen! I ask you civilly!"

"It must be burning within doors!"

"Asks us civilly, and keeps poking with his elbows. Keep your hands to yourself! Though you are a head constable, you have no sort of kind of right to make free with your fists!"

"He's trodden on my corn! Ah! I'll crush you!"

"Crushed? Who's crushed? Lads! a man's been crushed!"

"What's the meaning of this crowd? What do you want?"

"A man's been crushed, please your honour!"

"Where? Pass on! I ask you civilly! I ask you civilly, you blockhead!"

"You may shove a peasant, but you daren't touch a gentleman! Hands off!"

"Did you ever know such people? There's no doing anything with them by fair words, the devils! Sidorov, run for Akim Danilitch! Look sharp. It'll be the worse for you, gentlemen! Akim Danilitch is coming, and he'll give it to you! You here, Parfen? A blind man, and at his age too! Can't see, but he must be like other people, and won't do what he's told. Smirnov, write his name down!"

"Yes, sir! And shall I write down the men from Purov's? That man there with the swollen cheek, he's from Purov's works."

"Don't put down the men from Purov's. It's Purov's birthday to-morrow!"

The starlings rose in a black cloud from the Father Prebendary's garden, but Pocheshihin and Optimov did not notice them. They stood staring into the air, wondering what could have attracted such a crowd, and what it was looking at.

Akim Danilitch appeared. Still munching and wiping his lips, he cut his way into the crowd, bellowing:

"Firemen! be ready! Disperse! Mr. Optimov, disperse! You'll suffer for it! Instead of writing all kinds of things about decent people in the papers, you'd better by far try to behave yourself conformably! No good ever comes of reading the papers!"

"Kindly refrain from reflections upon literature!" cried Optimov, hotly. "I am a literary man, and I will allow no one to make reflections upon literature! Though, as is the duty of a citizen, I respect you as a father and superior!"

"Firemen, turn the hose on them!"

"There's no water, please your honour!"

"Don't answer me! Go and get some! Look sharp!"

"How can we, your honour? The major's taken the fire brigade horses to drive his aunt to the station."

"Disperse! Back there! Go to the devil! Is that to your taste! Put him down, the damned rascal!"

"I've lost my pencil, please your honour!"

The crowd grew larger and larger. There is no knowing what proportions it might have reached, if the new organ just arrived from Moscow had not fortunately begun playing in the tavern close by. Hearing their favorite air, the crowd gasped and rushed off to the tavern. So nobody ever knew why the crowd had assembled, and Pocheshihin and Optimov had by now forgotten the existence of the starlings who were the innocent authors of the disturbance.

An hour later the town was still and silent again. And only a solitary figure was to be seen, the fireman pacing round and round on the watch-tower.

The same evening Akim Danilitch sat in the grocer's shop drinking limonade gazeuse and brandy, and writing:

"In addition to the official report, I venture, your Excellency, to append a few supplementary observations of my own. Father and benefactor! In very truth, but for the prayers of your virtuous spouse in her elegant villa near the town, there's no knowing what might not have come to pass! What I have been through this day, I can find no words to express! The efficiency of Krushensky and of the major of the fire brigade are beyond all praise! I am proud of such devoted servants of our country. As for me, I did all that a weak man could do, whose only desire is the welfare of his neighbor; and sitting here in the bosom of my family, I thank God with tears in my eyes that He spared us bloodshed! In absence of evidence, the guilty parties remain in custody. But I am thinking of releasing them in a week or so. It was their ignorance that led them astray."

Communications.

THE CHARACTER OF THE INDIAN POLICE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your contemporary, the "Spectator," published in its last issue the following grave statement by a correspondent about the Indian police:—

"The Indian Courts know (italics not mine) that torture is occasionally used to extort false confessions. They therefore suspect every confession to be false, and, in practice, decline to convict on a confession unless it is strongly corroborated."

In 1902 Lord Curzon, then Viceroy of India, found it necessary to appoint a commission of leading Indians and Anglo-Indians to investigate the growing scandals in connection with the administration of the police in India. It was presided over by Sir Andrew Fraser, late Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal. It visited every province in India and examined upwards of 600 witnesses. Its report was presented to Parliament in 1905, and contained the following sentences:—

"Everywhere we went we heard the most bitter complaints of the corruption of the police. . . ."

"The forms of this corruption are very numerous. . . ."

The police-officer may levy a fee or receive a present for every duty he performs. . . . Suspects and innocent persons are bullied and threatened into giving information they are supposed to possess. . . . If, in the police-officer's opinion, enough evidence is not thus obtained to secure a conviction, he will not hesitate to bolster up his case with false evidence. . . . Deliberate association with criminals in their gains, deliberately false charges against innocent persons, on the ground of private spite or village faction, deliberate torture of suspected persons, and other most flagrant abuses occur occasionally. What wonder is it that the people are said to dread the police?" (Italics mine.)

This terrible indictment—not surpassed by Mr. Gladstone's denunciation of the Neapolitan police in 1861—has been in the hands of the Government of India since 1903. What has been done to remove this blot upon our civilisation? Why, sir, hardly a mail comes from India without bringing fresh evidence of this intolerable oppression of our fellow-subjects; evidence, not from agitators, but from British judicial officers of the highest standing, nay, even from the police themselves.

In the very last Annual Report of the Commissioner of the Calcutta Police it is admitted that out of a force of about 3,500 men, no less than 17 men were dismissed for taking bribes, 23 for "illegal acts" (the nature of which may be easily surmised), and 8 for crimes of which they were convicted in Court. In addition to this "appalling record"—as the Anglo-Indian "Statesman" calls it—there is a further record of "departmental punishments" in which inspectors, sub-inspectors, sergeants, head constables, and constables, to the number actually of 500, are included.

I call attention to the Bengal police (of whom no less than 65 per cent. are illiterates), because they are supposed to be the best of the Indian police, and because it is upon the secret evidence of these men that gentlemen of culture and repute, like Mr. Ashwini Kumar Dutt and Mr. Krishnar Kumar Mitra, have been dragged from their homes without charge or trial and flung into interminable imprisonment in common jails.

Corruption is taken so much as a matter of course that last June Mr. Justice Alston, in the Allahabad High Court, when a sub-inspector was charged with extorting a bribe of 50 rupees for admitting a prisoner to bail, is reported to have said that "it was useless to affect ignorance of the fact that such things as the sub-inspector was accused of doing in this case were done, and, although this particular occurrence might or might not have happened, no one with any experience of the country could say that it was improbable."

So much for corruption, which is bad enough, but still nothing to the graver charges of deliberate torture brought by Sir Andrew Fraser's commission. With shame and pain it must be said there is abundant evidence from the records of the Courts of Justice week by week that no more effective steps have been taken to stop this scandal. Occasionally, indeed, there are convictions of the police for torture. More often, owing partly to the terror of the witnesses, and partly to the fatally close connection between the police executive and the inferior judiciary, the cases fail, or are hushed up. No one with any intimate knowledge of the facts thinks that Sir A. Fraser and his colleague overstated the case. Let me allude to one or two recent trials in Bengal and in the Punjab by way of illustration.

In the Midnapur conspiracy appeal heard by the High Court of Calcutta, presided over by the Chief Justice of Bengal, the three prisoners had been convicted, two of them on their own confession, of a conspiracy to use bombs for criminal purposes, and of being found in possession of them. The convictions were set aside on the ground that the confessions were illegally extorted by the police, and that the theory of the defence that the police themselves manufactured and placed a bomb on the premises of the accused was not one to be wholly rejected.

The statement reported to have been made by counsel for the defence in open court was this:—

"These men were marched off to the lock-up with ropes tied round their waists, and some of them were handcuffed. They were kept in the police-station, and attempts were made to induce two of them to confess. All kinds of torture were inflicted on the third. He was beaten and stoned. The orthodox methods of torture were again adopted after fifty years."

The finding of the Court was to the effect that the confessions were extorted from the prisoners by ill-treatment, by illegal confinement when untried in solitary condemned cells, by being prevented from sleeping, and by moral pressure of the following cruel kind. The parents of the prisoner, Santosh, were threatened with pains and penalties if their son did not confess. They were brought time after time to their son's cell to urge him to confess to a great crime which he had never committed, in order to save them from the punishment threatened by the police. At last, after holding out many days, the unfortunate young man gave way, and when he had confessed, he was made use of to bring pressure upon the second prisoner to do the same. A confession was thus at length procured from him also; but, as the High Court said, "when the magistrate accepted this confession, he ignored the all-important fact that the prisoner had been from the 7th to the 15th August in police custody, and the methods employed to procure his statement."

As to the third prisoner, the Court summed up its view of the proceedings of the police by asking "who would be safe if he were liable to be convicted on a charge so wide, and supported by evidence so indefinite?" These three men so acquitted were all that remained of no less than 154 men of all classes and ages originally charged with this conspiracy by the police. The judgment of the High Court was delivered on the 1st June. An inquiry was ordered into the grave charges against the police, at the head of whom was a European officer; but we are still in ignorance of the result. All that is known is that the police officials chiefly implicated have been given "long leave of absence" by the Government of Bengal.

So much for Bengal. I turn to the Punjab. In March of this year three Indians were charged by the Punjab police with falsely accusing three of their fellow-countrymen of the murder of a woman who had disappeared from a village called Islamia. It was upon an anonymous letter, presumably alleged to have been concocted by the prisoners, that the police proceeded against the supposed murderers. For eighteen days they kept these unfortunate men in close custody until they had succeeded in extorting from them by what the Court called "ill-treatment" confessions that they had murdered the woman, and from another that he had actually seen her body buried. Further proceedings were dropped when it appeared that, in fact, no murder had ever taken place, and a few weeks afterwards the woman appeared alive and well, having been apparently got out of the way by someone alleged to have instigated the prosecution of the three supposed murderers. The Judges of the Chief Court of Lahore held that "it would be an insult to anyone's intelligence to pretend that these absolutely false confessions were procured otherwise than in consequence of pressure from some of the investigating (police) officers . . . and the fact that the men accused of making false charges, in order to avoid ill-treatment (for which theory the confession procured from the accused afforded very serious warrant) repeated a story that was put into their mouths" could be no evidence of their guilt.

In consequence of these startling facts found by the Chief Court, the Punjab Government held a secret inquiry on the police, and in due course the Governor published a "Resolution" stating that "in the opinion of the Lieutenant-Governor the facts reported indicate that the police proceedings and especially the refusal to proceed on uncorroborated confessions were correct."

On June 12th last, a judgment was delivered by Mr. C. L. Dundas, the Sessions Judge at Rawal Pindi, in the Punjab, in a case in which six men were charged with murder mainly upon the confessions of guilt extorted from them. The learned Judge said:—

"The police investigation has been not only unsatisfactory, but also open to more serious charges, which have been freely made. The main charge made by the defence is torture; but bribery has also been alleged. . . . As to the torture charge . . . there is no doubt that Ghulam Mohammed had and still has marks on his wrists and ankles. By order of the Deputy Commissioner an investigation was made. Colonel Clark thought that the marks did not tally with the account given by Ghulam Mohammed, and might have been self-inflicted. But I think it very inconclusive. Ghulam Mohammed himself says that when brought to Pandar he was told that if his statements to the Superintendent of Police and Magistrate were not satisfactory, he would be taken back to Kuttar, the scene of his former racking, and again ill-treated. The Sub-Inspector took Ghulam, together with a witness Bakk, to Mussee. . . . He got Bakk's statement recorded, which statement Bakk has since entirely repudiated as extorted."

"The confession has led to no corroborative result whatever, and its value must be of the smallest. . . . The other evidence is of the worst. . . . The police investigation in this case certainly seems to call for enquiry."

Here it will be observed that the marks of "racking" by the police in March were still visible on the prisoners in June, and that the learned judge demanded an enquiry into the conduct of the police.

Whether the Executive has held any enquiry, and, if so, with what result, neither Parliament nor India is allowed to know, though five and a half months have passed since the judgment was delivered. No information can be obtained from the representative of the India Office in Parliament. The grim fact stands out at present uncontradicted that the police used by the British Administration in the Punjab can so torture innocent people by racking them as to compel them to admit having murdered and buried a woman who all the time was alive and well.—Yours, &c.,

FREDERIC MACKARNESS.

[We feel that we cannot refuse publication to Mr. Mackarness's statement of what we cannot but regard as a prima facie case for inquiry into the character and methods of the Indian police. The subject has long been a thorn in the side of the Indian Government, and we feel confident that Lord Morley, one of the most competent of administrators as well as the most humane of men, will not be content to leave the matter at the point where Sir Andrew Fraser's Commission, after a statement of the most extreme gravity, left it.—ED. NATION.]

(To be concluded.)

Letters to the Editor.

HOW TO DEAL WITH THE LORDS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the second article of your issue of the 20th November you refer to an interview with me, reported in the "Daily News" of the 18th November, remarking that a proposal (somewhat rashly made by me) to the effect that the King should be asked his consent to the creation of Peers was inadmissible.

Now, as it is desirable that all friends of our ancient Constitution and all supporters of the rights of the Commons and the people should, as far as possible, be seen to be in agreement, and, since I really am in agreement with the principles you lay down, I write to define the essentials of my requirements, and to explain the intrusion of a method in an interview that I should have confined to a declaration of those requirements.

In business it is usual to say, not only what is required, but also how the requirement is to be met. In the hurry of a newspaper interview, I forgot for the moment I was speaking on politics, and not on business, and I allowed myself to show a method as well as to declare an object.

For this I apologise. At the same time, I had not forgotten that the future position of a second Chamber was the most important of all the constitutional questions raised by the ill-advised action of the House of Lords. On the contrary, I took it for granted that if the creation of new peers became necessary, Mr. Asquith would first state the changes that would bring our second Chamber into touch with the progressive thought of the nation, and that would for ever prevent it from again becoming the constant and obedient slave of a small political caste, and that then he would only recommend for a title those who could accept, and, when a General Election had again returned the Liberals to power, could support these proposals, which by that time would have received the approval of the people.

What I had in my mind when the representative of the "Daily News" interviewed me was this—that the Government should not for one moment relinquish any of the ancient privileges of the House of Commons or admit any of the revolutionary claims of the Lords.

It was necessary, therefore, that the Lords should not be allowed either to hang up the Budget or themselves to call a General Election.

By the method that occurred to me these positions were secured. But I don't care about methods. So long as the experts do what has to be done, quickly, effectively, and for ever, it may be left for them to provide the machinery.

The needs of the crisis I put in the following order:—

1. That under no circumstances must the Government yield one jot or one tittle of the ancient rights of the Commons. If this were done, we should lose all interest in the coming election, and the cause would have been lost before the fight had begun.

2. That Mr. Asquith, when the proper time has arrived, should put the issue clearly before the people—in what way he conceives the Constitution has been strained, in what way he would render it secure for the future.

It is clear that we can neither speak nor work with conviction till we know for what it is we are called on to speak and work.

3. That, in addition to defending historical rights and customs, we must bring the second Chamber into line with modern thought and progress.

Those Peers who are called on to revise or improve the legislation of the Commons may be either in general agreement with the ideas that an election has put forward or in general opposition, but they must no longer be always in blind opposition to Liberal and in blind agreement with Tory legislation and finance.

If you want legislation to stop, let the second Chamber be Tory when the people are Liberal, and Liberal when the people are Tory. If, on the other hand, you think that the laws of our country are still capable of improvement, let the second Chamber be Liberal when the people are Liberal, and Tory when the people are Tory.—Yours, &c.,

ARTHUR CHAMBERLAIN.

Moor Green Hall, Birmingham,
November 24th, 1909.

[The adjective, "inadmissible," which Mr. Chamberlain quotes, only referred to this prospect of an immediate creation of peers for the purpose of passing the Budget. We thought, however, that within his proposal the lines of ultimate action by the Government might be found.—ED. NATION.]

MAKING THE FOREIGNER PAY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Perhaps, although an opponent, you may allow me to answer the arguments on this question. May I point out that, as Mr. Haywood allows "that if a foreigner chooses to reduce the price of the goods he sells to us by 10 per cent., there is no protection at all," he therefore directly admits that the foreigner may pay the 10 per cent. import tariff? Nothing, surely, could be clearer, and our Government would get the import duty paid by the foreigner.

Mr. Haywood says "that we live cheaply." Our rich people can buy their luxuries cheaply, with the exception of alcohol and tobacco, because they can buy the surplus and bounty-fed goods of the protected nations, or the goods made by cheap colored labor; but our import taxation under so-called Free Trade is greater per head than that of almost any other nation, and it is all on food, drink, and tobacco, and the working classes not only pay far the greater part of it, but also, on tea, coffee, tobacco, and alcohol, the working classes and the very poor pay far more in proportion to value than do the rich.

It is also admitted by Liberals that our own land is heavily taxed, and Mr. Asquith himself admitted that this was a tax on our agricultural produce. It is, therefore, also admitted that wheat, meat, fruit, and other agricultural productions grown in this country are also considerably taxed.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie is reported to have written in one of his latest publications "that the system of import taxation was very different in Great Britain to what it was in the United States, to the great advantage of the great mass of the American people, because, although in America the import taxation was heavy, it was chiefly put on the luxuries of the rich which the poor never bought, and that in this way America raised about 45 million pounds a year which did not affect the poor, whilst in Great Britain all the import taxation was on food, drink, and tobacco, the necessities or simple luxuries of the poor."

The present Lord Morley said, at Manchester in 1903, "that it was a matter of life and death to us to persuade other nations to rally to the Free Trade flag and come round to the open door." Can Mr. Haywood explain why this is a matter of life and death to us if our Free Trade policy is such an immense benefit to us?

Mr. Churchill told us lately at Birmingham "that millions of our people were more miserable than those of any other country in the world, and struggled under conditions worse than barbarism." He forgot to add that this was after sixty years of the enormous benefits which Free Traders say that our nicknamed Free Trade system confers on us, and especially on our working people. I am, therefore, justified in saying that, according to Liberal leaders themselves, there are great doubts as to the wisdom of our continuing our present system, especially when it is remembered that all the other great countries of the world and our own self-governing daughter nations believe in the theory, and practise the system, of protecting their own industries and working people from unfair foreign competition.

Your correspondent, "Manufacturer," says "the cry of taxing the foreigner is a frigid and calculated lie." I have already quoted your other Free Trade correspondent as having directly and distinctly admitted that the foreigner may pay the tax.

We admittedly tax our own people about 300 million pounds a year in Imperial and local taxation for the upkeep of our country and market. Why is it impossible to tax the competing goods of the foreigner for the benefit of using that same market?

Our own people have to pay on the average from about £10 to £15 on every hundred pounds' worth of agricultural and manufactured goods which they produce for our own home market. Why, with the exception of alcohol, tobacco, and cocoa, should foreigners be allowed to use our market for their competing goods without paying anything to enter it? I can see no sense in taxing our own people considerably and letting in the foreigner entirely untaxed.

If all the women living north of Shrewsbury had to pay 3s. on each couple of fowls for the benefit of selling in Shrewsbury Market, whilst all the women to the south could use it without paying anything, would the women to the north go home with the same amount of money in their pockets as the women from the south? If not, they would have paid part, perhaps most, of the tax.

Your correspondent does not say whether his goods have to compete with an untaxed supply made in the country into which they are imported. When we can send goods to America which the Americans do not make, then I agree that, as a rule, perhaps almost always, the Americans would pay, because there would be no competition with an untaxed supply.

If, however, the Americans made the same goods as "Manufacturer," could he get the same price for his goods in America if the average American tariff, of about £72 on every hundred pounds' worth, had to be paid to the American Government before his goods were allowed to enter America? Each country would have to pay its own taxes for the upkeep of its own country and market, but on the goods sent by "Manufacturer" there would have to be paid 72 per cent. extra. Could he reduce his men's wages and his own profit sufficiently to beat the Americans who had an advantage of £72 on every hundred pounds' worth produced?

If he can do so, then Mr. Asquith was wrong when he said in 1894 "that the tariff walls which excluded us from foreign markets were every day getting higher and higher."

"Manufacturer" does not seem to be aware, as pointed out by Mr. Andrew Carnegie and American Presidents, "that home commerce is doubly profitable, because with home commerce both the traders are British, both gain by the transaction, and both employ British labor, and all the money is kept in the country." With foreign commerce only one is a Briton and only one employs British labor, and the money of one of the traders and the wages of his working people are spent among foreign tradesmen and shopkeepers.

With highly manufactured imported foreign articles like motor-cars or smart dresses, probably more than 75 per cent. is actually paid in wages to foreign working people.

Under this Free Trade Budget these luxuries do not pay a halfpenny of import duty, but the raw tobacco of the working man is taxed about 600 per cent., his whisky nearly, if not quite, 400 per cent., his beer about 31 per cent., and his tea from about 75 to 100 per cent. This seems, perhaps, the most curious part of this nicknamed Free Trade Budget, which is said by Liberals to be of such great benefit to the working classes.

If a sufficient import duty was put on the 140 millions of imported manufactures to cause us to make 70 million pounds' worth in this country, it must be admitted that at least, and probably more, than 35 million pounds would be paid in wages to our people, which are now paid to working people abroad. Our Government and local authorities between them would get the 10 to 15 per cent. of internal taxation on these home manufactures, and also the import duties on the 70 million pounds' worth of manufactures still imported. In this way we should gain millions in wages and in revenue. On the other hand, as it is now, we get the 140 million pounds' worth of imported goods, but no British labor is employed in making them, and our Government gets no revenue from the importation of any of the whole amount.

It is by no means certain that in many cases a scientific tariff would increase the cost of production, and in some cases in America the reverse has been proved to be the case; the reason, of course, being that if our manufacturers had fair play, and if so many of them had not always hanging over them the danger of having their market broken by the importation of surplus goods from abroad, they could manufacture in larger quantities and therefore more cheaply. There is also the fact that if we had preferential trading within the Empire, we should have a larger and more secure market within its huge boundaries.

In assuming that Tariff Reform will increase the cost of production, I conclude that among other things your correspondent thinks it will increase wages; this, and regular employment, are two of the chief objects of those who are advocating Tariff Reform and imperial preference. If this is so, your correspondent is of the same opinion as the great John Bright when he wrote to the American manufacturer to try to persuade him to resist Protection in America. He wrote: "You will find that Protection will not only bring increased profit to manufacturers, but will be used to procure higher wages and shorter hours of labor for American working people." I have always thought that the reason Radicals resisted the Aliens Act so violently was because they wanted the cheap undesirable aliens to be imported so that wages might be kept down, and also for this same reason the present Government have done all they can to make the Aliens Act as useless as possible. British working people may depend upon it that cheap imported goods must mean unemployment and cheap underpaid men and women, because their wages must come down low enough to enable us to compete with the cheap imported goods, if we are to be able to compete at all. So-called Free Traders might as well recognise that this tariff question must be faced if only because Japan and China are becoming manufacturing nations, and it will be impossible for our people to compete against the cheap imported goods made by yellow labor working long hours for from about 8d. to 1s. 6d. a day. If Free Traders are right in saying that what they call Free Trade means cheapness, it is bound to ruin us because we are not a cheap race. I have put these same kind of arguments over and over again in the House of Commons, and so far as I can remember no answer has been given. Perhaps we may have an answer from "THE NATION." At all events, I think it is a fair challenge to all the admittedly very clever people who call themselves Free Traders.—Yours, &c.,

ROWLAND HUNT.

House of Commons,
November 22nd, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—An English firm intimately known to the writer had, for a period, a warehouse in New York for the sale of their product. In New York the product was placed to the debit of one account and the duty, paid by the warehouse, to another. When a sale was made the two amounts were credited proportionately, and the buyer debited first with the product, and, second, with the duty that had been paid upon it.

Who, in reality, paid the duty?—Yours, &c.,

INQUIRER.

Ramhill, Lancashire.

THE CRISIS AND WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Every democrat must feel a thrill of joy at the prospect of the conflict with the Lords, and now, at last, we are at grips with reality in politics, and, not only on the main issue itself, the right of the Commons to the control of the national purse, but on every subsidiary issue, on the incidence of our taxation and the manner of spending it, on what shall and what shall not be the method and spirit of twentieth-century legislation, the Government have a clear claim to fight for the people against the Peers.

On one point only is their case weak. So long as the Liberal Party has no definite answer to give to the suffragist movement, its claim to be fighting the battle of the people is deprived of half its force, while it will be impossible for the party to weld all the forces of democracy into a united whole. In the interests alike of the women's movements and of the national cause, I appeal to the Government to make clear what, in the event of their receiving a second lease of power, they mean to do for women's suffrage.

It is perfectly true that the issue at the coming elections must be the Lords' veto. Ministers have a perfect right to claim that further progress is impossible until this preposterous obstacle has been removed. Granted victory at the polls, however, this need only be the word of the first session of the new Parliament, which, with the Lords' veto out of the way, should be more fruitful of good than any of its predecessors. We cannot reasonably expect women to enter whole-heartedly into the conflict, to recognise that the people's battle is their battle, unless they are given clearly to understand that one of these fruits will be the enfranchisement of their sex.

I am aware that some members of the Cabinet do not approve of women's suffrage, and also that many Liberals and some doctrinaire Socialists are afraid of the electoral consequences of the enfranchisement of women on the terms at present granted to men. Women have, quite rightly, concentrated on the demand for a Bill reversing those legal decisions, Chorlton v. Lings and Beresford Hope v. Lady Sandhurst, which have so long prevented them from claiming any public rights or fulfilling any public functions not specifically granted to their sex. It being obvious, too, that the House of Lords stood in the way of any attempt to extend the franchise further to men, women have cared very little for any offers of the suffrage as part of a measure for democratising the franchise generally. Of what advantage would it have been to women to have been included in the recent Bill to abolish plural voting, and to have shared in its rejection by the Peers? Women may be excused for paying little heed to Mr. Asquith's offer to adopt an amendment to the next Reform Bill, if carried by a free vote of the Commons, so long as it was pretty certain such a Bill would share the fate of so many others distasteful to the Tory Party. They insist, and naturally, on a measure breaking down the sex disability, not weighted with provisions which would make the Lords reject the whole. But, with the limitation of the Lords' veto, Liberalism will have a free hand, and I submit that, in asking for this, the Government should renew Mr. Asquith's pledges in such a manner that women may know that their enfranchisement will certainly follow a victory over the Lords.

Mr. Asquith's pledge, which was virtually to leave the inclusion of women at the next extension of the franchise to the judgment of the House, however unsatisfactory to women at the time, certainly provided a bridge whereby Ministers not favorable to women's suffrage themselves could yet agree to it without loss of credit. Anti-suffragist Ministers, in a House with so large a suffrage majority as there is in the present, are in a position not unlike that of the House of Lords. We blame the Lords for resisting the will of the elected representatives of the nation; we do not demand that they shall personally approve of the legislation they are called upon to pass. It appears to me that anti-suffragist Ministers may well accept the mandate of the House, and assent to a change which has been approved by the last three Parliaments at least, and must, in any event, soon come about.—Yours, &c.,

BROUGHAM VILLIERS.

November 23rd, 1909.

HOUSE OF COMMONS CANDIDATES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Allow me, as a Socialist and a member of the Labor Party, to suggest:—

(1) That the Liberal leaders frankly lay their cards on the table, and tell us definitely what they propose to do with the House of Lords.

(2) That, if feasible, the coming election be fought out, not between Liberals and Labor Party men on the one side and Conservatives and Unionists on the other, but between House of Commons and House of Lords candidates.

If the first suggestion were adopted it would reassure those of us who rather fear we are in for another sham fight, and, at the same time, prevent our sentiments and enthusiasms being exploited all for nothing or next to nothing: while the second would ensure that every candidate on the progressive side would be representative of both parties, and thus there would be no need for the Labor Party to fear the loss of its independence as the result of playing second fiddle to its great rival.—Yours, &c.,

I. L. P.

November 23rd, 1909.

THE SECOND APPEAL TO ESAU.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Surely since Jacob induced Esau to sell his birth-right for a mess of pottage no such disgraceful appeal has been made to any nation as that made by the Brewers to the English people to barter their liberties for a pot of beer.

And how remarkable is the simultaneity of this beer-pot appeal, Lord Lansdowne's notice of motion, and Mr. Bal-four's Manchester speech. Let us hope, however, that the response of our people will be an illustration of the truth of the saying, "in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird."—Yours, &c.,

G. M. MINCHIN.

November 24th, 1909.

STANLEY, EMIN, AND LIVINGSTONE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The interesting review of Sir Henry Stanley's "Autobiography" in your current issue contains one or two sentences which excite a little surprise as coming from a writer evidently so well acquainted with his subject. Your reviewer says:—"Emin Pasha was rescued, but owing to some national or personal peculiarity, he was almost indifferent to his rescue, and presently having gone over to the enemy, he met exactly the kind of death from which Stanley came to preserve him."

It is a little puzzling to know who "the enemy" were to whom Emin went over. He entered the German service, it is true, but in what sense could Germany be called "the enemy" in 1890 or, indeed, at any other time?

But, beyond this, is it not clear, from Emin's letters to Mackay, to Dr. Felkin, and to the Secretary of the Anti-Slavery Society, that he never expected or wished to be relieved in the sense in which Stanley proposed to "relieve" him? He wished to maintain his ground in the Equatorial Province, unless absolutely compelled to leave, and there is no reason to suppose that, had he been supplied with the ammunition and stores he asked for, and left to deal with the situation in his own way, he could not have done so. Instead of which, Stanley, having wasted (unavoidably, no doubt, given the previous circumstances) the greater part of the "relief" stores on the road, all but deported him by force. The monstrous mismanagement of that ill-fated expedition arose chiefly from three causes—the choice of the Congo route, for which, as is well known, we have to thank the King of the Belgians—the engagement of Tippu Tip as an official of the Congo State, and a third which, with all admiration for Stanley's great qualities, it is impossible to overlook. Without stirring up the miserable quarrels and recriminations of that time, it must be conceded that none of his subordinates left behind with the rear-guard was equal to the very difficult and dangerous task entrusted to him. Why did he select men with no special qualifications and no previous experience of African travel, when he might have had the services of Joseph Thomson, for instance? The answer lies in one fatal weakness—he was not great enough to endure another near the throne.

Your reviewer speaks of the disappointment felt when Livingstone did not return with Stanley in 1872. That such was the case I am aware, inter alia, from the recollections of those who attended the meeting of the British Association in that year; but surely it seems a little unreasonable. It must have been well known that Livingstone's heart was set upon finishing his exploration of the Nile Sources, and it would have been most unfair to hold Stanley responsible for this, or expect him to bring the Doctor away against his will, as he afterwards brought Emin. It is disappointing to find that the late Mr. Fox Bourne's lucid and striking account of the latter transaction, in "The Other Side of the Emin Pasha Relief Expedition" (Chatto & Windus, 1891), is not better known.—Yours, &c.,

A. WERNER.

8, Mill Lane, N.W.

November 22nd, 1909.

PRAGMATISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is quite true, as Mr. L. Crook points out in his letter on Pragmatism, that in the last resort the proof of truth lies in its usefulness. But it is impossible to determine what exactly will be "useful" to the future. We must act on faith, as Professor James and your correspondent urge, but we should first weigh the balance of probabilities apparent to us. When action is immediate and imperative, "suspension of judgment" is catastrophic. It is synonymous with Hamlet and failure.

Thought is a process by which we arrive at action, and the laws which govern thought and action are different. This is a sweeping generalisation, and, like all such, could easily be shown to fail. I know there is no exact line of demarcation between the two, but, to facilitate expression, generalisations are convenient. On questions that are primarily intellectual, it is neither possible nor advisable to bind oneself to those definite decisions which are necessary in order to achieve action. Let me illustrate very simply. Generally, I consider the evidence in the recent Steinheil case as conflicting and unsatisfactory; therefore I suspend my judgment. I am not for this reason an "impartial superhuman being." I am merely thinking in a rational manner, and surely no one will say that such a suspension of judgment will perniciously affect my actions. But if I want to take a taxicab from Euston to Trafalgar Square, and I stand on the station balancing with philosophic impartiality the relative values of the various cabs and their drivers, I should probably remain there for hours, possibly for ever.

It is, I contend, action alone that forces the issue. The defect of the Pragmatist position is that it regards action as immediate rather than ultimate. A protracted "suspension of judgment" is to be encouraged until the moment of action arrives.—Yours, &c.,

A. E. Y.

Strand, W.C., November 22nd, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—No wonder that Mr. Crook's letter reveals a state of intellectual chaos.

The whole position of Pragmatism is based on a definition of Truth. "Truth," says the Pragmatist, "is that which works and is of practical use."

No miserable hair-splitting about this. We need not trouble to think any further. Anything which is attractive, influential, probable, we shall call true.

Unfortunately, there is an answer to the Pragmatist position. It is a brief one. The answer is: your definition of Truth is splendid; but it is not what we mean by Truth.

Smith, a modern, believes in immortality. Lucretius, of old, did not. Then immortality is true for Smith, says the Pragmatist, untrue for Lucretius!

A lunatic believes he is the Emperor of China; therefore he is the Emperor of China.

Is it not time that a serious protest was made by Sanity and Thought against a doctrine which is influencing to no small degree the United States of America?—Yours, &c.,

JAMES ELROY FLECKER.

10, Jesus Lane, Cambridge,
November 23rd, 1909.

THE ULTIMATE BASIS OF AUTHORITY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Dr. Massie has addressed his last letter to reasonable beings. As one possessing a claim, albeit perhaps somewhat shadowy, to that appellation, will you permit me to point out a rather obvious fallacy in his reasoning? He would refuse the franchise to women because, so he asserts, the ultimate basis of authority is force. To which I reply: Do citizens possess votes in order that they may select to represent them those more skilled in military or naval strategy or those whom they consider best adapted to govern their country? If the former, I quite agree that women should not possess the vote. Such social systems may be found in full force amongst the Pathans of the Zakka Khel or the Masai of East Africa. But surely we have advanced just a little beyond this stage of barbarism. We select our members of Parliament, not on account of their military or naval qualifications, but because they possess certain opinions and convictions, often based on considerations of a highly complex nature, regarding the proper lines on which a Government should be conducted. Of the fitness or unfitness of candidates to sit in Parliament, women, then, providing they educate themselves sufficiently, should be as well qualified to decide as male voters.

My household property depends for safety against the bold, bad burglar on the police force. But I do not consult the worthy local inspector as to its acquisition, proper management, or expenditure. Lawyers, agents, &c., are the most suitable persons for that work. And, as a matter of fact, military and naval officers, though drawn from the present governing classes, are quite a negligible portion of the House of Commons, which consists, for the most part, of the legal and other distinctly non-combatant classes.

Even on such narrow issues as peace or war, it cannot be said that the male vote has achieved any brilliant successes. To take modern instances, does Dr. Massie defend the declaration of war against France in 1793? Does he support the Crimean or the Boer wars? The male vote would seem to be no such talisman for right judgment in these matters that we need fear also to consult women.—Yours, &c.,

BERNARD HOUGHTON.

Broomy Lodge, nr. Ringwood,
November 23rd, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. John Massie, in your last issue, reiterates his view that "the ultimate basis of authority is force," and quotes Mr. James Bryce in support. May I quote two authorities who take a different view? Professor A. V. Dicey, in Chapter II. of "The Law of the Constitution," cites with approval the following passage from Hume:—

"Nothing appears more surprising to those who consider human affairs with a philosophical eye than the easiness with which the many are governed by the few. . . . When we inquire by what means this wonder is effected, we shall find that as Force is always on the side of the governed, the governors have nothing to support them but opinion. It is, therefore, on opinion only that government is founded."

Mr. Massie might also remember the words of Horace: "Vis consilii expers, Mole ruit sua." Behind the "vis" there must always be the "consilium." It is the unseen thing which is the ultimate thing. Mr. Massie has often taught this truth to others. Why does he forget it himself?—Yours, &c.,

M. A.

November 23rd, 1909.

MORE ECONOMICS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—At Poole on November 16th Lord Milner instructed us that Tariff Reform would "increase the total income of the nation by an increase of its total production."

The claim that Protection can increase total production is surely a contribution to economics showing considerable independence of thought. Perhaps Lord Milner will remove this impression by giving his authorities, or confirm it by developing his "argument."—Yours, &c.,

TRIPOS.

November 17th, 1909.

CHARLES KINGSLEY AND WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In reply to the remarks of Mr. Maurice in your issue of last week, I should like to refer him to Kingsley's Letters and Memoirs, edited by his wife in 1888. Kingsley received from Stuart Mill his "Subjection of Women" in 1869, and thanked him in a letter in which not a word appears that could suggest a leaning to female suffrage, whatever his previous impressions may have been.

Mrs. Kingsley gives us a second letter to Stuart Mill, written in 1870, in reply to his inquiry why Kingsley had withdrawn from the movement. In it Mrs. Kingsley says "he gives his latest views on this question." She then adds:—

"The proceedings of some of its advocates were so distasteful to him that he refused to attend their meetings; and the only branch of the subject which had his entire sympathy and support was the medical education of women. This he has held years before the question of Women's Suffrage was mooted, to be one of deep importance."

The following excerpts of the above letter show Kingsley's view on womanhood clearly enough:—

"I am pained in a very large acquaintance of all ranks to find the better rather than the worse women against us, whilst foolish women, of no sound or coherent opinion, are inclined to patronise us in the most noisy and demonstrative way."

"I fight not for the maiden so much as for the matron, because if the mother be benefited, the child will be benefited, and therefore I deprecate the interference in this movement of unmarried women."

"I object also to the question of woman's right to vote."

"Therefore I deprecate most earnestly all the meddling, however pure-minded, humane, &c., which women have brought to bear on certain questions during the last six months—they are mixing themselves up with the fanatical of both sexes, with the vain and ambitious."

"Our strength lies not in the abnormal but in the normal type of womanhood."

Of woman suffrage there is, in this second letter, also no mention except in the above instance where Kingsley says straight out that he objects to it.

What would Kingsley say of the meeting at Bolton the other day, under the presidency of Lady Constance Lytton, when Miss Mary Gawthorpe said, amongst other vulgarities:—

"The attack upon Mr. Winston Churchill is one of the most courageous things I can think of. Our friend who thrashed Mr. Churchill with a dog whip took the responsibility of publicly thrashing a Cabinet Minister, just to show her supreme contempt for his principles."

Such words cannot but have a bad influence on impressionable, half-educated girls with whom these meetings are packed.—Yours, &c.,

G. A. SEEBOHM.

Townend, Knutsford,
November 23rd, 1909.

Poetry.

TO THEM THAT DARKEN COUNSEL.

"Forasmuch therefore as ye trample on the poor and take exactions from him of wheat, ye have built houses of hewn stone but shall not dwell in them."

"And the great houses shall have an end, saith the Lord."

FORASMUCH as your hearts are hardened, and your hands encumbered with gold,
Forasmuch as ye sell your judgment, as a stall-fed beast is sold;
Forasmuch as your eyes yearn backward to the feast of the full fat years,
Forasmuch as your brows bend earthward, when the sign in the heaven appears;
Therefore your feet shall falter, and the staff of your hands shall bend,
And the firm-set stones shall fall, for the house of the great hath an end.

Because your lips have watered for the price of the sufferer's pain,
Because ye have drugged men drowsy, and count their drunkenness gain;
Because ye have mocked their weakness, and flung them a grudging dole,
Because ye have counted their bodies, and found no trace of a soul;
For all this the hounds are gathered, and the huntsman's net is spread,
And ye hear their horn on the hills like a long-drawn wail of the dead.

As up in your high-built halls ye have careless lived, and content
If others have toiled and gathered, and ye have scattered and spent,
As ye fear to smirch your souls, or so much as a finger soil
With the scum of a nation's ferment, the grime of a people's toil,
Therefore your own fine hands have sullied your once fair fame,
And your speech that was bold and straight is now fall'n crooked and lame,
Till at last men say, Lo, these have woven their own rewards,
Who once were lords among people, where now the people are lords.

GUY KENDALL.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE following is our weekly selection of books which we commend to the notice of our readers:—

- "The Last Years of the Protectorate." Vols. I. and II. By C. H. Firth. (Longmans. 24s. net.)
 "Indian Speeches (1907-1909)." By Viscount Morley. (Macmillan. 2s. 6d. net.)
 "Liberalism and the Social Problem." By the Right Hon. W. S. Churchill. (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d. net.)
 "A History of Medieval Political Theory in the West." By R. W. Carlyle and A. J. Carlyle. Vol. II "The Political Theory of the Roman Lawyers and the Canonists, from the Tenth to the Thirteenth Century." (Blackwood. 15s. net.)
 "Dr. Johnson and Mrs. Thrale." By A. M. Bradley. With an Introductory Essay by Thomas Seccombe. (Lane. 16s. net.)
 "The Rise of Louis Napoleon." By F. A. Simpson. (Murray. 12s. 6d. net.)
 "The Clerk of Oxford in Fiction." By S. F. Hulton. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
 "The Bourbon Restoration." By Major J. R. Hall. (Alston Rivers. 21s. net.)
 "The Light of the West." By Sir William Butler. (Methuen. 5s. net.)
 "London in the Nineteenth Century." By Sir Walter Besant. (Black. 30s. net.)
 "In the Grip of the Nyika." By Lieut.-Col J. H. Patterson. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.)
 "It Never Can Happen Again." By William de Morgan. (Heinemann. 2 Vols. 10s.)
 "Souvenirs autour d'un Groupe Littéraire." Par Madame Alphonse Daudet. (Paris: Fasquelle. 3fr. 50.)
 "Deux Dramas: Le Cloître, Philippe II." Par Emile Verhaeren. (Paris: Mercure de France. 3fr. 50.)
 "Vieilles Maisons, Vieux Papiers." Quatrième Série. Par G. Lenôtre. (Paris: Perrin. 5fr.)
 "La Vie et l'Œuvre de Titien." Par Georges Lafenestre. (Paris: Hachette. 3fr. 50.)

* * *

LIKE most other industries, the book trade will be injuriously affected by "the temporary dislocation, the temporary chaos, as it is called," to which Lord Lansdowne looks forward with much equanimity. A war or a General Election is a catastrophe from which publishers and booksellers pray to be delivered, for books are the luxuries with which many people are most ready to dispense, and an event which absorbs attention in the way of a General Election, or which interferes with the normal course of finance, is soon felt in the book market. Authors, publishers, and booksellers have all been expecting great things from the season now drawing to a close, but, though far from a bad one, it has not realised their hopes. The autumn season of 1907 was to some extent harmed by the financial and commercial collapse in the United States; last autumn there was a general decline of trade; and this season we are confronted by the prospect of a constitutional crisis. The one fortunate thing about the affair is that the General Election is likely to take place in the middle of January, a time when there is not usually much activity in the publishing world, though the present writer knows of a popular novelist who has directed his publisher to keep back a book which it had been arranged to issue during that month.

* * *

THE reported decision of some of the circulating libraries to subscribe for only a few copies of Mr. de Morgan's novel, "It Never Can Happen Again," has given rise to a good deal of comment. The book contains about 300,000 words, and has been published by Mr. Heinemann in two volumes, at the price of ten shillings. The libraries are, of course, the chief buyers of fiction, and if they are determined not to give more than the regulation six shillings for a novel, however long it may be, it will require a strong and united effort on the part of the publishers to secure better terms. As we have remarked before in this column, the publishers have damaged their market by the over-production of worthless novels, and have not helped matters by their policy of disregarding the interests of the small booksellers. If Mr. Heinemann fails in his spirited attempt to cheapen novels, and thus to induce people to buy who now borrow, the failure will be due to the latter cause.

* * *

THE publication this week of Mr. Winston Churchill's "Liberalism and the Social Problem," and of Lord Morley's

"Indian Speeches, 1907-1909," reminds us that many—indeed, an unusual proportion—of the members of the present Cabinet are distinguished as men of letters. Lord Morley and Mr. Birrell enjoy reputations in the world of books quite as great as in the world of affairs. Mr. Winston Churchill is, like his American namesake, a novelist, though he is better known as an author by his contributions to military history travel, and biography. Mr. Haldane's name appears on the title-page of seven volumes, most of them designed to instruct his fellow-countrymen in the mysteries of Hegelian philosophy. Sir Edward Grey is the author of a treatise on "Fly-Fishing." Mr. Sydney Buxton, also an expert writer on fishing and shooting, has written and compiled several books on political subjects, one of which is in its eleventh and another in its fifth edition. Both Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Burns have travelled some distance on the road of journalism, and have published articles and speeches. Mr. Burns is, besides, a frequenter of second-hand bookshops, and owns an excellent collection of political pamphlets. Lord Crewe has written verse, and is another collector of books. His library of 30,000 volumes is, in some respects, the finest private collection in the country. Lord Loreburn is not an author, but is almost as devoted a student of Virgil as Gladstone was of Horace. We believe he has a great admiration for Professor J. W. Mackail's prose translations of the "Eclogues and Georgics" and of the "Aeneid."

* * *

FOLLOWING on their admirable edition of Swift's prose works, Messrs. Bell have almost ready for issue the first volume of a new edition of "The Correspondence of Jonathan Swift," and they are also preparing an edition of the "Poems," which will be added to the Bohn series. The work of editing the correspondence was originally entrusted to Mr. C. Litton Falkiner, a writer on Irish history, who met his death through an Alpine accident just over a year ago. His place has been filled by Mr. F. Elrington Ball, and the first volume will contain an introduction by Dr. Bernard, Swift's present successor in the Deanery of St. Patrick's. Mr. Ball has had access to the material accumulated by Forster in preparation for an edition of the correspondence which he was engaged upon at the time of his death, and he has also discovered a large number of hitherto unpublished letters, many of which are said to be of great interest. Another contribution to our knowledge of Swift will be a book on the Dean and his circle, by Miss Shilleto Smith, which Messrs. Methuen will issue early in the spring.

* * *

SWIFT's patron, Sir William Temple, is now little read, though possibly Professor Spingarn's edition of the essays "On Ancient and Modern Learning" and "On Poetry," just issued by the Clarendon Press, may do something to bring him before the general reader. Professor Spingarn protests against Macaulay's "violent and ill-considered" verdict on Temple, and claims that the two essays "represent a turning point in the development of English style, and that in them something of the tone and temper of the eighteenth century essay are already apparent." In praising Temple's style, Professor Spingarn is in excellent company, for these essays were Pope's favorite prose, and Dr. Johnson said to Boswell that "Sir William Temple was the first writer who gave cadence to English prose"—an estimate that seems extravagant when we think of Jeremy Taylor and Sir Thomas Browne. Among other writers who had a high opinion of Temple were Swift, who said he had "advanced our English tongue to as great perfection as it can well bear," Goldsmith, Lamb, who contrasted him with Shaftesbury in the essay on "The Genteel Style in Writing," and Hallam. As a critic, Temple made the mistake of defending the authenticity of the "Letters of Phalaris," and calling forth Bentley's wonderful "Dissertation." But he had the insight to see the romantic interest that lay in Eastern and in Scandinavian literature at a time when both were despised. The concluding sentence of his "Essay on Poetry" is justly famous: "When all is done, Human Life is, at the greatest and the best, but like a froward Child, that must be Play'd with and Humor'd a little to keep it quiet till it falls asleep, and then the Care is over."

Reviews.

PROFESSOR FIRTH'S CONTINUATION OF GARDINER.*

THERE have been greater historians than Gardiner, but there have been few who did a more important work in sinking wide and deep the foundations of the knowledge of a great period. Nor is this all. Gardiner was neither a deep thinker nor a powerful writer, but he gave, within certain limits, a sound comment on events. He has done much to form what may fairly be called the "verdict of history" on the Roundhead and Cavalier controversy. That phrase is, indeed, often misused, and the philosopher will point out that the political sympathies of an historian, as such, are just as likely to be wrong as right. But if there is ever any meaning in the words "verdict of history," Gardiner's is such a verdict. He has spread very widely, even among people who have never read his book, a juster understanding of the issues as they appeared to the various actors themselves in the seventeenth century, and a sane modern criticism of those actors, of their mistakes, and of their lasting service to us, as judged in the light of three hundred years of further experience. Gardiner's achievement is brought out by comparison: for example, the period of the English Reformation, though its documents have been ransacked by partisans, has not yet been blessed with a Gardiner. (Will Mr. Pollard play the part? He might, perhaps, if he had time.) Similarly, the period from Fox and Pitt down to the Reform Bill of 1832 has not even had its documents ransacked, though the "verdict of history," which used to be a Whig asset, now sometimes goes by default to a particularly purblind Toryism.

Gardiner's massive learning was the accumulation of the lifetime of one who scorned lucre and other delights in order to live laborious days in self-imposed service of the truth. Nothing short of this learning would have sufficed to raise this classical period of English history on to a pedestal high above the semi-knowledge of partisans. But Gardiner died a few years too soon to complete his task either at the death of Cromwell or at the Restoration (I do not know which he regarded as his goal). Fortunately, there was a man fit, and, indeed, ready equipped, to finish what he left undone. At Dr. Gardiner's own request, Professor Firth took on the work. To say that he could be compared to Gardiner for his knowledge of the Cromwellian period is by no means to overstate the case. His life of Cromwell in the "Heroes of the Nations" series, his "Cromwell's Army," and many learned publications had shown that. And no man without such a knowledge could have "continued Gardiner."

Professor Firth, in his Preface, expresses a regret we all feel, that Gardiner did not live to put the crown on his work, and to "give the world his final estimate of the aims and achievements of the Protector." But, after all, Gardiner had given the world such an estimate in a separate volume, his "Cromwell's Place in History." Perhaps, therefore, apart from the natural sentiment that affects us all, if we calculate coldly, the most serious thing about Gardiner's premature death was that it has for awhile called away Professor Firth from the reign of Charles II. For our knowledge of Cromwell's period is now very much greater than our knowledge of the Restoration period. The reign of Charles II. is a tangled forest of Court and Party intrigue, through which a few historical pioneers have cut stray paths at their own sweet will, but which craves the true settler to clear it, before the ordinary reading tourist can travel there with any safety. May Professor Firth live, not only to bring "Gardiner" down to the Restoration, but to give us the sure footing that we so sadly lack in the history of the reign of the Merry Monarch!

The two volumes before us, which go down to the death of Cromwell, are eminently satisfying, within certain limits. These limitations are set by Mr. Firth's natural reticence—his dislike of broad generalisation, on the one hand, and of vivid narrative style on the other. These natural qualities or defects of his are here increased by his consciousness that on this occasion he is finishing another man's book, and that he must keep himself and his opinions out of it. I do not mean that he differs in opinion from Gardiner—I am not aware that he does. But he seems to write with the object of avoiding as far as possible any expression of opinion—more so than Gardiner himself ever did. This is, may be, very proper under the circumstances, but now and again I should like a lead from Professor Firth, just because I value so highly his opinion on the subject which he has made his own by years of study, and of which he has so sane and clear an understanding. What, for instance, does he think of the military "purge" of the Parliament of 1656, effected by the soldiers at the door of the House of Commons? He does, indeed say, on page 14, that it was grossly illegal, and thoroughly bad in form and method. But he might well have given us two pages discussing it in its broader aspects of policy, in relation to the possibility or impossibility of establishing real constitutional government under the Protectorate. Such a discussion is worth little from the pen of a mere essayist or hack writer dealing with the Stuart period, but from Professor Firth it would have great value. It is useless to say that the reader can judge for himself from the facts given: he cannot possibly judge as well as Professor Firth, who knows so many other facts besides those which he actually gives. But I suppose the feeling that it is Gardiner's book has held him back in this and other like cases from expressing his own opinion.

Once, indeed, he gives us this opinion in good round hand. In the middle of the admirable chapter on "Henry Cromwell in Ireland" he tells us what he thinks of the Cromwellian Settlement in its general aspect.

"In the end," he writes, "it was the action of the Cromwellian Government itself which caused the failure of the Cromwellian policy. The fact that the land settlement was based on confiscation might not have prevented its success; the fact that confiscation was accompanied by religious persecution did. The mass of the people might have accepted the substitution of one set of landlords for another; but the prohibition of their religion kept alive the spirit of discontent and revolt."—(Vol II., p. 145.)

That religious persecution increased the spirit of revolt cannot be disputed. But it may be questioned whether that spirit would not in any case have been kept alive by the confiscation. I doubt much (on purely a priori grounds, for I know next to nothing about the subject), I doubt much whether "the mass of the people" would have "accepted the substitution" of English Protestant for native Catholic landlords, even if Catholicism had not been persecuted. Whether the priests had been persecuted or not, they must inevitably have become the sole leaders of the Irish peasantry, after we had destroyed the lay Catholic upper class. That destruction, effected by the confiscation, was, to my thinking, a mistake more fatal than even the religious persecution. For the religious persecution could be stopped, and eventually was stopped. But the native landlord class, once destroyed, could never be recalled to life. Therefore, Ireland was certain to be governed by the priests the moment it ceased to be governed by the sword—as occurred in the course of the nineteenth century.

If Professor Firth casts an eye on this review, he will here exclaim: "What a creature is this reviewer! First he says I don't give him enough of my so valuable opinions, and when I do give him one he says he doesn't agree with it, although he admits he knows nothing about the subject!" To this there is no reply possible.

However, I have now done with inconsistent criticisms. These volumes are an important event in the historical world, and to all true lovers of history they will be a delight. You feel on terra firma when you are reading them. You feel you are reading "nothing but the truth," and at least as much of "the whole truth" as human labor can attain. "Some episodes," says Professor Firth in the Preface, "are, perhaps, treated in too much detail, but it seemed to me as important to show the temper of the time as to narrate the events." This is the essence of Professor Firth's work and method—to show "the temper of the time" on every occasion, by a mosaic of apt, brief quotations picked out from innumerable letters and papers of persons of the most opposite parties and the most different attributes, but all written at the very moment of the event itself. This necessarily affects the author's own style, which is sometimes hardly more than a setting for the mosaic. It is an historical method very successful within its limits, when managed, as here, by a real master of the subject. And it enables the reader to understand "how it struck contemporaries" as no other method can do. For that purpose, at least, it is superior to the Thucydidean "speech," and even to the Macaulayese "summary of the arguments on both sides." But it has its own limitations.

* "The Last Years of the Protectorate, 1656-58." By C. H. Firth, Regius Professor of Modern History at Oxford. Longmans. 2 vols. 24s. net.

Two opportunities for stirring narrative occur in these volumes. First, Blake's sinking of the Spanish fleet under the forts at Santa Cruz and his subsequent death in sight of the English coast; and, secondly, the battle of the Dunes. Both, as here described, leave an indelible impression on the mind of the affairs exactly as they happened. It is true that the adoption of the method described above in a first-rate battle-piece takes away much of the swing and élan of the narrative, and deprives us of some of the possible emotions. But I have got a very clear as well as a very accurate knowledge of what happened in Santa Cruz harbor and on the Flemish sand dunes, such as one gets from very few modern accounts of battles. Among good modern accounts of battles, these of Professor Firth have this peculiarity—that the color of the picture is entirely a seventeenth-century color. One looks on at Carlyle's battles through a chink in the clouds of heaven, with Teufelsdröckh as the humorous, pathetic, dramatic showman at one's side. But one looks on at Professor Firth's battles from on board one of Blake's ships, in the person, as it were, of one of his solid, quiet captains.

And so it is with everything in these volumes, whether in tales of peace or of war. I feel, for instance, as if at last I had really heard what the different people thought and said about the question of reviving the Monarchy in Cromwell's person. That being so, it is perhaps lowering the standard to expect that Professor Firth should discuss what "might have been" if only Cromwell had consented to pour the new wine into the old bottle. Perhaps the very sum of his knowledge and thought on the subject makes him hate such idle speculation.

G. M. TREVELYAN.

THE COMPLETE STORY-TELLER.*

Of the three great writers who created Italian literature six centuries ago, and have not been surpassed or equalled by any of their successors, Boccaccio now stands second in honor. He himself regarded his friend and philosopher, Petrarch, with humble and excessive admiration as beyond comparison the greater man; and probably, till within the last generation, nearly all critics would have accepted his judgment, though rather from habit than conviction. The present neglect of Petrarch is significant of a new temper of mind which can forgive anything to passion, and anything to genuine and sympathetic vision, but resolutely refuses to be put off with sentimentality or sugared artifice, though of the very finest manufacture. All may join Mr. Hutton in admiring Petrarch for unusual culture, for courageous scholarship, and an almost scientific conception of history. In all those advantages, as in piety and perhaps in behavior, he was far beyond any standard of Boccaccio's. But in art the first thing we demand is sincerity, and from start to finish of Petrarch's best-known work we hardly discover sincerity in a single line.

"Laura!" cries a recent critic. "Though her portrait is in Florence, and Arthur Young saw her tomb, I am inclined to think there never was such a person. Or, if there was, I bless, for her sake, every yard of that safe and innocent twenty miles which separates Avignon from Vauluse, and I have not the least doubt that her lover blessed it for his own sake too."

But in Boccaccio we are delivered from the pedantic chill of the merely literary man, whose first thought in love or joy or sorrow is the use to which his art can put it afterwards. In him we find the passion, the sincerity, and the sympathetic vision, together created and illuminated by the reality of life. All the vast difference between the two poets is seen in his love for Fiammetta—the golden, generous, and inconstant woman, who was the source of his inspiration, of his joy, and perhaps of the bitterness of his later life—the part of his life which does not count. After a maudering sonnet or two on Laura, with what refreshment of spirit we come upon the traces of a passion thus described by Boccaccio's new biographer, though in the description itself the writer yields for a moment to his most dangerous temptation of style:—

"Who shall divide love into periods of the soul? These are things too wonderful for me, which I know not. Are not 'idealism' and 'sensuality' moods of the same passion, often simultaneous, and always interchangeable? Or do critics speak of affection? But I speak not of affection. I speak of love—a flame of fire. And whatever Boccaccio's love may have been, good or bad, as you will, I care not what you decide to think, this at least it was, a passion, a passion which mastered him and destroyed in him much that was good, much that was bad, but that made of him a poet and the greatest storyteller in the world. . . . Who may divide what God has joined together? And if one might—what disaster!"

It is only from Boccaccio's own poems and other writings that we know the story of Fiammetta, and, indeed, of the poet himself, during the earlier and finer part of his life. Even what we know is uncertain, though Mr. Hutton follows out the conjectures with convincing skill and knowledge. But the poet was very fond of writing personal confessions; indeed, nearly all his verse is occupied with his own biography or experience more or less disguised, and it is all the more remarkable that the one work which seems likely to live for generations yet is as nearly impersonal as any great work of art can be. We do not mean, of course, that it would be impossible to tell from the Decameron what kind of man Boccaccio was. It is easy enough to recognise in the writer the alert and humorous man, endowed with "charm," rather overbalanced on the sensual side, and incapable of genuine speculation, religious thought, or, apparently, of any profound and tragic emotion. But in the Decameron there is no distinct mention of his own life, and if the name of Fiammetta, among the seven ladies who tell the tales, suggests passing memories of his one absorbing passion, the references are slight and fleeting. The real Fiammetta had, in fact, almost certainly died of the plague the year before the Decameron was begun.

But if there is small directly personal biography in the Tales, they give the most brilliant picture of the world that surrounded the writer. Never has Europe itself been so brilliant, or, at least, so diversified in color and interest, as just in the half-century that Boccaccio knew. The time was of even greater interest than the two centuries following, for it possessed the charm of great changes that were approaching, but as yet only dimly discerned. Day was already bright with the Renaissance, but the sun had not risen with its heat. The human spirit was assaulting the Church, but rather with laughter than violence. The doom of medievalism was preparing; it had not yet become tragic.

The interval was filled with clashing contrasts, with adventures of life and death, with worship and mockery side by side, and with laughter so close a neighbor to tears. It was a time of extreme violence; while Boccaccio was actually writing the Decameron in Florence, the citizens of the most cultivated city of the world tore two hostages in pieces with their own hands and ate them in the public square, as Mr. Hutton narrates. Only a year or two before, the plague had killed about a third of the city's population, for 100,000 died—nearly as many as died of it in the Punjab during a single fortnight of 1907. The Mediterranean swarmed with pirates; the power of the Paynim was continually edging westward; the leading races of Christendom were engaged in wars that seemed unending; the foremost cities of Italy were tearing at each other's throats; the Head of the Church was in exile from his holy seat, and the two representatives of God's spiritual and temporal powers here on earth had divided the faithful into armies of partisans, each regarding the other as emissaries of the devil.

In the midst of all that conflict and chaos, life was not likely to be monotonous. The strange thing is that the lives of peasants, citizens, and even nobles went on so often in much the usual way, and afforded so many opportunities for leisure, delight, and amorous adventure. As is well known, Boccaccio himself insisted on the contrast by choosing the horror of the plague as the background for that charming party of seven women and three men, who consorted together to drive away its gloom with their merry, tender, and surprising tales. So it is against a background of a violent and changeful time, where custom and belief were just beginning to break up, that the action of the Tales themselves is depicted, nor is any set of them more typical or more welcome than those of the Second Day, which tell the fortunes of men who, after divers adventures, have at last attained a goal of unexpected felicity. Dimly, perhaps, in some of the stories, but consciously in nearly all, we are aware of that dark background of violence and wrong and death and of man's perpetual struggle to escape from its horror and find the joy and solace that seem so near him and so natural. Amid cheating friars, and Jews, and Paynims, and Sultans of Babylon, and pirates, and torturers, and murderers who serve up hearts to eat, that is the search of all those gentle lovers and faithful pilgrims and generous knights and laughing knaves and women whom nature had made neither of iron nor of adamant.

* "Giovanni Boccaccio: A Biographical Study." By Edward Hutton. Lane. 16s. net.

The obvious difficulty in writing Boccaccio's life is the great uncertainty of the facts. But a far greater difficulty still is the vast amount of obscure and undistinguished detail by which the Italian history of the period is overwhelmed. Mr. Edward Hutton appears to us to have worked upon this chaotic material with equal knowledge and restraint. He has produced an illuminating book, presenting us with a clear and succinct account of the first master of story-telling, and of his other works besides the Decameron, some of them too much neglected. He has, further, added very valuable appendices and an excellent index to the Decameron as well as to his own volume.

IDEALISM AND LIFE.*

For a generation or more the oracles of German idealism have been nearly dumb. Since Lotze no great original thinker has appeared among the countrymen of Kant and Hegel. German metaphysics have flourished more vigorously in Oxford and Glasgow than in Leipsic and Berlin. But if no new system has arisen in the motherland of idealism, there have not been wanting interpreters and exponents of older ideas, and of these perhaps Professor Rudolf Eucken, of Jena, is the most distinguished and influential. His best-known work, "Die Lebensanschauungen der grossen Denker," has, we are told, been through eight editions in its own language, and is now translated into English by Professor W. S. Hough and Mr. Boyce-Gibson, under the title of "The Problem of Human Life as viewed by the Great Thinkers, from Plato to the Present Time." The English is thoroughly readable and scholarly, and we may unreservedly congratulate the translators on their work. Whether, indeed, German idealistic metaphysics bear translation at all is a question which may be raised. Hegel, whose vernacular is always racy and living, becomes almost unreadable in English. Kant, who at best is a pedant, has less to lose. Lotze in a translation becomes so dreamy and vague that the reader wanders on through pages without clear consciousness of the drift, and we fear at times that the same must be said of Professor Eucken in his English dress. There are the regular phrases of idealism, familiar to the initiated, full of solemn mystery to the beginner. In German they seem to stand for something. Translated, their force seems to evaporate. Take at random this passage which is to help us to appreciate modern thought:—

"So subject and object point to each other for completions. Opposite poles of thought, they are ever prone to hostility. But life will attain its highest perfection when both work together, bound to each other in fruitful mutual relation. And this is what happens in art, primarily from the point of view of the artist, but to some extent from that of the spectator also. For, as in the domain of art all inner impulse seeks embodiment, so, too, the outward form cannot be appropriated until it has been associated with a soul."

We might go on indefinitely. The unaccustomed reader

"The Problem of Human Life as viewed by the Great Thinkers, from Plato to the Present Time." By Rudolf Eucken. Translated by W. S. Hough and W. R. Boyce-Gibson. Unwin. 17s. 6d. net.

would be no nearer to anything concrete. The habitual drinker at the Hegelian stream would be lulled to gentle slumber at the repeated sound of the familiar antitheses and dear old reconciliations. In German certainly it seems at first blush more real, but philosophy is not like poetry. It ought to bear translation without evaporating into nothingness.

Vague and disappointing in its general import, Professor Eucken's book nevertheless has two great merits. To begin with, it has a distinct originality of plan. It is a history of thought, but it differs from the professed, and, so to say, official histories of philosophy in that it seeks an appreciation of the essential point of view of each school rather than a scholastic exposition of detail. Moreover, it seeks to show the bearing of theory upon life, it deals with the spirit of each world-system, and so it finds a place for Christianity alongside of the schools of the metaphysicians. It seeks, in short, to present a series of pictures of the ideas that have moved the western world, and the doctrines that have been propounded for the guidance of men. Secondly, in so doing, the writer does not allow his one strong leaning to an idealistic interpretation of Christianity to cramp his historic impartiality. If his account of Aristotle is less glowing than the periods in which he describes the Platonic philosophy, if he is palpably less enthusiastic for Comte and Mill than for Kant and Hegel, he does not allow his feelings to distort his judgment, but awards praise and blame, sets out positive merits, and, at the same time, puts his finger on contradictions with undeviating impartiality. Such a mixed character, and such a motley philosophy as that of Augustine, for example, are treated with really admirable justice, every point of excellence and every grave deficiency being marked with equal emphasis. Professor Eucken has philosophic evenness of temper and width of view. If he possessed a corresponding incisiveness of thought and expression he would have given us a history of real value. As it is, his final judgment is often difficult to grasp, and the impression left by the account of each thinker lacks definiteness. Much has been propounded to which the instructed reader cannot object, but when he asks himself at the end what is the upshot, what, in Professor Eucken's view, is the essential of the message of Plato, of Hellenism generally, of Christianity, of modern idealism, he finds no clear advance on the points of view that were already familiar to him.

Sometimes, indeed, he comes across judgments that are peculiar and may be questioned. The Platonic doctrine of ideas "discloses a great truth," viz., that there is a realm of truth beyond the likes and dislikes of men; this is the "foundation of the independence of science and of the secure upbuilding of civilisation; only a self-dependent truth can provide laws and morals, which elevate human existence because they unite it. But this is the central thought of all idealism; hence the latter ever remains linked with the name of Plato." But why, we are bound to ask, limit that doctrine to the idealist? We are, indeed, glad to hear an individual idealist associating himself with the doctrine of the objective independence of the true order, but why call this "the central thought of idealism" in particular? What quarrel has the Realist with such a principle? Is it not rather the central contention of Realism, with which, if the Idealist agrees, so much the better? Whether, indeed, the Idealist can maintain this position unimpaired becomes doubtful when, later on in the volume, we read Professor Eucken's acceptance of the Kantian doctrine of relativity.

"It was Kant who first showed clearly and forcefully that to wish to know a thing as it is independently of us is arrant absurdity. For things in the process of becoming known to us must inevitably change their character."

This is really a very crude statement of the doctrine of relativity, and Professor Eucken ought to have known that it cannot at this time be put forward without paying due attention to well-known exposures of its obvious fallacies. But, apart from this, the Realist may well ask how Professor Eucken is to hold together the two doctrines: (1) that truth is self-dependent; (2) that what we know somehow depends on our knowledge. Till he can show that these two positions are reconcilable, he should at least refrain from claiming the one, which he truly regards as the foundation of science, as the peculiar product of Idealism and of Plato. The Realist does not seek to reconcile the two positions; he denies the second one, and therewith prepares himself to wage war against the Relativist and the Idealist schemes of knowledge alike. This denial constitutes, in fact, a better working definition of the Realist than that suggested by Professor Eucken himself. He identifies the idealistic view of things with the conception that the soul "absorbs and assimilates the world," the realistic with the view that "the world absorbs and assimilates the soul." This is to confound realism with materialism, and to misinterpret the impulse and direction of modern scientific method. Professor Eucken's favorite antithesis of the "inner" and the "outer" fails him here. The "realist" has no preference for the "outer." He studies the world of the soul as frankly and "objectively" as the behavior of a molecule or a bacillus. He takes experience of every kind and from every quarter and pieces it together into interpretations of reality which he knows to be broken and partial, but which are at least free from misleading pretence to finality. He stands not for the "outer" against the "inner" (whatever these may be), nor for the material against the spiritual, nor for sense against thought, but simply for the slow, cautious, humble interpretation of experience in its widest sense as against abstractions and dogmas with more sound than meaning, doubtful in their origin and vague in their application.

L. T. HOBHOUSE.

SHELLEY FOR THE MIDDLE-AGED.*

"I HAVE written of Shelley," says Mr. Clutton-Brock, "as a middle-aged man for other middle-aged men," and the confession is at once an avowal and a self-criticism. In that period of life at which one boasts oneself to be middle-aged, one has lost the illusions of youth without acquiring the serenities of age. It is the period of common-sense militant and compromise defiant. To the young illusions are beautiful; to the old they are necessary. It is in middle age that it seems to be the worthy occupation of a man to examine their mechanism and investigate their physiology. It is a curiously cold and level book which Mr. Clutton-Brock has produced from his wilfully uninspired standpoint. There is in it no uncurbed enthusiasm, yet there is no unkindly detraction. It is full of judicious comments on Shelley the man, and of sober estimates of Shelley the poet. There is nothing to offend any sane idolator. There is much to placate and confound the unfriendly critic. It presents in every chapter a middle view. It is never unsympathetic in the sense of failing or refusing to grasp or expound Shelley's standpoint. It is rarely sympathetic in the sense of adopting or defending Shelley's manner of thinking. It is written from outside, yet from an angle which admits of a clear and uninterrupted view. The total result is rather competent than interesting. One closes the book, puzzled to remember anything strong, original, or new that has been supremely well said. One recalls its contents, equally puzzled to indicate anything essential which has been left unsaid. Here, in short, is all that the middle-aged reader may wish to know about Shelley's life. Here, too, is the balanced judgment which he would wish to form of Shelley's poetry. The estimate of the man is, on the whole, fairer and better than the estimate of the poet. Mr. Clutton-Brock is clearly happier in the exercise of the negative functions of criticism than in fulfilling the exponent's duty of setting forth the values of the work which he admires. He rates the greater poems at their true worth. But it is more congenial to him to explain why "The Revolt of Islam" fails from the slightness and confusion of its narrative interest than to appraise the supreme beauty of the choruses of "Hellas." A few sentences, which lack nothing in verbal homage, convey the proper estimate. But the critic rarely allows himself to develop his praise or to carry his analysis into the necessary detail.

The debate over Shelley's conduct has become a classical impertinence, and a public which finds nothing immoral in the cold egoism of Milton's relations with women still insists upon making the tragedy of Shelley's fickle pity for Harriet Westbrook—the pity which he mistook for love—the theme of an unending ethical debate. Mr. Clutton-Brock handles this theme, as, indeed, he handles all the familiar biographical material, with fairness and tolerance, but also with a just contempt for that affectation which would set genius above morality. One is sometimes tempted to wish for an essay on Shelley which would studiously avoid all mention of University College and the Westbrooks, of Godwin and the Court of Chancery. The best of Shelley's work is absolute music, and has no more relation to his life than a fugue of Bach's to the composer's numerous family. For all we need to know or care, the man who wrote the Brandenburg Concertos might have been a bachelor, and the man who wrote "Adonais" need never have known the unrest and tragedy of love. But there is no understanding the bulk of Shelley's work in this way. No poet—and this is the burden of this book—was ever so completely individualistic. He often seems, like all the romantics, to have neither city nor country, and to stand outside his time. He is the companion of clouds and mountains, and the maker of a mythical world. His very millennium was the ruined paradise of an Aegean island, tenanted by one sympathetic soul. Yet his very loneliness was a flight. One must understand from what it was he fled. These moods alternated with a passionate social ideal. The revolutionary history of "The Revolt of Islam" and the prophetic vision of the final chorus of "Hellas" are even more the real Shelley than the individualistic dream of "Epipsychidion." The reformer who tried to rouse Dublin to the pursuit of liberty with virtue was somehow the same paradoxical spirit who conceived his Eden in an uninhabited isle. The subtle attraction and repulsion of a contemporary world which was for him too bad for any sympathy, yet not too bad to be reformed by a sudden convulsive appeal, makes a study in psychology which is perennially interesting. Mr. Clutton-Brock, by his very aloofness and freedom from prejudice, has handled it with insight and subtlety. His primary interest in Shelley is, we think, rather that of the psychologist than of the pure student of poetry. He has brought to his task a knowledge of all the intricate biographical facts painfully acquired, and, what is much rarer, a ripe knowledge of men. He wields a style which possesses a certain restrained dignity. He has attained in his intercourse with Shelley an intimacy too close alike for mere misunderstanding or for uncritical eulogy. If his book displays that pedestrian good sense which makes extravagant praise inappropriate, it has also the sound scholarship and the sure judgment which bestow upon it a permanent utility. It registers no fashion. It expresses no individual whim. It is a sane and deliberate treatment by a sober and energetic mind of a theme handled too often by prejudiced and extravagant critics.

CAMBRIDGE BIBLICAL ESSAYS.*

THE volume of Biblical Essays which a group of Cambridge scholars has just published is, in its way, a sign of the times. Most of the Divinity Professors of the University have a hand in it, and with them we may group some of the younger graduates in Divinity. But there are also several laymen, a Presbyterian, a Methodist professor, and a distinguished Jewish scholar. And about their work—at least, in the attitude of most of them—there is remarkable congruity of spirit. The uniting term is scholarship, and here it is recognised that sect and creed have nothing to say. Opinions differ among the writers; for instance, one holds the speech attributed to Paul at Athens to be "intensely Pauline," while another thinks "an unprejudiced reader will feel that the spirit is different from the spirit of Paul," that Athens, in fact, had cast over Luke something of her spell. But the fundamental principle is one and the same.

"One can no more apply one set of considerations to a Biblical and another to a profane author, in a historic question, than one can use different measures for a church and a dwelling-house, or suppose that a sacred structure is less dominated by gravitation than a theatre."

* "Shelley, the Man and the Poet." By A. Clutton-Brock. Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.

 "Essays on Some Bible Questions of the Day by Members of the University of Cambridge." Edited by H. B. Swete, D.D. Macmillan. 12s. net.

So Professor Percy Gardner, a Cambridge man if an Oxford professor (like many more Oxford professors borrowed from the sister University), lays down the guiding law which rules the book.

Three essays may claim our attention to begin, in which the present position is summed up as regards Old Testament Research (Mr. Stanley A. Cook), the Synoptic Gospels (Mr. H. L. Jackson), and New Testament Textual Criticism (Mr. A. V. Valentine-Richards). Business-like and scholarly, they form a sort of foundation on which very different structures may be raised, and certainly there are differences among those who attempt construction in the volume before us. There is Professor Kennett, Regius Professor of Hebrew, who rebuilds the history of the Jewish Church between Nebuchadnezzar and Alexander the Great with a freedom that might rival the former of these monarchs, unless Herodotus is right in attributing the great structures of Babylon to Queen Nitocris, whoever she was. The effect is rather dazzling, and the judgment of specialists will have to be taken upon it now for some time to come. It is intensely interesting to watch so fearless a scholar handling his material with this freedom, when his material, long too sacred to be examined, proves to be so very various, so very complicated, and so very fragmentary as are the component documents of the Pentateuch, the broken pieces of the teaching of prophets, hard to date and long since carelessly cemented together, the curious relations of Jerusalem and Samaria and some other places and their priesthoods—and all to be fitted in between two rather narrow limits of time.

In antithesis to this, we may set the essay of Professor Emery Barnes. If we may borrow a metaphor from one of the chapters, and compare Mr. Kennett to the skater cutting marvellous figures on thin ice, Dr. Barnes may fairly be said to stand on the bank. His refusal to accept the very possibility of dating the Psalms, his insistence that they are "timeless," have a pedantic look. Such nescience is partly pose. What the essay is doing among the brave and energetic studies of the scholars who have made the volume, it is hard to see.

Curiously enough, there is just a touch of the same foible in Professor Burkitt's very interesting paper on the Eschatological Element in the Gospels. Why he should make such a mystery of "the real causes" of the Roman Empire's decay, which "no one knows even now," when a reasonable study of what has been written by sound historians could supply a whole bunch of contributory causes, he best can say. But, having said so much, we are bound to add that his paper is really one of the more memorable in the book. It will at least haunt the mind with some suggestion, when the interest of many of the others will be dim, and will need fresh kindling.

While the volume is in general liberal, Mr. Brooke contributes a paper on the Historical Value of the Fourth Gospel which seems designed to be conservative. It is not likely to please conservative readers, for his concessions bulk far larger than anything he establishes, and when one remembers the vigor and clearness with which the historicity of the Gospel has been assailed, the hesitant method and faint conclusions here set forth will hardly help. "These considerations do not, of course, go very far towards proving the truth of St. John's narrative as it stands. But they deserve the consideration of those who attempt to reconstruct the history."

An excellent article is contributed by Dr. Johns, the new Master of St. Catharine's, on the influence of Babylonian Mythology upon the Old Testament. Here and there his style is rather obscure, but his article stands out as one of the more stimulating. Professor Moulton, of Manchester, has an essay on New Testament Greek in the Light of Modern Discovery, which will be a delightful surprise to any who do not know his "Prolegomena." He has a gift of making philology fascinating which is very rare. Some will appreciate the human satisfaction he betrays in pointing out, with the utmost delicacy, a grammatical "howler" or two in the work of such men as Harnack and Wellhausen—a survival of his Cambridge days, perhaps.

St. Paul is the subject of two interesting papers. Professor Anderson Scott deals with the essential unity in thought which links Jesus and Paul, and Professor Gardner with the speeches attributed to Paul in the Acts. While the latter recognises the service Sir William Ramsay's geographical researches have done to New Testament study, his own attitude on the criticism of St. Luke is far sounder in every way. In all, his study of St. Luke is a real piece of portraiture, as human a thing as any in the book.

In fine, the volume may be taken as a fair index of Cambridge study to-day—devout and candid, cautious, quiet but progressive.

SUCCESS AND HALF-SUCCESS.*

ONE of the best tributes to the methods of training that produced the art of the old masters is the fact that puzzled experts not infrequently confound the work of pupils and masters, and in self-defence attribute a given picture to "the school of Giorgione," and so forth. Mr. Galsworthy's "Villa Rubein" is of "the school of Turgenev," and one cannot bestow on it higher praise than to say that in freshness and beauty, though not in artistic force, it is almost worthy to be signed by the greatest artist of them all. That a pupil's creation should stand close scrutiny so triumphantly as "Villa Rubein" is a proof that the work lives less by virtue of the perfection of its acquired style, than by virtue of the pupil's spiritual quality. And a careful examination of this novel—first published ten years ago, and unnoticed from that day to this—leads us to the conclusion that the born singer is not so much he who can train his voice as he who has a voice to train. It would be astonishing indeed if the manner of singing could so have affected us, if the singer's rare quality of feeling were not, indeed, innate.

Accepting as proven that in "Villa Rubein" the master's style is one with the pupil's inspiration, we are arrested by the ease, harmony, and restraint of the whole picture. Now it is precisely these qualities that indicate the artist's mastery of his subject. The scene is a health resort in the Tyrol in spring. Paul von Morawitz, an Austrian flâneur, having buried his English wife, Mrs. Devorell, and having run through his fortune, is living with his child, Greta, and his step-daughter, Christian Devorell, in the Villa Rubein, which is inhabited also by Christian's aunt, Mrs. Decie, and her uncle, Nicolas Treffry. Into the midst of this family comes the young artist, Harz, a poor and proud and talented young man, the son of a peasant. He paints a portrait of Christian Devorell, and the two fall passionately in love. Harz's suit is opposed by Mrs. Decie, and Herr Paul, having learned of a romantic incident in the young painter's past, when, as an Anarchist, he fled from "the authorities," informs the police, and Harz, aided by old Nicholas Treffry, has hurriedly to cross the frontier. Eventually, through the agency of old Treffry's dangerous illness, the family is reconciled to Harz, who becomes Christian's betrothed, and the story closes with a chapter of retrospect, three years after their marriage. Now, the exact story of "Villa Rubein" has only the value, so to speak, of a path which winds in and out of the trees and lawns and flowers of a garden. It might, conceivably, have been planned differently: its true purpose is to lead us on from point to point, so that we may enjoy simply and easily what the garden provides—in the case before us, the study of the characters, their relations one to another, and the surrounding atmosphere. Each little scene of "Villa Rubein" as it passes before our eyes has the spiritual freshness, the spontaneity, the tenderness and grace that only a great master, or the rare pupil capable of learning his lesson, can bestow. In the hands of a master of genre, subject is only of importance relative to the quality of beauty it discloses. The way an old woman sits by the fire, or pares turnips, may touch deeper springs of human interest than a "Descent from the Cross." The history of a lifetime may be disclosed by the knotted hand of a laborer, and the glory of light may be better revealed by a single ray in the darkness of a cellar than by the sunset glow of the heavens. It is by its suggestions of an infinite background of natural and spiritual forces that a piece of art counts,

* "Villa Rubein." By John Galsworthy. Duckworth. 6s.

"The Florentine Frame." By Elizabeth Robins. Murray. 6s.

WERNER LAURIE'S NEW BOOKS.

* * PLEASE WRITE FOR NEW ILLUSTRATED LIST.

SPECIAL MESSENGER: A

Novel. By Robert W. Chambers. Author of "The Fighting Chance," "Cardigan." 3rd large edition in preparation. 6s.

EGYPT. By Pierre Loti. Translated by W. P. Baines, and with eight plates in colour from paintings by Augustus O. Lamplough. 15s. net.

The Child's Book of the Season.

THE ARABIAN NIGHTS.

Their Best Known Tales. Re-written by Kate Douglas Wiggin. With many full-page illustrations, title-page, cover, and end papers in full colours by Maxfield Parrish. 10s. 6d. net.

THE CATHEDRALS AND

CHURCHES OF BELGIUM. By T. Francis Bumpus. Illustrated. 6s. net.

THE NIGHTSIDE OF PARIS.

By E. B. d'Auvergne. Author of "Lola Montez." With 24 full-page drawings specially made for the book by Harry Morley. Demy, Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

MY FRIENDS THE FRENCH.

By Robert Harborough Sherard. Brilliant Parisian reminiscences. 12s. 6d. net.

MODERN WOMEN AND HOW TO MANAGE HER.

By Walter M. Gallichan. Invaluable to Married Men. 2s. net.

MY SUMMER IN LONDON.

By James Milne. A fascinating causerie. 6s. net.

THE QUINTESSENCE OF

NIETZSCHE. By J. M. Kennedy. An account of his life and works. 6s. net.

STORIES FROM THE OPERAS.

By Gladys Davidson. The third volume in this series. 3s. 6d. net.

THE GRIZZLY BEAR.

The Narrative of a Hunter—Historical, Scientific, and Adventurous. By William H. Wright. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.

PSYCHICAL SCIENCE AND

CHRISTIANITY. By E. Katharine Bates. Author of "Seen and Unseen," "Do the Dead Depart?" 6s.

CHATS ON ELECTRICITY.

By Frank Broadbent, M.I.E.E. Crown 8vo, fully Illustrated. 3s. 6d. net.

GILBERT WHITE AND SEL-

BORNE. By Henry C. Shelley. Illustrated. 6s. net.

WERNER LAURIE, CLIFFORD'S INN, LONDON.

Macmillan's New Books.

INDIAN SPEECHES, 1907-1909,

BY

Viscount Morley.

Demy 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

New Book by Author of "THE MAN-EATERS OF TSAVO." IN THE GRIP OF THE NYIKA.

Further Adventures in British East Africa.

By Lieut.-Col. J. H. PATTERSON, D.S.O.,

With Illustrations. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Daily News :—"If you want to enjoy the wildest dangers by proxy, here is the book for you . . . As a book of sport and adventure, this we feel, is the book of the season."

Lord Kelvin's Early Home.

Being the Recollections of his Sister, the late Mrs. Elizabeth King, together with some Family Letters and a supplementary Chapter by the Editor, ELIZABETH THOMSON KING. With Illustrations, 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

Sophocles in English Verse.

Part I. Oedipus the King Oedipus at Kolonus Antigone. By ARTHUR S. WAY, D.Lit. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

New 6s. Novels.

The Education of Uncle Paul.

By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD. Author of "Jimbo," &c.

Robert Emmet: A Historical Romance.

By STEPHEN GWYNN.

A Gentle Knight of Old

Brandenburg. By CHARLES MAJOR. Author of "Dorothy Vernon," &c.

The Principles of Religious Development:

A Psychological and Philosophical Study. By GEORGE GALLOWAY M.A., B.D., D.Phil. 8vo, 10s. net.

The Spirit of Youth and the City Streets.

By JANE ADDAMS, Author of "Democracy and Social Ethics." Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Christmas (Dec.) No.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated, Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, 16s.

London Solitude. By STEPHEN PHILLIPS.

The Holy Land. 1. Baalbec, the Town of the Sun. By ROBERT HICHENS, Pictures by JAMES GUERIN.

A Little Paradise in the Dutch West Indies (Curacao). By CHARLES POST.

The Burgomaster's Christmas. A Story. By JACOB A. RIIS, Author of "How the Other Half Lives," "The Old Town," &c.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of general interest.

MACMILLAN'S ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE
POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

rather than by any inherent worthiness of subject. Mr. Galsworthy is extraordinarily successful in "Villa Ruben" in suggesting the latent, spiritual essence of his characters, extraordinarily happy in making a trait, a gesture, a tone indicate all that immense fusion and play of forces constantly at work in the current of every man's life. Take, for example, his picture of the child, Greta. While she is an incarnation of the spontaneous charm of childhood, she is extraordinarily individual, and yet she is made living by virtue of a few fine strokes. We know that such craft as this is part of the legacy bequeathed by the example of a great master, but how few are the disciples who ever learn how to handle the tool. Original feeling, insight, and the most delicate spiritual perception must guide the hand, and "Villa Ruben," in its luminous delicacy and harmonious grace, is an achievement that lives, that may be living, in fact, when the avalanche of contemporary fiction has vanished down the abyss.

Among our women novelists Miss Elizabeth Robins, though by no means one of the foremost artists, is perhaps the most richly endowed. She is almost too clever in facility of expression, too quick in accepting and summarising situations and scenes which a more fastidious taste would bid her hold awhile at arm's length before working them into her æsthetic scheme. In the hands of an artist with a severer standard "The Florentine Frame" might have become a little classic, but, as it stands, the admirable quality of the emotional passages between the middle-aged woman, Mrs. Roscoe, and her daughter, Genie, who are both in love with the same man, Keith, the youthful ex-professor and literary genius, are almost lost in the "woolliness" of the whole picture. It is a question of art. The figure of Mrs. Roscoe, who has never known love, is exquisitely drawn, and the silent contest in this reticent woman, who sees the man she loves being detached from her by the girlish infatuation of her own daughter, is indicated with the most subtle precision. It is a vital flaw that the man should be a cheap lay figure, despite his attractive exterior, for this is the source of the psychological haziness at the crisis of the drama, when Keith languidly accepts the situation of wooing the girl he has no desire to marry. Even more destructive to the story is the introduction of the unreal figure of Professor Fanshawe and the terrible vulgarian, Cousin Minna. Cousin Minna takes the stage halfway through the book, and a most obtrusive piece of comedy is forced on our attention—a comedy which harmonises with the spiritual tragedy about as well as a Kidderminster carpet goes with Sheraton furniture. Miss Robins has only the most elementary instinct for so balancing, harmonising, grasping her accessory details that the beauty of the whole composition may be felt. She jars us with pieces of obtrusive reporting, and on one page she will bestow on us a delicate silver-point, and on another a flashlight photograph. Her last chapters, which analyse Genie's alienation from her husband when at her mother's death she discovers the truth that Keith's passion was never for herself, are finely sensitive, but their fine gold shows queerly against the pinchbeck of their artistic setting.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

IN "The Life and Times of Bishop Challoner, 1691-1781" (Longmans, 2 vols., 25s. net), Dr. Edwin Burton narrates in two bulky volumes, and with a wealth of original documents, the history of English Roman Catholicism during its most undistinguished epoch. From the Revolution of 1688 to the Relief Acts of 1778 and 1791 liberty of public worship was denied by law to Roman Catholics, and endurance rather than enterprise was the quality needed in those who moulded the policy of the Church. Bishop Challoner, whose long life covered the greater part of the eighteenth century, was a prelate who, in depressing surroundings, did notable service to the Roman Catholic cause. Dr. Burton admits that he was not a man of genius or even of striking originality. On the contrary, he was typical of the "old-fashioned Catholics" of the penal times whom the new school—most of them converts—called into existence by Wiseman's statesmanship regarded with impatience or scarcely concealed hostility. But Challoner's name is still held in reverence by his co-religionists, and with good reason. He wrote or adapted such books as the "Garden of the Soul," the "Meditations," the "Memoirs of Missionary Priests," and several other popular manuals of devotion, while his sanctity and devotion to the interests of his church won him the veneration of all with whom he came into contact. Biographies of Bishop Challoner have already been written by Milner, Butler, Barnard, and Dr. Burton himself, but the present volumes contain a mass of information that has never before been made public. Dr. Burton has been unsparing in his researches, and he has been rewarded by the discovery of materials that throw many interesting lights on Roman Catholic history in this country. On the Gordon riots, for example, he has, in addition to rare contemporary pamphlets, made use of manuscript authorities. Altogether, Dr. Burton is to be congratulated on this valuable contribution to English ecclesiastical history.

* * *

As a general rule the lives of theatrical celebrities make very dull reading, but in a former book dealing with Garrick and his circle Mrs. Alfred Parsons showed talent in writing this form of biography. Her latest volume, "The Incomparable Siddons" (Methuen, 12s. 6d. net), is fresh and entertaining, though not every reader will agree with the estimate in the concluding chapter that Mrs. Siddons was "the foremost woman England produced in the region of the arts." Whether she was even the greatest of English actresses may be questioned, for the tragedy of the art of the theatre is its want of permanence, and a comparison between actors of different generations is impossible. Mrs. Parsons intends her book to be "a study of a personality and, at the same time, a contribution towards that definitive History of the English Stage which is yet unwritten." As regards her personality, Mrs. Siddons presents an interesting psychological study. On the stage, we are told, she was a "Pythonesse, nightly hypnotised into passionate emotions by the sight of the drop-curtain and the boards." In her home, she was, "at all events to the casual observer, more than a thought too much a mere mother and British matron, loving to be seemly and of good report, shut in the tower of an unimaginative nature," while she described herself as "a matter-of-fact woman," made of "inability and simplicity." This contrast is all the more interesting since she came of a family, the Kembles, whose name is familiar in English theatrical annals. Mrs. Parsons is right in laying stress upon the firm moral equipoise that distinguished Mrs. Siddons, and this characteristic was cheaply purchased at the price of a certain want of vivacity and sense of humor. As a contribution to the history of the stage, the present volume accomplishes what the author intended. We are told the parts which Mrs. Siddons played, and are given full contemporary accounts of the effect produced by her acting. In a chapter entitled "Friends," Mrs. Parsons gives us some glimpses of Mrs. Piozzi, Mrs. Inchbald, Mrs. Opie, Hannah More, Miss Seward, Sydney Smith, Chancellor Erskine, Campbell, and a crowd of others who attended Mrs. Siddons's parties. The book is thorough, as well as readable, and is likely to take its place as the standard biography of Mrs. Siddons.

* * *

IN "A Beau Sabreur—Maurice de Saxe, Marshal of France: His Loves, His Laurels, and His Times, 1696-1750" (Unwin, 15s. net) Mr. W. R. H. Trowbridge relates the career of an adventurer and soldier of fortune, who for a brief space sat upon the throne of Courland and played a number of other stirring parts in the history of the first half of the eighteenth century. The book takes a form which is, we think, new to this species of "romantic" biography. "I have," says Mr. Trowbridge, "cast the material I have carefully collected from an extensive bibliography into an autobiographical form. In other words, instead of telling the story in the third person I have made Saxe, so to speak, tell his own story." Though the method is open to question, Mr. Trowbridge has produced a readable and balanced account of the famous bâtard du roi. Both Saxe's father, Augustus the Strong, and his mother, Aurora von Königs-marck, were remarkable for their contempt for all conventional obligations, and this feeling, together with the military qualities of the Brandenburgs, Saxe possessed in a high degree. His bid for the throne of Courland, his military

Golf tiredness

Not tired of golf, of course; but just pleasantly wearied with the round of the links; just a little stiff, perhaps, and a little bit afraid of to-morrow.

Get into a hot bath, a

Mustard Bath

—one to which a couple of tablespoonfuls or so of COLMAN'S MUSTARD have been added. Note the immediate bracing invigoration; note the enjoyment of your evening, and the easy, lithe stride of the next day's round.

Colman's mustard

Then remember Colman's Mustard with gratitude.

Letters from George Eliot to Elma Stuart.

Crown 8vo, cloth. 5s. net.

"All admirers of George Eliot will surely join in a feeling of gratitude to Mr. Roland Stuart for publishing this little volume of letters addressed to his Mother by the great Novelist."—Daily Telegraph.

"Every admirer of the writings of George Eliot will be delighted with these charming letters."—Publishers' Circular.

SWIFTHAND

A NEW, SIMPLE AND RAPID METHOD OF
WRITING. Invented by the

Right Hon. SIR EDWARD CLARKE, K.C.

PRESS OPINIONS—

"Extremely ingenious and clever."—The Road.

"A modified shorthand with some advantages of its own, particularly in regard to legibility."—Birmingham Daily Post.

"Easily learnt by any person of ordinary ability."—Newcastle Weekly Journal.

"It is certainly a simple system that may be mastered in a very short time."—Colonial Printer.

ONE SHILLING, of all Booksellers.

London:

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & CO., LIMITED.

The Daily News

PRINTED SIMULTANEOUSLY
in LONDON & MANCHESTER.

"The Daily News" the representative Liberal Daily,
is on sale all over England
first thing in the morning.

If you have any difficulty in procuring
a copy communicate with the publisher.

LONDON AND MANCHESTER

Price One Halfpenny.

Head Offices: BOUVERIE STREET & FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telephone: 2626 Holborn (3 lines)

Northern Offices: 53, DALE STREET, MANCHESTER.

Telephone: 8031 Central.

JAMES CLARKE & CO.

J. B. PATON, M.A., D.D.,

EDUCATIONAL AND SOCIAL PIONEER.

By JAMES MARCHANT.

Photogravure Portrait and Illustrations on art paper. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 4s. 6d. net.

Dundee Advertiser.—"Mr. Marchant's sympathetic, informed, well-written biography should be popular."

British Congregationalist.—"The compiler has done his work well. This handy volume will afford satisfaction to many. This is a book to do us all good. . . . Thanks to Mr. James Marchant for this volume."

THE LATEST
WORK OF REV. J. BRIERLEY, B.A.

Author of "Sidelights on Religion," "Ourselves and the Universe," &c.

ASPECTS OF THE SPIRITUAL

Large crown 8vo cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

Dundee Courier.—"Mr. J. Brierley, B.A., needs no introduction to the reading public. His books, under the well-known initials of 'J. B.', have established for him a reputation of which any man might be justly proud. . . . It is inspiring to stand in the sunshine with such a man."

A DEVOTIONAL VOLUME.

LIFE IN HIS NAME

By DAVID M. M'INTYRE,

Author of "The Hidden Life of Prayer," &c.

Handsomely bound in cloth boards, gilt edges, with headband and marker, 3s. 6d. net.

Liverpool Post.—"Another most interesting religious work by David M. M'Intyre, who has given us some most valuable books on religion, all of which are of first-rate ability and excellence."

Scotsman.—"Nothing could be better. Throughout the whole volume the reader feels that he is following a sound, safe, well balanced thinker upon the spiritual life."

London: JAMES CLARKE & CO., 13 and 14, Fleet Street, E.C.

adventures, and his relations with Adrienne Lecouvreur, with Anna Ivanovna, with the Duchesse de Bouillon, and other episodes in his spirited but fickle career, are related by Mr. Trowbridge, who also manages by an occasional deft touch to convey something of Saxe's simple and wayward temperament. Readers who demand of history plenty of color and romance will enjoy this book.

* * *

IN a little volume of seventy-nine pages, Mr. Herbert Leeds has written the life of the late William Lefroy, Dean of Norwich (Jarrold, 2s. net). The memoir belongs to the order of "appreciations," rather than biographies, but, as the author explains, the slightness of the biographical detail is intentional, the late Dean having expressed a wish that no extended biography should ever be published. Dean Lefroy was an engaging and not unpicturesque personality in the church life of his day. An Evangelical to the core, he fought the Ritualist movement with all the vigor of a strenuous nature, always with the sincerest conviction that he was serving the best interests of the Church thereby. Yet this combativeness in doctrine was not the predominant feature of his ministry. His record at Norwich—a record that shows him as an earnest, almost impetuous, reformer in a circle which was disposed at first to accept reform with but indifferent grace—is the story of a consistent determination to regard his Christianity as a practical working creed, and his calling as directly connected with, and inseparable from, ordinary life. The Tory-democracy that he preached and practised was essentially democratic. "Few men," says Mr. Leeds, "in the hierarchy of the Church, knew better than he the life, the outlook, the thoughts, and the feelings of the common people"; and his innate conservatism was tempered and directed into wholesome channels by this knowledge. Mr. Leeds gives an interesting sketch of his early days in Dublin, where he started life as a journalist; of his incumbency of St. Andrew's, Liverpool; and of his reception into the then sleepy, comfortable life of the Norwich Close. It is unfortunate, by the way, that a quotation, descriptive of the sensation caused by the Dean's coming to Norwich, has been so mangled by the printers that one sentence is utter nonsense. The Dean's work in regard to the regulation of the Cathedral is traced by Mr. Leeds, and there are thoughtful essays on his sermons, lectures, recreations, and personal characteristics. The volume is illustrated by a frontispiece portrait, and a few photographs of churches with which the Dean was connected.

The Week in the City.

		Price Friday morning, Nov. 19.	Price Friday morning, Nov. 26.
Consols 2½ per cent.	...	82 ⁷ / ₁₆	82 ¹ / ₂
German Threes	...	83	83 ¹ / ₂
Spanish Fours	...	94 ¹ / ₂	94 ¹ / ₂
Buenos Ayres Pacific	...	85 ¹ / ₂	88 ¹ / ₂
Steel Common	...	93	90 ¹ / ₂

THE City has cheered up in the last day or two in spite of the lugubrious speeches about British credit by Lords Revelstoke and Avebury. The Stock Exchange has been busy with investment orders, and prices have been a little firmer. There has been some speculation in copper shares, as it is believed that Mr. Pierpont Morgan is heading a gigantic combine to control and curtail output. The Bank return is a very good one, and much surprise was expressed that the Court of Directors did not reduce the rate from 5 to 4 per cent. The universal explanation is that the Directors of the Bank are anxious about the consequences if the Lords reject the Budget, and prefer to keep to their 5 per cent. rate until, at any rate, the event has occurred and the probabilities of financial chaos can be better measured. In the meantime we cannot look for any outburst of speculative activity, and the mere fact that a General Election is impending will tend to check the trade revival.

EXPORTS OF CAPITAL.

Last week I referred to Mr. Wyndham's extraordinary statements about exports of British capital. Since then Lord Lansdowne has referred to the subject and has been supported by Lord Revelstoke, Lord Rosebery, and Lord Milner. They are all in the same boat. They all try to make our flesh creep with irrelevant statistics which sound very scientific and are well calculated to mislead an unsophisticated audience. As their whole argument seems to be based on figures of "capital issues" collected by the "Economist," it may be well to give the following figures from the issue of that paper of October 16th:—

AMOUNT PUBLICLY RAISED FOR BRITISH INDUSTRIALS.

1903.	1904.	1905.	Average.
£24,370,300	£20,833,900	£22,340,800	£22,515,000
1906.	1907.	1908.
£23,538,800	£24,642,900	£26,889,500	£25,040,400

The first three years were years of Tory Government, and the average was £22,515,000. The second three were years of Liberal Government, and the average was £25,040,400. Difference in favor of the Liberals, £2,525,400 per annum. But, as I have said before, British industries are not financed by public subscriptions in London. For every pound so raised in London I dare affirm that twenty are subscribed locally, or "put into the business" privately. Possibly some reader of this column could illustrate the subject from his own experience.

LORD ROSEBERY AND THE EXPORTS OF CAPITAL.

Lord Rosebery's speech has been a great source of innocent merriment this week in the City. His views on the elementary transactions of finance are childlike and original, and bear out his own statement that he has never made a study of these matters. This is what he said:—

"This country was not long ago the strong box and the safe of Europe, to which every man outside this country sent his savings that they might be secure. That was an enormous mass of capital which was sent to England for security. I venture to ask if those millions have not already disappeared from this country. I believe all the great ships that go westwards across the Atlantic are at this moment carrying bonds and stocks in ballast." (Loud laughter.)

This is indeed serious. So anxious are our capitalists to get their money out of the country that the primal relations of borrower and lender are reversed, and to-day Englishmen not only lend freely to Americans, but actually offer their own bonds as security for their own money! Perhaps Lord Rosebery's ridiculous blunder will warn other enthusiasts to make sure of their home-made financial theories before airing them in public. And what does this theory of American borrowings, even when correctly stated, amount to? Simply this—that New York is supposed this autumn to have bought an unusually large number of bills for discount in London. The story is strenuously denied, but even if it is true, the bills only run for a short period—three or six months, and many of them are already maturing. During the harvest months America, whose supply of credit is never equal to a heavy demand, shifts part of the burden on to the shoulders of London, draws money at a high rate of interest and sends it back again as soon as the seasonal stress is past. That is all. It is done every year, and it has absolutely no connection with this or any other Budget. Lord Rosebery, no doubt, supposes that this investment in Americans is permanent; but, as everybody ought to know, English investors have not been taking up American stocks or bonds any faster than usual. On the contrary, most of them believe that Wall Street has run prices up far too high, and that investment at present is a very dangerous business. Speculation there may be, but not investment; and my readers may rest assured that neither on the westward nor the eastward journey are bonds and stocks being used to ballast Atlantic liners.

LUCCELLUM.

CHAIRMAN : To those qualities of fine flavour and aroma that one requires for real enjoyment in smoking it adds the unusual attribute of coolness.

Whether smoked much or little it is always cool, always pleasing and burns evenly to the last shred.

BOARDMAN'S is the same tobacco milder, and

RECORDER the same, but fuller flavoured.

6d. per oz. from
all tobacconists.

R. J. LEA, MANCHESTER.

Rowntree's Cocoa

has a distinctly rich flavour
all its own.
It is really
delicious.

MAKERS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

EUROPE'S OPTICAL ILLUSION. By Norman Angell.
2/6. Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co. Ltd., London.

New light on the armament Question.
A book that goes to the root of the difficulty, showing,
HOW the credit system is our real defence;
WHY it would make even a victorious Germany impotent for evil, and,
HOW it brings about the economic futility of military power, and,
Makes modern wealth, even when undefended, secure from military aggression.

NO LIBERAL CAN AFFORD TO REMAIN IGNORANT OF THE LITTLE-REALISED FACTS ELABORATED IN THIS STRIKING TREATISE.

EUROPE'S OPTICAL ILLUSION. By Norman Angell.
2/6. Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co. Ltd., London.
4, Stationers Hall Court, LONDON.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£12 12s. OPORTO, GIBRALTER, TANGIERS, ALGIERS,
PAERMO, February 15th.
£28 5s. PALESTINE, EGYPT, CONSTANTINOPLE, GREECE,
March 3rd.
Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

£7 7s. —SKI-ING, SKATING, TOBOGGANNING
TOURS, including Second-Class Return Ticket
and Accommodation Hotel Aubepine, Ballaigues. Also Hotels at Mantana, Villars. St. Beatenberg, Wengen, Lenzerheide, etc.—
Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, S.W.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME V. OF THE NATION

Is now ready, and can be obtained free
on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 200 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Scholarship Examination in December.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.
BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

ST. GEORGE'S CLASSES, EDINBURGH.

(FOUNDED 1876)

TUITION BY CORRESPONDENCE.

Help and Direction for Home Students in Literature, Fine Art (Special Subject for 1909-10, "The National Gallery—Foreign Schools"), History, Geography, Philosophy, Languages, Science, &c.

The Classes, under the direction of an Honorary Committee of Ladies, are conducted by experienced tutors of high University attainment who work in direct communication with their students. Preparation for examinations. Fees from 12s. per term. Write for Prospectus to Secretary, St. George's Classes, Edinburgh.

SESAME HOUSE for Home-life Training and for Training of Children, Lady Nurses and Kindergarten. —For full particulars apply, the Principal Miss Emily Last, 43A, Aeneia Road, London, N.W.

ROYAL HOLLOWAY COLLEGE.
(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.)

The LENT TERM BEGINS ON JANUARY 12th, 1910. The College prepares Students for the London Degrees in Science and Arts.

TWELVE ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, from £50 to £60 a year, and a certain number of Bursaries of not more than £30, tenable for three years, will be offered for COMPETITION in June, 1910.

Inclusive fee £100 a year.

For further particulars, apply to the SECRETARY, Royal Holloway College, Englefield Green, Surrey.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Healthy outdoor life, combined with thorough education on modern lines. Usual curriculum, including citizenship course, extension lectures, &c. Preparation when required for University and other careers. Handicrafts, gardening, riding, nature study, archaeology, &c.

Principal: Miss AMY KEMP.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL.

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities.

Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

The Spring Term begins on January 18th.

For prospectus, etc., apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class, Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK.
 { K. M. ELLIS.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE,
SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

BOOKSELLERS.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE.

6/-
for 2/-
Po t
Free

2,800 "VICTORIAN" EDITION OF

BARRY'S TEACHERS' PRAYER BOOK.

Being the Book of Common Prayer, with Introductions, Analysis, Notes and a Commentary upon the Psalter. By the Right Rev. ALFRED BARRY, D.D., D.C.L., and a Glossary by the Rev. A. I. MAYHEW, M.A. 16mo. Bourgeois, Large Type Edition. Cloth boards, red edges, 6s. for 2s. Abroad 2s. 2d.; Pastegrain, limp, gilt edges, 7s. 6d. for 3s. 9d.; Abroad 3s. 11d.; post free, 53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

GLAISHER'S DECEMBER CATALOGUES
OF PUBLISHER'S REMAINDERS AND BOOKS
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS

are now ready, and will be sent post free on application.

These TWO CATALOGUES include many ENTIRELY NEW REMAINDERS in General Literature; also a large and wide selection of well-illustrated and attractive books for the young, suitable for Christmas Presents.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., Remainder and Discount Bookseller,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

The Strange Disappearance
of a Baronet—

an eerie and whimsical story by ALGERNON BLACKWOOD
—will appear in this week's issue of

The Saturday
Westminster,

which will be a SPECIAL LITERARY NUMBER enlarged to

TWENTY PAGES.

Other Special Contributions to the issue will be

THE NEXT DOOR BABY: by Mrs. Neish.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS: by G. A. B. Dewar.

AN AMUSING STUDY BY "SAKI."

And in addition there will be

Special Articles on Christmas and Gift Books,
Reviews of the Season's Books, F. C. G.'s
Cartoons, and all the usual features.

'Saturday Westminster,' November 27th.

OFFICES: Salisbury Square, Fleet Street, E.C.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading,
Billiard and Smoking Rooms.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) Single from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill. E.C.; 70 & 71 Euston Square. W.C.AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.THE QUEEN. Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence. 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderate

SILVER HOW.. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL. Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL 120 rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCs.

CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE. 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone 3032 Royal, 3 wiresGRAPES HOTEL, Tarleton St. Snacks and Luncheons. Tel. 3074
Royal. G. Cutts. Prop.LLANDUDNO.

The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

LYNTON (Devon).

ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challard

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.

RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant One Minute from Station

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

SOUTHPORT.KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illu-
minations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s per day. Tel. 422.

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough. Prop

ALBERT HOTEL. Ordinary daily. Sunday Table d'Hôte. H. E. Taylor

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BYBARLOW & JONES, LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION
Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription. Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION
Publishing Co. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions
are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	$\frac{1}{2}$ PAGE.	$\frac{1}{4}$ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages...	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0
Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:
13 Insertions	8d. per line.
52	6d. ..

THE INDEX TO VOLUME V. OF THE NATION

Will be ready shortly and may be had free, on application to the Manager.

THE "NATION" IS SAFE!

We are at the Back (PAGE) of it

A & F Pears

Soapmakers to the King

GOD SAVE THE KING!

GOD SAVE THE KING!

Soapmakers to the King

A & F Pears

We are at the Back (PAGE) of it

THE "NATION" IS SAFE!

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 10.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1909.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K. 4d. Abroad, 11d.]

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	385	The Poetry Recital Society.
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		By the Director ...	404
The Fruits of Victory ...	388	Pragmatism. By L. Crook.
The Destruction of the Block		and E. C. Childs ...	404
Veto ...	389	Bacon on Protection. By A. J.
Can Protection Cure Un-		Butler ...	405
employment? ...	390	POETRY:—
The Logic of Lord Revelstoke	391	Rellets dans l'Eau. By Edith
IN THE KINGDOM OF THE		Moggridge ...	405
BLIND. By H. W. M.	393	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ...	406
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		REVIEWS:—
The Sceptic in Art ...	394	Sheridan ...	407
A Decivilised Class ...	395	The Return to Reason ...	408
The Army of Innocence ...	396	La Maureria. By R. B. Cun-
THE DRAMA:—		ninghame Graham ...	410
Potted Beethoven. By William		A French View of Shakespeare.
Archer ...	397	By the Rev. Canon Jessopp	412
COMMUNICATIONS:—		A Legation Lady ...	414
The Character of the Indian		A Talkative Novel ...	414
Police (concluded). By		BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
Frederic Mackarness, M.P. ...	398	Travels in the Upper Egyptian
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		Deserts ...	416
The Government and Women's		Madame de Maintenon: Her
Suffrage. By Margaret		Life and Times ...	418
Llewelyn Davies and Mary		Highways and Byways in
R. Macarthur ...	400	Middlesex ...	418
Making the Foreigner Pay.		Kirk Life and Kirk Folk ...	418
By Manufacturer, A. Grim-		Ten Great and Good Men ...	418
shaw Haywood, James Mor-		London Town: Past and ton, and John Grubb ...	400	Present ...	418
The Ultimate Basis of		Melba: a Biography ...	418
Authority. By John Massie,		British Mountain Climbs ...	420
M.P. ...	402	Wedges ...	420
Lord Rosebery's Speech. By		Tyrol and Its People ...	420
D. M. Stevenson ...	402	The Poetry of Nature ...	420
Dramatic Authors on the Cen-		THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By sorship. By Arthur Pinero,		Lucellum ...	420
etc. ...	403	LITERARY SUPPLEMENT:—
The Purpose of Mr. Balfour's		What to Teach Children. By
Romanes Lecture. By		Leo Tolstoy ...	427
Donald B. Somervell ...	403	The Madman's Story. By G. K.
Rattling into Barbarism. By		Chesterton ...	427
Penguin ...	404	The Old, Old Stories ...	429
In Praise of Dumping. By		The Fairy Queen's Mark. By
W. H. M. ...	404	Evelyn Sharp ...	430
Charles Kingsley and Women's		Books of the Open Air ...	432
Suffrage. By C. E. Maurice	404	Science for Young Students ...	434
Undergraduate Opinion in		Books for Girls ...	436
Oxford. By H. F. D. ...	404	The Children's Bookshelf ...	438

The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

ON Tuesday night, the House of Lords, for the first time in British history, refused supplies to the Crown, and attacked its prerogative of ordering a dissolution. In other words, they rejected the Finance Bill. 350 peers voted for Lord Lansdowne's amendment, and 75 against, the majority of 275 peers contrasting sharply with the majority of 230 Commoners who carried the Budget on its third reading. We cannot profess to summarise a week's debate. In the main it possessed three features. The first was the revolt of the ablest and most truly conservative minds in the House of Lords, coupled with the statement of the Archbishop of York that the debate had convinced him that the policy of abstention commended by the Primate was impossible, and that Lord Lansdowne had failed to make out his case. The second was the absence of all attempt on the part of the majority to argue the Constitutional question. The third was the assumption by Lord Curzon, Lord Cawdor, and Lord Milner—"damn-the-consequences"-Milner—of a position involving the following usurpations of the power of the King and the House of Commons:—

(1) That the House of Lords, in spite of its defeat in 1861, asserts an absolute right over taxes and bills of supply.

(2) That it claims the right of forcing a dissolution on measures which are either new or which it judges to be unpopular.

(3) That it has the right to reject one scheme of taxes and to propose another.

(4) That it has the right to reject each verdict of the electors until it has obtained one enabling it to strengthen its position by an enlarged basis.

* * *

ON Wednesday and Thursday came the retort of the Commons, delivered in two tremendous hammer-strokes by the Resolution and the speech of the Prime Minister. The Resolution proved to be a model of large and, at the same time, concise affirmation. It was to this effect:—

"That the action of the House of Lords in refusing to pass into law the financial provision made by this House for the service of the year is a breach of the Constitution and a usurpation of the rights of the Commons."

* * *

THESE words were supported on Thursday by Mr. Asquith in a magnificent oration, calculated to rouse his party to the highest pitch of zeal and enthusiasm, to guard the menaced privileges of the Commons, and to loose a united Grand Army of democracy for an attack and a certain and overwhelming victory on the Veto. The speech was acclaimed with a passion that only Gladstone's greatest utterances evoked. Declaring that the Government would "never brook" "the gravest indignity and the most arrogant usurpation" from which the House had suffered for two hundred years, the Prime Minister announced the King's assent to an early dissolution, and, while rejecting the proposal to go on enforcing the new taxes in pure reliance on the resolutions of the House of Commons, declared that they would all be re-enacted, as from this week, if the Liberal Party were returned to power, with retrospective force. He refused with scorn all recourse to the Lords, foreshadowed a process of borrowing under the Appropriation Act to meet the immediate necessities of the State, and threw upon the House of Lords all responsibility for the inevitable loss to the taxpayers, which he hoped would ultimately not be "very great." Meanwhile, there will be a period of voluntary taxes during which people may deposit their taxes with the proper officers. [The dissolution, we understand, will take place on January 8th, and the first elections on January 13th.]

* * *

THE Prime Minister declared the action of the Lords to be a breach of the Constitution, which rested upon "usage, custom, and convention." As Pym, Selden, and Somers saved the House of Commons from the domination of the Crown, so would the Liberal Party put an end to the usurpation of the House of Lords. (A storm of cheering, again and again renewed.) He proceeded to foreshadow the character of the Liberal counter-stroke, by declaring that the Resolution was only a step in the controversy with the Lords. They now lived under a system of "false balances and loaded dice," in which the House of Commons was omnipotent when the Tories were in power, and the House of Lords when the Liberals took office. That system must come to an end. The Lords had opened up a wider controversy than that of finance, and the Government would ask the people to declare that their "organ and voice" should be found in the "elected representatives of the nation." We gather that some Liberal members thought that the policy of the destruction of the Veto should have been definitely opened up. But it is clear that this is reserved for the Albert Hall speech.

* * *

MR. BALFOUR's reply, on a bad and already lost cause, was a complete failure. His speech, faltering in tone and almost negligible in argument, could hardly have been made by a man who expected, or even wanted, to win the coming election. He evaded the financial issue, not attempting to explain his retreat from the position which he took up in the debate on the Campbell-Bannerman resolution—that the House of Lords could not "touch" Money Bills. He accepted the Government's plan for minimising financial chaos, though he would have preferred a legalising of the taxes—that is to say, the passage of an interim House of Lords Budget. He said that the Resolution helped nobody, hurt nobody, and frightened nobody, though it grossly misrepresented the Constitution. Taunted with his recent phrase that he was a House of Commons man, he minimised his treachery to the representative principle by pleading that such action of the Lords was "rare," and must in the future be "very rare," hinted that the House of Commons was stretching its privileges, even attacked earlier Speakers for helping the process, and asked how the people could be said to be insulted merely because they were to be asked their opinion on the Budget. The House of Lords' action was consistent with the theory of a Second Chamber, and even with the Campbell-Bannerman Resolution, which denied a Government a mandate for a controversial measure in its fourth year. Mr. Henderson, on behalf of the Labor members, strongly supported the Resolution, which was carried by a majority of 215, 349 voting for it and 134 against. The result is only a prelude to the "sweep" in the country.

* * *

By an unfortunate blunder on the part of the Chief Liberal Whip, the time of the division was fixed, in his circular to Liberal members, for seven o'clock. It took place a little after five. The result was that many Liberal members came to the House too late, and the Liberal majority, which should have been nearer 250 than 215, was needlessly depleted. Such an error, in one of the most important divisions ever taken in the British Parliament, is the more inexcusable, as every Parliamentary journalist knew beforehand that only three speeches of consequence would be delivered on the Asquith motion.

* * *

THE Lords were busied on Wednesday with two of the side-issues of the national conflict. At the instigation of Lord Camperdown, whose "Hang the consequences" will not be forgotten, they finally adhered to their destructive amendments to the Scottish House Letting and Rating Bill, a step which involved the loss of this measure. The motive was frankly defined as a fear lest the Bill should admit to the register some poor thousands of tenants who may at present be excluded. The "consequences" are likely to be the strengthening of the Liberal position in Glasgow, where the demand for the Bill is keen. Not less significant were Lord Lansdowne's protests against the insistence of the Commons on their privileges over the Development Bill. The Lords' amendments, as the Speaker had ruled, were clearly a breach of privilege. Lord Lansdowne retorted by what is in effect a bold claim to the effective right to amend a Money Bill. If, he threatened, the Commons insist on their privileges, the Lords will no longer be able "to take measures of this kind into their consideration." The protest, however, was academic, and the Lords in the end agreed to the Commons' amendments to their amendments, but not without registering their formal dissent from the Commons' reasons for their amendments and entering a claim to deal with all such "questions of policy." The actual conflict is thus narrowed to the Budget, for the Irish Land Bill and the Housing Bill have been allowed to go through in a maimed condition. "We can await the result of the General Election with indifference," an Irish peer was heard to remark. "We have got our money."

* * *

It is not surprising that the rejection of the Budget has gravely disturbed American and Colonial opinion. Every type of American newspaper, from the Conservative-Liberal "Evening Post," to the democratic "New York World," condemns the peers, and regards the victory of democracy as inevitable. Australian opinion is stated, even by Reuter, to be generally adverse to the Lords' claim to constitutional powers not belonging to them. The "Melbourne Age," one of the ablest and most powerful British newspapers ever published, describes the Lords as an oligarchy, setting up as the controller of the public purse. The "Toronto Globe," the weightiest paper in Canada, is entirely hostile, and so is the Press which represents the governing forces in Cape Colony, the Transvaal, and the Orange Colony. Apparently, the Conservative Press in South Africa is "generally favorable to the Unionists." The Lords have also found a friend in Natal.

* * *

It appears that the interim collection of indirect taxes on a voluntary basis will proceed by agreements with the heads of the particular industries concerned. Bonded goods will be released on payment of duty, and merchants will be refunded if the Government fails to return to power, or if the taxes are altered. The action of the Lords is, indeed, being treated in practice as well as in theory, as a usurpation. "The customs officers," said the head of a large tea company, "are arranging to collect the duty as though nothing had happened. We shall pay it as usual, and that is the whole position." But the losses and leakages may be serious, and the next Budget and the men who wrecked it will have to make them good.

* * *

THE Reichstag met on Tuesday, and the attitude of the various parties emphasises the complete destruction of the Liberal-Conservative coalition. The Liberals and Radicals even abstained from voting for the officers of the Chamber. The Kaiser's speech from the throne announced no new departure which would give a clue to the new Chancellor's personal policy. The Bills for extending the State system of sick insurance, and for adding to it a life-insurance for surviving relatives, are legacies from last session. Apart from an optimistic reference to the progress of railway construction in South-West Africa, the speech was notable only for its very cordial reference to France and her work in Morocco. This has been underlined with much satisfaction by the French Press. The usual mention of the Triple Alliance was phrased in such a way as to convey the reminder that Austria and Germany were the original, and are, presumably, still, the leading partners in it. A hot polemic against Italy is going on in more than one of the semi-official German newspapers, and Italian writers are complaining of the one-sidedness of the commercial treaty. The speech contained no reference to Great Britain, and through various semi-official channels the forward school is being assured that Herr Bethmann-Hollweg will continue Prince Bülow's foreign policy. One is inclined to ask "Which policy?" for it was always sinuous and opportunist. This assurance, being interpreted, is said to mean that there will be no naval arrangement. The German Budget, however, has yet to be voted.

* * *

THE probability to which we referred last week that Germany would collaborate with this country in calling an international conference to deal with the conditions of trade on the Congo has now become a certainty, and has been confirmed by announcements of obviously official origin both here and in Germany. The arrangement was concluded early in the year as a detail in the Central African boundary negotiations. The "Times" meanwhile, possibly because it dislikes any common action with Germany, now warns Mr. Morel and his friends not to go too far. MM. Beernaart, Cattier, and Vandervelde—all of them men whose sincerity and wisdom are beyond doubt—are cited as holding the opinion that the irreconcilable attitude of the Congo Reform Association is now embarrassing their action in Belgium.

* * *

THIS warning is not lightly to be set aside. What it means is clear, however, from an article by M. Vandervelde in the "Contemporary Review." Writing after his second visit to the Congo, he explains his reason for accepting the new programme of reforms as serious. In one sentence, forced labor on the Congo no longer pays. He eulogises the work of M. Morel, while criticising "the want of precision, the softness, the evasions of English diplomacy." But he does enter a very grave protest against the inclusion in Sir A. Conan Doyle's otherwise admirable pamphlet, of a suggestion that the Congo should be divided between France, whose record is far from clean, and Germany. Such proposals may well throw doubt on the disinterestedness of the reforming Powers. Germany would gain a colony, and we should doubtless secure from her in some other way a quid pro quo. Any proposals for partition are clearly mischievous, but we do not gather that M. Vandervelde has anything to urge against an attitude of reserve on our side towards the new reforms. The time has not yet come for a recognition of the Belgian annexation.

* * *

THE Spanish campaign in the Hinterland of Melilla is apparently over; the troops will shortly be recalled, and the tribes are making their peace. But the probability of a forward move on the part of France increases. M. Pichon is pressing for an early answer from the Sultan to his statement of claims—claims so onerous that they would involve an extensive financial control. A section of the French Press flatters itself that no further difficulties are to be feared. The Sultan will now understand, it is said, that he has nothing to hope from German backing, and he will therefore yield without the need for further military measures. The "Débats," on the other hand, fears that M. Pichon's policy can only be completed by military measures on a large scale. That is, we confess, our reading of the probabilities. The very anxiety of German diplomacy to give France a free hand in Morocco is not altogether auspicious. A free hand in Africa may mean tied and embarrassed hands in Europe.

* * *

"KING" PATAUD still reigns. He chose the occasion of a gala visit of the King of Portugal to the Opera to bring out his electricians on strike. For a quarter of an hour the rise of the curtain was delayed, and the management, in despair, signed an agreement with him—which will doubtless prove to be void—for an increase of wages. He then strolled round to a hall where M. Jaurès happened to be lecturing on the folly of these very tactics. "King" Pataud recounted his exploit, but the audience apparently was far from being impressed. M. Jaurès is engaged in a serious educative campaign to convince the leaders of the weak but violent Trade Unionist movement that steady work and a powerful organisation are the only guarantees of success.

* * *

THE text of the Russian proposals for suppressing the autonomy of Finland has now been published in Helsingfors. They go even further than we had anticipated in our article of last week. It is proposed to transfer to the competence of the Duma the following categories of Finnish affairs:—Finance, the military system, the use of the Russian language, Justice, Education, Customs, Posts, Railways, Shipping, the Right of Association, the Freedom of the Press, the Right to import foreign literature, the treatment of Russian residents, the Police system. It is difficult to guess what will remain for the Finnish Diet to do, when all these fields of activity have been closed to it. The Russian proposal is, in short, to make Finland virtually an ordinary province of the Empire, returning five members to the Duma. The preliminary era of repression is apparently about to begin. The Liberal Governor, Böckmann, has now been forced to resign, and in his place has been installed General Seyn, who was the most ruthless and the most active of Bokrikoff's lieutenants during the previous reign of terror.

* * *

THE Dramatic Authors' Committee, over the signatures of Mr. Shaw, Mr. Jones, Mr. Pinero, Mr. Barrie, and others, issued on Monday a letter embodying their view of the Censorship Report. They welcome unreservedly the establishment of one licence for all places of amusement, and the provision which makes the Lord Chamberlain responsible to the House of Commons. They protest against the looseness and width of the set of offences scheduled for punishment, including the impossible condition that no play must hurt anybody's feelings. The list of offences must be cut down, if the religious and political liberty of the stage are to be preserved. Their most serious protest is against the provision which empowers the landlord of a theatre to insist that his lessee shall produce only such plays as are licensed by the Censor. In effect, that provision destroys the option which the report seemed to offer. If the landlord is liable to be punished for the offences of his tenant, he will always insist on the production of censored plays. Only an "intellectual" theatre which actually owned its own building would gain anything in freedom. Since there is no appeal from the Censor's verdict, neither author nor lessee should be obliged to resort to him.

Politics and Affairs.

THE FRUITS OF VICTORY.

THE Lords have declared war on the Constitution; and the House of Commons, without one unnecessary word, has promptly branded their act as the greatest blow at representative government since the levy of ship-money. So far so good. If they win the ensuing election, they govern, or try to govern, Great Britain. If we win, we pluck them down from the seat they have usurped, and put them for ever in the lower place they will fill so long as England is free. The gamblers who lead the peers have indeed stated in advance that, in any event, they will collar the stakes. The popular appeal which they pretend to court is to be of no effect unless, and until, it yields the answer they want. Here, however, the Government and the Commons will catch and hold them. There will be an election on the Budget. So far as it is possible to disentangle the complicated issues of a large scheme of taxes, we shall ask the electorate, "Will you tax your food or their land?" "Do you believe in making a man of £5,000 a year pay on the very top scale of his income, or in sweating down the bread and clothes and school-money of the struggling citizen?" "Will you ask wealth for its fair toll, so that the State out of which it grows can be made fit for the multitude to live in?" There will also be an election, not only on Land-taxing, but on Land-holding. But, above all, there will be an election on the Veto, and on the question whether the people shall retain the full power of the vote, or sign fifty per cent. of it away to the Lords. The Prime Minister's splendid vindication of constitutional right already brushes them out of the quarrel on the taxes, and the action of the Government sets forth, this time by a series of voluntary agreements, the people and their representatives as the sole parties to the collection of revenue. The House of Commons for the moment must act without law; its agents will simply ask tea merchants and liquor merchants to pay their dues as if the Budget were law; and when the people vote this Budget back again, will validate the transaction. Chaos, therefore, will be avoided, really because 300 or 400 ignorant and lawless men cannot reduce a great community to chaos, and because in their hearts most men know that the usurpation of the Lords must be a matter of days and weeks alone. Were it otherwise, we should see our duty, with equal clearness. Should the people of Great Britain decide to lay their liberties at the feet of the peers, the minority would instinctively act as their fathers acted two hundred and fifty years ago. Liberals would not directly pay taxes to any power outside the House of Commons. Liberals would refuse to pay taxes so long as the sole taxing power of the representative House remained in doubt. Do the Lords refuse supplies to the Crown? Hundreds of thousands of Englishmen, Welshmen, Scotsmen, and Irishmen will, if necessary, refuse supplies to them.

The Liberal and Labor Parties, therefore, having had the immense advantage of a cool preliminary argument, in which the nation has been able to see that the prevailing weight of sense and experience in the Tory Party revolts from the action of the peers, stand to win on the issue to which we move, and cannot lose. But they have not the slightest notion of merely marking time on this election, or of bringing back, as their one sheaf of the harvest, the right to re-enact the Budget. Not that this in itself is an unimportant issue. The Lords have refused to pay the old age pensions fund, and to-day Mr. Ure's prophetic warnings are converted into commonplace truths. They have refused to find the money for the great scheme for bringing into the workman's home the immeasurable blessing of security against the triple evils of his life—sickness, invalidity, and unemployment. Therefore the Budget must be put back again. But every soldier in our campaign is thinking of its lasting reward—the destruction of the Veto. That will emerge naturally from the fact that our leader's declaration at the Albert Hall and elsewhere will have put the question plainly before the electorate. Of course, we shall restore Single-Chamber Government in finance. Necessarily, also, the party will secure by written compacts the King's right to order a Dissolution in constitutional fashion, the Commons' sole right to send Governments about their business, the people's right to vote for a Mother of Parliaments, not for a starved and disinherited Maid-of-all-work to the House of Lords. But above all, it will claim, and expect its leaders to provide in advance, and for the new Parliament, the machinery for a final and complete subordination of the peers to the principle of representative government. Lord Curzon sees, in Oriental perspective, a long vista of elections, at the end of which will arise the magnificent structure of a "reformed" House of Lords, not merely equipotent with the Commons, but proudly dominating them. We cherish a different dream. We see government by the people for the people, carried to its legitimate issues. There our policy begins and ends. When we have achieved it, we have no more immediate concern with the peers. They may reform themselves, if they can. All we propose is that we shall not be ruled by them.

This being the end, we have only to devise and fashion the means of organising the crushing victory that awaits us. It is to grand and dominating issues, not to petty calculations of immediate advantage, that the forces of English, Scottish, Irish, and Welsh democracy must look. They must survey the whole wide fabric of popular government, now subject to the crafty menace of the oligarchy that we scotched but did not kill in 1832. This is no time for considering nicely varying shades of progressive opinion. Moderates and advanced men deserve equally the consideration that comradeship in arms brings with it. The task of re-writing the Constitution torn up by the House of Lords is visibly before us, and in that work it is of deep importance that a party directly representing labor should be fully engaged. All Liberals, or nearly all Liberals, are Democrats, Social Reformers, and Home Rulers. The House of Lords is the standing obstacle to Democracy, Social Reform, and Home Rule. When it ceases to be a controlling force, these three ends become attainable. We desire them all. They are all historic principles of Liberal Government; all can be pursued in harmony with Imperial unity, with security to property, with substantial singleness of aim. If they were thwarted, not merely would British politics be turned to a course of pure reaction, but the grand example of the House of Commons, the head-light of constitutional and democratic progress all the world over, would be lost to civilisation. Equally fatal would such an issue prove to the development of the autonomous States and Dominions now grouped round the Motherland. Each one of them has borrowed its Constitution from our own. Each one of them has, with or without a struggle, reduced its House of Lords to comparative nullity, and Australia, at least, has built on the practical supremacy of the representative power just that structure of democratic finance some of whose corner-stones Mr. Lloyd George has taken for his Budget. The shock of the defeat of the House of Commons would strike a blow at Colonial liberties as well as at our own. It would be felt as a death wound to every struggling cause of liberty in Europe, and, in its reactions, and the rule of violence and forcible resistance they would entail, might give the twentieth century a darker dawn even than the nineteenth.

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE BLOCK VETO.

It is not a bad thing for the world that some of our ruling spirits enjoy a profound contempt for those whom they aspire to rule. It makes for candor. Men like Lord Milner and Lord Curzon blurt out what men like Lord Lansdowne wrap up in studied periphrases. Lord Milner frankly "damns the consequences," therein retaliating for what the consequences of his own public acts have done for him. Lord Curzon, "calm and strong as one who does, not suffers wrong," boldly emphasises the nature of the revolution which the Lords are attempting. Not only does he directly claim the right of enforcing a dissolution for the Lords, thereby saving us all trouble in the matter of proving their encroachments, but he fearlessly forecasts a constitutional change as the result of the controversy, and the change is to be one out of which the House of Lords is to emerge re-powered and strengthened. He promises to take an active part in the platform campaign, and we could wish for nothing better. No one is better fitted to make clear to the people the simple issue that is now before them, whether they are to govern themselves or to be governed by a few hundred Peers. On the Ministerial side, as the debate has gone, the alternative has been more and more clearly grasped, and we now have the mind of the Government expressed by Lord Crewe even more distinctly than by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Pentland. The Liberal Party may win or lose—and, in our opinion, it is going to win a smashing victory—but, win or lose, it is now definitely committed to one object, which must dominate all political controversies until it is gained. It is pledged to secure "guarantees" against the destruction of the powers of the House of Commons, legislative as well as financial, by the House of Lords.

The precise nature of these guarantees remains to be formulated, and we hope that they will be made as plain as possible by Mr. Asquith before the dissolution. There are two points to be covered. The first is the formal assertion of the traditional supremacy of the House of Commons in finance. This involves no constitutional change. It requires merely the formal and explicit assertion, in terms which can never be mistaken or ignored, of traditional practice, the declaration in the Asquith resolution, of the inalienable "rights of the Commons." Such an assertion has become necessary because we are dealing with Conservatives to whom the past is nothing, with constitutionalists to whom the spirit of the Constitution is an idle breath, with men of affairs whom long-established understandings do not bind so long as within the letter of the law they can see a chink by which to escape. In dealing with such men an instrument like the British Constitution becomes unworkable, and the bondage of written law is rendered necessary. It will not suffice, therefore, for the new Parliament to pass the Budget into law. Nor, indeed, is it probable that the old Budget will meet the new necessities. There will be the losses involved in the period of chaos to be made good—and they will not be made good at the expense of the poor, who have not caused them. But before the Budget is passed means will have to be found for securing that it and all future Budgets shall become law without question in the shape in which they have left the House of Commons. To consolidate this pillar of the Constitution is the first duty of the party.

Distinct, but closely associated with it, is the second duty of vindicating the legislative predominance of the House of Commons. We say that the object is distinct for two reasons. In the first place, under this head we do not claim undisputed authority. We claim predominance. We do not seek to ignore or annul the Second Chamber. We seek to bring it into due relation with the representative house. In the second place, in this relation it must be admitted that a certain constitutional change is contemplated. It is, indeed, a change of a conservative order, as most British constitutional changes have been. For it seeks to establish by statute law a relation which, in an informal way, has generally, since 1832, been supposed to exist, and has, in fact, been in large measure maintained by the exercise of good sense on both sides down to recent times. That relation consisted in this—that the House of Lords gave fair consideration to the will of the Commons, taking into account the right of majorities, the circumstances of elections, and so forth, and, on the whole, accepting measures which they disliked if these had, as judged by those tests, received an adequate backing. On this basis Liberal Governments in the past were enabled to secure a fair proportion of their first-class measures. The situation was often difficult, but never, at least until 1894, impossible. In the last two Liberal Parliaments it has been fundamentally changed. For a due recognition of the predominance of the House of Commons the Lords have substituted the theory of the mandate. On any measure which they dislike they claim the right to exercise their power of rejection, and thereby of compelling the Government either to surrender the Bill or dissolve on that particular issue. This is a principle which alone would have forced, was gradually forcing, Liberals to recognise the necessity of a constitutional change before ever the question of the Budget arose. The immediate task before them is accordingly that of establishing by law the old predominance—not the sole authority of the Commons in legislation, but its ultimate predominance over the irresponsible House.

Thus faced with the unavoidable necessity of constitutional change, we have to ask in what direction will lie the line of least resistance to the enforcement of the popular will? We must admit that the beginning of constitutional strife is like the letting out of waters. But the strife was not of our seeking. We shall contend for those changes which are necessary for our purpose, and for no more. That in a Constitution like ours, so intricate, so delicately balanced, one change will almost certainly be found to involve others, we must acknowledge. The whole constitution of the House of Lords will almost inevitably be brought under review before the controversy is done, and if anyone tells us that the hereditary principle is doomed by its inherent absurdity we shall not say him nay. But it has been our established method in this country to take one thing at a time, and to deal with obstacles as they arise. Now the one thing that lies straight in our path is the veto. Beyond the veto lie further questions, questions of the constitution of the Second Chamber, questions of the powers of the Commons. These questions, we may well believe, will soon be forced on legislators when the block of the veto is overcome. But upon them we find little or no agreement among people of democratic ways of thinking. There are those who would abolish the House of Lords. There are those who would reform it. There are those who fear that reform would only consolidate its powers of obstructing. There are those who favor a Referendum as the final Court of Appeal. There are those who consider that a Referendum would destroy the representative character of our institutions. On these questions of reconstruction there is as yet no general agreement. No complete theory of constitutional reconstruction can therefore be put before the electors with any prospect of commanding the united support of Liberal and Labor electors. But, on the preliminary point all parties opposed to the Lords are agreed. The block veto must go. It is, accordingly, on the removal of the block veto that the Government will concentrate its forces.

But the destruction of the block veto does not involve a sheer single-Chamber system. It does not involve the reduction of the House of Lords to that complete impotence in legislation which has been, and is to be, its portion in matters of finance. There are many degrees between an absolute veto and no veto at all. One such stage was illustrated by the scheme put forward by the late Prime Minister, and adopted in 1907 by the House of Commons. We do not know whether the Government will revive this scheme. We should prefer to see it simplified in some respects. But its essence, stripped of all complexities, was to shorten the life of Parliaments, and give the House of Lords a certain power of delay, which would, of course, have an increasing effect as the life of the House of Commons ran its course, and would enable the Lords in the later part of the period to refer any legislative matter to a new Parliament. While fresh from the electorate, the House of Commons would be able to secure its Bills; when aging, it would only be able to do so by consent or by a renewal of its authority from the constituencies. We do not, for our part, suppose that such a scheme has all the elements of finality. There are several problems which it leaves untouched, to some of which we may on occasion refer. We claim for it only that it solves the immediate difficulty while leaving open the solution of further difficulties. For the block veto once destroyed, the path of constitutional reform is open, and the advocate of a reformed House of Lords, the advocate of no House of Lords, the advocate of a referendum, can all obtain their hearing, and, if they can convince a majority of the constituencies, can hope to see the perfect constitution of their dreams established by law. While the block remains, it is useless to talk of delicate work of reconstruction wherein the necessary balancing of many views takes the steam out of the measure as a whole. A block must be forced by a single concentrated effort. It is only when it is removed that the freedom and leisure necessary for the delicate and debatable task of reconstruction are obtained.

CAN PROTECTION CURE UNEMPLOYMENT?

Of the three popular catchwords of our Protectionists, "Taxing the Foreigner," "Keeping Capital at Home," and "Finding Work for the Unemployed," probably the last can be made the most specious to the novice in economic reasoning. "Talk Unemployment" is therefore the instruction which the engineers of Tariff Reform are giving to their platform workers. Free Traders commonly meet the "argument" in one of two ways. The simpler is to counter the attack by asking whether the tariff of Germany or of the United States has prevented or cured unemployment in these countries. This method is broadly true and unanswerable; but the statistics so commonly abused by Tariff Reformers are too defective to be used with absolutely convincing effect by Free Traders in reply. The other answer is to point out that, if a tariff could cure unemployment by stopping foreign goods from entering this country, a corresponding quantity of exports would be stopped from going out to pay for them. But this argument is less convincing than it sometimes is taken to be. For the Protectionist who "knows his job" will answer that, though our export trade may be reduced to correspond with the reduction of imports, this does not signify that the goods which formerly went out to pay for the foreign goods will not be made, or that unemployment will be caused in the trades which produced them. These goods will continue to be made, but instead of exchanging against foreign goods, they will exchange against the home-made goods that have been substituted for the former by the tariffs. The Protectionist may, no doubt, be forced to admit that the same goods will not be demanded in exchange for home-made goods as formerly for foreign goods, and that thus some dislocation and waste will follow tariff interference. But he will stoutly contend that, since an equivalent quantity of English goods must be produced to "buy" the protected goods, the net quantity of production and employment in this country is increased.

The formal refutation of this argument, though perhaps not easily adapted to the platform focus, runs as follows: Take the case most favored by Protectionists, a period of depressed trade, when a number of British trades, suffering from the competition of foreign goods, have a large quantity of unemployed labor and plant, amounting, say, to ten per cent. Suppose that, by putting on a ten per cent. duty, an amount of foreign goods could be kept out equal in quantity to what would suffice to put into employment all the unemployed capital and labor in this country. What would be the effect of such a tariff? Since the foreign goods are only just kept out by a ten per cent. duty, it follows that the British goods substituted for them are produced ten per cent. dearer, and that they can only be sold at a price ten per cent. higher than the foreign goods were sold at under free importation. But since there can only be one price for the same sort of goods in the same market, the British makers of the other ninety per cent. of goods, which required no protection, will raise their prices ten per cent. The whole of the goods thus produced in the protected trades will rise in price ten per cent.

Now, if all the goods in protected trades were necessities, it might follow that the rise of price would not be followed by a reduction of demand for them. In such an improbable event the whole of the unemployed in these trades would have work and wages found for them. But there would be some unemployment directly caused in other industries. For employees and workers in non-protected industries would find that, since they had to spend a larger portion of their incomes in buying the now protected goods, they had less than before to spend on unprotected goods. This would probably apply to the workers in the protected trades who made the ninety per cent. which formerly were produced, for we cannot assume that the higher prices in these trades would bring them higher wages. The higher profits taken by employers in the protected trades would enable them to increase their demand, but this would only be a partial off-set against the diminution of demand caused by the rise of prices of protected goods among all other classes of consumers. And even if the workers in protected trades did get a rise of wages, this would only mean that profits did not rise as much as otherwise they would have done.

The same result in effect would follow if the goods in the protected trades, not being necessities, suffered a reduction of demand in consequence of the rise of price following the imposition of the duty. The only difference would be that, in this event, the tariff would fail to fill up the unemployment in these trades, and that, since less of the protected goods were bought at the higher price, less unemployment would be caused directly through diminution of demand for other non-protected goods. Some unemployment would be left uncured in the protected trades, some new unemployment would be caused in non-protected trades.

But our Protectionist might still urge that the aggregate of employment might be as great or greater than before; there would be more employment in the protected trades, and the new unemployment caused in the non-protected trades might, he would contend, be very small. But there are other important secondary effects to be considered. Some of the protected goods will be tools or raw materials or other ingredients entering into the costs of production of other trades, protected or non-protected, and the higher prices at which they are sold will raise expenses of production and selling prices in these other trades. Other protected goods will form part of the standard of consumption of workers, and in as far as wages had to be raised in order to enable them to maintain this standard of consumption, there would be another increase in expenses of production, making for higher prices. Higher prices thus produced in non-protected trades would have two important effects. Such of these trades as were exporting trades would suffer a reduction of exports and unemployment would ensue. Such of these as were exposed to foreign competition would now find their home markets invaded by cheaper foreign goods, and the protection which they now would claim would only exasperate the situation for the remaining trades which from their character could not profit by a "pull" upon the tariff.

Finally, the necessary effect of subsidising a number of protected trades with a high rate of profit would be to feed those trades with an abundant flow of new capital and labor at the expense of other "naturally" more productive trades. The general result would be to reduce the average productivity of capital and labor in the country, and so to stimulate fresh capital to seek investment abroad rather than stay in this country. This failure to feed our own industries with the requisite amount of capital would entail further unemployment of labor, unless it stimulated emigration. In neither event would an increased quantity of production and of employment have been occasioned in this country by a tariff. On the contrary, an attempt to bolster up defective trades, or to cure unemployment by preventing consumers from buying cheaper or better products from abroad, must issue in diminished production and employment for this country.

THE LOGIC OF LORD REVELSTOKE.

PERHAPS the most lamentable feature in the Lords' debate on the Budget was the utterances of the two financial Barons, who stood forth as champions of City opinion. Heads of the houses of Baring and Rothschild, their words were received by a listening Senate with the respect that the practical English mind gives to practical achievement. Lord Revelstoke was clear enough. Whether he was candid we hope presently to show. Lord Rothschild's oration was marked chiefly by a digression on his grandfather's evidence before the Lords, which went far to upset his own case.

Some critics of the debate have blamed this pair of financial spokesmen for having talked straight out of their pockets. This objection is hardly relevant. As City peers, they were there to voice the City, and even idealists cannot ignore the effect of the Budget on markets in general and British credit in particular. But it is just because these gentlemen were talking as experts to laymen on a highly technical business, that the public had a right to claim from them a large-minded and, above all, an open-minded review of the subject.

By those who know the City, Lord Revelstoke is acknowledged to be quite one of the cleverest of its denizens. Under his rule, the house of Baring Brothers has been restored to the position of eminence which it had so long held before the event which is still remembered as the Baring crisis, the enormous importance of which, and the manner in which the whole City stood together to meet and mitigate its effects, are the highest possible tribute to the greatness of the firm. Fortune has showered upon him gifts which would have fitted him to shine in any line of life that he had chosen. His speech in the House of Lords on Monday week was a maiden effort. But every sentence in it was balanced and complete. Every point in it was made. And its effect was so successful that it has been the subject matter of a large and important part of the rest of the debate. Nearly every word in it was true and to the point. And yet it left out so many truths which were equally to the point, and would have altered the whole tenor of the speech if they had been uttered, that it remains an example of the manner in which a financial subject ought not to be dealt with by anyone who claims to give a reasoned opinion on finance.

For the first and most obvious platitude that can be laid down about the movements of the stock markets is that the causes which produce them are generally manifold, often innumerable, and sometimes quite untraceable. What actually makes a stock rise or fall is the fact that there are, for the moment, more buyers than sellers, or more sellers than buyers. The reasons why there should be more buyers than sellers, or contrariwise, are often a matter of merest chance, and must, as anyone familiar with the huge daily turnover of stock will recognise, be so varied and diverse that anyone who takes any event or development and says, "This is what brought Consols down," commits a logical blunder which would be clear to the stupidest stockbroker—and not many of them are stupid—if he could be caught and questioned in a moment of candor. If we remember right, Consols rose 1-16th on the day when the death of the late Queen was announced to her sorrowing subjects. To argue, therefore, that this lamented event had had a beneficial effect on British credit would be an obviously fatuous absurdity; but it would not be much more fatuous than the common contention that the recent relative weakness of British securities is wholly due to the Budget, or to the present Government.

Lord Revelstoke did not go this length. His fairness impelled him to content himself with the statement that "much—not all—of the unparalleled depreciation in British credit and British stocks was due to the unsettlement occasioned by a growing lack of confidence as to property of all kinds held in this country." But having made this concession to fairness by that "much—not all," he proceeded to develop his case with the ability of a lawyer rather than the equable judgment of a financial expert, and to win partisan cheers by showing that prices had fallen since the Government came into power, and ignoring the causes, other than that of mistrust of the Government, which had brought the fall about.

Let us admit that mistrust of the Government and dislike of the Budget have had something to do with the weakness of British securities, reserving to ourselves the right to answer that this mistrust and dislike arose less from anything that the Government did or the Budget enacted, than from the studied misrepresentations of the Tory Press and from the political prejudices of eminent gentlemen in the City, who may reasonably be supposed to have done much to create and educate an opinion which they now quote as evidence for their case. But let us look into the "unparalleled depreciation" with which this high authority terrifies holders of Consols. In the first place, is it true? $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Consols at $82\frac{1}{2}$ are, roughly, equivalent to the old Three per cents. at 99. There is no need to lay stress on the fact that, in 1798, the old Threes touched $47\frac{1}{4}$. That was a period of war and reckless finance which Lord Revelstoke might be excused for leaving out of count. But if he had looked up the record in "Fenn on the Funds," he would have seen that, in the century before 1893, there were only five years in which Three Per Cent. Consols. could not have been bought below 99. This being the fact, it is surely rather reckless for one from whom the world thought that it was hearing a plain and accurate statement on a business matter, to talk of unparalleled depreciation. From 1893 to 1897 was a period of stagnant trade and abnormally cheap money, which forced up the prices of securities, especially of English securities, owing to the more advanced development of the credit system in England, and in 1896 and 1897 Consols touched $113\frac{7}{8}$. Since then their decline has been steady and continuous, so that it is thus seen to have begun nine years before the present nefarious band of freebooters took office, and twelve years before this predatory Budget was born or thought of.

This very relevant fact Lord Revelstoke left out, and he also omitted all reference to the many causes which produced it, causes which were still at work when the Government took office and are still at work now. We have only space to enumerate a few of them. The conversion of Consols from 3 to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. unsettled thousands of investors who had looked on them as the only stock in the world, and misunderstood and disliked the operation. It was a fine piece of finance in some respects, but it was a deadly blow at the popularity of Consols. The South African War added many millions to the amount of Consols and necessarily lowered the price. At the same time high taxation made investors look for a higher yield on their savings, and so quickened the process of throwing out Consols and reinvesting in cheaper foreign securities. Mr. Chamberlain's measure, by which Colonial Government stocks were made available for trustees, enabled trustees to follow the example of private investors and neglect British securities for their cheaper Colonial rivals. The Irish Land Purchase scheme produced a constant flow of stock from the Government tap, cheaper than Consols, and equally well secured. All these reasons would be reeled off at once by any intelligent stockbroker's clerk who was asked why Consols had fallen within the last dozen years. Lord Revelstoke, the wise and experienced financial expert, must have had them at the tip of his fingers. Lord Revelstoke, the Budget-slaying politician, did not let them get to the tip of his tongue.

And there are others. Tariff Reformers have been proving that British trade is dying, and investors have been believing them. The navy building race with Germany has not only scared investors, but has prevented the economies in expenditure which ought to have increased the pace of debt redemption and lightened the taxpayer's burden. Jingoism, rampant in one party and too strong in the other, has wasted our resources on armaments, and the Sinking Fund has been raided both by Tories and by Radicals. And at the same time the fashion among investors of distributing risks and putting money into many countries has been fostered by stockbrokers who want their clients to change their holdings and pay them commissions, by loan-mongers who have foreign securities to dispose of, and by high taxation and personal extravagance which have impelled even thrifty folk to consider yield rather than security in choosing stocks. British securities being dear, and foreign stocks cheap, an exchange from the former into the latter was the obvious result, and for Consols still to stand at the equivalent of 99 for the old Threes, with all these influences against them, is in fact a testimony to their prestige of which any Englishman may be proud.

We have little space left for Lord Rothschild. And in truth he said little, and little can be said of his speech. He told the peers that the City did not like the super-tax and did not like the land tax. Doubtless this is true of the eminent circles in which this distinguished financier moves. But among the rank and file of City men there are plenty who agree that men of great wealth should pay more in proportion, in view of their greater relative dependence on the security that the State gives them for the enjoyment of their possessions; and the taxation of the unearned increment from urban site values has certainly many supporters. Lord Rothschild also repeated some very sensible remarks made by his grandfather on the good effects on British trade of the export of British capital, and scored a dialectical point by showing that since their war Russian and Japanese securities have risen, while since our war Consols have fallen. But he forgot to say why this was so. At the end of the Russo-Japanese war, Russian and Japanese securities offered a highly attractive yield; at the end of ours, Consols did not yield 3 per cent. to the buyer. Since their war, Russia and Japan, especially the latter, have made some attempt to economise, and put their finances straight, and Russia has been helped by a fine wheat harvest and a fine price for it. Since our war, a chronic war scare has checked retrenchment, and the City Tories have shouted as loudly for "Dreadnoughts" as the larrikins of the music-halls. Finally, Lord Rothschild's statement that it is "difficult, if not impossible" to get money for "even the best English enterprise" can only be deplored as an exaggeration most unworthy of a man in his position. Such are the counsels which have guided the Lords on this question of practical finance.

IN THE KINGDOM OF THE BLIND.

IN the early hours of Tuesday night's debate, Lord Curzon, royally patronising Lord Lansdowne, and nobly shielding him from Radical slander, had relieved him of the aspersion that this rather meagre figure in the revolutionary march of the peers was there against his own free will. The statement was not wanting in assurance; but the certificate of character it conveyed proved to be strictly limited. Lord Lansdowne was really not under duress, but, of course, he had only gone forward after anxious communication "with those with whom he was in the habit of acting." Having restored Lord Lansdowne his tinsel crown of leadership, Lord Curzon proceeded to put him in his proper place as a compulsory banner bearer, and to outline the policy of "My" party in the crisis fomented by him, by Lord Milner, by Lord Cawdor, and by the liquor lords with whom Lord Lansdowne is "in the habit of acting"—with or without the presence of reporters. Lord Curzon, however, had a preliminary duty which seemed to weigh a little on his mind. This was to disembarass the "backwoodsmen" of the weight of prudent counsel which their ablest leaders had tried to hang round their noble necks. It was not quite so easy a task as it looked. The debate had gone badly—even fatally—against the wreckers. Not only had Lord Rosebery—that much-deceiving Daniel—come to a most unwelcome judgment, but his warning had been driven home by their familiar sages and fighting men—by Lord Cromer, Lord Balfour of Burleigh, Lord James of Hereford, and now, at last, by a new adviser, but one of great power, sagacity, and clearness of vision—the Archbishop of York. Might there, after all, be such a thing as the British Constitution, and was the party of tradition quite in its proper place in moving en masse to its assault? Such inquiries and discomforts shaped themselves on the expressive features of Lord No Zoo. Now, therefore, was the time to re-arm the Forts of Folly; and who so fitted for the task as Lord Curzon?

It need hardly be said that his success was immediate and most inspiring. Arrogance, led by super-arrogance, rallied again; after their impulse to waver, it seemed to the little people in the Kingdom of the Blind that, at least while Lord Curzon was speaking, they saw clear. He, and presently Lord Cawdor, made no disguise of the path which they meant them to tread. All Lord Lansdowne's furtive theories were swept aside, and the claim of the House of Lords to master King and Commons was stated in terms as uncompromising and defiant as naked pride could make them. No interpretation by the Liberals of the meaning of Lord Lansdowne's amendment could have been wider than that which, in their survey of the directing forces in British politics, these two men assigned it. Trifling distinctions between financial bills and non-financial bills were swept away, and the lost battle of 1860 was dismissed as an impertinent incident. "You have to-day," said Lord Cawdor, "an absolute right over each tax as you had then over each Bill and each tax." Not only could the Lords stop taxes, but they could impose them. "A great number of your lordships," said Lord Curzon, "will vote against the Bill because you think that there is a better means of raising the money." "If you object to these taxes, what is the alternative by which you propose to raise the money?" he asked. For all this power of revolutionary change and pressure, Lord Curzon supplied the necessary engine and driving bands. This was the fashion: Item: Right of My Lords to force an appeal to the country whenever a measure is unpopular or when it has never been submitted to an electorate; Right to stop a Radical Government, not two years or two months hence, but now, when you think your blow can be deadliest; Right to hold election after election, rejecting every judgment that does not suit your private ends, till you emerge from the battle, with fresh forces drawn from all the seats of social privilege and intellectual pride, and can then build up such barriers against democracy that no force on earth can break them down.

Such was the palimpsest that the peers proceeded on Tuesday night to scrawl, like a ribald catch over a missal, across the British Constitution. In the last hour of the debate it was not given to Lord Crewe, with his charm of speech and presence, and his gift of ironic insight into the ways of the Lords, to drive home the answer to their usurpation. The reason was clear. The path of a Liberal leader in the Lords is one of perpetual humiliation. His Bills, as Lord Crewe said, are taken from him and written over by the Opposition. When he succeeds, it is often by abasing himself and his party. When he fails, he has to pocket his masters' insults as he may. No man can live such a life and keep his self-respect, and the bravest Liberal leader in the peers—even Lord Ripon himself, the stoutest of them all—gets in time to wear his shame as if he liked it. Scorn is the lash for the backs of the selfish and the mean; and no other weapon counts a jot.

But if Lord Crewe hardly used the right arm of punishment, the last act of the delinquents showed no special joy in their offence. For many minutes they passed, a silent, and in appearance, at least, an undistinguished crowd, through the narrow doors to the left of the Throne. Simple Englishmen in the bulk; not one in twenty known by sight to the mass of their countrymen. Some, ghosts of great Liberal names—Argylls, Devonshires, Corks, Hampdens—had come to commit a last act of treachery to the Whig tradition. Others had merely rallied to party, or to the heedless frenzy of the Rosebery speech, or were driven on by the coarse fears of wealth. Others, again, spirited by the two men who came near to losing South Africa and India to the Empire, had the conscious aim of forcing Protection on their own leaders and on the people of this country. There were two notable absences from the majority. The first was the only Tory ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer that the House of Lords contains—absent, in high disdain, from every hour of this Carnival of Fools. The second were the group of peers—Lord Esher, Lord Suffield, Lord Knollys, and Lord Farquhar—who may be specially said to enjoy the personal friendship of the King.

H. W. M.

Life and Letters.

THE SCEPTIC IN ART.

To question the validity of standards is the proper taste of the sceptic. Philosophy, religions, politics present fair fields for his exercise, but, perhaps, the best is afforded by the Fine Arts. It was therefore to be expected that our arch-sceptic, in selecting for his Romanes Lecture at Oxford the subject of "Questionings in Criticism and Beauty," should make an even larger contribution to our intellectual unsettlement than by any of his excursions into metaphysics or economics.

Literary and artistic criticism in the past itself claimed the position of an authoritative art. Its experts imposed "certain rules, which every well-conducted man of letters, painter, or musician ought to follow, but to which certain licensed exceptions were to be allowed in the case of a man of exceptional genius." Often, too, in former times the suzerainty of religion, ethics, or even politics, imposed standards for good art, requiring artists to subserve the interests of the Church or morality or public order. Now all such rules of criticism are thrown aside, and every one recognises that the end and justification of a work of art is to be a thing of beauty. Since the feeling of beauty is to be the sole criterion, the only way of getting any standard, or any basis for an art of criticism, is to examine this feeling of beauty. But the history of taste, Mr. Balfour contends, yields no positive results. All great critics have been engaged in "sweeping away the rubbish of their critical predecessors"; one age's meat has been another's poison. There is, no doubt, in every art an intelligible evolution from crude simplicity of form to complexity, and trained sensibility appears to get pleasures more refined and elevated from the more elaborated forms.

But, in this commonly accepted doctrine of artistic progress, Mr. Balfour naturally fastens the sharpest fangs of his scepticism. What reason have we for identifying complexity with progress, or a finer feeling for beauty with a liking for complexity of form? And with the same audacity of arbitrary choice as Tariff Reformers showed in choosing 1872 for the beginning of their curve of British trade, Mr. Balfour takes for his single test the art of music among the ancient Greeks. Here was a people of the finest and most varied sensibility to every form of beauty, carrying, as we admit, to the highest pitch of perfection the arts of poetry, the drama, architecture, and sculpture. Are we justified in holding that the simple and, to our minds, unattractive and ineffectual music which they used was due to defective sensibility to the pleasures of sound? We have every reason to believe that this music of the Greeks produced in them, at least, as powerful æsthetic emotions as our more complex music produces in us. Is it then certain that our modern art of music represents a progress in the art, or yields a larger and a better enjoyment? "Are we to say that the Greeks in admiring their music showed bad taste, or are we to say that our sensibility for musical excellence has been so dulled by experience or by our natural ineptitude that we have got to apply to the means of producing that emotion incomparably more labor . . . and that what we call the progress of music is really the decrease in our musical sensibility?"

Although this instance is at most suggestive, and it is unreasonable to suppose that a modern people, with a naturally defective sensibility to sounds, would get more pleasure from more elaborated than from simple compositions, the question raised is really a searching one. If the production of the pure feeling for beauty is the end of art, is it not possible that the refined training of artist and of critic may lead away from such feeling to other subsidiary and more "artificial" feelings, arising from "sympathy with the artist's knowledge of his surroundings, admiration of his technical skill, appreciation of the difficulties with which he had to contend; in fact, all the historic setting which is absolutely necessary for one point of view, but which in itself can hardly be described as the practical æsthetic enjoyment of the work of art itself?" So far as this points to a clear distinction between the naïve enjoyment of a first impression, and the more intellectualised appreciation which accompanies closer inspection and consideration, it is indisputably true. Indeed, one may go further and admit that the two modes of feeling, the naïvely æsthetic and the critically appreciative, contain something inconsistent or antagonistic. The case for the trained sensibility, from the standpoint of æsthetic enjoyment, will rather stand upon a third mode of feeling, which supervenes upon the critical, in which the admiration of artistic skill is fused with the simple love of beauty in a new emotional synthesis, which finds its subject-matter in the sympathetic satisfaction in a creative act.

But reasonable doubts may still remain regarding the elaboration of the arts and of art criticism in a society where culture is the adornment and the diversion of a class. Such doubts, Tolstoy, it will be remembered, raises in his uncompromising manner in "What is Art?" A spontaneous desire "to transmit to others the highest and best feelings to which men have risen" is the only true art impulse which he recognises. All art is thus of the nature of improvisation or inspiration, and all education of taste which takes the form of definite rules or recipes degrades art into mere counterfeit. Only under such conditions of free expression can good technique emerge. To Tolstoy indeed the three arch enemies of Art are professionalism, art criticism, and technical teaching. In no department of life is the war of spirit against letter waged more remorselessly. The cry, "Back to Nature!" to her simplicity and spontaneity, is continually raised, though sometimes spontaneity proves anything but simple. Many in our time are indeed disposed to turn from the art criticism of the salons to that of the peasant or the factory hand, and from the severe intricacies of modern chamber music to the traditional folk songs. Ought not all art, like poetry, they ask, to be "simple, sensuous, impassioned," and does not the trained sensibility, living rather upon delicate associations conveyed through literature and traditional class culture than upon the wholesome food of direct emotional experience, lead art and artistic people into forms of refined and finicking sentimentalism, or, worse still, into a dry intellectualism? Such obstinate questionings arise, and are not wholly stifled, by the charge of Philistinism which lies so ready to the lips of culture. Tolstoy in his sturdy way would go further than Mr. Balfour's criticism leads us, regarding professional artists of every order as mere "mountebanks" plying their deceitful crafts in order to avoid "bread-labor." Mr. Balfour indeed professes his eagerness to enjoy both sorts of aesthetic pleasure, that of pure beauty and that of subtler appreciation got by learning. But if he is correct in holding that "as discrimination grows there is no evidence that sensibility grows with it," and that "there are cases where the increase of powers of discrimination is accompanied by a waning of aesthetic sensibility," we feel that his logical mind may yet bring him to the artistic doctrine of the Russian sage.

To many, however, the most striking feature in the address will be Mr. Balfour's complete repudiation of any logical or philosophical treatment of aesthetics, and, indeed, of the emotions in general. Though he makes a passing allusion to theories which explain aesthetic enjoyment by relating it to some form of utility or progress of the race, he waives aside as undeserving of his serious attention the ample light which psycho-biology has shed upon the origin and nature of the fine arts and the sense of beauty. While the precise action of Nature in these subtle workings must remain matter for speculation, it can hardly be doubted that, in the biological struggle for survival and the gropings after higher organic life, certain instincts arose impelling man to make fit and serviceable adjustments of his environment and to exercise his organs with regularity and rhythm; that pleasures were attached by Nature to these useful acts; and that in them we have the rude beginnings of those arts which the evolving brain of man has applied to more refined operations.

It is by following the humble utilities in which the arts, as indeed the sciences, take their origin, that we can best constitute and find stability for those standards which Mr. Balfour appears to deny. Pleasures in form and color, rhythm and composition, have solid roots in the early needs of man's animal nature as he struggled to make for himself an abiding place upon this earth, where, by infinite pains and acts of audacity and faith, he might eventually raise himself a little way towards heaven. Such origins are only mean and unsatisfying to those who fail to realise the singleness of meaning and of method in the greater drama of which the life of humanity forms an episode. It is to the art of Nature we must look in the last resort in order to discover and to comprehend the nature of Art.

A DECIVILISED CLASS.

It is still the practice of some savage tribes to smear the hands and face of a lad who goes hunting for the first time with the blood of the quarry he has killed. The process even in this literal sense is not unknown to English sportsmen. But this "bleeding" of the young is typical of the whole spirit which presides over the education of our upper class. The boy arrives at school, still full of the ideas of the essentially modern civilisation common to those among whom he has spent his few conscious years—his nursemaids, his sisters, his teachers. He is at once subjected to a conscious process of hardening which aims at throwing him back into the obsolete phase of human development which still rules the thinking of his class. He learns to be ashamed of all but his more elementary emotions and to repress all but his more pedestrian thoughts. He is taught to exclude from his interests all that does not relate to the simple and joyous life of a healthy and well-fed body. He is taught to shed from his vocabulary every rare and significant word, and to express himself in sentences of a primitive simplicity and brevity. Above all, his natural instincts of pity and sympathy are rooted out by the cult of sports which teach him to regard the animals as creatures destined only to afford him a relief from boredom by feeding his pleasures with their sufferings. At Harrow he is "blooded" by assisting in the "breaking-up" of hares. At the University he learns the still more luxurious delight of hunting the carted deer. The process by which his moral fibre is deliberately coarsened by these sports is not without its defenders. The boy is being fitted for "the battle of life," and fitted to play his part "without mawkish sentimentality" in the duties of an Imperial race. His class schools itself still to think of life and society in terms which would be understood by a predatory tribe of mountaineers. One might suppose that it passed its existence in tribal feuds, vendettas, and raids, under conditions amid which a normally humane and merciful individual would really find himself handicapped in the universal war. It is conscious that its ideals are peculiar to itself. It is dimly aware that the mass of men who labor and study think otherwise. It maintains its own class ethics, as the Dorians retained their cruder ways of thought against the more civilised races of the coasts and the isles. The rest of us were "Pro-Boers" yesterday; we are "Socialists" to-day. "Educate your masters," said Robert Lowe, when he imagined that England was in danger of becoming a democracy. "Our masters" to-day are concentrated in "another place." We have got to educate them.

A prosecution which was heard on Monday at Cambridge revealed in all its callousness the habits of thought of this minute but powerful class. Some thirty undergraduates had been indulging in the aristocratic sport of hunting a tame deer. The wretched animal, so used to domesticity that it looked to man for protection and thought of walled enclosures as its natural sanctuaries, had twice taken refuge in a yard. The sportsmen followed it, prodded it with a pole, beat it with a broom, and lashed it over the head for something like a quarter of an hour with their hunting whips. Once it flung itself against barbed wire, and received a gaping wound in the chest. When at last its hunters succeeded, after the second attempt, in forcing it back to the road, it cheated their sporting instincts by falling dead. The hind, said the Master of the Hunt, in a phraseology familiar to carters when they are flogging an over-laden horse, was "a sulky animal"; while to the protests of some working-men who chanced to pass, he replied that they must be "Socialists." The hearing of the case, from the merely legal standpoint, was without result. The Bench, with a Colonel at its head, decided that there had been no cruelty, and, indeed, such is the state of the law, it is quite probable that his ruling will be confirmed on appeal. The law was made by the class which finds these pleasures to its taste, and only this Session the efforts of the Bishop of Hereford to alter the law were defeated by Lord Newton in the Upper House amid the manly laughter of his brother peers. Outside the Court, however, the publicity given to the case has had the happiest results. The University has suppressed the Hunt, and daily newspapers have expressed themselves with an entirely wholesome vigor. Yet there was nothing at all exceptional in the cruelty which these young gentlemen displayed. It was indeed the cornerstone of their defence that, as their counsel put it, "there is no case of stag-hunting in which this sort of thing does not occur." The quarry is always a domesticated animal, and the hunt is always a violation of that tacit social contract which instinct concludes between man and the animals that have learned to trust him. This degraded sport is as disreputable a cruelty as the attempts of a small boy to stalk his neighbor's cat with an air-gun in the back garden.

The survival of such a sport as this is one of the minor scandals in English social life which we owe directly to the House of Lords. There are phases of social evolution during which the upper classes of a nation commonly lead it in their sensitiveness and their humanity. The very word "gentle" has its origin in the recognition of that moral superiority. With the growth of an educated class outside the ranks of what is consciously society, a contrary process commonly sets in. The aristocracy seeks distinction in maintaining an obsolete habit of thought. It prides itself in isolating itself as absolutely as possible from the "intellectuals," and it entrenches itself yet more firmly when the intellectuals become the acknowledged leaders of the masses. The process, which is marked among ourselves, is even more obvious in Russia, where the political struggle seems at times to be a war between an educated proletariat which has enlightenment and sensibility without birth or wealth, and a ruling caste which is consciously, almost articulately, retrograde and Asiatic. Its moral influence, so far as it succeeds in exerting any at all, is invariably for the perpetuation of some obsolete barbarism. On the Continent it maintains the duel. Among ourselves it defends the crueller sort of blood sports. It even makes of these institutions a shibboleth in the class-war. To oppose the duel is in Austria or Russia to write oneself down "no gentleman," and to oppose even this peculiarly abominable sport, the hunting of tame deer, is among ourselves to proclaim oneself, if not a Socialist, then almost a Christian. For two generations now the mass of educated men has felt about such barbarities as this the disgust which Wordsworth once for all expressed. If our social habits, and even our legislation, lag behind the almost universal sentiment of all among us who work and think, the explanation is simply that our development is retarded by the prestige of fashion and the legislative veto which this decivilised class can wield. It resists the thinkers and the poets who would come between it and its crueller pleasures, precisely as white settlers will resist the coming of missionaries who intervene between them and the more helpless natives. Removed itself from the necessity of work and study, it opposes an obstinate, if inarticulate, resistance to the moral ideals of those whose minds have been formed by the real struggle to exist by sympathy and co-operation. It fights in the larger issues of politics for the liberty to levy tribute and exploit. It masses instinctively for the defence of a sport which wins pleasure by the infliction of pain. To limit its sympathies, to exclude from them all who are not of its caste or kind, from the carted stag to the black man, is the first of its instincts. In the animal world it admits a sympathy which is near to veneration for its horses and its dogs—the creatures which assist it in its sports—only to deny all regard for the creatures whose sufferings are essential to its amusement. The habit of mind which is bred of this disregard has its influence far beyond the sphere of sport. It is reached only by a conscious suppression of the instincts of pity and compassion. It can be justified only by an unlimited acceptance of the right to pleasure at any price. The character which is formed by it has been coarsened in a multitude of relationships. To suppress the more wanton of blood sports will be, first of all to rescue some of the gentlest and least offensive of animals from cruelty. It will also be to give to thousands of young lads, naturally merciful and kindly, the chance of growing up in a civilised community, freed from an influence whose purpose is to breed in them the mentality of a Spartan or a Pathan.

THE ARMY OF INNOCENCE.

"THANNE longen folk to gon on pilgrimages." How right the poet was to dwell on the desire felt by all mankind for pilgrimage, and not merely on the obligation of religious duty! Among all the sensations of holiday there is none more exquisite than that of a pilgrim setting out for a holy place. The daily round is broken; the common task is left behind him at the gate; the eyelids of the dawn are opening; the white road leads onward into the rising sun; the calling of the birds, the waking mountains, and the smell of dew upon the grass are unconscious symbols of hope and the spirit's renewal; his heart is fixed, being raised to its natural, though unaccustomed, elevation, and attuned by the sanctity of purpose, without which the holiday would be but a relaxation, a slackening of the strings of the soul. No wonder the peoples of all nations have longed to go on pilgrimage, and have laid down their lives for access to the shrines of the world—to Lhasa, Puri, Mecca, Rome, Kieff, and Jerusalem.

For Christians this universal longing was naturally much increased when the end of the thousand years since Christ's birth approached, and He was expected to return in glory to His native land, and there to celebrate the Last Judgment upon quick and dead. With a confidence that must excite the envy of latter-day sinners, the devout of Europe desired above all things to behold His re-appearing and to present themselves among the first before His tribunal. Nor was it only for their own sakes that their eyes were turned with anxiety towards Jerusalem, which for nearly five centuries had lain in the hands of sun-worshippers and followers of the False Prophet. If in a few years Christ should now return and find His holy city—the scene of His death, His sepulchre, and His resurrection—occupied by mere Seljukian Turks, who for a generation had inflicted unendurable hardships on pilgrims seeking comfort at His shrines, how great would be the scandal to His Church and His Vicar here on earth. In some fertile mind suddenly sprang the conception of an Army of the Cross for rescuing the sacred places from the Infidel. Peter, the Amiens hermit, began his wild preaching—so holy a man that the hairs of his donkey's tail were treasured as relics. Urban II. appealed to Christendom from Clermont in Auvergne, and the believing hosts around him answered with the cry, "Deus le volt, Deus le volt!" Incited by hopes of spiritual pardon hereafter, or by the certainty of release from earthly prisons and the bonds of debt or vows; encouraged by the promise of crossed legs upon sepulchral effigies, and of shirts that, having been worn in the Holy Land, ensured immediate entrance into Paradise; ardent in faith, longing for pilgrimage, and careless of a world so soon to end in Judgment, nearly a quarter of a million human beings set out for the divine campaign, under the mystic standards of Goat and Goose.

Then followed the familiar, incredible story of the Crusaders, when, for the first and last time in history, the Christian Powers were at intervals combined for a purpose that could almost be called religious. The deeds of Tancred and Baldwin, the siege of Antioch and opportune discovery of the Sacred Spear, the rabble host kneeling in tears at sight of Jerusalem and rushing forward to the slaughter of Saracens and Jews; St. Bernard's miserable attempt at a second Crusade, the glory of old Barbarossa and Richard Lion-heart; the chivalry of Saladin, conquests of Constantinople, fightings in Egypt, the appearance of Frederick Stupor-of-the-World, himself, it was said, no better than an Infidel—so for two centuries the varied course of holy wars went on, till it died away with St. Louis of France sinking on the road at Damietta. With him the flame of sacred endeavor flickered and was extinguished, though for some, as for our Henrys IV. and V., there remained the dream of levying a power of men:—

"Whose arms were moulded in their mothers' wombs
To chase these pagans, in those holy fields,
Over whose acres walked those blessed feet,
Which, fourteen hundred years ago, were nailed,
For our advantage on the bitter cross."

Nine of these Crusades from first to last are counted by historians, and as to their result, "the holy wars," says Gibbon, "appear to me to have checked rather than forwarded the maturity of Europe." That is too large a question for us. We will only say again that to us it now appears incredible that Europe should ever have shown herself so disinterested as to fight for any sacred cause at all. But for the moment we have not to do with maturity. Mr. Henry Baerlein's rather unsympathetic and disjointed book, called "On the Forgotten Road" (Murray), has reminded us of that "Children's Crusade," so small and immature that it is not even counted among the nine. In point of date we must tuck it in between the fifth and sixth, and there let it stand as a piteous episode, a baby's death, a young lamb's heart among the full-grown flocks. It was the time when Philip, called the August, was reigning in France, and in England the Lords were pestering the King with their demands for representation and the redress of grievances before they would give him a penny to carry on with. For Magna Charta lay only three years ahead, England was still suffering from the Papal Interdict, and the elder Simon de Montfort was himself crusading, not against Pagans or Paynims, but against unhappy Christians who even in Southern France could believe the present earth was hell, and death the truest blessing.

It is strange to think that the inspired children must have passed on their journey right through the midst of the Waldenses, those Quakers of Lyons, and not far eastward of the province where Simon himself was dealing out to the Albigenses the blessing they so much desired. For Mr. Baerlein has chosen the story of the French children, who followed the boy Stephen of Cloyes near Orleans, and has left for another hand the German children's Crusade, which started the same year, and tried to make its way across the Alps. We believe it was not the first time that children had in a certain sense taken the Cross. In a contemporary account of the first Crusade, at all events, a chronicler with a peculiar conception of humor writes:—

"Strange sights one saw, enough to make you die of laughing; the poor, for instance, would shoe an ox or two like horses and tie them to a cart, into which they piled their bits of things and babies; and whenever they came in sight of a castle or city, you would hear the little creatures keep asking whether this was Jerusalem, the place they were going to."

But the idea of an actual children's army seems to have been St. Bernard's own suggestion, though it was not carried out till seventy years after the failure of his Crusade. It seemed likely that nothing but the wickedness of the Crusaders themselves could have caused a failure so complete as that; innocence, therefore, might bring success, and where was innocence to be found, save in the heart of a child? So argued the great ecclesiastic, ignorant alike of logic, war, and children.

The idea spread, and whether it was reinforced by cruel agents from the Old Man of the Mountain, ever seeking recruits for his Assassins and the Fedavees in the Gardens of Bliss, we cannot tell. Mr. Baerlein thinks so, and the belief should have added the final touch of horror and tragedy to a tale which he somehow fails to make tragic. But in that age no external reinforcement was needed for the idea. Once possessed by his holy purpose, the boy Stephen found no trouble in recruiting his army of the innocent. Little boys and girls from all sides came flocking to his standard, sometimes escaping the parents' anger, but usually, as it seems, accompanied by their applause. Quicker than the Boy Scouts his drilled battalions grew. When they had seen the King at St. Denis and begun their march southward from Paris to the sea, they are said to have numbered 30,000. How they were fed, how covered and succored on the road, we can only conjecture, but we may imagine the devout and pitiful women coming from villages and towns to meet them with cakes and sweets, with little garments and combs, and herbal medicines in a bottle. So the tender warriors marched upon their way, flowing like Rhone's waters ever southward:—

"The hum of multitudes was there, but multitudes of lambs, Thousands of little boys and girls raising their innocent hands."

"It is to God, to God, we are going!" they cried continually. Marseilles received them, and again we can imagine them asking each other if this was not the holy Jerusalem they sought. Seven ships received them; beyond the protecting mountains of that ancient port they stood out to sea, and France saw them no more. One priest returned; then, after twenty-three years, Stephen's father returned, and into his mouth Mr. Baerlein has put his story. Quick death or long Egyptian slavery swallowed up the rest in darkness.

It is a strange scene to recall, full of a pathos that it would be easy to wallow in. Like a dream, it is adorned with all the fantastic mists and colors of medieval unreality. But at the heart of it we recognise the abiding spirit of the child in man. For who is there that does not long to go on pilgrimage, or with the fairy army of Crusaders to pass beyond the bounds of commonplace, and set forth in fearless elation upon the white road that leads to the City of God?

The Drama.

POTTED BEETHOVEN.

LET me state at once, and emphatically, that I enjoyed "Beethoven" at His Majesty's; and I fancy that there must be thousands of people, at something like my own stage of musical culture and spiritual sentimentality, who would do likewise. The idea of the French author, M. René Fauchois, is a very ingenious and beautiful one. There are faults of execution that one knows not to whom to attribute, without having seen the French book and the French performance. The playbill bears the legend: "Freely adapted by Louis N. Parker," but I feel sure that Mr. Parker is too good a musician, too reverent of his own art—or of one of them—to take much pleasure in the cheap farce which mars what ought to be throughout a thing of beauty. Very likely everyone concerned is somewhat to blame. Perhaps M. Fauchois, founding on the recorded character of Beethoven's brother, Nikolaus, made him somewhat of a grotesque; then Mr. Parker accentuated the absurdity; and finally Mr. Edward Sass, a good comedian of the emphatic school, accentuated Mr. Parker's accentuation. But, after all, it is to Sir Herbert Tree that one's respectful remonstrance must be addressed. It was in his power to tone Mr. Sass down; and he certainly does not seem to have made any effort in that direction. For one thing, however, I am sincerely and profoundly grateful. When Mr. Ainley, as Schindler, carefully placed Beethoven's breakfast-tray upon a chair in Mr. Sass's immediate neighborhood, I did not doubt that Nikolaus, having sat upon everything else that could raise a laugh, was going to give us humor's crown of humor by subsiding on the coffee-pot. Had this occurred, I should certainly have shrieked—not with amusement. But that ultimate agony was spared me. Perhaps the tray was placed there in order to beget in us the highly dramatic emotion of suspense; in which case it brilliantly succeeded. I breathed a deep sigh of relief when the coffee-pot was removed, and no one had sat on it. But all the intrusions of farce (by which I do not mean the illustrations of Beethoven's eccentricity and absence of mind) seemed to me unspeakably jarring. Why should not the whole thing have been kept on the level of beauty? It reminded me of a recent experience on board one of the splendid steamers of the Hamburg-America line. One expected to find the music on a German boat far better than on the English liners; and, indeed, the band was large and technically competent. But the style of music they played was distinctly more vulgar and trivial than that which prevails on the Cunard or White Star boats. One especial outrage they perpetrated was a sort of medley, in which noble and lovely things not only alternated with vulgarities, but were inextricably interwoven with them. The minuet in "Don Giovanni," for instance, would break off three or four bars before its close, and merge into a jiggish quick-step. Had I been the captain, I should have put in irons the conductor who was responsible for this infamy; and somebody—though not, certainly, the conductor—ought to be put in irons at His Majesty's.

Like many ingenious ideas, M. Fauchois's appears obvious—when once you have thought of it. He has simply chosen a theme in which "incidental music," instead of being an abomination, becomes a psychological necessity, and must be, moreover, the noblest music in the world. A similar process has sometimes been applied to poetry, with disastrous results. Nothing is more ludicrous than to see Shakespeare or Molière strolling around and talking tags from his own works. But here the case is very different. Here the orchestra simply externalises the strains which must, at one time or another, have been pulsing in the great tone-poet's brain. Whether they actually arose there in this manner and under these circumstances is an indifferent detail. I know next to nothing of Beethoven's biography, yet enough to feel sure that the incidents depicted (with one or two exceptions) must be regarded as typical rather than actual. Some of them, indeed, belong entirely to the realm of symbolism. But what does it matter? If we bring the smallest goodwill to it, we can easily yield to the illusion of assisting at that ultimate miracle of the human spirit—the creation of great music. I, at any rate, passed completely under the spell. It is a good thing the theatre was darkened, for more than once my critical impassivity was sadly compromised.

Surely it is the miracle of miracles, this creation of music. One can easily imagine oneself Shakespeare—many people have cultivated the habit with great success. But to imagine oneself Beethoven, or Gluck, or Handel, or even Mendelssohn or Chopin!—that is a pitch of megalomania to me inconceivable. No doubt this is partly because I am not a musician; but I think true musicians, too, feel an awe in the presence of their masters which no mere weaver of words can inspire. The poet, after all, is dealing with tangible matter of the intellect and the emotions. He manipulates that matter in ways denied to you and me; but his processes are subject to analysis, and well within comprehension. Now and then, indeed, in his greatest moments, he achieves what we feel to be a miracle, a something divine that holds analysis at bay; and that is just when he places himself most nearly on a level with the great musician. But the musician seems to go straight to the archetypal fount of beauty, and draw from it at will. This is doubtless an illusion. A psychology of music is just as possible as a psychology of poetry, though probably far more difficult and distant. But the illusion is so inevitable, the beauty appears so absolute and unconditioned, that the musician, more than any other mortal, seems to come trailing clouds of glory from some region beyond the stars. How incredibly impoverished would life be without music! How denuded, not only of sheer beauty, but of mystery! Surely the least metaphysically-minded man, if he have any musical sense, must feel himself transported by a great tone-poem into a fourth dimension wherein the problem of life puts on a new and unspeakably wonderful aspect. Well, in this play is brought home to us the fact that these great tone-poems do actually take shape in the mind of a man like ourselves, that they come to him somehow and from somewhere, and that their miraculous conception is interwoven with common incidents and emotions of life. That, it seems to me, is an interesting, a moving experience. The play suggests to the imagination, however faintly and imperfectly, what it must be to think in glorious harmonies, and pass one's life in imperiously marshalling the giant hosts of sound. We carry away a vision of Beethoven as a greater Napoleon, manœuvring his winged legions in luminous deeps of space.

At least that is how it affects me, a non-musical, if not precisely an unmusical, man. M. Fauchois has, in fact, made Beethoven his collaborator in a piece of spiritual portraiture, which is, at the same time, an act of homage. The disadvantage of the method is that, when once his appetite is whetted, the spectator is apt to weary of the interludes of talk, and wish that Beethoven would get on with his composing. "Cut the cackle and come to the 'osses" was the principle of the late Mr. Astley. Unreasonably, but not unnaturally, one is conscious of hankering after less biography and more music.

Beethoven is distinctly one of Sir Herbert Tree's good parts. He presents the figure admirably to the eye; and, but that his voice lacks modulation, his acting would leave little to desire. The other parts are, at best, of slight importance. Mr. Ainley's discreet Anton Schindler was of value and Miss Evelyn D'Alroy was a graceful Bettina Brentano, though she surely need not have pitched her speeches in quite such a declamatory, unnatural key. The scene in which she brings to Beethoven the homage of Goethe is moving to anyone whose imagination is touched by the sound of great names. Why the Archduke Rudolf and his two satellites should be made such figures of fun I cannot conceive. No doubt their uniforms were laudably correct; but if no compromise with the regulations was permissible, they might, in one act at least, have been allowed to wear mufti.

"Beethoven" is preceded by "A Russian Tragedy," in one act, of which one is glad to record that it is "adapted from the German of Adolph Glass." An English playwright who should turn out such a trumpery piece of mechanical, conventional melodrama would deserve to be severely dealt with. It is like the maiden effort of a schoolboy who has been injudiciously taken to see "Fédora." Why it should have been placed on His Majesty's stage, and with Mrs. Patrick Campbell in the leading part, is a mystery which passes all understanding.

It is, of course, impossible to arrive at any adequate appreciation of a performance in a language of which one understands no single word; but I think it evident that Mme. Lydia Yavorskaia, of St. Petersburg, who appeared at the Afternoon Theatre on Tuesday, in "La Dame aux Camélias," is an actress of very unusual gifts. Like her compatriot, Alla Nazimova, she struck me at first as rather mannered and self-conscious; but as she warmed to her work this effect in great measure passed off, and one could admire without reserve her graceful carriage (except in rapid motion), her beautiful voice, and her great emotional power. Her death-scene was extremely realistic, and might have been no less touching if one could have followed the words. I look forward with lively interest to her Hedda Gabler, announced for next Tuesday.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Communications.

THE CHARACTER OF THE INDIAN POLICE.

(Concluded.)

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It now appears, from a statement made a day or two ago by the Master of Elibank in Parliament, that in the Gulam Mohammed torture case, in which the Sessions Judge of Rawal Pindi found that the prisoner bore on his legs and arms palpable marks of racking, and that his confession of murder had been extorted from him by the police, the Government of the Punjab have held a secret police inquiry of the usual sort, and "come to the conclusion that the charge of torture is false, and that no blame attaches to the police." No explanation is offered as to how the man came by his injuries, and why he should have confessed to a murder which he had not committed. The police are whitewashed by a secret police inquiry, and the judicial tribunal is discredited.

But I must mention one other case in the Punjab, in which the alleged torture was of a more atrocious kind, and the conduct of the Executive of the most unsatisfactory character.

A woman named Gulab Bano was convicted last year, upon her own confession, of poisoning her husband, and sentenced by Mr. Kennedy, a Sessions Judge, with the concurrence of three Indian assessors, to be hanged. She appealed to the Chief Court at Lahore, consisting of Mr. Justice Robertson and Mr. Justice Rattigan, who, in January of this year, set aside the conviction on the ground that the confession was most probably extorted by outrage of the most horrible kind inflicted on the woman by the police. The Judges exhorted the Executive in earnest language to "institute a most searching enquiry" into the conduct of the police. Nevertheless for nine months the world heard nothing, and the police continued in the service of the Government. At the end of that time appeared a "Resolution" by the Government of the Punjab completely discrediting the views both of the Judges and of the prison doctor who examined the woman, and completely exonerating the police. The "Resolution" purports to be the result of a secret enquiry. But no one knows by whom it was held, except that it was by the police. No one knows who was examined, except that none of the police implicated were cross-examined. Parliament has been refused information on the subject. Such is the respect shown by the Executive in India for the highest Courts of the land. The Judges have taken the unusual course of intimating that they will reply; but so far their reply is not made public.

Here is the horrible story of what the police did to the woman, in the very words of the Official "Resolution":—

"On the evening of the 7th June she complained to the matron of the jail that the police had maltreated her. The hospital attendant was summoned, and to him Gulab Bano (the woman) made a statement to the following effect: 'I was hung to the roof by the police (Superintendent and two head constables) in my village during the investigation, with a rope in my legs, and a baton smeared with green chillies was thrust up my anal opening.'"

The matter was reported the next day to the Civil Surgeon, who examined the woman and found that she was suffering from fever and was in a weak state. He ordered her to be prepared for examination, and next morning examined her, and found her, to use his own words, "terribly inflamed and ulcerated, a condition which, in my opinion, could only have been caused by an assault similar to that described by the prisoner." (Italics mine.)

He subsequently added that the assault might have been committed on or about May 12th (the date given by the woman), but more probably about June 2nd. To the District Judge the woman gave a "very clear and detailed account" of how the police first beat and kicked her with the object of making her confess, then tied a rope round her feet and suspended her from a rafter of the roof. Then (so the official account runs) "a police baton, smeared with red peppers, was thrust into her rectum. She described minutely how the red pepper was ground, mixed with water and applied to the baton, and what part each of the police concerned took in the proceedings."

Under this agony she confessed to having poisoned her husband. She retracted the confession on June 7th, first to the Matron of the Jail and then to the Hospital Assistant and the Civil Surgeon, and on the 10th formally before the District Magistrate. Nevertheless, she was committed by him for trial, and convicted and sentenced to be hanged by the Sessions Judge. How could this possibly come about?

The answer of the High Court is clear (the Judges saying, by way of preface, that "they would not differ from the finding save for reasons which, in their opinion, rendered it impossible to uphold the conviction"):—

"We find, on looking through the record, that evidence distinctly favorable to the unfortunate woman has been, if not suppressed, at all events not brought forward into Court on her behalf. . . . This evidence was known only to the police authorities. . . . We are constrained with regret to observe that the learned Sessions Judge has made frequent references to some case tried in the Peshawar district in which the accused was apparently concerned. . . . Clearly the record of that case was wholly inadmissible, and was produced by the prosecution, in our opinion, most unfairly, for the sole purpose of prejudicing the Court against the accused. It is therefore a matter of regret that the learned Judge should have allowed it to be referred to. . . . It is surely too much to suppose that this did not affect the mind of the Sessions Judge in the case before him. Apart, therefore, from all other considerations, it is obvious that the accused was gravely prejudiced in the trial by the reception of evidence which was inadmissible per se, and could only have been adduced for the purpose of alienating the sympathy of the Court from her."

The police actually allowed the Sessions Judge to believe that the unfortunate woman had tried to make away with the vomit of her husband—which, on examination, turned out to contain poison—when the real fact was that she had carefully retained it, and pointed it out at once to the police when they appeared. The Head Constable, who could have proved this vital point, was never called, and the Sessions Judge was induced to believe that the woman's story was a "clumsy concoction."

The Government of the Punjab have now come to the conclusion that the Sessions Judge was right, the Appeal Judges were wrong, and that the unfortunate woman probably inflicted this horrible torture upon herself. They support this theory on the ground that there is a discrepancy between the date on which the Civil Surgeon thinks it probable she was tortured and the date when the woman alleges she was actually tortured; and also that on two occasions subsequent to the alleged torture she walked considerable distances and appeared to be in good health. On these grounds the unanimous judgment of the Chief Court of Appeal of the Punjab is treated as wrong, the doctor's evidence set aside, and the police implicated are acquitted and retained as the honored instruments of the Executive in the administration of justice. The tragedy has been completed by the death of the unfortunate woman, which is reported to have just occurred. I must add that it was upon the secret information of the Punjab police that a man so much honored by his fellow-countrymen as Mr. Lajpat Rai was deported to Mandalay without warning, charge, or trial.

So far I have dealt with Bengal and the Punjab. But by the very last mail comes the report of a judgment of the Sessions Judge of Madura in Madras, Mr. Hamnett, in which he acquitted six villagers in that district, charged by the police with murder. The principal evidence against them was that of one of themselves, who turned informer. He subsequently said that he had given his evidence as the result of torture and "tutoring" on the part of the police. In support of this view the learned Judge is reported to have said:—

"The hospital assistant of Thandikudi admits that the informer was under his treatment from the 29th April, 1909, to 9th May for dysentery and also for two wounds; one on the fore arm and one on the right leg. The witness does not seem to me to be telling the whole truth. The informer has a number of scars of wounds on both his legs, and a scar of a severe wound on his left arm, which has caused permanent stiffness of one joint of his ring finger. The hospital assistant says he did not see those wounds at Thandikudi, but I cannot believe him. The informer's story, that the wounds were caused by the police beating and branding him, and that he was kept at Thandikudi until the hospital assistant got his wounds healed is more probable. . . . There are strong grounds for thinking that the informer's story, that he was tortured by the police, is substantially true, and that enquiry into the conduct of the police is necessary." (Italics mine.)

I quote from the "South Indian Mail," November 8th, published at Madura.

I will conclude with a crowning case of police villainy from the United Provinces. Mr. T. K. Johnston, the Sessions Judge at Bahraich, has just passed heavy sentences upon one Inspector, two sub-Inspectors, and six constables for deliberately concocting against fifteen innocent men a false charge of being dacoits (highway robbers). These unfortunate men were alleged to have been caught and surrounded by the police at night in a lonely house, armed with guns and pistols. It was sworn that they were attacked in force by the police—who fired heavily in self-defence—captured, and taken off to jail. They were brought before a Magistrate, who swallowed the whole story, and committed them all for trial, one of them having been induced under prolonged police "pressure" (the nature of which is not disclosed) to confess that this concocted charge was true. Before, however, the case came on for trial, one of the Inspectors had qualms of conscience, and went to Mr. Williamson, an Assistant Superintendent, and confessed to him that the whole affair was "put up" by the police. The persons captured in the house were not the accused at all, but village police dressed up and armed to represent dacoits. On the return of the party from the house, the accused, who had been previously arrested on some ground or other, were substituted for the village police and falsely charged as the captured dacoits. The Inspector, who made this confession, shot himself immediately afterwards, and the other policemen implicated have been sentenced to terms of imprisonment varying from one year to seven years in length. It appears from the judgment of the Sessions Judge that the men falsely accused were persons against whose characters nothing could be said.

It will be observed that in no single case, except the last one (in which one of the miscreants confessed), has any punishment been inflicted upon the police. In all the Punjab cases the considered judgments of the Courts have been set aside and the police whitewashed; the whitewashing process being in part conducted, as the Judges at Lahore have said with regard to the Gulab Bano case, by "Mr. Chisholm, the Superintendent of Police, against whose subordinates our remarks were directed."

Sir, it was upwards of seventy years ago that Lord Macaulay wrote that tremendous indictment of Bacon for racking Dr. Peacham in order to extort a confession of guilt:—

"Bacon was here distinctly behind his age . . . he persisted in a practice the most barbarous and the most absurd that has ever disgraced jurisprudence, in a practice of which in the preceding generation Elizabeth and her Ministers had been ashamed, and a practice which, a few years later, no sycophant in all the Inns of Court had the heart or the forehead to defend."

But Bacon's offence was committed early in the seventeenth century. What will be said by posterity about the toleration extended in the twentieth century to the practice of torturing British subjects throughout a large part of the British Empire?—Yours, &c.,

FREDERIC MACKARNES.

House of Commons,
November 30th, 1909.

Letters to the Editor.

THE GOVERNMENT AND WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The question of the House of Lords must at present take the first place in public attention, and no one of democratic sympathies would wish to stand in the way of its speedy settlement. But some thought must also be given to the future. The next great political reform for progressive parties will be the reform of the franchise, and its extension to women. Its solution will continue the work of making our Government truly representative, which it cannot be while all women and a large number of men, mainly of the steady working class, are without votes.

The NATION has given support to the principle of adult suffrage, and in a recent article placed Electoral Reform, accompanied by women's enfranchisement, first among the future tasks of Liberalism. Liberalism must be ready for its task when the time comes; and we feel we can confidently ask you now, at this critical moment, to support our claim that the Government should recognise the importance of this subject by including in its approaching declaration of policy on December 10th, an undertaking to deal with it at the earliest possible moment.—Yours, &c.,

MARGARET LLEWELYN DAVIES,
MARY R. MACARTHUR,

Hon. Secs., People's Suffrage Federation.

"League House,"
34, Mecklenburgh Square, W.C.
December 1st, 1909.

[We are strongly in favor of such a declaration, and will give our utmost support to any practical measure for giving effect to it.—ED. NATION.]

MAKING THE FOREIGNER PAY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Without offence, may I suggest that it is not surprising that Mr. Rowland Hunt's arguments have never been answered in the House of Commons? The game of ninepins is evidently not popular in that august Assembly.

In so far as Mr. Hunt deals with my statements, I crave the privilege of answering him, with, I hope, due regard for your valuable space.

No one disputes "that if a foreigner reduces the price of his goods by 10 per cent. he would be paying the 10 per cent. import tariff," nor yet that in exceptional cases he may pay the whole or part of the tax. What we are asked to believe is that he can be made to pay all or most of a general import tariff. That is false to fact, and against all experience. What ground is there for believing that the experience of Great Britain will be different from that of all other countries? To what protected countries, and what goods, does Great Britain ship upon which she pays all or any part of the import tariff?

If I insist on selling my goods in a market for which they are not suited, or where they cannot compete with domestic productions, I would probably not only pay all the import duty, but something more, and the same would apply to the foreigner in this country; but international commerce does not work along these lines.

We sell to the foreigner the goods he wants and cannot obtain as favorably elsewhere, and we buy from the foreigner the goods he can make better or cheaper than we ourselves can.

The "import taxation on food" in this country is possibly greater than in many other countries. America might even figure out at nothing per head, but who would claim that this represented her total taxation? What about her tariff on general merchandise and the taxes levied upon the people by the protected manufacturers under the "licence to rob" which their protective system gives them?

Mr. Carnegie is quoted by Mr. Hunt as saying that "America raised £45,000,000 a year which did not affect the poor," but he forgot to add that the American tariff discriminates against the poor, and the duties are too high to permit of any but the middle and richer class buying foreign goods. The poor are left to the tender mercies of the domestic manufacturer.

May I also quote Mr. Carnegie? I heard that gentleman say, as nearly as my memory serves me: "You have in your midst a party calling themselves Fair Traders. Of them beware! They propose to put on what they call discriminating duties—here a little and there a little. Let me tell you, as an American manufacturer, that we would give untold sums of money if we could persuade your British manufacturers to handicap themselves one feather-weight, by putting on what they call discriminating duties." Mr. Carnegie was not in doubt as to who paid the duties.

Why, asks Mr. Hunt, is it impossible to tax the competing goods of the foreigner for the benefit of using this market? Simply because the tax would be just so much added to the £300,000,000 which he says he must pay in Imperial and local taxation.

Mr. Hunt sees no sense in "allowing the foreigner to use our market without paying anything to enter it." Where, except in our own Colonies, are we taxed for using a market?

I am challenged to say whether I sell my goods in America in competition with an "untaxed supply made in that country." My answer is yes, and I charge a profit on the duty also. I don't require to "reduce my men's wages and my profit," and I sell no cheaper than my next-door neighbor, and why? Simply because Protection has increased the American's cost of production and hindered the development of his industry.

Why is America, of the four great nations, the smallest exporter of manufactured goods? Simply because she is handicapped in the race, and, unlike some Free Traders and all retaliators, I don't want to see one single strap removed from her legs.

Mr. Asquith was not wrong if he said in 1894 that the "tariff walls were every day getting higher and higher," but he did not say that we should follow the lead and handicap ourselves. He simply saw in the fact he stated the need for Free and Freer Trade. He is taking the first chance that has come within his reach of changing the shoulders which bear the burdens that handicap trade. In 1909 he might, with equal truth, say that the same countries which were increasing their burdens are now struggling to throw off the intolerable load.

What effect a duty on the £140,000,000 of imported manufactures would have upon these imports must be more or less of the nature of a speculation, but it is more than probable that the £70,000,000 which Mr. Hunt is going to manufacture in this country will neither come in from abroad nor be manufactured in this country. The bulk of it forms the raw material of important industries which could not pay for the goods plus the duty, nor the price at which they could be made in this country.

Mr. Hunt can figure out for himself, even if his own view were correct, what the loss to our shipping trade would be.

Mr. Hunt claims that Tariff Reform will increase wages, but "a scientific tariff would not increase the cost of production." How is it to be done? If Tariff Reform did not increase wages, the plight of the workman would be poor indeed.

Trade Unionists are almost to a man against Tariff Reform. They see in the unemployment which the agitation for a fiscal change has brought about an earnest of worse things if Tariff Reform became the policy of the country. They understand the law of supply and demand, and can see the control of labor handed over absolutely to the capitalist or employer of labor, and they have no stomach for the change.

Mr. Chamberlain was right when he said that to tax food was to lower wages, and the same applies to anything else that the wage-earner uses.

Imperial preference is to secure regular employment! Imperial preference is a glorified hypocrisy, as anyone engaged in the Colonial trade understands. The principle underlying the whole thing, as the Colonists in unmistakable language declare, is that, first and foremost, there must be absolute protection for Colonial industries. Nothing coming from Great Britain or any other place must interfere with that protection. After that, on the goods which they cannot manufacture themselves, they are willing to, and do, give a preference to Great Britain, and that preference represents just so much saved to the Colonial pocket. In almost every article that we ship we have the foreigner beaten, so that the whole thing amounts to "thank you for nothing."

During the preferential period our trade with Canada has increased materially; not, it is true, to the same extent as America's trade with that Colony, but to credit the increase to the preference given us is to ignore altogether the enormously increased purchasing power of that Colony.

I hope I have knocked over a few of Mr. Rowland Hunt's ninepins. I will leave the rest, which had no particular bearing on the subject, to fall from their own want of balance.

Except to bring about a change in the position of political parties in this country, what is the whole agitation about? In 1907, as against 1905, we had increased our export trade 26 per cent., against Germany's 21 per cent. and America's 20 per cent., and yet, from the platform, we are going to the dogs!—Yours, &c.,

MANUFACTURER.

Glasgow, November 29th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Rowland Hunt is not permitted, I think, to use the "argumentum ad populum" in a discussion on a hard business subject which admits of actual tangible proof. Because I wish to show when a duty meant to be protective ceases to be protective, because the foreigner might choose to reduce his price by the amount of the duty, Mr. Rowland Hunt is not permitted, by the rules of logic, to assume that the proposition indicates a general fact of trade—I think it is a method of reasoning based on the same principle as: "What we eat grew in the fields; loaves of bread are what we eat; therefore loaves of bread grow in the fields."

It would be of interest to learn how Mr. Rowland Hunt could show us whether the foreigner reduced his prices by the amount of the duties placed upon the articles taxed, or not. What would be the standard? Where would be the protection?

May I commend to Mr. Rowland Hunt a very excellent work which he cannot have had brought to his notice, or he would have found no necessity to take up so much of your valuable space. It is the "Financial Reform Almanac." It costs a shilling on any bookstall, and on page 160 (1909 edition) he will find that the expenditure on food, fuel, and rent of a workman in Germany would be to that of the same workman in England, on the same items, but not including local taxation, as 119 to 100. Therefore, an English workman in Germany, living as far as possible as he had been accustomed to live in England, would find his expenditure on rent, food, and fuel, exclusive of local taxation, increased by some 19 per cent., or, roughly, by one-fifth. This is either true, or it is not true. If true, what Mr. Hunt says is not true; if it is not true, then Mr. Hunt is at liberty to correct it.

Behind the white sheet ghost of "Tariff Reform," which moves mysteriously through the country, is the British landlord. It is his voice which is chiefly heard clamoring for tariffs, for it is his rents which make our industry less fruitful than it should be. Corn competes on the markets and a common price results, but land is not allowed to compete, and monopoly prices are upheld in Britain. Mr. John Morley clamored for the open door and for the unshackling of trade abroad as at home, knowing, as all the best economists have known, that the freedom of foreign countries will mean their expansion, and their expansion cannot take place without benefiting us. Because my neighbor shuts his garden behind a high wall, even though he casts some shade on mine, what shall it benefit me to shut in my own and exclude the sun? The total yield of the two gardens would be less than it would be did there exist no walls at all. The more we both have, or the more we both produce, the easier are exchanges made, and the wealthier we become. Countries do not buy what they do not require, nor sell what they cannot afford to part with. Tariff Reform would positively prevent our buying what we want, thus preventing us from selling, because we could not produce, and the profits of two transactions would be lost. What would be the benefit?—Yours, &c.,

A. GRIMSHAW HAYWOOD.

November 29th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Much has been written recently as to whether the importer pays for the duty, &c., on articles which he buys from abroad. To business men dealing with foreign countries it seems absurd that any doubt can be expressed on this point. I am a manufacturer, and our firm for the past thirty years has made carpets and furnishing fabrics largely for export. In no single instance have we ever paid for duty, and prices received by us have always been exactly those got from home customers. This is plain and indisputable; but I should like to point out that the user of the imported article pays much more than simply the price of the duty added, and a very simple illustration which came before me in New York will explain what is the universal experience. Here are figures which show the price which the retail purchaser or user of one of our chief makes of carpets pays in London and New York respectively:—

IN LONDON.		IN NEW YORK
Manufacturers' charge or shopkeepers' cost	4s. 3d. sq. yd	Manufacturers' charge at Liverpool ...	4s. 3d. sq. yd
price ...		Duty, 22c. per sq. yd....	11d.
Shopkeepers' expenses and profit		Duty 40 per cent. ad val. ...	1s. 8½d
33½ per cent. on cost ...	1s. 5d	Freight and clearance 5 per cent.	2½d.
Shopkeepers' selling price per sq. yard ...	5s. 8d.		7s. 1d.
Thus carpet 4 × 3 yards sells @ £3 8s. 0d.		Shopkeepers' expenses and profit, 50 per cent., say ...	3s. 7d.
		Shopkeepers' selling price ...	10s. 8d.
		Thus carpet 4 × 3 yards sells @ £6 8s. 0d.

Above shows that not only does the American user pay 2s. 10d. for duty, &c., but, what is generally forgotten, he has to pay the shopkeepers' profit on that 2s. 10d. And this is not all, for, while the conditions of living enable the shopkeeper here to make a satisfactory net profit if he adds 33 per cent. (or less) on cost, the amount paid for help and head charges in America is such that the shopkeeper, to make the same net profit, must charge 50 per cent. on cost, so that while the user of this carpet at home pays only 1s. 5d. per square yard above manufacturers' price, the American user pays 6s. 5d. above manufacturers' price, and I saw regularly the same carpets selling in America at £6 8s. and over, which are on sale in London at £3 8s. and under.

This is no unusual case. I could cite instances much more striking, but the above is quite the average, and goes to show that not only does the foreigner pay the duty, but he pays over and above a specially high profit on the duty and article combined.—Yours, &c.,

Home-acres, Carlisle,

JAMES MORTON.

December 1st, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—You do well to publish the letter of Mr. Rowland Hunt in your issue of the 27th inst., as I have seldom seen a better illustration of the hopeless fog which envelops the whole Tariff Reform case.

I was, for more than twenty years, senior partner in a firm of Birmingham manufacturers doing a large export trade with the Continent and other foreign countries, so I can speak with first-hand knowledge as to the terms on which export business is done, and I can assure Mr. Hunt that the cases where the profit on exported goods amounts to so much as 10 per cent. are so rare as to be absolutely negligible in considering this question.

The bulk of our business was done at what are known as "rock bottom" prices, delivered free on board at any English port. These prices, on an average, did not yield a net profit of more than about five per cent., and the importer had to pay freight from the English port and customs duty. But to meet the wishes of some of our customers we quoted alternative terms which included freight and duty delivered free within works, and in these cases we not only charged the full cost of freight and duty to the customer, but obtained some additional profit for ourselves as compensation for the trouble involved, thus proving beyond the possibility of doubt that the importer pays the duty.

Granting, for the sake of argument, that one-half of the 140 millions of what are called manufactured articles imported into this country would be made here if a 10 per cent. duty was imposed, though the assumption is very questionable, what would be the result? The duty would be equivalent to a tax of 7 millions on our people, plus cost of collection and other charges, say, 10 millions in all. To this must be added an indefinite number of other millions we should have to pay, owing to the general rise in prices of articles already made in this country of similar character to those previously imported.

The result on the wages bill would not be materially affected, additional wages to the extent of a possible thirty-five millions might be paid in some branches of trade, but this would be counterbalanced by loss of employment in other branches engaged in making goods which had previously been exchanged for the articles imported; for every economist knows that imports are not paid for in cash, but by exchange of commodities; you cannot exclude imports and still do an export trade.

The total result therefore of a 10 per cent. duty on manufactures would be to add a certain 10 millions of additional taxation to this country plus an indefinite further sum, owing to a general rise in prices; there would be no increase, on balance, in employment, and great dislocation would result from an artificial stimulus being given to some trades, which would be counterbalanced by great depression in others.

Mr. Hunt claims that the other half of "manufactured" articles imported would yield a revenue of seven millions, but if he will take the trouble to look at the list of these imports he will see that the bulk of them come under the head of "raw materials," which, I believe, no Tariff Reformer proposes to tax. But even if this revenue were obtained it would all come out of the pockets of people in this country, and the heavy cost of collection would have to be deducted.

With regard to the present duties on beer, spirits, tobacco, and tea, Mr. Hunt professes concern that they press so heavily on the working-classes, which is perfectly true, but I would point out that not one of these is a necessity; a very large number of persons make no use of them, and they may, to some extent, be considered luxuries. Yet he objects to the present Budget, which bases taxation on the ability to pay, and the party to which he belongs proposes as an alternative to tax imported foodstuffs which are absolute necessities of life to the very poorest. A more illogical position it would be difficult to imagine.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN GRUBB.

The Down, Winscombe, Somerset,

November 29th, 1909.

THE ULTIMATE BASIS OF AUTHORITY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—If "M. A." will do me the justice of keeping to my point—"the last resort, the ultimate basis of authority"—instead of writing about something else, he will, I think, find that his "two authorities," Hume and Professor Dicey, are of no use to him. Hume's "government founded upon opinion," must still have force as its "last resort," its "ultimate basis of authority." And Professor Dicey does not agree with "M. A." in his misapprehension of Hume, as may be clearly seen from his own express affirmation in his recently published "Letters to a Friend on Votes for Women" (page 84): "The pregnant principle or fact that government itself depends at bottom upon force, tells all but fatally against the establishment of woman suffrage in a country, at any rate, such as England, where it would ultimately give predominant power to women. Nothing, I may add, is more noteworthy or characteristic than the incapacity of suffragists to recognise the unwelcome truth."

Mr. Houghton's presentment of his case is ingenious and plausible, but unconvincing. Our representatives, as such, it is true, are not soldiers, but they belong to the sex which alone can be soldiers; and the sex which, for physiological reasons, cannot be responsible for enforcing the law, cannot claim the responsibility of making it. Voting is our less barbarous substitute, as far as it goes, for fighting; but, even in these comparatively civilised days, when voting fails, fighting begins. And I would not give much for the respect shown towards a law made mainly by women but enforceable only by men, if the great majority of men entirely disapproved of it. And that is where the "last resort" comes in.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN MASSIE.

Oxford, November 27th, 1909.

LORD ROSEBERY'S SPEECH.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Whether it is a cause or an effect of the traditional exclusion of the House of Lords from the realms of finance I know not, but the ignorance displayed by their Lordships of financial matters well within the knowledge of ordinary business men appears to me to more than justify the attitude of the House of Commons in this connection. One after another has got up in the present debate and spoken of the fall in Consols as the direct result of the Budget proposals. Do they suggest that the corresponding falls in the national securities of France and Germany have the same origin? Surely not, and yet French Rentes have been as high as 98 this year and as low as 95½, and German Imperials as high as 86¾ and as low as 81¾. German Imperials are three per cents., whereas Consols are two-and-a-half per cents. The equivalent, therefore, of the present price of Consols, fully 82, is 99 for three per cents., so that on the Stock Exchanges of Europe our credit is 17 points, or fully 20 per cent. better than that of Germany.

In this connection, I pointed out immediately after Lord Rosebery's Budget speech here last September that his statement that Consols were never so low as at that time was strangely inaccurate, seeing that they were two points lower in 1907, and that, converting them to their equivalents previous to 1889, up to which they were three per cents., the statement was inaccurate in respect of thirty-eight years out of the preceding sixty-seven. Last night Lord Rosebery is reported to have said: "The days which have passed over me since then have not weakened in my mind one single syllable, or made me think of reversing or recalling one single syllable of what I uttered upon that occasion." This is hardly the strict regard for truth which one expects from a former Prime Minister.

Lord Rosebery also said last night: "This country was not long ago the strong box and the safe of Europe, to which every man outside this country sent his savings, that they might be secure." Judging by the above figures, it still occupies a high place, though we have never held such enormous hoards of gold as France and even Russia, and Jacques Bonhomme and, I suppose, the small investors of other countries have always preferred to put their savings into home securities. But what are we to make of Lord Rosebery's unsailorlike belief "that all the great ships that go westward are at this moment carrying bonds and stocks in ballast in order that they may be got rid of"? Bonds and stocks would make very poor ballast; but if he means that the ships are going in ballast, then his ship-owner friends will support me when I say that they are getting as much cargo to carry as ever. If he means that our savings are being invested in America, then the bonds and stocks will be coming in the eastward-bound ships.

Lord St. Davids' reply to the noble Earl will have, I doubt not, the approval of the bulk of moderate men actively interested in our trade and commerce. The credit of the country has not yet been shaken, but if anything will shake it, it is the persistent jeremiads of those who, while claiming to be the only patriots, are taking the best possible steps, unintentionally, I believe, to damage our financial prestige in the eyes both of our own fellow-citizens and of our foreign friends.—Yours, &c.,

D. M. STEVENSON.

Glasgow, November 25th, 1909.

DRAMATIC AUTHORS AND THE CENSORSHIP.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am desired by the Dramatic Committee of the Society of Authors to forward you the enclosed letter, which they would deem it a favor if you would print in the next issue of your paper.

The letter embodies the joint opinion of our Dramatic Committee on the Censorship Report, and it is, therefore, important that this should be made public as soon as possible.—Yours, &c.,

G. HERBERT THRING.

SIR,—On the Report of the Select Committee on Stage Plays (Censorship) we desire to make the following comments in our capacity as the Dramatic Committee of the Society of Authors, which is the sole public body representing the dramatic authors of the United Kingdom.

We recognise that the report is a notable advance on anything of the kind that has appeared before; and we appreciate its virtually complete admission of our case against the existing censorship, and its adoption of our suggestions for preventing the abuse as an instrument of censorship of the power of licensing theatres.

The Dramatic Committee note with the greatest satisfaction that one license for all places of amusement has been recommended. There is an immediate necessity for this reform, which should at once be passed into law.

Concerning the recommendations regarding the Censorship, the Dramatic Committee feel that these recommendations require careful and exhaustive criticism, but they hope that public attention will be especially centred upon the recommendation that empowers a landlord to compel his lessee to produce only such plays as have been passed by the Censor. So long as this recommendation stands, the Censorship is not optional. As in all probability most theatrical landlords would insist upon the clause, it makes all the limitations of the Censorship useless. If an optional Censorship is to be instituted, landlords should be restrained by definite Statute from compelling their tenants to take up an option which they do not desire. The Dramatic Committee feels strongly that under no circumstances should a landlord be penalised for the fault of his tenant. It is the man, not the building, that has done the harm. If a punishable play is produced, the author and the lessee (or sub-lessee) immediately responsible for the production of the play should be punished. By penalising a building because somebody produces a punishable play in it, you drive the landlord into driving his lessee to the Censor. If there were an appeal from the judgment of that Censor it would be a different matter, but as there is no appeal, neither the author nor the lessee of the theatre should be obliged to go to the Censor if they do not wish to do so.

The recommendation concerning the responsibility of the Lord Chamberlain to the House of Commons is regarded by us as most satisfactory.

The second proposal to which we take exception is objectionable on the ground of general political principle. A list of offences is first drawn up in such loose general terms that there is hardly a play in existence or possible to be written which could not be found guilty under it. We ask why we, alone among British subjects, are to be allowed to exercise our profession only on the impossible condition that we hurt nobody's feeling. We again demand as complete freedom of conscience and speech as our fellow-subjects enjoy.

If the proposals of the Committee as to a new Judicial Committee of the Privy Council are proceeded with, we suggest that the list of offences be cut down by the omission of all the items which are clearly abrogations of the religious and political liberty of the stage, and that the author shall have the option of trial by jury in every case if he prefers it to trial by the proposed committee.

We desire further that it should be made clear that the powers of the Director of Public Prosecutions and the Attorney-General set forth in the proposals are not to supplement but to supersede the powers now possessed by the common informer; so that we may be freed from persecution by irresponsible individuals and societies which aim at the extirpation of dramatic art.—Yours, &c.,

ARTHUR PINERO (Chairman).

HENRY ARTHUR JONES (Vice-Chairman).

H. GRANVILLE BARKER.

J. M. BARRIE.

R. C. CARTON.

CICELY HAMILTON.

JEROME K. JEROME.

W. J. LOCKE.

ROBERT MARSHALL.

CECIL RALEIGH.

G. BERNARD SHAW.

ALFRED SUTRO.

The Incorporated Society of Authors,
39, Old Queen Street, Storey's Gate,
November 27th, 1909.

THE PURPOSE OF MR. BALFOUR'S ROMANES LECTURE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As one who heard Mr. Balfour's Romanes lecture at Oxford, may I be allowed to try and correct the generally wrong impression given by the short notice of it, in your issue of November 27th? Your comments are, in any case, inadequate, as they confine themselves to the issues raised by Mr. Balfour in the first ten minutes of his lecture. More than this, however, you attribute to him views diametrically opposed to those he propounded.

Here is what occurs in your Diary of the week:—

"Curiously enough, he (Mr. Balfour) followed Tolstoy in criticising and almost rejecting the æsthetic judgment of art, and showed some hankering after the older custom of asking whether it served morality and religion, or helped the State, or served some practical end."

Here, on the other hand, is what Mr. Balfour said:—

"There was a time when it was not merely common, but almost universal, to ask: Does such a work subserve the interests of morality and religion? Does it help the State? Does it lead to any useful practical end? . . . Now, again, I venture to say that these questions are no longer put. You will not find in any competent modern critic the serious consideration of such a question with regard to a picture, a poem, a statue, or a symphony; you will not find him asking: What end, outside the production of a beautiful work of art, does this subserve? You will find him asking: Is it a beautiful work of art? And that is the only question with which primarily he is concerned."

Mr. Balfour went on to say that the other questions are not, of course, absurd. It is quite rational to ask with regard to any particular work of art, or with regard to art in general: Is society better for it? Though this has nothing to do with artistic value; and with regard to the general question he personally had no doubt as to the answer. He regarded, he said, the feeling of the beautiful aroused by a work of art, as the true end of a work of art.

Anyone familiar with Tolstoy's "What is Art?" will see at once that the above is a statement of the view of art which Tolstoy tried to combat. The only question Tolstoy asked about a work of art was whether it subserved the interests of morality or religion; and in his opinion that was the only question worth asking.

Mr. Balfour would agree with Tolstoy in considering the metaphysical theories of art as unsatisfactory; but while regarding them as simply inadequate, he considers Tolstoy's own view as fundamentally and absolutely wrong.

I must apologise for prolixity, but your notice was not only unworthy of the lecture and of your paper (to both of which I should like to pay a valueless tribute), but, and no severer indictment occurs to me, it would have been unworthy of any paper. Moreover, it seems to me of paramount importance that the views of a great man on a great subject should not, either through accident or carelessness, be misrepresented.—Yours, &c.,

DONALD B. SOMERVELL.

Magdalen College, Oxford,
November 30th, 1909.

[We quite accept our correspondent's correction. But we are bound to say in self-defence that we were misled by the brevity of the report on which we based our brief criticism. We certainly were astonished at its apparent conclusion, but it was unmistakeable on the face of the record to which we refer.—ED., NATION.]

"RATTLING INTO BARBARISM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Two utterances of the past week may serve as an index of the rate we are travelling in the above direction. Professor Spenser Wilkinson, in his inaugural lecture at Oxford as Chichele Professor of Military History, declared war to be "one of the modes of human intercourse," and the tone of his lecture showed that he regarded war as far from being the most maleficent of these modes. The other utterance is from a leading article in the Harmsworthised "Times," and needs no comment: "Even expert knowledge of horse-races and ballets may come in useful when such questions as gambling and the licensing of theatres are brought up." Add the report of the Cambridge Deer Hunt, and we have a week that deserves to be marked with a white stone.—Yours, &c.,

PENGUIN.

November 30th, 1909.

IN PRAISE OF DUMPING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—We are all accustomed to considerable change of front on the part of Tariff Reformers, but the latest acrobatic feat performed by no less a person than Viscount Ridley, the President of the Tariff Reform League, surpasses all in the completeness of the somersault.

In the Budget debate in the House of Lords, the "Morning Post" reports him as saying:—

"In the case of the United States it was found that the taxation of imports had been not only beneficial to the nation by providing a large revenue, but had had the effect of largely increasing the import of dutiable goods."

Can it be that this lauded increased "import of dutiable goods" under Protection in America is the same thing as "the inundations," "the floods," and "the dumpings" of foreign goods which, according to the self-same Tariff Reformers, cause widespread unemployment in our own degenerate and impoverished country?—Yours, &c.,

W. H. M.

Street, Somerset,

November 27th, 1909.

CHARLES KINGSLEY AND WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I submit that Mr. Seebohm's letter leaves my statement just where it was. I repeat that I heard Charles Kingsley speak in favor of female suffrage, and in favor of Mill's book, and I may add that, on speaking to him in the waiting-room, before we went in to the meeting, he remarked, "I am very glad to see you here," with an emphasis on the last word. That he disliked some later developments of the movement I have already admitted, and no doubt he withdrew, in consequence, from the active support which he had first given to that movement. As to what he would think of some recent performances, I have no doubt he would have regretted them as keenly as other champions of female suffrage have regretted them.

I suppose it is a price we pay for Party Government that people think that each cause must be defended without reserve, or opposed altogether; but there are still some people left who can defend a cause and yet condemn the methods by which it is supported. To which I would add that this remark is a criticism, not a wholesale condemnation, of Party Government.—Yours, &c.,

C. E. MAURICE.

Eirene Cottage, Gainsborough Gardens,

Hampstead, November 27th, 1909.

[This correspondence should now cease.—ED., NATION.]

UNDERGRADUATE OPINION IN OXFORD.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Noticing that, in your issue of November 20th, you adduce as an instance of the bent of "educated opinion" at the present time the fact that the Oxford Union Society Debating Club only rejected by eight votes a motion that the House of Lords is a "standing menace" to the State, I should like to draw your attention to another example, even more emphatic, of the tendency of opinion in this seat of education.

The motion on Thursday, November 25th, was that "this House would welcome the return to power of an Unionist Government early in 1910."

The motion was carried by 56 votes, 118 voting for and 62 against.

I can only suggest that the result of the previous debate was, in some degree, due to the presence of Mr. G. K. Chesterton on the side of the mover, a fact which needs consideration.—Yours, &c.,

H. F. D.

November 27th, 1909.

THE POETRY RECITAL SOCIETY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your readers will include many persons who would be interested in this society did they but know of its existence and scope. During its short life the desirability, practicability, and tremendous potentialities of the society have been proved, and they are splendidly realised and appreciated by those who believe in the refining formative influence of poetry, and are aware—as Mr. A. P. Graves has pointed out—that a taste for poetry and an appreciation of all that it stands for can be formed, and that a latent taste awaits the stimulating influence and guidance of this society.

We need the recognition and active help of all sympathisers, and hope this brief appeal will bring us into touch with many readers who wish to know more about this significant movement.—Yours, &c.,

THE DIRECTOR.

The Poetry Recital Society,

Clun House, Surrey Street, Strand, W.C.

PRAGMATISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I thank you for publishing my letter, but am not at all sure that it was worthy of the title "Pragmatism" which you gave it. I should also like to thank your correspondent "A. E. Y." for his very tolerant and fairly sympathetic reply, besides making one or two rejoinders to him and Mr. Flecker.

"A. E. Y." says that he suspends his judgment on the Steinheil case because the evidence is conflicting and unsatisfactory. But suppose Madame Steinheil was a very great friend of his, would he suspend his judgment then? Would he not rather believe in her innocence and stake all that he possesses on an attempt to prove it? Surely, then, the same course would be the right one with regard to those beliefs which our natures prompt us to like. What would "A. E. Y." think of a man, who, on being asked if life was worth living or not, replied that the evidence was "conflicting and unsatisfactory," and that therefore he would stop living until further evidence had accumulated? Or of a man who refused to believe in God because the evidence was insufficient? What "A. E. Y." forgets is that life is action from beginning to end, and that these beliefs and generalisations are the only tools we have for use in that action. I think, therefore, and this is my point, that I am justified in saying that we ought to believe exactly what we want to believe (so long as facts do not absolutely contradict it) until it is proved to be untrue, and disbelieve what we want to disbelieve until it is proved true, when it becomes a fact and not a belief.

Mr. Flecker's letter is one of an altogether different kind. It may not reveal intellectual chaos, but it certainly reveals the fact that he has not read Professor James's book, or if he has that he does not understand it. He would do well to remember that he cannot refute a doctrine unless he understands it, and that it cannot be understood unless it is treated a little sympathetically.

He appears to imagine that Pragmatism is a doctrine of intellectual licence. If he were to understand it and try it he would speedily find that the Pragmatist is confined within just as rigorous limits as anyone else. Here is an extract from Professor James's book:—

"The only guarantee we have against licentious thinking is the circumpressure of experience itself, which gets us sick of concrete errors whether there be a trans-empirical reality or not.

"All the sanctions of a law of truth lie in the very texture of experience. Absolute or no absolute, the concrete truth for us will always be that way of thinking in which our various experiences most profitably combine."

Thus Mr. Flecker's lunatic would soon find that it did not work to believe himself to be the Emperor of China, experience insisting that that position was not vacant for him to occupy.

Certainly, immortality is true for Smith, if such a belief works for him and fits in with the rest of his experience, and untrue for Lucretius if it does not work for him, and is contrary to his experience. How else would Mr. Flecker have it? Would he suspend his judgment on the question of immortality? If he does this, and extends the same method to other subjects, he turns his back upon religion and declares himself an agnostic. For my own part I do not feel justified in thus ignoring the religious experience of the past. Pragmatism, as Professor James has so ably shown, is the mediator between the two extremes—Agnosticism on the one hand, and credulity in faith on the other; for this reason I hope that it may commend itself to some of your readers.—Yours, &c.,

L. CROOK.

4, Elm Grove, Wimbledon.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The letter of Mr. Flecker in your last issue is an example of the way many a brave man rushes into battle with scant knowledge of his opponents' strength.

In the first place, he painfully misrepresents the theory which passes by the name of Pragmatism. No Pragmatist ever held that all Truth must have practical consequences in the ordinary sense of the word "practical." What they always insist is that a statement must have some consequences, otherwise it is not worth considering.

Secondly, Mr. Flecker's brief answer to the Pragmatist position is amusing in its completeness. With a single sentence he crushes a whole philosophy; "it is not what we mean by Truth."

As he is careful not to say what he does mean, in the interest of "Sanity and Thought," to quote Mr. Flecker, I suggest the following points for his consideration:—

1. The Truth of Geometry and Natural Science is determined, not alone by logical consistency, but also by the convenient practical working of the knowledge in question.

2. In matters of everyday knowledge—e.g., discrimination of colors—the agreement of the majority is the determining factor. Those who do not distinguish colors as the majority do, are called color-blind.

3. Truth in all cases is the result of a process of selection and elimination. This process may be long or short, but in no case do we human beings attain Truth, eternal and complete, with a single glance. The purpose of knowledge is never immediately reached, so that the knowledge which fails of its purpose is, sooner or later, rejected, and called Error, while that alone which is finally satisfactory, in relation to its purpose, is Truth.

The remainder of the letter hardly seems serious, but it is so much in accordance with the common criticisms levelled against this theory that I beg Mr. Flecker to consider how the Pragmatic method applies in one of these cases he mentions.

One man believes in immortality, another does not. How shall we decide? Pragmatists say that if the belief in question makes no difference whether accepted or rejected, then it is an idle matter. Does the belief in immortality work or not? What are the consequences of accepting or rejecting it both for the individual and for society? When these questions can be answered, the truth of the notion may be affirmed or denied, and I challenge anyone to produce a different method of solving the problem of immortality.

Finally, may I urge a more serious study of the philosophical speculation called Pragmatism, since it gives a more complete account of the nature of human knowledge than any other, and, furthermore, since it is the only theory which can be successfully tested by its own standards?—Yours, &c.,

E. C. CHILDS.

Balliol House, Toynbee Hall, E.

November 28th, 1909.

BACON ON PROTECTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Our Protectionist friends made great play with a somewhat unlucky obiter dictum of John Stuart Mill, as to the value of Protection in fostering the industries of a new country. Have they ever considered the view held on this subject by a greater than Mill? Bacon, in the "Essay of Plantations," uses the following words, most remarkable in an age when every kind of Protection was among the recognised economical methods: "Let there be Freedom from Custom till the Plantation be of Strength: and not only Freedom from Custom, but Freedom to carry their Commodities, where they may make their best of them, except there be some special Cause of Caution." But, indeed, to judge from what I see around me, I should fear that the number of Tariff Reformers who have read their Bacon, or any other literature prior to 1903, is comparatively small.—Yours, &c.,

A. J. BUTLER.

Wood End, Weybridge,

November 30th, 1909.

Poetry.

REFLETS DANS L'EAU.

(AFTER DEBUSSY.)

*Glory of golden leaves in the water reflected,
Red-brown leaves dank at the water's margin.*

A LITTLE lake—or, scarce so much, a pool—
I see, and around it are beech-trees, all ablaze
With Autumn's prodigal wonder of yellow and gold.
So much I know, although the water, cool
And tranquil, fascinates my dreamy gaze,
For its depths the golden glory mirrored hold;
And in the centre, lo! a little patch
Of delicate and most ethereal blue,
November's calm, remote, and tender hue.

The stillness seems to deepen while I watch;
Only at times a leaf will languidly
Float down—so slowly that its touch scarce wakes
A quiver in the water, or makes dim
The meeting of the imaged trees and sky. . . .
Sudden, a frog jumps, with a splash that breaks
The tranced stillness of the mellow day.
The ripples widen and spread to the outermost rim
Of the pool, where the fallen leaves, all sodden and dead,
Lie, heavy with the richness of decay.
The reflected colors—blue, gold, brown, and red—
In circles mix, are blended and effaced,
And all's confusion. . . . Now the picture clears
By slow degrees. The shaken tapestry
Of gold and blue, in circles inwoven, appears
Once more. The stems in wavering lines are traced,
Grow steady, as the ripples die away,
And all is still again, and plain to see
In the water reflected, the glory of golden leaves.

EDITH MOGGRIDGE.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE following is our weekly selection of books which we commend to the notice of our readers:—

- "The Cambridge Modern History." Vol. VI. "The Eighteenth Century." (Cambridge University Press. 16s. net.)
 "Trans-Himalaya: Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet." By Sven Hedin. (Macmillan. 2 vols. 30s. net.)
 "Charles Darwin and the Origin of Species." By E. B. Poulton. (Longmans. 7s. 6d. net.)
 "The Camel and the Needle's Eye." By Arthur Ponsonby. M.P. (Fifield. 3s. 6d. net.)
 "The Evolution of Italian Sculpture." By Lord Balcarres. (Murray. 21s. net.)
 "Socialism and Government." By J. Ramsay MacDonald, M.P. (Independent Labor Party. 2 vols. 3s. net.)
 "Modernity and the Churches." By Percy Gardner. (Williams & Norgate. 5s. net.)
 "History, Authority and Theology." By A. C. Headlam, M.A., D.D. (Murray. 6s. net.)
 "India Under Ripon." By Wilfrid Scawen Blunt. (Unwin. 10s. net.)
 "Mary." By Björnstjerne Björnson. (Heinemann. 3s. 6d. net.)
 "J. J. Rousseau et la Révolution Française." Par E. Champion. (Paris: Colin. 3fr. 50.)
 "Propos Littéraires." Cinquième Série. Par Emile Faguet. (Paris: Société d'Imprimerie. 3fr. 50.)
 "Les Théories de l'Evolution." Par Yves Delage et M. Goldsmith. (Paris: Flammarion. 3fr. 50.)

* * *

A NEW book by Mr. James Bryce is to be published by the Yale University Press, and an English edition will be issued next week by Mr. Henry Frowde. Under the title of "Hindrances to Good Citizenship" Mr. Bryce investigates civic responsibility, and points out the reasons for its avoidance by the average citizen.

* * *

MR. H. G. WELLS is busy putting the finishing touches to his scenario for "When the Sleeper Wakes," a play with a strong love interest, which bids fair for a long run at His Majesty's Theatre next year. He is also writing a preface to a remarkable transcript from the "Life of a Bath-Chairman," the true record of the life of a very poor, much battered man, which Messrs. Constable will issue early in 1910.

* * *

ALTHOUGH less than a year has passed since Professor Wilbur Cross published his full and informing, though rather dull, work on "The Life and Times of Laurence Sterne," another book upon the same subject is now announced. This is a biography of Sterne by Mr. Lewis Melville, which is described as "a straightforward narrative, letting Sterne, as far as possible, speak for himself." It will contain several letters until recently supposed to be spurious, the hitherto unpublished "Journal to Eliza"—which Professor Cross describes as "the emotional history lying behind and thus explaining in a measure the style, tone, and mood of the 'Sentimental Journey'"—and extracts from the unpublished letters of Mrs. Eliza Draper. Sterne has engaged the attention of several biographers, but it cannot be said that the definitive "Life" has yet made its appearance.

* * *

THE long-expected anthology of Oxford and Oxford life, "In Praise of Oxford," upon which Mr. Thomas Seccombe and Mr. H. Spencer Scott have been engaged for some years, is, we understand, to be published by Messrs. Constable early next spring. It promises to be far the most comprehensive selection of passages relating to Oxford, both in prose and verse, that has ever been issued.

* * *

THE same publishers are about to issue an English edition of Mr. Arnold Haultain's charming book of aphorisms and epigrams, which, under the title of "Hints for Lovers," is enjoying great favor in America. It is said to be as original in form as in substance and texture, though some of Mr. Haultain's headings, "On Girls," "On Women," "On Making Love," "On Beauty," "On Courtship," "On Kisses and Kissings," will seem hackneyed to the cynic. As tastes of Mr. Haultain's quality, we may quote the following: "Love, like sunlight, wears its most tender tints at dawn." "Children act as collateral security."

AN English edition of the annotated Shakespeare, upon the editing of which Mr. Sidney Lee has been engaged since 1902, will be issued shortly by the Caxton Publishing Company. The main feature of the work will be the "Special Introductions" by contemporary critics. The list of those who have contributed to the volumes includes the names of Swinburne, Mr. Henry James, Professor Dowden, M. Jusserand, Mr. William Archer, Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. Maurice Hewlett, Mr. Gosse, and Mr. Watts-Dunton, so that the edition is likely to contain all that is best in contemporary appreciation of Shakespeare.

* * *

MR. STEPHEN GWYNN, M.P., who has just brought out, through Messrs. Maunsell of Dublin, a volume of selections from the writings of Charlotte Grace O'Brien, is, on his mother's side, a grandson of the Smith O'Brien who was sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered for his share in the abortive Irish revolt of 1848. The O'Brien clan trace descent from Brian Boru, and though of the landlord class and Protestants by birth, the O'Briens have been forward in nearly every Irish patriotic movement. Sir Lucius O'Brien took a leading part in the establishment of Grattan's Parliament; his son, Sir Edward, voted against the Act of Union; while Smith O'Brien stood by O'Connell in the demand for Repeal. Smith O'Brien's daughter, Charlotte Grace O'Brien, won the gratitude of the Irish peasants by her efforts to improve the terrible conditions of the Atlantic crossing at a time when the English Government offered a grant of five pounds to each Irish family willing to emigrate to the United States. She twice travelled as a steerage passenger between Queenstown and Liverpool, and though her campaign against the steamship companies was not always wisely conducted, it directed public attention to a grave scandal. Mr. Gwynn's memoir of his aunt fills more than half the volume, and gives an excellent picture of her slightly eccentric but gifted and winning personality. Her poetry, though well worth preserving, shows want of finish and want of concentration. Her novel, "Light and Shade," which was praised by Aubrey de Vere, is about to be republished as a serial in "The Irish Nation."

* * *

SINCE his return from South America M. Anatole France has been engaged upon a book somewhat in the vein of his "L'Île des Pingouins," the subject being the fall of the angels. It is hoped that this work, together with his lectures on Rabelais, will appear early next year.

* * *

MR. J. A. HOBSON's coming volume of political essays, which we have already announced on this page, is to be called "The Crisis of Liberalism: New Issues of Democracy," and will be issued almost immediately by Messrs. King.

* * *

MR. JOHN BIGELOW's "Retrospections of an Active Life" has just been published in America in three bulky volumes. It covers the period of the author's life from 1817 to 1867, and gives his recollections of the many distinguished people with whom he came into contact. But its chief value consists in the materials it contains for forming a judgment upon the part played by France in the American Civil War. It deals fully with the "Trent" affair, and a number of original documents are printed which show how near the United States was to a war with this country and with France. It is to be hoped that the book will be issued by an English publisher.

* * *

WE commend to the attention of readers a "Bibliography of Unemployment and the Unemployed," by Miss F. A. Taylor, which has been published for the London School of Economics and Political Science by Messrs. King. A bibliography is one of the most useful contributions that can be made to the study of a subject, and though Miss Taylor's work is only intended as a summary guide to the principal publications of the United Kingdom and to some of those of France, Germany, Italy, and the United States, during the last quarter of the century, it is of the utmost value to every student of the subject. Mr. Sidney Webb contributes a preface treating of the measures for dealing with unemployment recommended in the Minority Report of the Royal Commission on the Poor Laws.

Reviews.

SHERIDAN.*

THESE two volumes are the result of vast industry employed on a vast store of material. Mr. Sichel has had access to sources of information that were not at the disposal of the earlier biographers of Sheridan, notably to the Devonshire House MSS., among which he discovered a diary kept by the famous Georgiana during the critical months of the Regency debates in 1788-9. This very interesting document is given as an appendix in these volumes. Mr. Sichel has in his own possession a number of Sheridan's letters to the Duchess and her sister, and also a copy of the "Rolliad" containing all Sheridan's attributions as recorded by Ridgway. He has been able to explore the Holland House MSS., which contain a good many Sheridan letters, and he has found in various collections which have been open to him evidence about Sheridan's ancestors. All these seams he has worked with an indefatigable zeal, and a reviewer must preface his criticisms of the finished work by acknowledging the great obligation under which Mr. Sichel has placed students of the period. His most interesting discovery is the discovery that the famous letter of the Prince of Wales to Mr. Pitt was the work of Sheridan, and not of Burke.

Our admiration for the infinite trouble Mr. Sichel has taken over his task intensifies the regret with which we are compelled to pronounce the result of all this labor a disappointment. Mr. Sichel has not been able to keep his passion for detail in control. His book is not so much packed as choked with his learning. If he were only discussing Sheridan's writings from his share in the "Love Epistles of Aristaenetus" to the "School for Scandal" and "Pizarro," his labyrinthine and centrifugal diffuseness, though distracting, would not be fatal. Mr. Sichel is steeped in the literature of the age; he revels, we might say riots, in its classical taste, and his enjoyment and understanding of its delightful and frolicking scholarship will make his readers wish that he would annotate and edit the "Rolliad," a classic that has fallen into a most undeserved neglect. But this complicated and artificial style does not lend itself to portrait painting, and these volumes, though they are magnificent, are not Sheridan. If anybody wants to know all that is to be learnt about Captain Mathew's grandfather, his curiosity will find complete satisfaction in these pages; if he wants to understand Sheridan himself, he will close this book feeling that Sheridan lies buried somewhere beneath this huge baroque palace which Mr. Sichel designed and decorated as the home of his memory.

The first two chapters illustrate the obstacles that Mr. Sichel's style interposes between his readers and his subject. He has collected almost all the good things that were said in a very witty society in a very witty age, and poured them out over a hundred dazzling pages. So lavish is he with other people's fun that frequently the sallies that flash in the page provoke an answering sparkle in a footnote. A profusion of splendor, so rich, so studied, so elaborate, bewilders more than it delights the eye, and Sheridan, who flits in and out of this blaze of color, becomes a fugitive and unreal figure. Sir George Trevelyan has shown that a brilliant society can be drawn in such a way as to make the characters living and vivid; in Mr. Sichel's picture the personality is obscured and shrouded. The subject was a dangerous one for a writer of Mr. Sichel's besetting weaknesses. Sheridan's career is so romantic, so adventurous, so picturesque, that it needs simplicity and restraint above all else in its interpreter, and Mr. Sichel, from the lack of these qualities, has contrived to make it almost tedious. Certainly some of the chapters in the first volume, where the ramifications of the most distant relationships in life and in literature are pursued to their dull end, are exhausting as well as exhaustive, and the reader longs for the relief of Creevy's description of Sheridan's extravagances and pranks.

Unfortunately, too, some perverse irony has prompted

Mr. Sichel, whose scrupulous attention nothing escapes in questions that are not vital, to regard accuracy as unimportant when he is discussing questions that really matter. Thus on page 281 of his second volume he contrasts Fox, who persisted in demanding peace "after Napoleon had transformed the whole scene of action," with Sheridan, "who never favored half measures with the genius who terrorised the world." Yet he must surely be aware that Sheridan was teller for Fox's motion about Napoleon in January, 1800, and that he made a peace motion of his own in December, 1800, six months after the battle of Marengo. Mr. Sichel seems, indeed, to be incapable of accuracy when he is discussing Sheridan's relations with Fox and Grey. With Mr. Sichel's general contention that Sheridan was badly treated few of his readers will quarrel. He was a difficult colleague, apart from his intemperance, but that was not sufficient justification for his exclusion from the Cabinet or for the rather ungenerous tone in which the other Foxites spoke of him. (It is true, as we know from Creevy, that in this respect there were faults on both sides.) Now it is clear that if a historian or biographer is to do justice to the rights and wrongs of the quarrels of political colleagues, he must be extremely careful and exact in his presentation of the evidence. This is an example of Mr. Sichel's care. He says on page 40 that Fox "suspected" Sheridan in 1792, and he refers in a footnote to a letter of Fox's classing Sheridan with Grey and Lauderdale as "manageable men." Mr. Sichel adds: "Grey would surely never have forgiven these doubts had he known of them later during his long and close confederacy with Fox." Now any reader who cares to refer to the letter which Mr. Sichel cites will see that he has entirely misunderstood it, and that "manageable," so far from having a sinister meaning, is used in a complimentary sense. Fox is writing to Adair, who hoped that the quarrel between the two sections of the Whigs might be composed, and explaining that he is not himself very sanguine, for he sees no indication of a conciliatory temper. "If any such disposition existed, I cannot help thinking that on the other side I should have weight enough to produce a correspondent disposition if it did not exist without my interposition. I am sure that Lauderdale, Grey, and Sheridan are all manageable men; and the rascals of the democratic party (for there are such on all sides) have not set their wits to prevent them in the way that those on the aristocratic side have to prevent the Duke of Portland, Fitzwilliam, Windham, &c." We should have thought the meaning of this passage was clear enough to make misunderstanding impossible even on the most superficial reading. Elsewhere Mr. Sichel suggests that Fox was disingenuous in repudiating all knowledge of "proposal or accommodation" in reply to a statement made by Major Scott in 1786 that Fox had been ready to drop the prosecution of Hastings if Hastings's friends would have agreed to support his India Bill in 1783. The most important evidence that Mr. Sichel cites is Dr. Parr's own conversation, for Dr. Parr was the intermediary between Sheridan and Scott. This evidence goes to show that Fox knew nothing whatever of that meeting, but Mr. Sichel thinks that the quotation from Fox's speech, which he puts into italics, is an admission that he did know about it. "It had been privately suggested in conversation that Hastings, being a very powerful man, might make the India Bill go easier if the idea of prosecuting him were given up." Cobbett's Parliamentary Report and the edition of Fox's speeches both give the first sentence rather differently: "In private conversations with his friends." This difference is not very serious, but it is serious that Mr. Sichel should stop short in the middle of a quotation which continues thus: "but he had always resisted such advice, and, indeed, so determined was he to have the Governor-General brought to trial that in his opening speech on his India Bill he had dwelt so much upon the mal-administration of Mr. Hastings that many of the enemies of that Bill had objected to him that there seemed to be no other remedy necessary for the evils in India than the recall of Mr. Hastings."

We have given these two instances of Mr. Sichel's want of care because so much of his book resolves itself into attacks on Sheridan's colleagues that it is necessary to show how flimsy is the basis on which these charges repose. In the case of the scandal about the Prince of Wales's marriage to Mrs. Fitzherbert, Mr. Sichel goes so far as to prefer the word of George the Fourth to that of Grey. In the discussion of this disagreeable subject he argues that Fox did something very cynical in urging the Prince not to marry Mrs. Fitzherbert, and that Sheridan did something very chivalrous in telling the House of Commons that she was a virtuous woman. We should have thought that as one object of marriage is to shield a woman from precisely the brutalities that Mrs. Fitzherbert suffered after her marriage, Fox's advice was conceived in her interests no less than in the interests of the public peace. Nobody treated the fact that she was his wife and alive, as an obstacle to the Prince's second marriage. If Mrs. Fitzherbert found some consolation in Sheridan's compliments to her virtue made after he had pressed home Fox's denial of her marriage, she must have been very easily pleased. We cannot see that Mr. Sichel's version puts a better complexion on the part played by any of the actors in these pitiful proceedings. The spectacle of such men as Fox and Sheridan and Burke wasting their friendship on a worthless and treacherous Prince is one of the most degrading in history. Poor Sheridan continued under this infatuation much longer than the others, and it was towards the close of his career that he referred in Parliament to the Prince's "protecting friendship." Perhaps Mr. Sichel, who allows himself in one passage to speak of "arranging the politics of a prince" with a sort of awe, as if it were a splendid object of ambition, thinks this situation less humiliating than we do, who hold that to procure Ministers for such a Prince was almost as degrading as the office of procuring him mistresses.

* "Sheridan: From New and Original Material, including a Manuscript Diary by Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire." By Walter Sichel. With illustrations. Constable. 2 vols. 31s. 6d. net.

But, after all, this disedifying side of Sheridan's career must not be allowed to obscure his magnificent qualities, and it is the fault of Mr. Sichel's biography that Sheridan's real greatness is half hidden in his picture by these shadows. Sheridan was a much greater man than Mr. Sichel paints him. His reputation rests not merely on his presence of mind and leadership in the Nore Mutiny, and his speeches against Napoleon, but on his intrepid and brilliant fight for great and generous causes against overwhelming odds. That this was Sheridan's own view is clear from his devotion to the memory of Fox, by whose side he had resisted the oligarchy in its conspiracies against freedom abroad and its vindictive oppressions at home. Mr. Sichel takes little interest in those struggles. So little does he understand Sheridan that he applies to him the grotesque adjective of "imperialist." He tells us, indeed, that Sheridan looked at politics from the point of view of the people, but he leaves this part of his career almost untouched. Thus his heroic interventions on behalf of the prisoners in the Coldbath Fields and his brilliant speeches on that subject receive less attention than does Miss Marie Löhr who played Lady Teazle in a performance this year; for Miss Löhr appears twice in the text and once in a footnote, whereas the Coldbath Fields appear once in a footnote and never get into the text at all. There is no mention of Sheridan's speeches on the Combination Laws, or of his support of Whitbread's proposals for the agricultural laborers; and the whole battle with domestic tyranny is dismissed with a few perfunctory compliments. Sheridan was a humanitarian, and a humanitarian at a time when the governing class of England was brutal and savage with fear, from Dundas, who was savage to everyone who would not accept his crude politics down to Wilberforce, who was savage to everyone who would not accept his crude religion. The most brilliant wit and almost the most brilliant orator of his time, he often forgot himself, and he sometimes forgot his dignity, but he remained an Irishman and a Liberal in a world which would have rewarded him for forgetting his country or his principles with its most lavish gifts of honor, wealth, and power.

THE RETURN TO REASON.*

"YOUR professors are out of the civic, the current, world as they are not at the Sorbonne; your clerics are out of the stream of Christian thought and theory, and devote themselves to parochial morality and organisation." Thus a recent French writer, putting his finger on the curious provincialism of English thinking. With all our great possessions—and their greatness is beyond dispute—the "one thing thou lackest" applies to us; flexibility, the free play of the understanding, the sense of proportion—in a word, intelligence—is not ours. Learning is more common with us than enlightenment; prejudice, the fixed idea, obscures our vision and arrests our thought. This reflection is suggested by a comparison between Mr. Galloway's "Principles of Religious Development" and a very able book recently reviewed in this journal, Dr. Inge's "Faith and its Psychology." The two deal with kindred subject matter; and their aim, the vindication of the primacy of reason in the philosophy of religion, is the same. The English theologian is distinctly the more brilliant, probably the more suggestive, certainly the more readable. But you never for a moment forget that Dr. Inge is an English divine with the Thirty-Nine Articles behind him. Mr. Galloway represents a larger tradition and standpoint: the reader is in contact, not with the opinions, however respectable, of an individual, however eminent, but with a movement of thought. This note of universality distinguishes Scottish from English theology. This is not the place to ask why this is so: it is enough to note the fact.

* "The Principles of Religious Development: A Psychological and Philosophical Study" By George Galloway. Macmillan. 10s.

Mr. Galloway's work is "a study of the principles which underlie and are disclosed in the development of religion." Hence it is psychological and philosophical rather than historical: it keeps in touch with the actual; but facts are used to illustrate principles, not for the purpose of narrative. The book is an outcome of the reaction against what may be called Irrationalism—the tendency to lay stress in religion, and generally in life, on feeling, will, and results (Pragmatism), rather than on reason—which is asserting itself in recent thought. If reason leads us astray, the remedy is more and better reasoned reason: the attempt to change the centre of experience to another factor in the process breaks down on this essential fact of human nature, that reason is the distinctive note of man. "Which things have, indeed, a show of wisdom in will-worship and humility, but are not of any value:" the naturam expellas furca holds.

"We feel called on to protest when we are asked to believe that will is the metaphysical first principle, that thought is a secondary product of will, and that in religion, as in other matters, our final criterion of truth must be that an idea 'works,' that it satisfies the will. The tendency which exists at present to identify religion with a supra-rational body of beliefs, which have their source and authority in the depths of the feeling-life, would, if generally accepted and acted on, prove fatal to the best interests of religion itself. The work of thought on the content of religion is the great stimulus to progress, as it is the guarantee that a religion will neither drift into obscurantism nor lose its vitality under a dead weight of tradition. In other words, the thinking aspect of the religious consciousness secures that religion will take a deeper meaning with progress in self-consciousness. For when a living religion finds itself at discord with reason, it sets to work to overcome the antagonism by means of a fresh and significant development."

Reason, in short, is the compass by which we steer: discard it, and, as experience has shown, and shows, there is no superstition, however riotous or exploded, that is not at hand. From sacerdotalism to spirit-rapping, such beliefs are never far from us; they wait for the open door. Here, as is so often the case, the common-sense of the many is a surer guide than the theorising of the few. When a religion finds itself out of touch with thought, its apologists take the line of least resistance, allegorising its tenets, or basing them on some non-rational foundation: "the heart has its reasons which the reason does not understand." But apologetic of this sort is for the schools, not for the people; for them it is a condition of truth that it shall be expressed in the vulgar tongue. This interest is sounder than the somewhat crude formulas in which it has at times found expression. While it is true that landscape, whether in nature or thought, is never without haze on the horizon, mist is not mystery; the thinker is ill at ease in a fog. It is here that the symbolism under which so many apologists shelter themselves breaks down:—

"In the dislike of all reflective formulation of spiritual experience the impartial observer will discern a danger threatening religion. Divorce religion sharply from reason, and you inevitably bring its objectivity into peril. And the symbol which

From WELLS GARDNER, DARTON & CO.'S LIST.

An Original Book on a new plan. The Illustrations are all mounted on Art Brown.

11 by 8½, fancy paper boards, cloth back, 5s. net.

The Animal Why Book.

By W. P. PYCRAFT, F.Z.S., A.L.S. Illustrated in Colours by EDWIN NOBLE, R.B.A.

A book of Natural History on novel and interesting lines. 32 Pictures painted in a bold and original style beautifully produced in chromo lithography, besides others in black and white.

8 by 5½, cloth, 5s.

Seeing the World. THE ADVENTURES of a YOUNG MOUNTAINEER.

By ASCOTT R. HOPE. With Illustrations in Colour from Drawings by GORDON BROWNE, R.I.

An excellent tale for boys by a most popular and experienced writer.

THE SEASON'S "COLOUR BOOK" FOR CHILDREN.

Everyone buying a book for a boy or girl should ask to see this book.

8 by 5½, printed on Superfine Paper, cloth, 6s.

Bellerophon. "THE BRAVEST OF THE BRAVE."

By EDWARD FRASER.

Mr. Fraser has written a stirring and romantic battle story of the hardest fighter of the Fleet of Nelson's time and how Napoleon gave himself up a prisoner, with some account of the later "Bellerophons," including the present vessel of the "Dreadnought" type.

DARTON'S FINE ART SERIES.

Each volume printed on superfine paper, profusely Illustrated in the best style by popular Artists, bound in cloth boards, gilt top, 8½ by 5½, price 6s.; calf, 10s. 6d. net.

A WONDER-BOOK OF BEASTS.

Edited by F. J. HARVEY DARTON. With numerous Illustrations and Coloured Frontispiece by MARGARET CLAYTON.

Among the Volumes included in this Series are;

ANOTHER BOOK OF CHILDREN'S VERSES. Selected by E. V. LUCAS.

OLD-FASHIONED TALES. Selected and Edited by E. V. LUCAS.

FORGOTTEN TALES OF LONG AGO. Selected and Edited, with Introduction, by E. V. LUCAS. [2nd Edition.

RUNAWAYS AND CASTAWAYS. By E. V. LUCAS.

ORIGINAL POEMS AND OTHERS. By ANNE and JANE TAYLOR and ADELAIDE O'KEEFFE. Edited by E. V. LUCAS. [2nd Edition.

THE BOOK OF KING ARTHUR AND HIS NOBLE KNIGHTS. By MARY MACLEOD. [4th Edition.

STORIES FROM THE FAERIE QUEENE. By MARY MACLEOD. [5th Edition.

THE SHAKESPEARE STORY BOOK. By MARY MACLEOD. [3rd Edition.

TALES OF THE CANTERBURY PILGRIMS. By F. J. HARVEY DARTON. [3rd Edition.

A WONDER BOOK OF OLD ROMANCE. By F. J. HARVEY DARTON.

SWEETHEART TRAVELLERS. By S. R. CROCKETT.

CHILDREN OF THE DAWN. OLD TALES OF GREECE. By E. F. BUCKLEY. [4th Edition.

&c., &c., &c.

Messrs. WELLS GARDNER, DARTON & CO., Ltd.,

will send, post free on application, a large Illustrated Catalogue, together with a List of this well-known Series.

FOR HOME, PARISH, OR SCHOOLROOM ACTING.

4½ by 7½, cloth, 1s. 6d.

A Perfect Cure, and other Plays.

By MILLICENT COOPER, Author of "Our Girls' Book of Plays."

Companion volume to the popular "Dialogues and Duologues," by M. H. Debenham.

A List of Volumes of Plays and Recitations will be forwarded on application.

7½ by 5½, cloth, 2s. 6d.

Afloat on the Dogger Bank.

By HENRY CHARLES MOORE, Author of "Britons at Bay," &c. Illustrated by W. PRATER.

The adventures of two English Boys and a Chinese Lad, first on a trawler in the North Sea, and afterwards in China at the time of the Boxer rising.

7½ by 5, cloth, 3s.

Two Tapleby Boys.

By Mrs. NEVILLE CUBITT. Illustrated in Colour from Drawings by PAUL HARDY.

A capital tale of Public School life, and of the influence boys have over each other.

7½ by 5½, cloth, 2s.

Friarswood Post Office.

By CHARLOTTE M. YONGE. Illustrated in Colour by A. G. WALKER, Sculptor.

A new issue of one of Miss Yonge's best-known tales.

NOW READY, Four of the Best and Most Popular Annuals for Children of the Empire.

SUNDAY.

416 LARGE PAGES.

6 COLOURED PLATES.

250 Original Illustrations.

SUNDAY.

SUNDAY.

"SUNDAY," Bound Volume, Coloured Boards, 3s.; Cloth Bevelled, Gilt Edges, 5s. Weekly, 1d. Monthly, 3d.

"A difficult problem solved as well as it can be anywhere."—Spectator.

"We can imagine nothing better."—Times.

LEADING STRINGS.

THE BABY'S ANNUAL.

LARGE TYPE.

EASY WORDS.

Cloth Boards, 2s. 6d.; Illustrated Paper Boards, 1s. 6d.

"Full of stories such as the youngest can understand. It makes one of the prettiest of gift-books. Nothing could be better."—Daily Telegraph.

416 LARGE PAGES.

12 COLOURED PLATES.

CHATTERBOX.

OVER 250 NEW ILLUSTRATIONS.

"A CHILD'S LIBRARY IN ITSELF."

Coloured Boards, 3s.; Cloth Bevelled, Gilt Edges, 5s. Weekly, 1d.; Monthly, 3d.

The TIMES said:—"Chatterbox" is one of the best children's books we have seen.

The SCHOOL GUARDIAN said:—"The most popular volume for children ever published. Both pictures and letterpress are very good."

FOR BOYS. THE PRIZE. FOR GIRLS.

13 Coloured Plates and over 70 other Pictures. Bound to suit all tastes. 1s. 2d. Paper; 1s. 6d. Pictorial Boards; 2s. Cloth; 2s. 6d. Cloth Gilt.

"As a present for young children it would be difficult to find a better book."—Westminster Gazette.

sacrifices definition to suggestiveness cannot safeguard religion in this matter; for the content becomes shadowy and elusive, and the main stress falls on a subjective and indeterminate feeling-state. And though you made 'working-value' the only test of validity, I do not think that symbolism would satisfactorily stand even this test. For faith will not work, either in the individual or in the social whole, save on the assumption that its object is real and can be trusted. We cannot trust the object, if we believe that every idea or form of it must be more or less erroneous. No doubt man, whose life is cast am farbigen Abglanz, can never know as he is known. But the Supreme Being, to whom the soul relates itself in faith, must be the object of a spiritual knowledge which gives the worshipper the assurance that He is the source and realisation of the highest values and ideals. If this conviction is undermined and ruined, the religious life ebbs and dies. And, to my mind, it seems unlikely that Symbolism could maintain such a conviction in the average man."

It is the rationalism—in the good sense of the word—of Mr. Galloway's standpoint which, for obvious reasons, we have accentuated. It is here that it comes into contact with the main current of European thinking: both in this country and in Germany, reason, like a sovereign recalled from exile, is coming back to its own. But the psychological side of the book is of equal significance. A speculative theory, it assures us, cannot be applied straight away to the interpretation of the materials which the History and Science of Religion set before us. "The mediation of psychology is indispensable to a right understanding of facts which are primarily psychical, and of the movements of the human mind which give the facts the form of development." "Omne receptum secundum modum recipientis recipitur" is a sound maxim; the content of knowledge is colored by the medium through which it passes; we cannot get outside ourselves. With regard to the ultimate basis of experience, the conclusion arrived at is that this is a self-conscious Will. In metaphysics no theory escapes objections; but this "may fairly be termed the position of least difficulty. Any other derivation of the self-conscious spirit makes the problems of existence a more bewildering puzzle." No philosopher has solved the perhaps insoluble problem of philosophy, but the writer of this book stands in the honorable succession of those who have indicated the direction in which the solution lies.

LA MAURERIA.*

ONCE riding on the beach in Tangier, I met two Spaniards. One was my friend Er Zurco, an anarchist and refugee from Malaga; the other, comrade Quintanilla. Both of them had been unlucky in their native land, although they both avowed their characters were quite without a stain. Being curious to know what had forced Nicolas Moreno, known as Er Zurco, to leave his country, I ventured to inquire. He replied, expectorating, just at the angle of his eye-tooth, "Nothing, nothing at all, a pure misfortune, such as might well occur to any man." It turned out that the misfortune had happened thus.

A trifling dispute having arisen, Er Zurco, as a matter of precaution, had drawn his knife. "No, sir," he said, "not with a wish to harm, but in defence." His adversary, maliciously as it appeared, had run upon the point, and died, as it seemed to my informant, for he was tired of life.

This seemed quite satisfactory, and then I said, "Friends, you never seem to work. How do you live, and what is it that brought you to live amongst the Moors?" Comrade Quintanilla, who had been silent up to now, after expectorating and some almost necessary oaths, for he could not have said a word without them, took up his parable.

"We came," he said, "here to this cursed land of rags and lice . . . we came . . . to introduce progress and culture amongst the Infidel."

This seems the spirit of the Spain that Don Miguel de Unamuno has made known to us, at least so I am led to understand, by what he writes, by "Way of Introduction." If this is but the introduction, only the God who watches over his own Basques can possibly conjecture what is to follow in our next.

* "The Spirit of Spain." By Miguel de Unamuno. The Englishwoman.

The article begins by stating that there is "no single modern conception of European life," but that there is "a central current of contemporary European thought." So far so good. This much we trifling Europeans will cheerfully allow. But, as there is no single modern European conception of life, so, in the same way, is there no single English conception of English life, and, I maintain, this must hold good of France, of Germany, and even of the curious Basque Spain of which Professor Unamuno writes.

He begins by saying Spaniards are not Europeans, and thanks God for it. He then goes on to say he is a Basque, and the countryman of San Ignatius of Loyola, and therefore—you see the "therefore" in a flash—can enter into the depths of the Castilian soul. This is as much as if Mr. Lloyd George set forth, "I am a Welshman, and therefore able to speak with confidence on how a man from Lincolnshire looks out upon the world." For all I know, Andalusians and Valencians may be allied as much by blood to the Arabs or the Berbers as to the bulk of Central Europeans; but the Basques have not a drop of Oriental blood—that is, as far as we know from our imperfect European studies of their race. I write the word European almost in dread, so mighty is the scorn that the Professor has poured down upon our heads—or, rather, on our mediocre souls. Facts, though, are stubborn chieftains, and the fact remains that the Arab tide of conquest stopped at the mountains of Cantabria, just as the Saxon tide of conquest stopped at those of Wales.

Within the Provinces—that is to say, in Alava, Vizcaya, and Guipuzcoa—no Arab penetrated, and therefore Professor Unamuno has as little right to speak for men of a race so different from his own, as I should have to speak on the behalf of Irishmen. No one is further off a Spaniard (at least to foreign eyes) than is a Basque. What seas unfathomable, and mountain ranges, higher than the Cordillera of the Andes, divide the mental outlook of Mr. Walter Long and Mr. Lloyd George! In the first place, one has lispish Welsh as a child, the other English. When Don Miguel de Unamuno says, "My native tongue is Basque," by the very pride of his confession he deprives himself of any right to speak about the spirit of men whose native tongue is different from his own. Who would give a farthing, except as a mere curiosity of literature, for an essay on the true inwardness of the dwellers on the Yorkshire wolds by Swift McNeill?

In the Professor's case, the difference between him and the Spaniards is even greater than that between the English and the Welsh. Wales has not had a separate code of laws for centuries as have the Basques, Wales has not been shut off from England by want of roads and of communications, as have the Provinces. All that he says, is to be taken as from a Basque Basconising (I coin the word); then it is interesting to a high degree. No doubt the Basques (for the Professor is a patriot) are quite incapable of art, of irony, of science, and of style in literature. He says so, and being one of them should know.

Still, speaking as a foreigner, I should have thought Velasquez, Goya, and El Greco were artists, at least to some extent. Jorge Manrique, the author of the Celestina (for this consult Fitzmaurice Kelly), and Cervantes, seem to have written pretty well. The little picture by Bernal Diaz del Castillo of the effect upon the nerves of all the host by sudden stopping of the noise of shouting and the infernal beating of the "great, sad drum," when the great Teocalli at Tenochtitlan was won, is a pure gem of style. Far be it from a foreigner to stand between the Spaniards and the Basques; it would be a task as thankless as the proverbial peacemakers' who interfere between a husband and a wife.

Therefore, we may assume that Spaniards (or is it Basques?) are quite incapable of art, of science, of irony, of sustained effort, and of participation in aesthetics, at least so Don Miguel de Unamuno tells us. There is a comedy of the Quintero Brothers, called "Las Flores." In it a rich but brutal Andalusian farmer, after he has done anything more especially brutal or idiotic than his wont, says with complacency, "Que bruto soy," and all his laborers reply with unction, "Yes, sir, you are."

All we can do, as foreigners, is to re-echo what they say, and hope that in his country Spaniards will thank the writer of the articles for the strange view of them that he has given to the world.

SMITH, ELDER & Co.'s PUBLICATIONS

AUTUMN 6s. NOVELS.

By the Author of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden."

The Caravaners

Daily Chronicle.—"It is very amusing—could our author write anything that was really dull? One laughs and laughs again at the colossal conceit of the Baron."

Her Mother's Daughter

By KATHARINE TYNAN.

Second Impression.

The Paladin: As Beheld by a Woman of Temperament.

By HORACE ANNESLEY VACHELL.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

The Coming Englishman

By PROF. JAMES LONG, Author of "British Dairy Farming," "The Small Farm and its Management," &c.

Live Stock Journal.—"The book should appeal not only to the agricultural community, and those who are interested in the various new movements intended for the benefit of the people, but to a large class that belongs to neither."

With 16 Illustrations and a Map. Small demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The Story of the Thames

By the late J. E. VINCENT.

Country Life.—"An excellent piece of work. . . . It teems with knowledge, and is very agreeably written. The book may be thoroughly recommended alike to lovers of the Thames and to the general reader."

In 2 vols. Demy 8vo, 25s. net.

Fifty Years of New Japan

Compiled by Count SHIGENOBU OKUMA, late Prime Minister of Japan, and Minister for Foreign Affairs, and others. Edited by MARCUS B. HUIH.

Daily News.—"This monumental account of national change and development is likely to have a permanent interest for the serious reader. It will be a necessary work on the shelves of every library—probably, it will be the standard work on modern Japan—for many a long day."

Demy 8vo, 14s. net.

George I. and the Northern War

A Study of British Hanoverian Policy in the North of Europe in the years 1709 to 1721

By JAMES FREDERICK CHANCE, M.A., F.R.Hist.S., Author of "The Lighthouse Work of Sir James Chance, Bart."

With a Portrait, small demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Pascal

By VISCOUNT ST. CYRES, Author of "Francois de Fénelon," &c.

Essex.—"A masterly and original study of Pascal and of the philosophic life and thought of his generation."

Large post 8vo, 6s. net.

San Celestino: An essay in Reconstruction

By JOHN AYSCOUGH, Author of "Marotz," "Admonition," "Dromina," &c.

Scotsman.—"What must appeal to most readers is the rich vein of human interest that runs through the narrative, the vividness with which Mr. Ayscough peoples his pages with men and women of the thirteenth century."

Large post 8vo, 6s. net.

The Book of Flowers

By KATHARINE TYNAN and FRANCES MAITLAND.

Essex.—"An attractive gift-book for all who love flowers and flower-lore. The flower names—old and new—are grouped under the four seasons."

COMPLETION OF THE RE-ISSUE OF The Dictionary of National Biography

Edited by LESLIE STEPHEN and SIDNEY LEE.

Truth.—"To praise 'The Dictionary of National Biography' now seems superfluous. Its production was an enterprise of national importance, and its publishers are rendering what is really a public service by making it accessible in a cheaper and handier form."

Spectator.—"It is impossible to make a due acknowledgment of the service which has been done by this re-issue. The whole cost is £16 10s., and the space occupied, a consideration not less serious than the cost, is not more than even a small library should be able to supply."

At ONE-THIRD the price and ONE-THIRD the size of the Original Work.

The Dictionary furnishes the most exhaustive and most varied picture accessible of national life during more than ten centuries. It contains 30,378 separate articles, in 30,500 pages, all, whether short or long, prepared by Specialists of literary experience in very varied branches of knowledge. Many of the memoirs of kings and queens, of great statesmen, generals and admirals, embody information derived from State Papers and other authorities which have only become accessible in very recent years. A list of the sources whence information is derived is appended to every memoir.

The province of the work embraces all lives likely to interest students of history, naval and military affairs, the progress of the Colonies, the administration of India, philosophy, all branches of science, medicine, surgery, theology, literature, political economy, law, music, art, and the drama. And an attempt has been made to do justice to the pioneers of American, African, and Australian exploration, and to the large band of inventors whose half-forgotten efforts have slowly led to the modern applications of steam and electricity, and to recent improvements in industrial processes.

In 22 Volumes instead of 66.

Every Word Reprinted.

Cloth, Gilt Top, 15/- net each; or in Half-Morocco, Marbled Edges, 21/- net each.

Volume XXII. (Supplement—ABBOTT—WOODWARD) completing the Edition, will be issued on December 10.

PROSPECTUS POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

One or two points seem to be worth the dwelling on, especially the affirmation that in Spain no one can live by writing, and the ejaculation, "Thank God for that."

Cervantes, Lope, Calderon, Tirso, Moreto, Ramon de la Cruz, with Moratin and Espronceda, as far as I know, had no other means of livelihood. To come to modern times, Perez Galdos, Blasco Ibanez, Gomez Carillo, Bonufoux, Maeztu, Martinez Sierra, Pedro Gonzalez, Blanco, Dicentu, Valle Inclan, Reuben Dario, Benunente, and Linares Rivas, with a host more that I could name, all live by driving of the quill, or by the clatter of the type machine.

It may be that in the country of Loyola men cannot live by writing, but in Spain, even I, a foreigner, without a reference to a dictionary, have easily been able to write down ten or a dozen names. All that Miguel de Unamuno has set down about his countrymen is in the main a matter for themselves and him. If they approve what he has written, that is their affair. On one point, though, he has placed himself in foreign hands. His reference to Ferrer, when the man's life hung in the balance, was a cruel act. The Professor must have known that by so doing he was strengthening the hands of Maura, of the Priests, and of reaction generally. Nothing worse has ever yet been penned under such circumstances by any man of letters than were his references to a man whose case was then "sub judice," his epithets of "Matoide" and "bungler," and his attempt to shift the ignominy from the backs of those whom now the world has scorned.

R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM.

A FRENCH VIEW OF SHAKESPEARE.*

THE career of M. Jusserand has been a remarkable career. He has been associated with the French Embassy in London, was Minister at Copenhagen, and is now Ambassador at Washington; but his name will go down to posterity, not as an able and successful diplomatist, but as the gifted French author and scholar who, writing in a language not his own, has won for himself a foremost place in English literature, and undertaken single-handed to bestow upon us something like a complete literary history of the English people—written in lucid and captivating style such as very few Englishmen attain, and furnished with such stores of erudition as can rarely be piled up by vigilant and much occupied Civil servants, their leisure small and their time not their own.

This volume is actually the third volume of a work which, presumably, will be complete in itself, and will constitute a literary history of the English people from the Renaissance to the Civil War. But the Shakespeare volume, as it is sure to be called, is likely to be regarded as a work apart, and will appeal to a very much larger public than all or any of its predecessors in the series. It is furnished with a very curious frontispiece, giving us a view of the Southern Entrance to London in Shakespeare's time, and printed in 1616—i.e., the very year that he died. The letterpress occupies upwards of 500 closely-printed pages, and deals with (1) Shakespeare's predecessors; (2) his dramatic work; (3) his contemporaries; and (4) what M. Jusserand calls the aftermath, or the work of those prominent and gifted persons who may be said to have been under the direct influence of Shakespeare's genius. What we may expect to get when M. Jusserand issues his next volume it is idle to conjecture, but this third volume is complete in itself, and it may certainly be pronounced to be the most important monograph on our great poet and dramatist which has ever passed through the press, and the more one reads it the more difficult is it to conceive that such a volume should ever be superseded. And yet this can never be a book for boys and girls to cram up. So far from that, it is likely to be a book which will help to raise the standard of popular lectures and competitive examinations by the fascination which it will exercise upon its readers.

It is curious how little we know of Shakespeare's childhood, boyhood, or early life at Stratford. In those days his father was prosperous, and there are rumors that the son was just a little troublesome. He went to the grammar school of the little town, but nobody has discovered the name of this pedagogue, who appears to have taught the lad something to go upon. Not a single name of any of his schoolfellows has survived. In 1585—i.e., when he was in his twenty-second year—he found himself the father of three children, and, with a wife and growing family, the outlook was not cheering. He seems to have disappeared without telling anyone where he was going. Seven years later he was in London, somehow hanging about the theatres, and probably engaged fitfully as a hanger-on of the stage. His literary activity, says M. Jusserand, "lasted about twenty-five years, commencing towards 1588, the year of the Armada, and ending towards 1613." During that period he composed, besides his poems, thirty-seven plays. As for his poems, two of them were what we should call dedicated to Lord Southampton, and the story goes that his Lordship gave him a thousand pounds. So says an old woman's gossip, which I, for one, do not believe. The sum named, translated into what it represented in those days, would be equal to ten thousand pounds. The question of the person to whom the 154 sonnets were addressed must for ever be left unanswered, though Mr. Sidney Lee, in his valuable "Life of Shakespeare," devotes about one-third of his volume to the discussion of the question who was the inspirer of those sonnets. His conclusion must be pronounced lame and impotent; M. Jusserand has blown it into the air. On the other hand, the character of the man Shakespeare is studied with results which are not altogether attractive. It seems that his boyhood was other than exemplary. His marriage was not quite creditable. His first child was born six months after the wedding. There is not a trace of his having any strong love for the wife, who was his senior by six years. He left her with her three children behind him at Stratford when he went off to make his way in London. There, M. Jusserand tells us, his life was not an exemplary one, and the only bequest which he made to his wife in his will reads like a cruel insult. It looks, too, as if he was a very keen man of business, never hesitating to sue a neighbor for a trifling debt which had been owed too long. While, as a rule, almost every man of letters collected some beginnings of a library, Shakespeare appears to have made it his practice to borrow books from others. He is not known to have been the owner of a single volume. He appears to have cared nothing for mere fame. "Actors' profits were large—far more so than authors'—"; and this is why Shakespeare, who never attained to more than an honorable place in the histrionic profession, continued, nevertheless, to act until about the time he retired from active life. Besides his interests in the Blackfriars Theatre, he seems to have owned two whole shares at the Globe, which brought in some £400, worth about eight times as much, or £3,200, of our money. Nor is that all. When Queen Elizabeth died the whole chorus of authors unanimously bewailed her death. Again he kept apart and said nothing. There was nothing to gain, and he was silent.

The strangest feature in this man's character, as M. Jusserand has pointed out to us, was the almost contemptuous indifference which he felt for anything in the shape of posthumous fame. "Out of thirty-seven plays which he had written, twenty-one remained in manuscript at his death, mixed with the theatre properties, in the actors' chests, and in great danger of disappearing! Never did indifference go farther. The genius who could create Othello and Macbeth never troubled himself to preserve them for a posterity about which he felt no concern. When this winged genius touched the earth, he trod it with soles of lead."

There is one thing wanting in this book. It is very weak on the chronological side. It greatly needs something like an adequate chronological apparatus. It is absolutely deficient in such help as the reader wants almost at every page. We are continually asking ourselves the date of this or that, and having to hunt for it—often in vain. Let me hope that in future editions this want may be adequately supplied.

* "A Literary History of the English People from the Renaissance to the Civil War." By J. J. Jusserand. Vol. III. Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.

THE PLACE of ANIMALS IN HUMAN THOUGHT.

By COUNTESS EVELYN MARTINENGO CESARESCO.

With a Photogravure Frontispiece and 32 other Illustrations,
12s. 6d. net; post free 12s. 11d.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

Spectator.

"It is a book full of miscellaneous information and entertainment. The sort of book which makes the reader idly long for Macaulay's memory in which to store all the delightful things which the author has told and shown him. Stories, quotations, comments, and pictures are all alike good."

Contemporary Review.

"The Countess Martinengo Cesaresco is to be congratulated on the publication of this delightful volume, illustrated in a fashion that does no discredit to the lucid and touching prose."

Westminster Gazette.

"A wonderful collection of facts."

Daily Graphic.

"The Countess Martinengo Cesaresco has collected a vast mass of testimony from all countries and from all periods of history."

Daily Telegraph.

"Taste, discrimination, and keen sympathy."

Daily Chronicle.

"Countess Martinengo Cesaresco brings rarely combined qualifications to the preparation of her interesting chapters."—E. C.

Athenæum.

"Both learned and entertaining."

Pall Mall Gazette.

"An exceedingly readable book, and one which, from the sweet reasonableness of its tone, and the extraordinary erudition displayed by the author, will do far more to further the humane treatment of animals than all the extravagant denunciation."

New Age.

"Some delightful illustrations; the Egyptian cat is a perfect joy."

Review of Reviews.

"Treats the question of the relation of animal creation to human beings from a scientific standpoint and in a sympathetic and forcible manner."

Inquirer.

"Makes its appeal not only to those who are lovers of animals in the ordinary sense of the word, but to those who have cultivated the habit of studying the laws of cause and effect for the purpose of solving some of the great mysteries which have perplexed mankind from the beginning of time."

Popolo Romano (Rome).

"Great erudition accompanied by delicate and profound observations."—Prof. A. DE GUBERNATIS.

Indian Spectator (Bombay).

"We strongly recommend our readers to read this admirable book; it is not only well worth perusal, but a study of it will take us nearer to God."

Parol (Bombay).

"Will be found highly interesting and instructive by Indians of all creeds."—J. J. MODI.

INDIA UNDER RIPON.

A Private Diary.

BY

WILFRID SCAWEN BLUNT.

Author of "The Secret History of the English Occupation of Egypt." Demy 8vo, 10/- net; post free, 10/5.

A New Volume of Mr. Wilfrid Blunt's political memoirs.

It consists of a private diary kept by Mr. Blunt in India in 1883-84. Like his "Secret History of the English Occupation in Egypt," it is very outspoken, and reveals much of the inner machinery of Government in India, as well as the intimate thoughts of the leaders of native opinion twenty-five years ago. He was equally in the confidence of Mohammedans and Hindus—and was present, the only Englishman, at the earliest meetings of what afterwards became the National Congress. He was behind the scenes, too, at Hyderabad at an interesting moment when Lord Ripon put a stop to a discreditable intrigue and installed the reigning Nizam. Some of Mr. Blunt's chapters are of immediate importance as foreshadowing the course events in India have since taken and suggesting reforms now officially adopted.

On Sale at all Booksellers.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

A. & C. BLACK'S NEW BOOKS.

LONDON IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

By SIR WALTER BESANT. Containing 123 illustrations and a reproduction of Cruchley's Map of London in 1835. Cloth. Price 30s. net.

NATURAL AND SOCIAL MORALS.

By PROF. CARVETH READ, M.A. Author of "The Metaphysics of Nature." Cloth. Price 7s. 6d. net.

THE IDEA OF THE SOUL.

By A. E. CRAWLEY, M.A. Cloth. Price 6s. net.

THE MEANING AND VALUE OF LIFE.

By PROF. RUDOLF EUCKEN. Translated by Boyce Gibson and Lucy Gibson. Cloth. 3s. 6d. net.

PRIMER OF STATISTICS.

By W. PALIN ELDERTON and ETHEL M. ELDERTON. With a Preface by Sir Francis Galton F.R.S. Cloth, with diagrams. Price 1s. 6d. net.

MONTAIGNE AND SHAKESPEARE, and other Essays on Cognate Subjects.

By JOHN M. ROBERTSON, M.P. Author of "Trade & Tariffs." Cloth. Price 7s. 6d. net.

THE HOLY LAND.

By JOHN KELMAN, M.A., D.D. Large crown 8vo. Cloth, gilt top. Price 3s. 6d. net.

PASSAGES OF THE BIBLE CHOSEN FOR THEIR LITERARY BEAUTY AND INTEREST.

By J. G. FRAZER. A New and Enlarged Edition. Cloth. Price 3s. 6d. net.

DUDLEY HARDY, R.I., R.M.S. Brush, Pen, and Pencil Series.

Edited by A. E. JOHNSON. Containing examples of the Artist's work in Brush, Pen, and Pencil, 8 being full-page in colour. Price 3s. 6d. net.

A. & C. BLACK, Soho Square, London.

A LEGATION LADY.*

THESE familiar, chatty, and very charming letters compose what we may call a domestic picture of Legation life. They lead us behind the scenes of diplomacy to the parlor or drawing-room where the ultimatum that may mean bonfires in Europe may also mean to the diplomatist's lady a tiresome and costly change of lodgings. The Legations can be considered as so many little families, almost to be called nomadic, hovering in the civilised centres of the world. One day the hand of war smites them; the pianos and crockery and uniforms of the Legations are packed, and out go the families, not exactly into the wilderness, but to the key-point behind which diplomacy next entrenches itself.

Mme. Charles de Bunsen (née Waddington) lived long amid the politics that diplomacy controls, saw great events and celebrated persons, and more than once presided over the folding of the tents. Her husband, Carl von Bunsen, was secretary and afterwards councillor to the Prussian Legations of Turin, Florence, and The Hague; and at each of these stations she had the experience of a war, and was present at a royal marriage. In Turin—the war between the combined armies of France and Italy against the ancient tyranny of Austria in 1859, and the marriage of the Princess Marie Pia of Savoy with King Louis of Portugal. In Florence—the war of 1866 which delivered Venice from the Austrian oppression, and the marriage of the Prince of Piedmont (who ascended the throne as King Umberto of Italy) with his beautiful cousin, the Princess Margherita of Savoy. And, lastly, at The Hague, there were the emotions of the Franco-German war of 1870, and the nuptials of the Prince of Wied and Princess Marie of the Netherlands.

Mme. de Bunsen's letters to her family, written on the spot, were in the manner of a journal, and have the ease and vividness that give to this kind of writing its special interest and vitality. She entered diplomatic life almost as a bride; it was all new to her; and she narrates the great and the little goings-on from day to day with equal zest and equal attention to detail. Already in Turin in 1858, blasts of war were beginning to blow across the frontier; but apartments had to be chosen, and a cook (occasionally disguised as a "char") engaged, and costumes thought out for parties, and all the etiquette to be learned of simple visits and solemn ceremonies. Dress, in the pleasantest gossiping way, occupies a good deal of Mme. de Bunsen's space, and we would not have missed the note on Mme. d'Alte (of the Portuguese Legation) "receiving her company in a white bonnet and a linsey-woolsey gown with a velvet cloak." She must have looked like a condensed Palais-Royal farce by Labiche. Literally, of course, dress did fill a good deal of space in those days, for the crinoline was at its amplest and most appalling. The bachelor chief of the Prussian Legation, Count Brassier de St. Simon, "gif a barty" on one occasion, the cards of invitation to which were a pictorial satire in little on the crinoline. "Brassier," says Mme. de Bunsen:—

"has designed a card which has met with a good deal of disapproval, as it is said to be a criticism or caricature of crinolines, and there is some ground for the opinion. It is all surrounded by small figures in enormous crinolines; one lady is quite slim in her stays and petticoats waiting for hers, others are overflowing carriages, &c., and in another two harlequins are actually sawing off some of the superabundant ampleurs. The Chief vows he meant no disrespect to crinolines or to the ladies who patronise them—what he did intend is not easy to understand."

There are many delightful little sketches of the people who belong to the Legations or who turn up at them in one capacity or another. The German professor whose

"way of speaking French is remarkable; he always puts the verbs in the infinitive and despises articles altogether. As Count Sclopis remarked, when once you knew the system it was easier to follow him, but at first it was disconcerting";

and a certain Princess G., who, discovering that her servants were cheating her, determined to buy all her provisions herself, and "intends buying old lace out of her economies." Of more serious interest is the little picture of Poerio, recently set free from a Neapolitan dungeon. Among some strange Italians in her drawing-room one evening, Mme. de Bunsen observed

"a mild, placid-looking man . . . talking with a quite startling familiarity of prisons and galleys, and at last I heard him state distinctly that he himself had lived for some time chained to a galley-slave. . . . Then there was an explanation, and I heard that the quiet-looking man was the Baron Poerio, one of the political victims of the King of Naples, who had been in the galleys with Settembrini and others for years."

"In Three Legations." By Madame Charles de Bunsen. Illustrated. Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.

From the pen of Queen Victoria we get a really splendid vignette of Victor Emanuel, whom she had just invested with the Order of the Garter. "A most peculiar and adventurous personality when you first see him," observes her Majesty.

"He is so frank, open, just, straightforward, liberal and tolerant, with much sound good sense. He never breaks his word, and you may rely on him; but wild and extravagant, courting adventures and dangers, with a very strange, short, rough manner . . . more like a Knight or King of the Middle Ages than anything one knows nowadays."

Had the pen of Queen Victoria often flowed in that style, with what a gallery of portraits she would have endowed posterity! "Il Rè Galantuomo" seems fairly to have dazzled our simple and modest English sovereign.

We should have liked from Mme. de Bunsen a little more about Cavour, and the great free lance of the Italian wars of liberation, Garibaldi. She shows us, however, what the hospitals were like when crowded with wounded soldiers—French, Italian, and Austrian—and how all the fine ladies of Turin made bandages and heaped comforts upon friends and foes alike.

Later chapters introduce us to Bismarck, and give us even at this day some feeling of the awe with which that man of iron inspired everyone. In the anxious hours before the war with Austria (1866), such was the nervous excitement of Bismarck that he was reduced to utter sleeplessness. We see him working feverishly till two or three in the morning, when he sinks exhausted on a sofa, and his wife, "a magnificent musician," plays one gentle air after another to soothe his nerves.

Our space is exhausted before we have half run through our sheaf of notes. A graceful, sweet-savoured book.

A TALKATIVE NOVEL.*

JUST after the reader, plodding away steadily, has passed the middle milestone in this novel of eight hundred pages, a character asks the hero, Challis, severely, "How many words are there in a book?" And Challis answers, "Of course there's not always exactly the same number. But a hundred thousand more or less." Would that Challis were right! But Mr. De Morgan, that astounding veteran, has again flung at his readers' heads a trifle of three hundred thousand words, and despite the specious promise of his title, we fear that he is ready to do it again, with a chuckle at the lack of staying power of the younger generation. The matter is serious for us now; and will be for the author later. Posterity, as the Irishman said, "is sure to behave with its usual levity," and posterity will not read Mr. William De Morgan; it will be grappling with some astounding veteran of its own. Let it be plainly understood that so lengthy a novel is a confession of failure, excusable only in days when "verbosity was a virtue," and our great-great grandmothers, shut up in Georgian country-houses, solaced themselves with the seven volumes of Mr. Samuel Richardson's "Clarissa, or the History of a Young Lady," and sighed for an eighth. The charm of a great style may carry us through an epic, but, on a rough computation, "It Never Can Happen Again" contains more than double the number of words of the twenty-four books of "The Odyssey"! And Mr. De Morgan's style is, well—garrulous.

Let us examine the first ten chapters, which run to about sixty thousand words. After twenty-six pages which introduce us to the child, Lizarann, her aunt, Mrs. Steptoe, her father, Jim, the blind ex-sailor, to the sharp Miss Bridgetticks, to "Teacher," Miss Fossett, and to other habitués of Tallack Street, we are transported to Royd Hall, the seat of Sir Murgatroyd Arkroyd, where we meet the family, Lady Arkroyd, and her handsome daughter, Judith, and Sibyl and Will, who are entertaining a house-party, Mr. Alfred Challis, the famous novelist, and Mr. Brownrigg, the disciple of the great German philosopher, Graubosch,

* "It Never Can Happen Again." By William De Morgan. Heinemann. 2 vols. 10s.

The February Boys.

CHAMBERS'S XMAS BOOKS

"The name of Mrs. L. T. Meade is one over which every girl reader rejoices, and the books which Messrs. Chambers publish this season will not fail to make that talented writer more than ever a favourite."—Glasgow News.

"Miss Baldwin's stories are the delight of young girl readers."—Freeman's Journal.

"Raymond Jacobsen writes that happy mixture of incident and good sense which teaches children so much while keeping their interest engaged."—Spectator.

THE FEBRUARY BOYS.

"This charmingly told story is told as only Mrs. Molesworth can tell a simple and familiar story. . . . If materfamilias wants a book to read aloud, she cannot do better. . . . We can assure her that the judgment of the audience will leave no doubt as to Mrs. Molesworth's skill."—Spectator.

AYLWYN'S FRIENDS.

"A delightful story of girl-life, refreshing in its naturalness, and with an atmosphere as perfectly wholesome as it is charming."—Glasgow News.

MURIEL AND HER AUNT LU.

A Story of School and Art Life in Paris.

"One of her best productions, and, though combining instruction with entertainment, always fascinating and attractive."—Queen.

HIS FIRST TERM.

By J. Finnemore. 5/-

A Story of Slapton School.

"This is a rattling good book for boys; there is not a dull page in it, and the boys act and speak like schoolboys."—School Guardian.

BRAVO, BOB!

By Andrew Home. 3/6

A School Story.

"Bob is a fine fellow alike in trial and triumph. . . . Written throughout in Mr. Home's manly, crisp style."—Dundee Advertiser.

JACK IN THE ROCKIES.

2/6

By G. Bird Grinnell.

"Boys will be fascinated by the description of the wild life in the Yellowstone region. . . . Every boy who wants to scrape acquaintance with camp-life and the hunting-trail, cannot do better than read 'Jack in the Rockies.'"—Spectator.

THE LITTLE TORMENT.

2/6

By Margaret Kilroy.

"After becoming initiated into all her little ways, we can only hope that another year the fair author will let us see a little more fully into her life-story."—Western Mail.

For a complete list of Messrs. Chambers's Xmas Books write for their Coloured and Descriptive List to 33, Soho Square, London; or 339, High Street, Edinburgh.

By Mrs. Molesworth.

3/6

By L. T. Meade.

6/-

By May Baldwin.

5/-

BECKY COMPTON, EX-DUX.

5/-

By Raymond Jacobsen.

"A comic element is supplied by the German pupil, Elise Schiffner, who explains her position, her wants and her opinions about English music with admirable frankness."—Spectator.

THE PRINCESS OF THE REVELS.

3/6

By L. T. Meade.

"Presents some delightful pictures of life under adversity, and the character delineation, the charming style, and a moving narrative make an interesting story for girls."—Freeman's Journal.

THE RED CAPS OF LYONS.

3/6

By Herbert Hayens.

"An entrancing tale of the French Revolution, with a hero who performs wonders and has our sympathies throughout."—Manchester Courier.

A TRIP TO MARS.

By Fenton Ash.

3/6

"All boy and girl readers will receive from this book, ideas which must widen the world of their experience."—World.

THE ENGLISH REVIEW

MONTHLY.

2s. 6d.

CONTENTS OF DECEMBER NUMBER:—

MODERN POETRY	Ernest Rhys John Freeman Frederic Manning
A PAGAN CREED	Professor Gilbert Murray
THE STARVELING POET	Edwin Pugh
LETTERS FROM AMERICA	G. Lowes Dickinson
LUCY EVANS	Gilbert Cannan
THE WIFE OF ALTAMONT	Violet Hunt
THE MONTH: EDITORIAL	The Passing of the Great Figure
AFTER THE DESTRUCTION OF THE VETO	J. A. Hobson
THE CONTROL OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS	H. N. Brailsford
LES INTÉRÊTS DE LA RUSSIE ET LES DROITS DE LA FINLAND	L. MECHLIN
THE RIGHTS OF FINLAND AT STAKE	Professor J. N. Reuter
THE PLACE OF SATIRE IN EDUCATION	Professor Foster Watson

SPECIAL SUPPLEMENT:

"HISTOIRE DE LA PRINCESSE ZULKAIS ET DU PRINCE KALILAH," a hitherto Unpublished Manuscript by WILLIAM BECKFORD, the Author of "VATHEK."

The first year of the "ENGLISH REVIEW" (December, 1908, to November, 1909) handsomely bound in three volumes, can now be obtained from the publishers, price 2s. per set. Single volumes, price 9s. each. The first volume includes, among many contributions, H. G. WELLS' Novel, "TONO-BUNGAY," while "THE HOLY MOUNTAIN," by STEPHEN REYNOLDS, appears as a serial in Volume 2, and "A CALL," by FORD MADDOX HUEFFER, in Volume 3.

CHAPMAN & HALL, Ltd., 11, Henrietta Street, W.C.

SELECT BOOKS FOR XMAS GIFTS.

THE CAT IN HISTORY, LEGEND, AND ART

Written and Illustrated by ANNE MARKS. Crown 4to, cloth gilt, 6s. net.

The cult of the cat must prove of interest even to those who are not professed lovers of the animal.

WHITE HEATHER

By ELLA MARY GORDON. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net.

A dainty and elegant volume of verse, which every poetry lover will enjoy.

THE HUMAN GIRL

By GRAHAM MOORE. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net.

"A most readable tale. The dialogue is crisp, situations are conceived with considerable skill. A story which should be popular amongst girls."—Dundee Advertiser.

THE FIRST DROP AND THE LAST

By PHOEBE ALLEN. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. net.

An excellent story, founded on incidents in real country life. The book for parish libraries.

Write for Catalogue No. N102 of Antiquarian and General Literature.

LONDON; ELLIOT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

THOUGHTS FROM MANY CLIMES

Quotations in English, French, and Italian, with the English translations of the Italian, with two Dialogues by E. CARSON. Demy 16mo, Japanese vellum gilt, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net. Velvet leather, gilt edges, silk register, 5s. net.

A book of meditative thoughts culled from French, Italian, and English authors, arranged for daily readings.

LITERARY BYE-PATHS, & VACARIES

By THOMAS NEWBIGGING. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

A series of interesting essays on out-of-the-way subjects, with the true literary note that will appeal to all book-lovers.

PHILIP MENZE:

A Story of Commercial Life. By H. C. KNIGHT.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

This story, of especial interest to "Gentlemen of the Road," will prove very attractive to all business men and women.

FOR THREE KINGDOMS

By H. C. CROSFIELD. Frontispiece by Mr. Noyes Lewis, Crown 8vo, 6s.

Recollections of Robert Warden, a servant of King James. Full of stirring incidents, a story that grips the reader from beginning to end.

and Mr. Ramsay Tomes, the political economist, and Mr. Wraxall, the Apostle of Universal Security. The three last-mentioned gentlemen are bores of a pronounced order, and the author does not scruple to inflict on us pages and pages of tiresome chatter, tedious disquisition, wire-drawn analysis, and roundabout commentary on the demeanor, motives, and trivial actions of everybody concerned in the story. The page we quote is a fair sample of the prolixity of Mr. De Morgan's literary method:—

"What's the something, Sibyl?"

"You'll be angry if I tell you."

"I may." Judith keeps her candle in her hand. Is it worth putting it down, if disension in the wind is pointing to a short interview? "But how can I tell you till I know? Why do you want me?"

"Well—I'll tell you. But you mustn't fly into a rage. That man, Mr. Scoop—or Harris, or whatever his name is—married his Deceased Wife's Sister!"

"Is that any concern of mine?"

"You wouldn't speak in that way if it weren't."

"In what way?"

"The way you spoke." What may seem inexplicable here is due to the inability of mere words to do justice to the intensity of Judith's unconcern. There was no need for an indifference such as a humming-top asleep shows to the history of its own time.

"I don't mind waiting till you are reasonable, Sib dear."

This little bit of Prussian tactics improved Judith's position. She put her candlestick on a piece of real Chippendale, to express anchorage, but remained standing. She had been looking very handsome in the white chiffon all the evening, and thought so. Her subconscious judgment confirmed this, as a mirror on a wardrobe-door swung her reflection before her for a moment. Sibyl had opened it, subconsciously, to look up again, when the counter swing brought the image back. All which occurred, and then Sibyl sat against the bed-end, having disposed of the wardrobe, and said:—

"You know you have been in Mr. Harris's company all day, Judith. And I suppose it's going to be the usual thing. But there's no sense in your calling me unreasonable simply because I wish you to know what his position is."

"What is the position?"

"Just what I've told you. Mr. Harris . . . well—Challis, then . . . is not really a married man. He married—at least, made believe to marry—his Deceased Wife's Sister."

"Then now you've told me what the position is, I know. And I may go to bed."

"Don't be irritating, Judith." It is provoking, you know, when your enemy makes a successful rally after a seeming repulse. Judith's last tactical success was masterly. Her success soothed her to moderation.

"I don't want to be irritating, Sib. And I don't think you have any right to talk of being irritating, after what you said just now. 'The usual thing!' What usual thing?"

"You know what I mean, and it doesn't matter."

"I don't think it matters in the least. But what do you know about Mr. Challis? I mean, what do you know that I don't?"

"Only what I told you."

"But how do you know? Really, Sibyl, I shall go if there are to be any more mysteries."

"Well, don't be impatient, and I'll tell you," &c.

We have selected the foregoing passage because, while readable and bearing on the plot, it indicates how it is that eight hundred pages have been inflicted on us. Eighty close-packed pages elucidate the growing tendresse between Miss Judith Arkroyd and Mr. Challis, who is married to Marianne, his deceased wife's half-sister. Mrs. Challis, number two, is an inconspicuous lady, a pattern of the domestic virtues, and about a hundred pages of Volume I. are devoted to an account of her domestic infelicities at Wimbledon, while her intimate friend, Mrs. Eldridge, is fanning the spark of Marianne's jealousy of her lord and master's interest in the beautiful Miss Arkroyd, into a tormenting flame. If we get very tired of the sisterly duets between Judith and Sibyl Arkroyd, we are bored to a degree by the confidential exchanges between the mid-Victorian ladies at Wimbledon. It is not that the psychological analysis of the emotional tension between Challis and Miss Arkroyd, and Challis and his wife is not true to life, but that it is insufferably long-winded, and that Mr. De Morgan will insist on decanting and re-decanting his light wine till it becomes positively flat.

"But," the reader who has preserved happy memories of "Joseph Vance" and "Alice-For-Short," may here ask, "are there no compensations in 'It Never Can Happen Again'?" There are. If one half of the novel were to be pared away, the remaining half would make a remarkable book. It is the old story of the half being more than the whole. We are not, indeed, prepared to say that, if the book before us were not the author's fourth, but his first, essay in fiction, we should not rank it higher. It would have the appeal of a new air instead of, as now, the effect of a variation of an old theme. For it can scarcely be denied that the originality of Mr. De Morgan's method of psychologising and philosophising about his characters wears thinner and thinner with each fresh group he introduces. Of his four women, Judith and Sibyl, Marianne and Charlotte, Judith alone possesses individuality, and the author's dissection of her impulses is not of surpassing interest. The same thing applies to the treatment of the little girl, Lizarann, and her aunt, Mrs. Steptoe. If we have not met these characters before, they are types of people he has made familiar to us in his former works. And, naturally, the danger of an author's repeating himself, of becoming prolix and prosy, is immeasurably increased by each fresh essay in the exhaustive method.

There are, however, some admirable passages in the novel. Mr. De Morgan is never better than when, as a mental pathologist, he has taken an interesting "case" in hand, and in Chapters XII.-XV. the narrative of the Reverend Athelstan's midnight encounter, in Tallack Street, with Uncle Bob, who is suffering from delirium tremens, and the chase after the madman down Snape's Lane to the canal-basin, are recorded with a horrible magic. The hospital scenes between the clergyman, Lady Murgatroyd, and poor, blind Jim Coupland, who has been run over by a heavy wagon, are also masterly, and whenever indeed the author leads us to the psychological borderland where death or disease shocks our normal consciousness into an uncanny apprehension of the spiritual forces "behind the veil," we readily yield to his spell. Both the Reverend Athelstan and poor Jim are creations in unselfish fortitude and manly tenderness, and it is all the more pity that the reader should so soon lose track of them in this regular jungle of a novel. The pathologist again comes into play in the closing scenes where Mr. Challis, while eloping with Judith Arkroyd, meets with a motor accident, with the sequelæ of brain concussion. Here, as in many other passages, the feeling of a family atmosphere is extremely actual, and rich in emotional tension. Mr. De Morgan appends to his book a Note, addressed to "readers only," in which he protests against "the practice of ascribing views—political, religious, or otherwise—expressed by characters in a book to its author." We sympathise with him, but we may remark that this is only a testimony to his power. As regards his appeal for "a free hand," we feel somewhat uneasy. Is it possible that the present edition is an abridgment of a still longer work?

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

"TRAVELS IN THE UPPER EGYPTIAN DESERT" (Blackwood, 7s. 6d. net), by Mr. Arthur E. P. Weigall, the Chief Inspector of Upper Egypt, Department of Antiquities, will be a surprise to those folk who imagine that an archaeologist is a dull and pedantic person, who can never see the glory of a distant sea or range of hills for the ruins and inscriptions that limit his visual and mental horizon. Mr. Weigall is an archaeologist of repute—but he is also a great deal more. The book he has given us includes the results of archaeological research; but it is pre-eminently a book of the desert, and the atmosphere thereof. Its word painting makes one think of Fromentin in Algeria, or Mr. Robert Hichens at Biskra, rather than the cold, if interesting, descriptions of the average Egyptologist. Mr. Weigall is a desert enthusiast. He has felt its spell. He has rejoiced in its burning days and starry nights, he has breathed its fresh, clear air, and battled with its sandstorms. He loves it for itself, not less than for its human monuments. Furthermore, he has had the advantage of a comparatively new subject. The eastern desert, that between the Nile and the Red Sea, has been but little explored by modern Europeans; and since the district is traversed by the ancient highway from Quft to Kossair on the Red Sea coast, and by that route was conducted the Indian and Arabian trade with Egypt, and since there are other routes also, whereby the granite and porphyry from the hill quarries were brought to the Nile, and thence shipped to ancient Rome, the country teems with remains and memories.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

THE SKENE PAPERS.

MEMORIES OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.

By JAMES SKENE. Edited by BASIL THOMSON. With Portraits, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

James Skene, Laird of Rubislaw, was one of Sir Walter Scott's closest friends for nearly 40 years. His knowledge of foreign lands furnished Scott with the materials for "Quentin Durward" and "Anne of Geierstein," and he was Scott's confidant in his financial troubles.

Among the letters is one of the last which Scott wrote, and the reminiscences give a very intimate and amiable picture of the poet's character.

A LIFE OF LADY HESTER STANHOPE.

By Mrs. CHARLES ROUNDELL. With Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s. net.

Lady Hester Stanhope, the niece of William Pitt, was one of the most adventurous and extraordinary women of her own or of any time. In her thirties she went to the East, and began a life of pilgrimage and wandering. Mrs. Roundell, in writing the story of her romantic career, has had access to material not hitherto available to the public.

THE RISE OF LOUIS NAPOLEON.

By F. A. SIMPSON, M.A., formerly Exhibitioner of Queen's College, Oxford. With Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. net.

THE EVOLUTION OF ITALIAN SCULPTURE.

By LORD BALCARRES, M.P., F.S.A. Illustrated, royal 8vo, 21s. net.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE CHIEF CAMPAIGNS IN EUROPE SINCE 1792.

By General A. von HORSETZKY, G.O.C., the 1st Austro-Hungarian Army Corps and the Troops in Cracow. Translated by Lieutenant K. B. FERGUSON, Royal Garrison Artillery. Numerous Maps, 18s. net.

"We have nothing but praise for General von Horsetzky's book."—Army and Navy Gazette.

"Singularity lucid, and presents in the clearest manner the most complicated campaigns . . . to the student of military history the work will furnish a highly serviceable handbook."—Scotsman.

THE GREAT WALL OF CHINA.

By Dr. W. E. GEIL. With Illustrations, 21s. net.

"It is not within our memory that the Great Wall has been so thoroughly and completely explored before . . . there hardly seems a nook or a cranny which Dr. Geil has not looked into. . . . He puts before us in graphic and picturesque language the history of Chin, who conceived the idea of the Wall; he tells us in a manner which almost persuades us we are reading a romance how the great Chin gathered his army of men to fight and work."—Daily Graphic.

SOME OLD-AGE OBSERVATIONS.

IN THE EVENING.

By CHARLES STEWART. Large Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

A volume of observations and reflections from the point of view of a man of varied experience on miscellaneous topics, ranging from Sport, Political Economy, and other Practical Matters to those deeper subjects which exercise the mind as active life draws to a close.

S. MACNAUGHTAN'S RECOLLECTIONS.

US FOUR.

The many readers who delighted in "A Lame Dog's Diary" will cordially welcome Miss Macnaughtan's autobiography, describing her childhood in the Western Highlands. The book, written with the brightness and humour which characterise this author's work, will strongly appeal to all who cherish the memories of their early youth.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

You have to choose your Christmas Books! Well, you only need to get the December BOOK MONTHLY, because it contains full, selected lists of the most interesting Christmas Books. You can get the BOOK MONTHLY from your bookseller, and the price is 6d. It is published by SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

FROM SEELEY & CO.'S LIST.

* * A miniature Illustrated Catalogue will be sent on application.

A MILITARY CONSUL IN TURKEY. By Captain A. F. TOWNSEND, lately British Military Consul at Adrianople. With 29 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.

"Captain Townsend's splendid book"—Saturday Review.

"Vivid and entertaining."—Yorkshire Observer.

FAMILY NAMES AND THEIR STORY. By the Rev. S. BARING-GOULD, M.A. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"A really entrancing volume."—British Weekly.

BOTANY OF TO-DAY. By G. F. SCOTT ELLIOT, M.A., B.Sc. Extra Crown 8vo, with 27 Illustrations, 5s. net.

"Teems with interesting matter.—There is not a dull page."—Daily Telegraph.

SECOND EDITION.

AERIAL NAVIGATION OF TO-DAY. By CHARLES C. TURNER. Extra crown 8vo, with 70 Illustrations, 5s. net.

"Mr. Turner is well qualified to write with authority on the subject of aviation. . . . Sets forth the principles of flight in plain, non-technical language, for all to read and understand."—Daily Graphic.

"THE LIBRARY OF ROMANCE."—NEW VOLUMES.

With many Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. each.

THE ROMANCE OF MODERN CHEMISTRY. By JAMES C. C. PHILIP, D.Sc., Ph.D.

"A fascinating exposition in popular language."—Illustrated London News.

THE ROMANCE OF MODERN MANUFACTURE. By CHARLES R. GIBSON.

"We have seen no better gift book for an intelligent boy this autumn."—Manchester Guardian.

THE FAERY QUEEN AND HER KNIGHTS. Stories retold from Edmund Spenser. By A. J. CHURCH, M.A. With Illustrations in colour. Extra crown 8vo, 5s.

"Will prove an enthralling treat to the young reader—delightful illustrations."—Daily Telegraph.

HEROES OF MODERN INDIA. By E. GILLIAT, M.A. With many Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 5s.

"Every Englishman will be the better for a perusal of this virile and well-written book."—Guardian.

ADVENTURES IN THE ARCTIC REGIONS. By H. W. G. HYRST. With 16 Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 5s.

"Really thrilling reading—appears at a singularly appropriate moment."—Liverpool Courier.

LONDON: SEELEY & Co., LTD., 38, Great Russell Street.

HANDBOOKS OF LIBERAL RELIGION.

THE JEWISH RELIGION IN THE TIME OF JESUS.

By Lic. Dr. G. HOLLMANN, of Halle. Translated by EDWARD W. LUMMIS, M.A. Crown 8vo, pp. 140, 2s. net.

THE SOURCES OF OUR KNOWLEDGE OF THE LIFE OF JESUS. By Prof. PAUL WERNLE, D.Th. of Basle. Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. Crown 8vo, pp. 164, 2s. net.

THE APOSTOLIC AGE. By Prof. E. VON DOBSCHUTZ of Strassburg. Translated by F. L. POGSON, M.A. Crown 8vo, pp. 144, 2s. net.

PAUL. By Prof. Dr. W. WREDE. Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. Preface by ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A., D.D. Crown 8vo, pp. 184, 2s. net.

WHOSE SON IS CHRIST? Two Lectures on Progress in Religion. By Prof. FRIEDRICH DELITZSCH, of Berlin. Translated by F. L. POGSON, M.A. Crown 8vo, pp. 76, 1s. 6d. net.

JOHANNINE THOUGHTS. Meditations in Prose and Verse suggested by passages in the Fourth Gospel. By JAMES DRUMMOND, M.A., D.Litt., D.D. Crown 8vo, pp. 200, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUMES I., II. III. & IV. OF THE NATION

may be had free on application to the Manager.

We are taken by Mr. Weigall to the quarries of Wady Hammamât and onwards along the Red Sea high road to Kossair, there to be shown a humorous picture of a Portuguese Governor bored to distraction with his lazy life; we are brought to Gebel Dukhan, the home of the ancient Imperial Porphyry Quarries; to the granite quarries of Mons Claudianus, to the Temple of Wady Abâd, and along "A Nubian Highway." The last journey is perhaps the most technical of any, though we should not omit to mention that a sufficiency of technical information is provided throughout by reproductions, with notes, of archaic drawings. A capital series of photographs completes an altogether delightful book.

* * *

EVERY reader of Saint-Simon will remember his astonished description of the deference paid by Louis XIV. to Madame de Maintenon at the camp of Compiègne, as also the many bitter references to her scattered through the "Mémoires." But, though Saint-Simon was unjust to Madame de Maintenon, few of her later biographers have described her with any enthusiasm. Mr. C. C. Dyson's workmanlike volume, "Madame de Maintenon: Her Life and Times" (Lane, 12s. 6d. net), makes no attempt to turn her into a heroine, but gives the portrait of her drawn by modern French historians. That she was "one of the most remarkable women who ever played a part in the history of France" is undeniable, and probably no more imperturbable disposition ever experienced such extremes of fortune. Her early training was severe. She was compelled to wear sabots like a peasant, and only allowed shoes when visitors came to see Madame de Neillant, to whose care her aunt transferred her. Later, she was placed in a convent, where she was induced to accept the Catholic creed. Her marriage with Scarron, her position of gouvernante to Louis XIV.'s children, and her ascendancy over the King, whom she subsequently married, are related by Mr. Dyson, who regards "sanctified common-sense" as her most prominent characteristic. Several chapters are given to the fortunes of Saint-Cyr, the school for girls which she founded. Her influence upon education was wholesome, and perhaps the chief debt which her country owes Madame de Maintenon is that, in an age of artificiality and ostentation, she held to an ideal of restraint and good sense in the bringing up of children. The fault of her system is that it repressed individuality and was too ascetic. For these reasons Saint-Cyr failed to do what Madame de Maintenon hoped.

* * *

THE scenery of the county of Middlesex, compared with that of many of our counties, is not beautiful, or at least not romantic. Apart from the fact that a good part of its ancient area has been usurped by the county of London, it is, on the whole, a flat land, for even the "Northern Heights" north of London are really of quite a modest altitude, and flatness has ever made for tameness. Yet the man who has diligently walked Middlesex knows that it has its beauty spots, its leafy lanes and footpaths, its vistas and views of classic Englishness, such as that to be seen any day from the summit of Richmond Hill; and in the inner consciousness of most people there is the recognition that the county stands unrivalled in the richness of its associations. It is with the latter rather than the scenic attractions that Mr. Walter Jerrold deals in his "Highways and Byways in Middlesex" (Macmillan, 6s. net), one of a series of handbooks that have done much to arouse enlightened interest in the history and topography of the English counties. By this scholarly cicerone we are shown, in turn, the glamor of Hampton Court, the social significance of Brentford, the literary importance of Twickenham as it centred round Pope's Villa, now gone, the romance of Hounslow, the intrinsic, perhaps only dimly remembered, interest of many another Middlesex fane. The author's net is drawn close towards the end of the volume, where Surbiton is treated, and we are given vivid glimpses of Hogarth at Chiswick, Lamb at Edmonton, Gladstone at Dollis Hill. He has had an able coadjutor in the making of this attractive guide in Mr. Hugh Thomson, whose dainty pen-and-ink sketches have already helped to make the series useful and unique.

* * *

"KIRK LIFE AND KIRK FOLK," by Mr. James Watherspoon (T. N. Foulis, 5s. net), is described as an interpretation of the clerical satires of Robert Burns, the interpretation taking the form of pictures of Ayrshire village life in the poet's time. We are introduced to "Holy Willie," a flagrant specimen of the unco' guid Scottish elder, half fanatic and half hypocrite, and to other village types who "kailed" and "cleeked" and "stotted" and "skirted" within their own narrow circle of existence, which reminds us that no kailyard novel ever published could beat these studies for sheer dialectical bewilderment. Nevertheless, they have atmosphere and a measure of that pawky humor which renders dialect readable, and they give a fair, if strongly colored, picture of the stunting influence upon the national life, and power of self-expression, exercised by the Presbyterian form of Church government against which Burns contended with all the might of his clever pen.

* * *

DR. H. MONTAGU BUTLER'S "Ten Great and Good Men" (Arnold, 6s. net) is a series of lectures written and delivered with the aim of bringing before "average readers, intelligent, but not learned, some notion of the personality of a great man, in the hope that they might be so far drawn to him as to wish to know him much more intimately." The subjects of the lectures are Burke, the younger Pitt, Canning, John Wesley, William Wilberforce, Shaftesbury, Bright, Gordon, Dr. Arnold, and Erskine of Linlathen. In a modest preface Dr. Butler says that his book makes no claim to be a serious contribution to literature, and that it has no fresh matter to disclose. Yet he is able to tell of the effect of Pitt's speeches upon his father, Dean Butler, who heard them from the gallery of the House of Commons, and how it was also at Dean Butler's suggestion that Canning prepared his speeches for the press. An important feature, as Dr. Butler himself remarks, in lectures of this type is the choice of quotations, and upon this Dr. Butler is to be congratulated. His extracts from the speeches of Pitt and Canning, those from Wesley's journals, and his illustrations of John Bright's humor, not only enliven his pages, but help readers to form a truer picture of the subject under discussion.

* * *

So much has been written about London that it is small wonder to find Mr. W. W. Hutchings stating in the preface to "London Town: Past and Present" (Cassell, 2 vols., 10s. net each), that "at every step in the journey it has been necessary, from exigencies of space, to reject matter which clamored for acceptance," and complaining of the difficulty of deciding between subjects "which had exasperatingly equal claims to inclusion." The two volumes run to over eleven hundred pages, and though it would be impossible even in that space to deal with London in all its aspects, there is very little of general interest not touched upon. Beginning with an historical and descriptive account of the City, the book afterwards takes the reader to Westminster and West London, thence through Central, North, and East London, to a section on the districts south of the Thames, and ends with a suggestive chapter by Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer on "The Future of London." Mr. Hutchings has in former works given proof of his thorough acquaintance with London history, topography, and legend. We are glad to see that the present work has met with success in its serial form. It is written in a style likely to engage the reader's interest, and the full index at the end of the second volume adds greatly to its value as a work of reference.

* * *

MISS AGNES MURPHY'S "Melba: A Biography" (Chatto & Windus, 16s.) begins with a short, though enthusiastic, preface by Mr. Fuller-Maitland. "Put Melba behind a screen," he writes, "and the most rapturous exultation of youth, or the most poignant expression of sorrow, will be conveyed to all intelligent hearers, yet without transgressing for an instant the canons of pure vocal art." But when the Australian singer paid her first visit to London, in 1886, she did not receive much attention, and even Sir Arthur Sullivan thought so little of her that he did not give her a place in the Savoy company. It was Madame Mathilde Marchesi who first discovered the possibilities in Melba's voice. "At last I have found a star," she exclaimed, when Melba presented herself in Paris to have her voice tried. Thenceforward her career was a round of triumphs—at Paris, Nice, Brussels, St. Petersburg, London, and Monte Carlo—

Just Ready.

COURT LIFE IN CHINA, theCapital, its Officials, and People. By ISAAC TAYLOR HEADLAND, author of "Chinese Mother Goose Rhymes," &c. Price 6s. net. Postage 5d.

Commencing with an account of the early life of the Empress Dowager, into which he has woven many interesting and little-known facts in her career, he proceeds to sketch in his delightfully interesting way the Ladies of the Court, Kuang Hsu, Prince Chun, the Forbidden City, the Manchu Princesses, the Chinese Ladies of Rank, the Social Life of the Better Classes, and many other topics of equal interest.

An unusual feature is the illustrations, which number several from the brush of the Empress herself, as well as several photographs and paintings of this remarkable woman, which will be new to the West.

A HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY IN JAPAN.

By OTIS CARY.

In 2 vols., price 15s. net, postage 6d. Vol. I.—A History of Roman Catholic and Greek Orthodox Missions in Japan. Vol. II.—A History of Protestant Missions in Japan.

Prof. HARLAN P. BEACH, of Yale University, says: "The work will be recognised as a standard. Dr. Cary is one of the most scholarly among the entire Japanese Missionary force, and his thoroughness and intimate knowledge are derived from more than 30 years in Japan."

The Japan Daily Mail, in a long article, says: "It is true that long residence in this country is not an essential qualification for compiling a work whose contents are taken from archives that have been in existence for many years. But, in standpoint of the Japanese as well as that of the Christian propagandists, such an insight as Mr. Cary has acquired is invaluable."

TOLSTOY, THE MAN AND HIS MESSAGE.

A Biographical interpretation. By EDWARD E. STEINER. With Illustrations. Price 5s. net, postage 4d.

The Dundee Courier says:—"All intelligent readers, even if not exactly students, will find here a careful analysis of Tolstoy's principle, works, ideas, methods, and the nature of his enormous influence on modern life."

The Scotsman says:—"It is a work well based both in literary and in personal study, which is full of interest for the many readers who wish to understand the greatest writer in Russia."

SPAIN OF TO-DAY FROM WITHIN.

With Autobiography of Author. By MANUEL ANDUJAR. Illustrated, price 3s. 6d. net, postage 4d.

The Scotsman says:—"Besides describing many of the chief places in modern Spain with a conciseness and good sense which any kind of traveller would appreciate, the book cannot but prove peculiarly acceptable to readers beyond the pale of Rome who are interested in the position and prospects of their Spanish co-religionists."

FLEMING H. REVELL COMPANY,

21, Paternoster Square, E.C., and Edinburgh.

FROM THE DELAMORE PRESS LISTALL ABOUT SHIPS AND SHIPPING

A Popular Handbook of Nautical Information. THIRD EDITION, revised, corrected, and considerably enlarged, by COMMANDER DOWLING, R.N.R., with Preface by COMMANDER W.F. CABORNE, C.B., R.N.R. With six coloured Plates and numerous illustrations in the text. With specially designed attractive cover, stamped in colours. Small square 8vo. 5/- net.

In addition to chapters dealing with many branches of nautical knowledge, ocean records, &c., this valuable little volume contains a list of the ships of the Royal Navy and the fleets of the principal shipping companies, illustrated by small drawings indicating the various types of vessels, buoys, and signals; coloured plates of flags, and also of vessels typical of various periods in our naval history.

"One of the most complete little manuals of the sea and the sea services we have seen."—Lloyd's News.

OLD LONDON: A Series of Fifty Reproductions of Old Engravings Illustrative of the London of our Ancestors.

[Second Edition.]

Compiled by WALTER L. McNAY. Large 8vo, cloth. 3/6 net. "Mr. McNay has arranged his volume on the old and useful plan of one page of text to one picture, and in a fairly exhaustive reading I have found accuracy and compactness of statement. . . . Old London is a kind of fairy-land, and it is not necessary to be an antiquary to love it. Mr. McNay has produced an admirable pictorial guide to its sights in the spirit of Stow's words: 'What London hath been in antient Time men may here see.'"—T.P.'s Weekly.

THE SEASON'S GIFT-BOOK FOR GARDEN-LOVERS.

THE HEART OF A GARDEN

By Mrs. MARRIOTT WATSON. With numerous fine illustrations. Royal 8vo. 7/6 net.

The book is beautifully printed, of a size and in type that gives a most handsome page, and is bound in pale green art-linen, the cover being decorated with a special design.

ON A PINCUSHION, and other Fairy Tales

By MARY DE MORGAN. With illustrations by WILLIAM DE MORGAN, author of "Joseph Vance," "Alice-for-Short," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt. 3/6 net.

ALEXANDER MORING, LTD., 32, George Street, Hanover Square, W.

TANGYESTYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

For Farm or Estate Work,
Country-House Lighting, &c.

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.

SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.

REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM."THE TRUE WAY OF LIFE."

By EDWARD GRUBB, M.A.

The BISHOP OF HEREFORD writes in a Foreword to the book:—

"We welcome the arguments set forth in this volume. We feel that the writer is doing the best national and international service, that he is in the direct line of those great preachers of national righteousness, the Hebrew Prophets, and we believe that his preaching of the true way of national and international relationships, as herein set forth, is destined to prevail, and that the time is coming when every monarch, statesman or diplomatist of good repute and all responsible leaders of public opinion will recognise that every nation or state or government is a morally responsible person; and that all governments claiming to be civilised should hold each other amenable to the universal moral law of veracity and fair dealing."

All the Profits on this book will be devoted to the furtherance of Anglo-German Friendship. To be obtained of all booksellers.

Price 1s. net. Post free 1s. 2d.

Headley Brothers, 14 Bishopgate Without, London, E.C.

£50 FOR A SHORT STORY.

The Editor of "M.A.P." offers the sum of £50 to the sender of the original short story between 1,000 and 3,000 words in length which he considers to be the best of those received.

Authors who wish to compete should study carefully the style of story in "M.A.P." in which the full conditions of this offer appear every week.

and most of these are chronicled in Miss Murphy's pages. We are given the usual stock of anecdotes, and the portraits, facsimiles, autographs, and so forth, that are seldom absent from any biography of a theatrical celebrity. Madame Melba herself contributes two valuable chapters—one on the selection of music as a profession, in which she warns young people of the difficulties they must look for, and another treating of the science of singing.

* * *

A WRITER on mountaineering has divided the followers of that fascinating sport into rock climbers and others; the "others" including the tamer spirits who like a mountain chiefly for what they can see from its top. It is to the former class that Mr. George D. Abraham's "British Mountain Climbs" (Mills & Boon, 7s. 6d. net) will appeal. A fairly exhaustive guide to the peaks of the Lake District, the Welsh region of Snowdonia, and the hills of the Scottish highlands and Skye, it bestows but little attention on the man who wants merely to walk and imagine he is mountaineering. Even a popular favorite like Helvellyn is dismissed in a brief paragraph. Nevertheless the volume is a very excellent one for its purpose. The sporting routes up the various hills in the neighborhood of Wastdale Head, the chief climbing centre of Cumberland, are detailed with accompanying diagrams; every climbing possibility of Snowdon and Ben Nevis and their associate crags is examined exhaustively; and there is an admirable chapter on the Coolin in Skye. Though technical, the writing is far from likely to bore the average reader, and the photographic illustrations have always picturesqueness and sometimes thrill. The book should be very popular with the growing class of British hill-climbers.

* * *

MR. C. W. WHEELER, the author of "Wedges" (Gay & Hancock, 2s. 6d. net), might have chosen a more euphonious title for the collection of essays on social questions that the book contains. Otherwise, there is little fault to be found with his work; it is bright, entertaining, and full of the square common sense that looks facts in the face. In an amusing preface Mr. Wheeler confesses that he wrote the essays, not with the object of expressing thoughts already formulated in his mind, but with that of finding out what he actually did think about certain points, and he gravely commends the experiment to anyone who "wishes to tidy up his mind and find his mental and moral bearings." The result in his case is to proclaim him as the holder of a set of advanced views on such subjects as "The Bonds of Matrimony," "The Ten Commandments," &c., and the possessor of a lightly philosophical method of airing these views. The essay on Scepticism is one of the best he has written. He also puts forward an alternative to our system of party government, which starts an interesting train of thought, even if its practicability need not be considered very seriously. Many telling little aphorisms find their way into these pages, whose author has a simple and forcible way of driving home his points; and though he deals with some delicate topics, the book is wholly without offence.

* * *

"TYROL AND ITS PEOPLE," by Mr. Clive Holland (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net), is a pleasantly written account of one of the most delightful of holiday resorts. It deals with the history, folk-lore, and scenery of the district, though the book is not confined to Tyrol, for Mr. Holland gives more than a chapter to Salzburg, and also touches upon several other places in the neighborhood. A chapter on the Dolomite region contains notes on some tours and ascents that are likely to prove of use to holiday-makers. Altogether Mr. Holland's book is one to be read by all who think of paying a visit to a district where there are to be found quaint customs and costumes as yet unspoiled by the self-consciousness that comes with the tourist, as well as splendid scenery and artistic treasures.

* * *

"THE POETRY OF NATURE," selected by Henry Van Dyke (Heinemann, 6s. net), and "The Poetry of Earth: A Nature Anthology" (Harraap, 2s. 6d. net), are two anthologies on almost the same lines, though the latter volume includes a few prose extracts, and contains a much larger number of poems than the former. Both are neatly produced, and are evidently intended as "gift-books." We can recommend them for that purpose.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning, Nov. 26.	Price Friday morning, Dec. 3.
Consols 2½ per cent.	82½	82½
German Threes	83½	83½
Peru Pref.	33½	35½
Buenos Ayres Pacific	88½	92
Steel Common	90½	89½
London Omnibus	16½	17½

NOTHING, of course, is talked of now except the Budget and the approaching elections. Very few people in the City know quite what the consequences of the Budget's rejection will be to the money market. But there can be no doubt that a big output of Treasury Bills will be necessary, which must stand in the way of easier money; otherwise, no doubt, the directors of the Bank would have reduced their rate from 5 to 4 per cent., for Thursday's return was again very strong indeed, and in normal times would have justified a three per cent. rate. The long-expected relapse of rubber and rubber shares has come at last, and may continue. The Kaffir market has also been weak, but gilt-edged securities hold up remarkably well considering the situation in which the Exchequer is placed by the rejection of the Budget. As the Revelstoke and Rothschild arguments are dealt with elsewhere, it is not necessary for me to touch upon them here.

PERU CORPORATION AND GOVERNMENT.

There is a good deal of interest just now in Peru. The Peruvian Corporation and the Government of Peru are always either making a quarrel or patching it up, and the market view of Peruvian Corporation Ordinary and Preference is apt to depend as much upon politics as upon profits. The Peruvian Corporation took over the old debt of Peru under an arrangement about which there has been much dispute; but in 1906 the Peruvian Government disposed of over half a million 6 per cent. gold bonds in Berlin. The price was 98 and the loan was secured on the salt monopoly. A new loan is supposed to be on the point of being issued in Paris. Travellers say that the Peruvians are the most agreeable, cultured, and indolent of all the Spanish-Americans.

THE LONDON GENERAL OMNIBUS.

The long-expected report, covering fifteen months from July, 1908, to October, 1909, has been issued. The previous year was disastrous, showing a loss of £140,000, and these fifteen months are again very unsatisfactory, though the directors profess to feel encouraged. The amalgamation seems to have been badly conducted, and even now the arrangement with the Vanguards is not settled. The auditors say that "no depreciation has been written off motor and other omnibuses or horses!" Yet the fifteen months' working shows a net loss of over £33,000. The directors attribute it partly to the weather. Lords Rothschild and Revelstoke will, of course, put it down to the Budget.

LUCCELLUM.

EVANS' ANTISEPTIC THROAT PASTILLES

are THE remedy for Loss of Voice, Huskiness or Soreness of the Throat, Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, &c. These Pastilles have an unrivalled reputation for their wonderfully soothing qualities for all Throat troubles. Made to a formula of the Liverpool Throat Hospital.

1/- and 4/6 per box of all Chemists, Stores, &c.

Write for Sample enclosing 1d. stamp to cover postage to EVANS SONS LESCHER & WBBB, Ltd.,
Hanover Street, Liverpool.

Ask for EVANS' Pastilles and refuse all imitations.

Summer pleasure in winter

You know the keen delight of the dive, out of the dazzling sun, into some shady stream where the lazy waters run.

You know the bracing snap of the water against the skin, and the sense of complete and utter restful invigoration.

You can get that very same sense of refreshment, with none of the after-lassitude, from a hot bath, a

Mustard Bath

—a bath to which a couple of tablespoonfuls or so of COLMAN'S MUSTARD have been added. Try it yourself.

Colman's mustard

Benger's Food prepared with milk, is a complete food.

The more delicate the state of health—the greater the need for it.

When other foods fail try Benger's; but it's wisest to use Benger's in the first instance.

For Invalids and the aged.

Benger's Food is sold in Tins by Chemists, etc., everywhere.

Rowntree's Cocoa

has a distinctly rich flavour
all its own.
It is really
delicious.

MAKERS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£12 12s. OPORTO, GIBRALTAR, TANGIER, ALGIERS,
PALERMO, February 15th.

£26 5s. PALESTINE, EGYPT, CONSTANTINOPLE, GREECE,
March 3rd.

Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

£7 7s. —SKI-ING, SKATING, TOBOGGANNING
TOURS, including Second-Class Return Ticket
and Accommodation Hotel Aubepine, Ballaigues. Also Hotels at Mantana, Villars, St. Beatenberg, Wengen, Lenzerheide, etc.—
Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, S.W.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Scholarship Examination in December.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.

BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

ST. GEORGE'S CLASSES, EDINBURGH.

(FOUNDED 1876.)

TUITION BY CORRESPONDENCE.

Help and Direction for Home Students in Literature, Fine Art (Special Subject for 1909-10, "The National Gallery—Foreign Schools"), History, Geography, Philosophy, Languages, Science, &c.

The Classes, under the direction of an Honorary Committee of Ladies, are conducted by experienced tutors of high University attainment who work in direct communication with their students. Preparation for examinations. Fees from 12s. per term. Write for Prospectus to Secretary, St. George's Classes, Edinburgh.

SESAME HOUSE for Home-life Training and for Training of Children, Lady Nurses and Kindergartners.—For full particulars apply, the Principal Miss Emily Last, 43A, Acacia Road, London, N.W.

ROYAL HOLLOWAY COLLEGE.

(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.)

The LENT TERM BEGINS on JANUARY 13th. 1910. The College prepares Students for the London Degrees in Science and Arts.

TWELVE ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, from £50 to £60 a year, on a certain number of Bursaries of not more than £30, tenable for three years, will be offered for COMPETITION in June, 1910.

Inclusive fee £100 a year.

For further particulars, apply to the SECRETARY, Royal Holloway College, Englefield Green, Surrey.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Healthy outdoor life, combined with thorough education on modern lines. Usual curriculum, including citizenship course, extension lectures, &c. Preparation when required for University and other careers.

Handicrafts, gardening, riding, nature study, archaeology, &c.

Principal: Miss AMY KEMP.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL.

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities.

Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

The Spring Term begins on January 18th.

For prospectus, etc., apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class, Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK.
K. M. ELLIS.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE,
SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas
Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,
Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
51, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

TO WRITERS OF POETRY AND BELLES-
LETTRES.—The Adelphi Press, Ltd., 11, Adam Street, W.C., are prepared to consider MSS. for Publication, and to undertake all forms of literary business.

BOOKSELLERS.

A SHILLING ILLUSTRATED BIBLE.

This Bible is printed in clear Pearl type, and contains 16 Photographic Views, 16 beautiful Figure Pictures after Collier, Delaroche, Hoffmann, Reynolds, Titian, etc.; 2 beautiful Illuminated Title Pages and Maps; tastefully bound in crimson imitation leather, gilt edges, and round corners, 1s. 3d. post free, or 5 copies for 6s. 6d. post free.

Rev. ALAN BRODRICK, Broughton Gifford Rectory, writes:—"The Bibles are perfect books of art and cheapness."

The London Bible Warehouse, 53, Paternoster Row, E.C.

GLAISHER'S DECEMBER CATALOGUES
OF PUBLISHER'S REMAINDERS AND BOOKS
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS

are now ready, and will be sent post free on application.

These TWO CATALOGUES include many ENTIRELY NEW REMAINDERS in General Literature; also a large and wide selection of well-illustrated and attractive books for the young, suitable for Christmas Presents.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., Remainder and Discount Bookseller
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

The Strange Disappearance
of a Baronet—

an eerie and whimsical story by ALGERNON BLACKWOOD
—will appear in this week's issue of

The Saturday
Westminster,

which will be a SPECIAL LITERARY NUMBER enlarged to

TWENTY PAGES.

Other Special Contributions to the issue will be

THE NEXT DOOR BABY: by Mrs. Neish.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS: by G. A. B. Dewar.

AN AMUSING STUDY BY "SAKI."

And in addition there will be

Special Articles on Christmas and Gift Books,
Reviews of the Season's Books, F. C. G.'s
Cartoons, and all the usual features.

'Saturday Westminster,' November 27th.

OFFICES: Salisbury Square, Fleet Street, E.C.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading,
Billiard and Smoking Rooms.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) Single from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Dirco.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderateSILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- weekBRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.*BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., BridportBRIGHTON.*THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, ManagerROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. PrestonBUXTON.*ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First HotelDARTMOOR—YELVERTON.*THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. SaraDEAL.*BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. JeffersonEASTBOURNE.*CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- dayHADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- dayEDINBURGH.*ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading HotelGREAT YARMOUTH.*MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per dayGREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.*THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. PearlILFRACOMBE.*COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL 120 rooms. Facing SeaKEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCs.*CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap RefreshmentsLANCASTER.*BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntoshLEEDS.*HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either stationLIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone 3032 Royal, 3 wires

GRAPES HOTEL, Tarleton St. Snacks and Luncheons. Tel. 3074
Royal. G. Cutts. Prop.

LLANDUDNO.The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LLANELLY.CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. WeaverLYNTON (Devon).*ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acresMALVERN.*HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. WilsonMATLOCK.*SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. ChallandROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)NELSON.*RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from StationOXFORD (near).*SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., LecturePENTRE.*PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. MilesSOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illu-
minations. Turkish, Electric, Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s. per day. Tel. 422.

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop.ALBERT HOTEL. Ordinary daily. Sunday Table d'Hôte. H. E. TaylorWHITBY.*WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. NewbittNOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION
Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION
PUBLISHING CO. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book
sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—
Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions
are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page } facing matter ... }	£10 0 0	£5 0 0	£2 10 0
Other Pages... }	8 0 0	4 0 0	2 0 0
Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:
13 Insertions	8d. per line.
52 ,,	6d. ,,

THE INDEX TO VOLUME V. OF THE NATION

Will be ready shortly and may be had free, on application to the Manager.

Illustrated Gift Books.

THE FACE OF CHINA.

By E. G. KEMP, F.R.S.G.S. Travels in East, North, Central, and Western China. With some Account of the New Schools, Universities, and Missions, and the old Religious Sacred Places of Confucianism, Buddhism, and Taoism, and a Map of China. With 64 Illustrations after Water-Colours and Sepia Drawings by the Author, 20s. net; Large Paper Parchment, 42s. net.

THE COLOUR OF ROME.

By OLAVE M. POTTER. With 60 Illustrations in Colours and Sepia by the Japanese Artist, YOSHIO MARKINO, who also contributes an Introductory Chapter. Fcap. 4to, 20s. net; Large Paper Parchment, 42s. net.

STORIES OF THE FRENCH ARTISTS FROM CLOUET TO DELACROIX.

Drawn from Contemporary Records. Collected and Arranged by P. M. TURNER and C. H. COLLINS BAKER. With 8 Coloured Plates and 24 in Half-Tone. Cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net; Edition de Luxe, with 5 additional Plates, crown 4to, Parchment 15s. net.

THE MIND OF THE ARTIST.

THOUGHTS AND SAYINGS OF ARTISTS ON THEIR ART. Collected and arranged by Mrs. LAURENCE BINYON. With 8 Full-page Plates. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

THE CONFESSIONS OF SAINT AUGUSTINE.

Translated by Dr. E. B. PUSEY. Edited by TEMPLE SCOTT. With an Introduction by Mrs. MEYNELL. Large crown 8vo, cloth, with 12 Plates in 4 Colours by MAXWELL ARMFIELD, 7s. 6d. net. Also an Edition de Luxe. Crown 4to, pure rag paper, with the Plates mounted, parchment, 15s. net; pigskin, with clasps, 25s. net.

THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH.

By CHARLES READE. With 20 Full-page Four-Colour Plates after Water-Colours, and 10 after Drawings in Line, Title-Page, Cover Design, and End-Papers by BYAM SHAW, R.I. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 12s. 6d.; parchment, 16s. net.

ANCIENT ENGLISH CHRISTMAS CAROLS, 1400-1700.

With some of later date including poems by ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE, JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS, CHRISTINA ROSSETTI, and WM. MORRIS. Collected and arranged by EDITH RICKERT. With 8 Photogravure Plates. Boards, 7s. 6d. net; pigskin, with clasps, 10s. 6d. net.

TRAVELS WITH A DONKEY.

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. Newly set in special large type, with 1 Full-page Reproductions from Water-Colours, and 12 Facsimile Drawings, by NOEL ROOKE. 7s. 6d. net; parchment, 10s. 6d. net.

THE RAINBOW BOOK.

By Mrs. M. H. SPIELMANN. With Coloured Frontispiece and 15 Illustrations by ARTHUR RACKHAM, A.R.W.S., and 21 in Black and White by many other well-known Artists. 5s. net.

THE ROSE AND THE RING.

By W. M. THACKERAY. With Coloured Frontispiece, 44 Illustrations (12 in Two Tints), and Decorative End-Papers by GORDON BROWNE. 3s. 6d. net.

THE MASTER OF GAME.

The Oldest English Book on Hunting. By EDWARD SECOND DUKE OF YORK. Edited by W. A. and F. BAILLIE-GROHMAN. With Introduction by THEODORE ROOSEVELT. Photogravure Frontispiece and 24 Full-Page Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net; parchment, 10s. 6d. net.

A Complete List of Autumn Announcements will be sent upon application.

CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

THE RICCARDI PRESS BOOKS.

The Riccardi Fount, designed by Mr. Herbert P. Horne, here used for the first time, may successfully challenge comparison, alike for LEGIBILITY and BEAUTY of line, as well with the Designer's previous founts as with any other modern attempt to recreate the glories of the Early Printers.

THE STORY OF GRISELDA

Being the Tenth story of the Tenth day from the "Decameron" of Boccaccio, translated by J. M. Rigg. Printed on Batchelor hand-made paper—9½ × 6½ in.—in an edition of 500 numbered copies; 12 copies—10 for sale—printed on vellum. Michalet grey wrappers, 5s. net; bound in limp vellum with silk ties, 12s. 6d. net. The copies printed on vellum, bound in limp Kelmscott vellum, silk ties 42s. net. [Now ready.]

THE SONG OF SONGS WHICH IS SOLOMON'S

Reprinted after the Authorised Version by permission, and illustrated with 10 plates reproduced in colour by the Medici Process after the water-colour drawings by W. Russell Flint. Edition limited to 500 numbered copies on hand-made Riccardi paper—10½ × 7¾ in.; 17 copies—15 for sale—printed on Vellum, the latter with a duplicate set of the Plates, mounted, in cloth portfolio. Paper copies, Michalet boards, canvas back and paper label, £2 2s. net; or in limp vellum, silk ties, £2 12s. 6d. net. The copies printed on vellum, bound in limp Kelmscott vellum, gold lettering, silk ties, £12 12s. net. [Ready about December 8th.]

THE THOUGHTS OF THE EMPEROR MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS

Translated by George Long, with 12 plates reproduced in colour by the Medici Process after the water-colour drawings by W. Russell Flint, and an engraved title after the design by Noel Rooke. Edition limited to 500 numbered copies on hand-made Riccardi paper—10½ × 7¾ in.; 17 copies—15 for sale—printed on vellum, the latter with a duplicate set of the Plates, mounted, in cloth portfolio. Paper copies, Michalet boards, paper label, canvas back, £2 12s. 6d. net; or in limp vellum, silk ties, gold lettering, £3 3s. net. The copies printed on vellum, bound in limp vellum, gold lettering, silk ties, £15 15s. net. [Ready about December 10th.]

Of the Vellum copies of the above Books few remain for subscription. Orders for which, as for the paper copies, will be executed in strict rotation as received, preference being given only to subscribers to the entire series of Riccardi Press Books.

Mr. W. Russell Flint's original Watercolours for the above Books are on Exhibition at 38 Albemarle Street until December 24th. Entrance Free on presentation of visiting card.

* * The detailed Prospectus, printed in the Riccardi Types, post free on application.

PHILIP LEE WARNER, Publisher to the MEDICI SOCIETY, Ltd.,
38, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, London, W.

The Nation

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1909.

Messrs. METHUEN call attention to the following Books, all of which are of high interest and very suitable for Presents.

FICTION

- SAILORS' KNOTS. By W. W. JACOBS, Author of "Many Cargoes." Illustrated by WILL OWEN. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. [Third Edition.]
"There is not a page without a good healthy, hearty laugh."—Morning Post.
"They are works of art; they are real short stories."—Morning Leader.
- THE TYRANT. By Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE, Author of "The Lonely Lady of Grosvenor Square." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.]
"Remarkably charming and truthful."—Morning Leader.
"Delightfully written; tears and laughter mingle in it."—Manchester Courier.
- NORTHERN LIGHTS. By Sir GILBERT PARKER, M.P., Author of "The Weavers." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Fourth Edition.]
"These stories will be read by future generations."—Morning Post.
- THE SEVERINS. By Mrs. ALFRED SIDGWICK, Author of "The Kinsman." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.]
"The charm and freshness of the book are delightful."—Morning Leader.
"The charm and freshness of the book are delightful."—Morning Leader.
"For all-round excellence 'The Severins' show us Mrs. Sidgwick at her best."—Spectator.
- THE SEARCH PARTY. By G. A. BIRMINGHAM, Author of "Spanish Gold." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.]
"Full of humour, humanity, and real interest."—Westminster Gazette.
"As hilarious a book as you could desire; witty and rich in the genius of mirth."—Daily News.

GENERAL LITERATURE

- THE SURVIVAL OF MAN: A Study of Unrecognised Human Faculty. By SIR OLIVER LODGE, F.R.S. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
The demand for this book was so great that a Second Edition was called for at once.
"It sums up the existing evidence of man's survival after death."—Daily Mail.
"Strange things in heaven and earth are here set down."—Daily News.
- "THE YOUNG CARPENTER." By CYRIL HALL. With many Illustrations, Crown 8vo, 5s. [Second Edition.]
This delightful gift-book will afford pleasure to every boy.
- TREMENDOUS TRIFLES. By G. K. CHESTERTON. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. [Third Edition.]
"There is bubbling humour; there is ripe philosophy."—Onlooker.
- ONE DAY AND ANOTHER. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. [Third Edition.]
"An elysium of humour and humanity."—Pall Mall Gazette.
- A WANDERER IN PARIS. By E. V. LUCAS. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by WALTER DEXTER, and 32 from Photographs after Old Masters. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Third Edition.]
"The soul of Paris is caught and reflected in these pages."—Standard.
- GOOD COMPANY: a Rally of Men. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. This is uniform with "The Open Road."
"The title is just; the characters are pleasant companions, the anthology very agreeable."—Morning Leader.
- ON EVERYTHING. By HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P., Author of "On Nothing." Fcap. 8vo, 5s. [Third Edition.]
"In this delightful book Mr. Belloc has caught the secret of the short essay."—Liverpool Post.
- MARIE ANTOINETTE. By HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P. With 35 Portraits and Illustrations, demy 8vo, 15s. net.
"The story is told with a full appeal to contemporary evidence and with dramatic skill."—Standard.
- REMINISCENCES OF A K.C. By T. E. CRISPE, K.C. With 2 Portraits, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
"The book is an excellent one, and makes light and amusing reading."—Vanity Fair.
"Much gossip, plenty of fun, many stories."—Observer.
- A BOOK OF THE ZOO. By ERIC PARKER. With 24 Illustrations from Photographs by HENRY IRVING. Crown 8vo, 6s.
The Author has tried in this book to make a round of the Zoological Gardens, and to show the Animals to a visitor as they appear to one who has spent many hours watching their individual characters and habits in captivity.
- THE WORKS OF OSCAR WILDE. A New Edition, reset in 12 vols. fcap. 8vo, 5s. net each.
1. LORD ARTHUR SAVILE'S CRIME. 2. THE DUCHESS OF PADUA. 3. POEMS (including "The Ballad of Reading Gaol" and "The Sphinx"). 4. LADY WINDERMERE'S FAN. 5. A WOMAN OF NO IMPORTANCE. 6. AN IDEAL HUSBAND. 7. THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING EARNEST. 8. A HOUSE OF POMEGRANATES. 9. INTENTIONS. 10. DE PROFUNDIS AND PRISON LETTERS. (This is the Fourteenth Edition, and contains new matter.) 11. ESSAYS. 12. SALOME.
- SHELLEY: the Man and the Poet. By A. CLUTTON BROCK. With 12 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
"A fine combination of penetration, accuracy, and charm."—Morning Leader.
- THE MAXIMS OF MARMADUKE. By C. E. JERNINGHAM. Fcap. 8vo, 5s.
"The vivacity of the author never flags."—Daily Mail.
- ONE HUNDRED MASTERPIECES OF SCULPTURE. With an Introduction and Descriptive Notes by G. F. HILL. With 101 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. A splendid book.
"Well chosen and well reproduced photographs of characteristic masterpieces."—Scotsman.
- THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE. By EDWARD GIBBON. Edited by J. B. BURY. Litt.D. In 7 vols. Vols. I, II, and III, demy 8vo, each 10s. 6d. net.
This is a Completely New Edition, newly set in large type, with many Illustrations and new Maps.
- THE SHAKESPEARE FOLIOS AND QUARTOS. By ALFRED W. POLLARD. With numerous Facsimiles, Folio, 2ls. net.
- BY THE WATERS OF EGYPT. By NORMA LORIMER. With 16 Illustrations in Colour and 32 other Illustrations, demy 8vo, 16s. net.
- THE AUSTRIAN COURT IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. By Sir HORACE RUMBOLD, late Ambassador at Vienna. With 16 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 18s. net.
"Its survey is wide; it abounds in personal touches and is never lacking in human interest."—Daily Telegraph.
- RAPHAEL. By A. P. OPPÉ. With 200 Plates, wide royal 8vo, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net. [Classics of Art.]
"A clear, exhaustive, and well-arranged biography."—Glasgow Herald.

SOME RECENT BOOKS

- BROWNING'S PARACELSUS (3s. 6d. net) MARGARET L. LEE and KATHARINE B. LOCOCK.
THE CLERK OF OXFORD IN FICTION (10s. 6d. net) SAMUEL F. HULTON.
THE NINE DAYS' QUEEN (10s. 6d. net) RICHARD DAVEY.
MATILDA OF TUSCANY (10s. 6d. net) NORA DUFF.
THE PILGRIM FATHERS (7s. 6d. net) WINNIFRED COCKSHOTT.
HOW OLD AGE PENSIONS BEGAN TO BE (2s. 6d. net) F. HERBERT STEAD.
ST. TERESA OF SPAIN (7s. 6d. net) HELEN H. COLVILLE.
THE INCOMPARABLE SIDDONS (12s. 6d. net) Mrs. CLEMENT PARSONS.
THE COURT OF A SAINT (10s. 6d. net) WINIFRED F. KNOX.

METHUEN'S POPULAR NOVELS

- SIX SHILLINGS EACH.
- | | |
|------------------------|------------------------|
| THE PRICE OF LIS DORIS | MAARTEN MAARTENS. |
| SPLENDID BROTHER | W. PETT RIDGE. |
| THE COLUMN OF DUST | EVELYN UNDERHILL. |
| THE BURNT OFFERING | SARA JEANNETTE DUNCAN. |
| THE FIRST ROUND | ST. JOHN LUCAS. |
| IN AMBUSH | MARIE VAN VORST. |
| THE SQUIRE'S DAUGHTER | ARCHIBALD MARSHALL. |
| HAPPINESS | MAUD STEPNEY RAWSON. |
| GIANNELLA | Mrs. HUGH FRASER. |

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

MACMILLAN'S BOOKS SUITABLE FOR PRESENTS

INDIAN SPEECHES. 1907-1909. By VISCOUNT MORLEY.

Demy 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

Dr. Sven Hedin's New Book.

TRANS-HIMALAYA: Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet.

By DR. SVEN HEDIN. With 388 Illustrations from Photographs, Water Colour Sketches and Drawings by the Author, and 10 Maps. 2 vols. 8vo, 30s. net.

New Book by the Author of "The Man-Eaters of Tsavo."

IN THE GRIP OF THE NYIKA. Further Adventures in British East Africa.

By LIEUT.-COLONEL J. H. PATTERSON, D.S.O. With Illustrations. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The Works of Tennyson.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co. beg to call attention to the fact that their Editions of Tennyson's Works are the only complete Editions and contain all the poems still in copyright and the latest texts of the earlier poems which are now out of copyright.

THE CENTENARY EDITION, in 9 vols.

Annotated by the Author, and Edited by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON. Globe 8vo, 4s. net. per vol.

[Eversley Series.

Complete Works in One vol. Cloth, 7s. 6d.

Pocket Edition. 5 Vols. Fcap. 8vo, 4s. net. Cloth, 2s. net. each; leather, 3s. net each.

Poetical Works. Pocket Edition. Morocco, gilt edges. Pott 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. The People's Edition. 12 vols. 16mo, 1s. net each; or in cloth box, 14s. net. Globe Edition. Cloth, 3s. 6d.; extra gilt, 4s. 6d.; limp leather, 5s. net.

In Memoriam. 2s. 6d. net; limp leather, 3s. 6d. net.

[Golden Treasury Series.

The Princess. 2s. 6d. net; limp leather, 3s. 6d. net.

[Golden Treasury Series.

Lyrical Poems. 2s. 6d. net.

[Golden Treasury Series.

Idylls of the King. 2s. 6d. net; limp leather, 3s. 6d. net.

[Golden Treasury Series.

In Memoriam. With Notes by the Author. Edited by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON. Fcap 8vo, 5s. net.

Cheap Edition.

Alfred Lord Tennyson: a Memor. By his Son, HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON. With Portrait and Facsimiles. Extra Crown 8vo, 6s.

HIGHWAYS and BYWAYS SERIES.

Profusely Illustrated. Extra Crown 8vo, gilt tops, in uniform binding, 6s. per volume.

MIDDLESEX. By WALTER JERROLD. With Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON. Just Published.

SURREY. By ERIC PARKER. Illustrated by HUGH THOMSON.

KENT. By WALTER JERROLD. Illustrated by HUGH THOMSON.

HAMPSHIRE. By D. H. MOUTRAY READ. Illustrated by Arthur B. CONNOR.

BERKSHIRE. By JAMES E. VINCENT. Illustrated by FREDERICK L. GRIGGS.

DORSET. By Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D. Illustrated by JOSEPH PENNELL.

OXFORD AND THE COTSWOLDS. By HERBERT A. EVANS. With Illustrations by FREDERICK L. GRIGGS.

YORKSHIRE. By ARTHUR H. NORWAY. With Illustrations by JOSEPH PENNELL and HUGH THOMSON.

DEVON AND CORNWALL. By ARTHUR H. NORWAY. Illustrated by JOSEPH PENNELL and HUGH THOMSON.

LONDON. By Mrs. E. T. COOK. Illustrated by HUGH THOMSON and FREDERICK L. GRIGGS.

NORMANDY. By PERCY DEARMER, M.A. Illustrated by JOSEPH PENNELL.

DONEGAL AND ANTRIM. By STEPHEN GWYNN, M.P. Illustrated by HUGH THOMSON.

SUSSEX. By E. V. LUCAS. Illustrated by FREDERICK GRIGGS.

SOUTH WALES. By A. G. BRADLEY. Illustrated by FREDERICK L. GRIGGS.

NORTH WALES. By A. G. BRADLEY. Illustrated by JOSEPH PENNELL and HUGH THOMSON.

EAST ANGLIA. By WILLIAM A. DUTT. With Illustrations by JOSEPH PENNELL.

DERBYSHIRE. By J. B. FIRTH. Illustrated by NELLY ERICHSEN.

HERTFORDSHIRE. By H. W. TOMPKINS. Illustrated by FREDERICK L. GRIGGS.

THE LAKE DISTRICT. By A. G. BRADLEY. With Illustrations by JOSEPH PENNELL.

RALPH NEVILL.

Light Come, Light Go.

Gambling—Gamblers—Wagers—The Turf. By RALPH NEVILL. With 9 Coloured Plates and other Illustrations. 8vo, 15s. net. [Tuesday.

Two Beautiful Colour Books.

The French Pastellists of the Eighteenth Century:

By HALDANE MACFALL. Edited by T. LEMAN HARE. With 40 examples in Colour and 12 in Black. Demy 4to, 42s. net.

Evening Standard.—"A volume to delight the eye as well as the mind. . . . The art of color-printing is shown at its highest in these reproductions, which are in every way worthy of Mr. Macfall's arduous labours."

The Forest Lovers.

By MAURICE HEWLETT. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by A. S. HARTRICK. 8vo, 5s. net.

THOMAS HARDY.

Time's Laughingstocks and other Verses.

By THOMAS HARDY. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

Modern Egypt.

By the EARL OF CROMER. With Portrait and a Map. 2 vols. 8vo, 24s. net.

Life of Gladstone.

By JOHN MORLEY. In 2 vols. 10s. net.

Forty-one Years in India.

From Subaltern to Commander-in-Chief. By EARL ROBERTS, V.C., K.G. With 44 Illustrations, including many Portraits. Extra Crown 8vo, 6s.

Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged.

The Making of Ireland and its Undoing, 1200—1600.

By ALICE STOPFORD GREEN. Second Edition. Revised and Enlarged. With Map, 8vo, 10s. net.

Appendix to Second Edition. Separately Sewed, 8vo, 6d. net.

The Rhythm of Modern Music.

By C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS. Extra Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

 Macmillan's Illustrated Catalogue Post Free on application.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

The Nation

WHAT TO TEACH CHILDREN.

YASANYA POLYANA,
MAY 25th, 1909.

I RECEIVED your letter, and was glad to find in it views that quite agree with my own, namely, that going to church as well as reading the Bible during childhood has not a desirable educational effect, and yet that besides the example of parents and those among whom the children live, which is the strongest influence, they also need direct religious teaching.

My religious understanding of life, of which my opinion of what constitutes religious education is the outcome, is this.

God, the spiritual first cause of life, we only know because we know him in ourselves and in other men. So that real worship of God is possible only if we worship Him in ourselves and in other men. Worshipping God in ourselves consists of picturing, and holding before us, the idea of the highest perfection of righteousness, and striving to attain as nearly as possible to that perfection. The worship of God in other men consists in acknowledging in every man the same God whom we are conscious of in ourselves, and therefore striving to unite with every man; and this union can only be brought about by love.

Considering such worship of God to be the essence of all religion, I think it can be and ought to be instilled into children. I believe, and know by experience, that children easily understand and readily accept such teaching, especially if it comprises all they are taught about the worship of God.

Such worship of God can be instilled into children in the following manner:—

"We all know," I would say to them, "that we must not offend, not abuse, not condemn anyone, but must be kind to all, wish everybody well, and love everybody; and that if we do so, it will be well for others and for ourselves. But still we often condemn, scold, and offend others, and wish well only to ourselves, and love only those that love us, and when we do that, it is not well either for others, or for ourselves."

"Why is it so?"

"It is so, because each of us lives with soul and body. The soul wants nothing for itself alone, but desires the good of all and of everything in the world, and loves everybody, while our body desires only its own good, and loves itself alone. So that the more you live for your soul, and the less for your body, the better it will be for others to live, and for you too."

"What are we to do to live more for our soul and less for our body?"

"To live so, we must understand, first of all, that our soul is the spirit of God in man and is the same in all people, and then we must get into the habit of doing what the soul, and not the body, wishes.

"To understand clearly that our soul is the spirit of God in man, it is well to listen to, to repeat, or to read the teaching of wise and holy men about what God is, and how He lives in man. To get into the habit of doing what our soul desires, and not what our body desires, it is well to recall at the end of every day what we have done that not our soul required, but our body desired, and at the beginning of the next day, to prepare ourselves not to fall into the same errors."

That is what I would tell children about the worship of God within ourselves. About the worship of God in others, I would tell children as follows:—

"Always remember that in every man dwells the same God that lives in you, and therefore when you meet a man, whoever he may be, do not forget that nothing in the world is higher or more important than that which lives in that man, and therefore, however evil the actions of that man may be (the man himself), and whoever he may be, he must be worshipped as God, and loved as you love yourself, and you should do to him what you would yourself like done to you if you were in his place."

Here, in a few words, is my answer to your question as to what the religious education of children could be. I shall be glad if these thoughts are of use to you.

LEO TOLSTOY.

Translated by Louise Maude.

No Rights Reserved.

THE MADMAN'S STORY.

THE last of a livid and sickly sunset trailed itself low across the corner of a lean common, a common with starved thistles, suggestive of starved donkeys. The traveller on his way to his suburban home had paused a moment to light a pipe under a dingy brick wall crowned with spikes. Suddenly above the spikes appeared in black silhouette the head and shoulders of a man, a man in a shabby top hat, with long thin wisps of hair, like the coarse grass of the common. The traveller looked up with some surprise on being addressed. He knew no one in the neighborhood, and had no notion what kind of house or garden was enclosed by the spiked wall. After listening to a few quiet and cheerful words from the long-haired man, he came to the conclusion that it was a private asylum.

"A world aflame with beauty," said the long-haired man in an educated voice. "A world full of a divine delirium like wine. A world welded out of pure and passionate colors like a glorious stained-glass window."

The traveller, who was a clerk in a bank, looked down at his boots and umbrella, and said indistinctly that it was a matter of taste.

At this the man in the top hat waved his arms with excitement, and nearly fell over the wall. "No, no, no," he cried, "not a matter of taste, a matter of principle—a matter of principle! That is the whole point. If it weren't for that we should none of us be here. We should all have been killed in the Great Pessimist War. But you're very young, of course. You don't remember the day when the world was nearly destroyed."

The clerk observed again huskily that he couldn't say that he did. A cat that was picking its way along the spiked wall stopped within a foot of the man, stiffened, arched its back, and sprang away among the bushes. The man turned his head at the sound; and the wan evening light lit up a round turnip face with spectacles, and a large mouth that shifted uneasily from ear to ear.

"The world was nearly destroyed," he repeated. "I nearly destroyed it."

The embarrassed clerk seemed unable to get away, and, with his silence for encouragement, the man on the wall coughed and told modestly his simple story.

"I was a poet, young and beautiful, like Shelley; and I was in love with death. Her languid lips, if I may so express myself, were sweeter than love's. Do not imagine that I was weary of the sorrows of life. So long as a man is weary of the sorrows of life he is still young and happy. But I was weary of its joys. Talk not to me of cruel misfortunes; the lucky man who is not happy is the mightiest of the enemies of God. At a tender age I hanged myself on the clothes line, and was released by my grandmother. You know those terrible verses of mine, "Lines to my grandmother," beginning:

"Twice hast thou wronged me; once in giving life,
And once in saving."

At the age of nineteen I jumped off the Embankment, and was pulled out by a waterman with a hook. With what superb poetical persecution did I pursue that man! I reproached him, "Infandum renovare dolorem." My ten volumes, cursing the Waterman in various metres (after the manner of Victor Hugo's "Châtiments") became famous and even popular. We founded the Suicide School in English literature. The Smart Set took it up; non-existence was the one form of excitement they had never tried. The "Morning Post" had advertisements of commodious sepulchres and well-built coffins, instead of houses and bungalows. There was quite a rush of the best people to be buried at cross-roads. The thing soon changed from a social clique to a political party. Leagues and bands were organised by ardent young men vowed to kill first everybody else and then themselves. They would willingly have done it in the other order (they eagerly explained), had it been possible. Whenever a little boy received a medal for saving life, our mobs assailed him with a storm of groans and reproaches. Whenever a doctor cured anybody of anything, which happened from time to time, our Pessimist Press resounded with righteous denunciation. Well, you know how it all ended; my great speech in Trafalgar-square, the unfurling of the Black Flag, the march on St. Paul's Cathedral. One half of the world had declared war on the world."

A large watery moon began to show behind the blackened branches of the stunted garden trees; and the eyes of the cat began to glow in the dark. But still the traveller with the pipe in his mouth stood immobile and helpless, tied by that slender and silver thread of soliloquy.

"At the same time I confess that there was some opposition. Old prejudices die hard, you know; and people cling to the religious notions they have been brought up in. I assure you that when my friend Professor Cramper, in the kindest and most beautiful words I ever heard in my life, persuaded forty children in a Board School to take arsenic and die together, we had quite a lot of trouble with their parents, who looked at things, naturally, I suppose, from the standpoint of the old generation. Under these circumstances we soon found ourselves in the great civil war. Our march on St. Paul's Cathedral was resisted by an irregular army of Optimists and the Battle of Ludgate Hill was the result.

"It appeared surprising to some that in this great war the Pessimists were mostly of the more prosperous orders, while those who retained the superstition of clinging to life had in many cases a very poor life to cling to. But when we consider the immense inferiority in Education"—here the man on the wall rapidly took off his hat and put it on again—"I think their failure to appreciate our point of view is fully explained. The leader of the Optimistic Army was an elderly clerk who was called Gamp, because he always went into battle with an umbrella. He was probably the greatest mystery of all; for nobody could imagine what he had to bind him to human life. He was old, poor, unmarried, ugly, and ill; he had not even any obvious hobby. But there must have burnt in him the pure and naked flame of the pride of life; for the dingy little clerk became as much the crusader of the cosmos as I, the high-born and luxurious artist, was the crusader of annihilation. He developed great tactical talents, in a cold and calculating style; whereas our genius was rather for the reckless and blind attack, like the rush of the fatalistic Arabs. He had invented a colossal kind of gun or mortar which could drop shells across London with a ruinous precision never known before; this he had established on a scaffolding on the dome of St. Paul's, and it was round this that was enacted the strange drama that ended our war."

The clerk took his pipe out of his mouth, and made a violent effort to go. But when the voice above again clove the silence, he felt caught again, as if the asylum gate had clanged behind him.

"I myself," continued the maniac placidly, "headed the great charge up Fleet-street, with a company of our crack regiment, called the Blue Devils, from their ferocity, their blue uniforms, and their well-founded view of life. Behind us was an army of earnest Thinkers, eager for the grave, and already crowing aloud in delighted anticipation. In numbers we were heavy enough to sweep them away; but old Gamp had his gun and his cunning. It was at night; and every gloomy or fiery detail of that scene is photographed on my brain. I can see their lamp-lit faces, growing larger and larger as we rushed upon them; the embittered, grinning faces, the unbearable projecting eyes of those obstinate, misguided men. I will not call them more than misguided, my dear sir; though their desire to go on living was thoughtless and fanatical, I believe it was quite sincere. I can see behind them the bulk of St. Paul's, the lower part of the columns lit from below; the dome above, dim, monstrous, and as remote as the North Pole; and gaping in front, far above us, the black mouth of that fatal cannon which had so often wiped us out by regiments. And every now and then, with a steady, sickening, indescribable roar, fire, smoke, and steel would come, torn out of the very entrails of that iron, and rush over our heads like a shrieking and sliding roof dragged across an open building. Every time the shell fell behind us we heard great ruin and dying cries, and then great gaps of silence; and at last I turned to look, and found that I and the few foremost were alone in a long street, a tessellated pavement of our dead. Already the men in front of us had begun smiling instead of savage grinning; and were leaning more easily on their arms. The battle was over. 'We must get back,' said one of my captains.

"Then all the windows opened in the house of my soul, and all the trumpets of the tower were blown. 'Back?' I cried to the captain. 'No, but forward! Why are we alive, but that the shells go over us, and the zone of fire is behind? We are within the enemies' citadel, man! Forward, and we will win this battle yet!' Drawing my sword, I flung myself on the enemies' ranks, my men behind me. The foe, already relaxed with victory, did not expect us; we struck them unready, and were half-way through before they had reeled again into a rank. Then my men began to be beaten back, but I, I know not how, broke through, and caught one of the ropes that swung from the platform of the great gun. My head singing with a million birds of battle, I clutched and climbed the rope. As I swung there in the stunning void I felt that I was climbing from star to star; that I was gaining crown after crown in the topsy-turvy kingdoms of the infinite. Blinding shots rang by me; and I could fancy they were whistling comets: higher and higher I crept, the sword in my teeth; till at last a resounding roar of victory from my Blue Devils below told a pale-faced world that the great Pessimist had captured the great gun."

"Well!" said the clerk, with sudden and violent cheerfulness, "I must really be going. So pleased . . ."

"My men below," went on the other, his eye on the moon, "gazed long and long to see me deal the last stroke of our triumph, to turn the gun on our foes, and to destroy humanity. At last they grew impatient, calling out directions, attempting to scale the rope. But I, who held the handle of omnipotence, I did nothing. I stood still."

"Why?" began the clerk, gazing slightly.

The madman took hold of two spikes and shook the wall with them. "Why?" he thundered; "why, because cabbages are green and purple at once. Because little clouds in the morning look pink like sweet-stuff. Because wind-mills go round, and horses have four legs. Because this world is aflame with beauty, as I told you; because we all live and die in fairyland. Because I never knew all this till that instant when I broke from five men and went whirling in the air on a crazy rope, ready to be dashed to death. Because the moment the Destroyer has won his battle he does not wish to win it."

The clerk put down his head desperately, and literally ran away. In an instant more, he felt, he would have jumped over the wall into the madhouse. After a little, his trot slowed into a walk; and, as he came near his suburb, he began to smile.

G. K. CHESTERTON.

Reviews.

THE OLD, OLD STORIES.*

It was the supreme soldier who called "Impossible" a silly word, and the great story-tellers have all known that he was right. At all events, they know that it is exactly the "impossible" stories that last for ever. One may think it strange, for there seems likely to be more solid value in the narration of facts, or at least of stories that do not "exceed the limits of probability." Yet the immortal stories of the world are neither founded on fact nor concerned with probability at all. Once upon a time an Englishman, finding an intoxicated beggar lying in a Dublin street at midnight, inquired where he lived. "In the Poddle," was the reply. "But," objected the Englishman, "the Poddle is a stream bricked over from end to end. It's no better than a drain. You can't live in the Poddle." "Faith!" answered the intoxicated beggar, with noble contempt, "and is it histry we're talkin'?" His was the mood of the real story-teller, and of the audience, too. It is not history, but the splendid lie that rejoices mankind.

In most affairs, perhaps in history itself, a mixture of the lie doth ever add pleasure; but for an immortal story there must be a certain quality in the lying, and that is where the difficulty comes in. One has heard stories that gods, men, and children would reject with loathing as "untrue," while others, far more fantastic, have been handed down almost unaltered from prehistoric generations because mankind liked them so much. And while we are on tradition, we may notice another peculiarity about old, old stories. Students of folk-lore make a good deal of fuss over the discovery that the same stories are found under different forms all round the world. We believe, for instance, that "Puss in Boots" appears as "The Antelope in Sandals" among the tribes of Uganda, and the present writer has found "Wolf! Wolf!" as "Leopard! Leopard!" near the sources of the Zambesi. But the really strange thing is, not that the stories are the same, but that they are different. Anyone can prove it by inventing a brand-new story for a child and seeing its anger and sense of wrong if he alters a single word in telling it again next day.

Once start your splendid lie, therefore, and it is likely to survive almost unaltered. But what is it gives the splendor needed for a lie's long life? Can we discover from examples? In Europe, probably the most widely diffused stories have been the Homeric poems and the mythology embedded in them. But those have reached us as definite works of art, and, in Northern Europe at all events, there are stories lying more intimately close to the people's heart from which they sprang, and preserved by no more conscious art than the repetitions of innumerable tongues—chiefly the tongues of mothers. It is not much over a century since the world of refinement and learning deigned to notice such old wives' tales, and it was then that the Brothers Grimm set about collecting their stories. No tales are more acceptable or more necessary for childhood, unless it be Hans Andersen's, which are so like them—with a personal beauty added, but with something of primitive power and wildness gone. Of all the many editions, we suppose none is finer than that

* "The Fairy Tales of the Brothers Grimm." Translated by Mrs. Edgar Lucas. Illustrated by Arthur Rackham. Constable. 15s. net.

"Grimm's Fairy Tales." Selected and Retold by Githa Sowerby. With Illustrations by Millicent Sowerby. Grant Richards. 6s. net.

"The Arabian Nights, Selected and Retold for Children." By Gladys Davidson. Illustrated by Helen Stratton. Blackie. 5s.

"The Arabian Nights." Retold by Kate Douglas Wiggin and Nora Smith. Illustrated by Maxfield Parrish. Werner Laurie. 10s. 6d.

"Gulliver's Travels into Several Remote Nations of the World." By Jonathan Swift. Dent. 7s. 6d. net.

"Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare." Dent. 7s. 6d. net.

"The Faery Queen and her Knights." Retold from Spenser. By Professor A. J. Church. Seeley. 5s.

"Selected Tales of Mystery." By Edgar Allan Poe. Illustrated by Byam Shaw. Sidgwick & Jackson. 12s. 6d. net.

"The Water Babies." By Charles Kingsley. Blackie. 1s. 6d.

"The Deserted Village." By Oliver Goldsmith. Illustrated by W. Lee Hankey. Constable. 15s. net.

"The Red Book of Heroes." By Mrs. Andrew Lang. Longmans. 5s. net.

translated by Mrs. Edgar Lucas, and illustrated by Mr. Arthur Rackham, of which Messrs. Constable issue a new and enlarged copy. Mr. Rackham has added fresh illustrations, and the whole series forms an admirable example of his power. The only thing that could be said against the translation is that our old friends, "Little Red Riding Hood," "The Sleeping Beauty," and a few others, appear under titles nearer the old German than our own; but it is an excellent volume. Another "Grimm" deserving mention is that issued by Mr. Grant Richards, with pleasing illustrations by Miss Millicent Sowerby.

To those who make much of nationality, it must be startling to find the tales which are probably best known after Grimm's, coming from an entirely different race and country. It is quite possible that "The Arabian Nights" are equally welcome with the stories of our own kindred. Outside Northern Europe, at all events, they are probably more universal favorites, and our publishers are always safe in the enterprise of bringing out a new edition. This year there are two before us, and we will not compare them. "The Arabian Nights, selected and retold for children by Gladys Davidson," with many illustrations by Helen Stratton, gives thirteen of the famous stories, including "Sindbad," "Ali Baba," and "Aladdin." The version of ten of the Nights, retold by Kate Douglas Wiggin and Nora Smith, is illustrated with great beauty and imaginative power by Maxfield Parrish, and, of course, it contains the same three immortal stories. Again, as in the "Grimm" noticed above, our one objection is to a departure from tradition. "Sindbad the Voyager" might do for Americans, but in this country, please, we must have "Sindbad the Sailor" or nothing.

For English people, we suppose, "Robinson Crusoe" and "Gulliver," running neck and neck, take third place to Grimm and the Nights, and we have a fine "Gulliver" before us, illustrated, like the Grimm, by Mr. Arthur Rackham. There are two "Gullivers"—the middle-aged man's and the child's—and both are equally successful. It is easy to understand why grown men, who have known the public world with its Governments and wars, philosophers and cranks, should love one of the keenest satires; but to discover the secret of immortal story-telling we must keep our eye fixed on the impossible and entrancing adventures of the only Gulliver known to the child—a Gulliver in whom there is no guile. To some extent the same is true of the Alice, who is taking much the same place as Gulliver in our childhood, and whose adventures are as often interpreted or transposed to please the wise and prudent. If a story is capable of hidden meanings, so much the better, but it is never the hidden meaning that makes the story, and the strange thing about "Gulliver" is that it was written as a satire for the wise and prudent and succeeds in delighting babes.

The "Tales from Shakespeare," by Charles and Mary Lamb, are another part of our national inheritance in stories, and Messrs. Dent issue a new edition, also illustrated by Mr. Rackham, on the lines of some earlier drawings. We are all bound to know Shakespeare, whether we like it or not, and we should know his stories even if the Lambs had not thought of writing their version in prose. But it is strange how very little we know of Spenser's stories, though they should form part of our birthright on the Celtic or mother's side. In "The Faery Queen and her Knights" Mr. Alfred Church has tried to do for the Spenserian poem what he has done already for the Homeric. It is not the first time, we think, that the experiment has been made, but Mr. Church is a good story-teller, and he may bring the allegories of chivalry out of their neglect.

Leaving the classics, we are brought suddenly to modern times with "Selected Tales of Mystery," by Edgar Allan Poe, illustrated by Byam Shaw, and in that strange genius, from whom both Stevenson and Conan Doyle seem to have sprung, we see the story-teller of to-day discovering his themes in a world that is so often called commonplace. Yet the themes are no less mysterious and no less exciting than the adventures of Sindbad or Gulliver. And then, in contrast to Poe, side by side with him, someone has placed "The Water Babies"—a pretty little edition, illustrated by Alice Woodward—and Tom also seems on his way to immortality, as a kind of baby Sindbad, with his adventures under the sea instead of on it. How "The Deserted Village"—a large edition, illustrated by W. Lee Hankey—comes to stand next "The Water Babies" we are not sure, unless it is that the theme of Goldsmith's poem is also immortal, or will survive as long as there are landowners and Lords.

Then at last, in Mrs. Andrew Lang's "Red Book of Heroes," we come to the tales which, we suppose, must be counted as part of history—the immortal tales of Hannibal, Montrose, Sir Thomas More, Gordon, Father Damien, and others beside—but even in these stories of reality we see that their essential quality is their impossibility. Everyone would have called it impossible for human beings to do what these men did, or what Joan of Arc did, or Florence Nightingale and other heroic women. That is why human beings are never tired of hearing their stories, for, in the end, man's chief delight is to break through the limits that the world of "hard facts" or comfortable routine is always laying upon him.

He longs for the wind and clang of Troy; for deep woods and misty headlands, where birds and beasts will consort with him on terms of friendship, and strange figures live, endowed with magic powers; for sacred rivers, and marvellous queens, and spirits that can carry golden palaces through the air. And, again, he delights in grotesque adventures among large or little people, and horses that can speak, and things absurd. He likes to see before his eyes the vision of the world's incredible glory and terror—kings and queens in their crimes, lovers in their sorrows and joy, merchants with their corded bales, children on the green, uncouth creatures under the waves, the wicked hatching their knavish plots, the brave and honorable rising above the capacities of man. Such are the themes of the stories which last from one age to another, and perhaps one cannot find any common quality that distinguishes them all. But if we were obliged to fix on such a quality, we should still find it in that silly word "impossibility"—a splendid impossibility. All the best stories may be called impossible, and man loves them so long as they encourage his eternal revolt against the trammels with which fate and law and prudence perpetually try to exclude his spirit from realms where it would so much like to live happily ever after.

THE FAIRY QUEEN'S MARK.*

If children were to be allowed, just once, to choose the books that are packed into Santa Claus's sledge every Christmas Eve, I believe there would be a book war, or rather a book revolution, in the nursery. All sorts of finely-bound, finely-printed volumes would be hurled to the tumbrils, and the shops would be searched for real story-books—books that have the Fairy Queen's own mark upon them. These might or might not be illustrated; the cover design would not matter. In the nursery, it is the story, and not the pictures, by which a book stands or falls; and if you want to know the kind of story-book that has been sealed by the Fairy Queen, you have only to go to the nursery bookshelf, and to pass over the splendid, gilt-edged aristocrats of it, until you come to one that has probably lost its cover and some of its pictures as well—a shabby-looking tramp of a book that boasts every sign of having been loved, from thumbmarks on its favorite pages to tattered edges and loose sheets. That is the kind of book that came originally out of Fairyland. But, unluckily for the nursery, it is not always the book that finds its way into Santa Claus's sledge on Christmas Eve.

Children, however, not having yet succeeded in abolishing the censorship of the nursery, are still at the mercy of the grown-up person with the purse. This would not matter so much if grown-up people went about their job in a more imaginative way—if they would take the trouble, in the first place, to recall the kind of books they used to like in the nursery of fifty years ago. But when grown-up people go into a shop to buy a Christmas book, they generally begin by looking for a name they know; and this method, working admirably when the name they know happens, for instance, to be Hans Andersen's, does not give a chance to the latest genius arrived from Fairyland, and it breaks down altogether when the name happens merely to be that of the illustrator. I know it is not possible to speak of children in the mass when it comes to subtler matters of taste, and I quite sympathise with the grown-up person who grasps at a name he thinks he has heard before, when he is going to give a book to somebody else's child. But he ought to know, if he has any memory at all, that the nursery of all the ages has certain broad views about story-books that never change. To mention only two of them, it invariably puts the story before the pictures, and it resents the cajolery of the apologetic preface.

I am glad to find that Miss Ethel Reader agrees with me about the preface, for this is how she begins hers: "A preface is a very difficult thing to write, because you see, Frances, when you have put all you have to say in the book, there is nothing left for the preface but what you haven't to say." But if she thinks this, why does she spoil it by adding: "Still, a book is not a proper book without a preface, and you know I would not for worlds write an improper book"? We do not know this, though willing to believe it, nor are we called Frances; and we do not want to be told where the author found the material for her stories, because, if she is the right sort of author, there is only one place where it could have come from. The Fairy Queen is the proper person to write a preface to a fairy book, and she writes it invisibly every time she waves her wand over the person who writes the fairy book. I think it is a pity the writer of "The Little Mermaid" forgot this, for her story is a thoroughly good one, and needs no preface. Its main idea is that of Andersen's tragic romance, but with a difference—a modern difference, as we suspect, on reading that "a mermaid can get a soul by marrying a mortal, but a merman can't; the mortal loses hers, which is rather unfair. If I were a mermaid, I shouldn't want to turn into a woman." Neither of the two stories that make up this volume can be labelled particularly modern, however; they belong to the real fairy age, and show both fancy and humor. Just because of these good qualities, one rather regrets little errors of taste, such as a tendency to be too familiar with the reader, to shiver a fairy atmosphere with an allusion to Brooke's soap, and to play upon words—the Mer-people, we are told, are sad because the water is blue, "so that they practically live in the blues." Still, "The Little Mermaid" ought to go into several stockings this Christmas.

I am not so sure about "The Fortunate Princes," although it has no preface, and the pictures, by Harry Rountree, are interesting. In the nursery of all the ages there exists a dislike, not to a moral, because every healthy child likes a story to have a moral, but to the story that says it has one. Most of the stories in this volume err in this way, except the last one, which the writer winds up by saying: "And the moral of this story is just what one chooses to think it may be." That is as it should be in every story; so why does the author trouble to mention it? On the whole, I think the Fairy Queen forgot to wave her wand when "The Fortunate Princes" was being written.

She seems to have remembered to do so when the pictures in "The Story of Forget-me-not and Lily-of-the-

* "The Little Mermaid." By Ethel Reader. Macmillan. 3s. 6d.
"The Fortunate Princes; and Other Stories." By A. D. Bright. Duckworth. 1s. 6d. net.

"Forget-me-Not and Lily-of-the-Valley." By Maurice Baring. Nisbet. 2s. net.

"The Rainbow Book." By Mrs. M. H. Spielmann. Chatto & Windus. 5s. net.

"Old Man's Beard." By G. M. Faulding. Dent. 4s. 6d. net.

"The Castle of Four Towers." By Netta Syrett. Duckworth. 2s. 6d. net.

"The Forest Foundling." By S. H. Hamer. Duckworth. 2s. 6d. net.

"The Irish Fairy Book." Edited by Alfred Percival Graves. Fisher Unwin. 6s.

"Fairy Tales from Tuscany." By Isabella M. Anderton. Chatto & Windus. 1s. net.

"Popular Fairy Tales." By Hans Christian Andersen. Blackie. 2s.

"Lob-lie-by-the-Fire; and Other Stories." By Juliana Horatia Ewing. Bell. 2s. 6d. net.

"The Rose and the Ring." By Mr. M. A. Titmarsh (W. M. Thackeray). Chatto & Windus. 3s. 6d. net.

"Mokey, the Autobiography of a Donkey." Translated from the French of Mme. de Ségur by Kathleen Clare Watson. Jarrold. 3s. 6d.

The Best New Books

- THE MERRY PAST. 12/6 net.
RALPH NEVILL.
ENGLAND AND THE ENGLISH.
7/6 net. PRICE COLLIER.
THE HILLS AND THE VALE. 6/-
RICHARD JEFFERIES.
BEGGARS. 6/- W. H. DAVIES.

The Best Fine Art Books.

- LONDON: 20 Photogravures.
25/- net. A. L. COBURN & H. BELLOC.
A HISTORY OF AQUATINT
ENGRAVING. 15/- net. S. T. PRIDEAUX.
LIVES OF BRITISH ARCHITECTS.
7/6 net. E. B. CHANCELLOR.
THE SCHOOL OF MADRID.
7/6 net. BERUETE-y-MORET.
AUGUSTE RODIN. 7/6 net.
CAMILLE MAUCLAIR.

The Best Theology.

- FAITH. 2/6 net. W. R. INGE, D.D.
A CRITICAL INTRODUCTION TO THE NEW TESTAMENT.
2/6 net. A. S. PEAKE, D.D.
PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION.
2/6 net. H. RASHDALL, M.A., D.L.
THE UNFINISHED SYMPHONY.
6/- HUGH FALCONER, B.D.
SCIENCE AND RELIGION.
8/- net. EMILE BOUTROUX.

The Best Plays.

- THREE PLAYS. 6/- MRS. W. K. CLIFFORD.
PLAYS. 6/- JOHN GALSWORTHY.

The Best Novels.

- VILLA RUBEIN. 6/- JOHN GALSWORTHY.
THE TRADER. 6/- CECIL ROSS JOHNSON.
MARGARET HEVER. 6/-
ELIZABETH MARTINDALE.
ELIZABETH VISITS AMERICA.
6/- ELINOR GLYN.

The Best Children's Books.

Ask to see Duckworth's New Books for Children at any good Booksellers. They are the best Books of the Season. Illustrated in colour. Write for Prospectus.

The Best Boys' Books.

- A SCOUT'S STORY. 3/6 OWEN VAUGHAN.
OLD FIREPROOF. 6/- OWEN RHOSCOMYL.
A SON OF THE SEA. 3/6
JOHN A. BARRY.
PARTNERS OF PROVIDENCE.
3/6 J. A. STEWART.

DUCKWORTH & CO., COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

MR. HEINEMANN'S NEW BOOKS.

THE HEART OF THE ANTARTIC

By Sir ERNEST SHACKLETON, C.V.O.

2 vols., fully Illustrated in Colour and from Photographs,
cr. 4to, 36s. net.

AUTOGRAPH EDITION DE LUXE.—Limited to 300 Numbered Copies, each signed by Sir Ernest Shackleton and the members of the Shore Party, with additional Illustrations and Text, printed on Dutch Hand-made Paper with special water-mark, medium 4to, vellum, £10 10s. net.

ITALIAN HOURS

By HENRY JAMES.

Illustrated in Colour by JOSEPH PENNELL. Demy 4to, 25s. net.

THE LAND OF THE LION

By Dr. W. S. RAINSFORD.

Fully Illustrated, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

CHRISTIANS AT MECCA

By AUGUSTUS RALLI.

Illustrated. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

MR. RACKHAM'S NEW BOOK.

UNDINE

Adapted from the German by W. L. Courtney.

Illustrated in Colour by ARTHUR RACKHAM. Crown 4to, 7s. 6d. net.

N.B.—This is the only entirely New and Original Work by Mr. Rackham to be published this year.

Illustrated by the same Artist.

THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS

Crown 4to, 15s. net.

CATHEDRAL CITIES OF SPAIN

By W. W. COLLINS, R.I.

With 60 Water-Colour Drawings by the Author. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.
Also an Edition de Luxe, 42s. net.

ORPHEUS:

A Universal History of Religions.

by Dr. SALOMON REINACH, Author of "Apollo."
Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

MEMOIRS OF THE DUCHESSE DE DINO

Demy 8vo, 10s. net.

THE GREAT FRENCH REVOLUTION

By P. A. KROPOTKIN. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

THE TRIBUNAL OF THE TERROR:

A Study of Paris in 1793-95.

By G. LENOTRE. Profusely Illustrated, demy 8vo, 10s. net.

THE RETURN OF LOUIS XVIII., 1814-15

By GILBERT STENGER. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 10s. net.

MR. DE MORGAN'S NEW BOOK.

IT NEVER CAN HAPPEN AGAIN

By WILLIAM DE MORGAN.

In two volumes, uniform with the Author's "Joseph Vance,"
"Alice-for-Short," and "Somehow Good." Crown 8vo, 10s.

"It is indeed a worthy companion to 'Joseph Vance' and its two successors.... In Mr. De Morgan's new book we should estimate that there are about 300,000 words, and the most eloquent testimony to his charm is that we do not find it in any way too much."—Daily Telegraph.

BELLA DONNA

By ROBERT HICHENS.

2 vols., fcap. 8vo, 4s. net., or 1 vol., cr. 8vo, 6s.

"One of the best novels we have ever read, and quite the best that Mr. Hichens has written."—Saturday Review.

LEAVES

By VIOLET CLARKE. Cr. 8vo, 5s.

Heinemann's Library of Modern Fiction

THE HUNGRY HEART

By D. G. PHILLIPS. 1 vol., 3s. net.

THE STREET OF ADVENTURE

By PHILIP GIBBS. 1 vol., 3s. net.

HEDWIG IN ENGLAND

By the Author of "Marcia in Germany." 1 vol., 3s. net.

BEYOND MAN'S STRENGTH

By M. HARTLEY. 1 vol., 3s. net.

A SENSE OF SCARLET

By Mrs. HENRY DUDENEY. 1 vol., 3s. net.

THE WHITE PROPHET

By HALL CAINE. 2 vols., 4s. net.

THE MAGNETIC NORTH

By ELIZABETH ROBINS. Popular Edition. Cloth, 2s. net.

Mr. Heinemann's Illustrated List post free.

London: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

valley" were being painted, for they are just the kind of simple and accurately-drawn illustrations that the nursery likes and understands. Probably they are not good from the strictly artistic point of view. I am not sure about that, but I do know that the humor and the color of them will appeal to all little children, who will also like the story of the spring flowers and the summer flowers who were jealous of one another, and of the sentimental Lizard who went to a school kept by a Dormouse because he wanted to learn to be lazy, and of the Butterfly who had the same brilliant idea as the Lizard, because "only idle people have time to think right." One can forgive Mr. Maurice Baring his little preface because it has rather an exciting piece of information in it that may please his small readers.

More pretentious is "The Rainbow Book," though not so pretentious as its preface, which would be better placed as an introduction to a collection of folk tales. When people turn fairy stories into folk-lore, one has to put up with a preface—I mean, with a foreword, that talks about the origin of fairy rings, and the inner meaning of the fairy story, and so on. But Mrs. Spielman, as you can tell from her preface, which is directed against these scientific mistakes, ought not to do this sort of thing, for it does not give her book a sporting chance with the nursery, which, or, at all events, that portion of it that likes fairy life and real life to touch in a fairy tale, would otherwise enjoy reading about children like themselves who have adventures in Wizardland, or in Fairyland itself. However, as there are a great many pictures by important people, with names like Rackham, and Partridge, and Thomson, and Baumer, and Wilhelm, that the grown-up person is sure to recognise directly he hears them, this book will certainly get into the nursery without any help from the Fairy Queen or me or anybody else.

Real life and fairy life are again blended, and very charmingly, in the collection of stories called "Old Man's Beard." Here the writer, G. M. Faulding, has kept the two elements distinct, the scene of all the stories being placed in Fairyland, and only knit into a whole by a delightful mortal mother called Teller-of-Tales. They are really imaginative and well written, and I fancy the nursery will find the fairy mark upon them. The tale of "The Dustman" is a particularly good one, telling about a land where there is no bedtime because the Dustman never goes there, until the boy Mark finds a bag of his magic dust, and sprinkles it over the people; and the description of the bored people who have to sit up all night telling the same stories over and over again, because they can never go to bed and dream new ones, conceals a moral which will not be far to seek in a suspicious nursery that never wants to go to bed of its own accord.

Netta Syrett has gone to a country that is itself a colony of Fairyland for a real setting to her tale of "The Castle of Four Towers." It is the story of a little English girl, belonging to the "nowadays people," who comes to stay in an old castle outside Padua, and makes friends with a little boy who lived in the "long-ago time," and only appears to her when she is playing alone. Dino calls up for her the animals after whom the various quarters of the city are named, including a beautiful dragon; so I hope the grown-up person with the purse will not fail to come across this book in the Christmas shop, for it bears a name that he will certainly know, and the nursery always loves a fairy story that has plenty of animals in it.

For this reason "The Forest Foundling," by S. H. Hamer, with its admirable illustrations by Harry Rountree, ought to be plentifully packed inside the fairy sledge on Christmas Eve. It is just the sort of story children will like, telling of a little boy, called Gilbert—this pleased the squirrel because it reminded him of filbert—who is educated by one forest animal after another, learning to climb from the squirrel, to swim from the frog, and so on, having fine adventures by the way, from a battle of rabbits to a tussle with a pike. It goes straight ahead, is never instructive, though only a natural history sort of person could have written it, and never stops being interesting for a single page.

The fairies are of the right sort in two story-books that belong by nature to the nursery of all the ages—"The Irish Fairy Book" and "Fairy Tales from Tuscany."

They certainly bear the Fairy Queen's mark, not so much because the modern writers who present them to us in these two volumes have come within the circling of her wand, but rather because the two countries that gave birth to the stories have been part of her dominions ever since the world began. So there is no need to praise these stories of the soil, and Santa Claus will carry them in his bag when he comes down the chimney, whether the grown-up person has bought them or not.

And then, there are writers of all the ages that need no word from me or from anyone who stands knocking hungrily at the gates of Fairyland, through which these greater ones have passed so easily—Hans Andersen, Horatia Ewing, "Mr. M. A. Titmarsh." "Popular Fairy Tales" by the first, "Lob-lie-by-the Fire" by the second, "The Rose and the ring" by the third;—all the new illustrations in the world, and they are the best of new illustrations, by the way, will not turn these into anything but the immortal nursery books of yesteryear. To them we might also add the "Autobiography of a Donkey," by Mme. de Ségur, now promoted to a Christmas book by a translation from the old French reading book, also of yesteryear. The grown-up people with purses will inevitably remember names like these four, and their books will as inevitably find their way into Santa Claus's sledge on Christmas Eve. That is what comes of being stamped for all time with the Fairy Queen's own mark.

EVELYN SHARP.

BOOKS OF 'THE OPEN AIR.*

A WEEK after Christmas the New Year begins. The planet swings and begins to toast itself in the sun, to call up the flowers, the bees, the birds, till the full revel of midsummer is accomplished. And just as in thinking of a room we think not merely of the door but of the heart of the fireside, so the thought most seasonable to Christmas is the thought of picnicking by some babbling stream in the forest. How is it that we did not take old John and the pony cart with our pots and kettles, our teepees, and one or two town cousins, and go for a week's real adventure in the Hampshire woodland last summer? Chiefly it was because we had not then read Mrs. Margaret Clayton's charming account of a similar expedition. Now, as we read of the cooking adventures, the interviews with wild animals, and those of the farm, we are smitten with a longing to go and do likewise, a longing that will not be appeased till we have made our tents and tried them. The colored pictures alone are enough to make the resolve firm. But at the same time comes to our Christmas fireside the "Children's Book of the Garden," with its colored plates of ourselves standing, watering-pot or spade in hand, among the wonderful flowers we have raised. As we turn the pages we come upon lists of the flowers we may grow, and discussion waxes hot about the relative merits of colored primrose, larkspur, or sweet lavender. And the gardening book has this advantage, that we need not wait till summer to put its precepts into practice, for there are insidious directions for mulching, double-digging, and other winter preparation that can be put into practice on the first fine day. This is undoubtedly a first-rate book of the garden. We would commend it to the adult as much as to the child, but, whereas the adult has many such books, it is almost or quite the only one written with a true appreciation of what is wanted for the children.

"Nature Stalking for Boys" is meant to appeal especially to the Boy Scouts. The Chief Scout has written an introduction in which he says that "creeping up to and watching the habits of wild animals or discovering new kinds

* "Camping in the Forest." By Margaret Clayton. Chatto & Windus.

"The Children's Book of Gardening." By Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick and Mrs. Paynter. Black. 6s.

"Nature Stalking for Boys." By W. Percival Westell. Dent. 3s. 6d. net.

"The World of Animal Life." Edited by Fred Smith. Blackie. 5s. net.

"The Animal Why Book." By W. P. Pycraft. Wells, Gardner, Darton & Co. 5s. net.

"Biffel, a Trek Ox." By Stanley Portal Hyatt. Melrose. 6s. net.

"The Children's Book of the Bee." By S. L. Bensusan. Mills & Boon. 5s. net.

NISBET'S CHRISTMAS LIST.REGINALD BOSWORTH SMITH.

A Memoir of the famous Schoolmaster and Writer. By his Daughter, Lady GROGAN. Demy 8vo, 10/6 net.
The Morning Post says: "Lady Grogan's memoir of her father is a delightful book about one of the most charming men of our time."

3rd Large Impression Now Ready.

MY LIFE AMONG THE BLUE-JACKETS

By AGNES WESTON. 6/- net.
The Standard says: "The record of her life which this volume contains is one of the most stirring autobiographies of modern times."

ITALY TO-DAY. New and Revised Edition.

By BOLTON KING and THOMAS OKEY. 6/- net.
"It is compact, pleasant to read, and trustworthy. . . . This is undoubtedly a good handbook."—Saturday Review.

A HISTORY OF ITALIAN UNITY.

(1814-1871). By BOLTON KING, M.A. In 2 Volumes. With Maps and Plans. 24/- net.

BETWEEN COLLEGE TERMS.

By CONSTANCE L. MAYNARD, Mistress of Westfield College. Extra Crown 8vo, 5/- net.
A volume of essays by a well-known educationalist.

LESSER LYRICS.

A Volume of short Poems. By CONSTANCE EVAN JONES. Author of "Caprice," &c. Ex. Cr. 8vo. 2/- net.

OUR NATIONAL DRINK BILL.

Its direct and indirect Effects upon National Health, Morals Industry and Trade. By JOHN NEWTON. 1/- net.

WORKS BY JOHN A. HOBSON.

Large Crown 8vo, each 2/6 net.

THE SOCIAL PROBLEM. Life and Work.
JOHN RUSKIN. Social Reformer.

WORKS BY HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P.

Demy 8vo, each 5/- net.

DANTON: A Study. With Portrait.
ROBESPIERRE. A Study and Biography. With Portrait.

CHRISTMAS GIFT BOOKS.Katharine Tynan's New Story.*KITTY AUBREY. Illustrated, 6/-.

"'Kitty Aubrey' is the best young lady's novel we have read for a long time."—Daily Chronicle.

L. T. Meade's New Story.BLUE OF THE SEA. Illustrated, 6/-.

"It is an altogether charming book, and written with all that detail of characterisation for which Mrs. Meade is famed."—Liverpool Post.

THE COMING OF NAVARRE.

A Stirring New Story for Boys. By O. V. CAINE. 5/-.

By the Same Author.

FACE TO FACE WITH NAPOLEON. Cloth, 2/6 and 2/-.

IN THE YEAR OF WATERLOO. Cloth, 2/6 and 2/-.

MY LADY BELLAMY.

A Spirited and Stimulating New Story for Girls. By DOROTHEA MOORE. 5/-.

By the Same Author.

BROWN: a Story of Waterloo Year. 1/6.

A PLUCKY SCHOOLGIRL. 2/6.

Two Charming Books for Children.THE STORY OF FORGET-ME-NOT.

By the Hon. MAURICE BARING. With Coloured Illustrations. 2/- net.

THE STORY OF LITTLE BLACK BOBTAIL.

By the Author of "Little Black Mingo." With Coloured Illustrations. Picture Boards, 1/- net; Cloth, 1/6.

J. NISBET & CO. Ltd.,
22, Berners Street, London, W.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS.THE OXFORD ENGLISH TEXTS.

Library Edition. 8vo. Uniformly bound in Cloth, with Paper Labels. The Texts carefully Collated with the Original Editions.

TWO NEW VOLUMES.CAMPION'S WORKS.

Edited by PERCIVAL VIVIAN. 10s. 6d. net.

SPENSER'S POETICAL WORKS

(The Faerie Queen, Vols. II—III). Edited by J. C. SMITH. 18s. net.

QUESTIONINGS ON CRITICISM AND BEAUTY.

By the Rt. Hon. A. J. BALFOUR. 2s. net.

THE CENTENARY OF TENNYSON, 1909.

By T. H. WARREN. 8vo, 1s. net.

SIR WILLIAM ANSON'S BOOKS.THE LAW AND CUSTOM OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Vol. I. PARLIAMENT. Fourth Edition, 12s. 6d. net.
Vol. II. The CROWN. Third Edition. Part I., 10s. 6d. net. Part II., 8s. 6d. net.

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF THE SMALL LANDOWNER.

The Ford Lectures, 1909. By A. H. JOHNSON. 5s. net.

A HISTORY OF SECONDARY EDUCATION IN SCOTLAND.

An Account of Scottish Secondary Education from Early Times to the Education Act of 1908. By J. STRONG. 7s. 6d. net.

EVRIPIDIS FABVLAE.

Edited by G. MURRAY. Vol. III. Helena, Phoenissae, Orestes, Bacchae Iphigenia Avlidensis, Rhesus. 3s. 6d. (New Volume Oxford Classical Texts).

THE CULTS OF THE GREEK STATES.

By L. R. FARNELL. Completion of the Work. Vol. V. with 19 Collotypes and 41 other Illustrations, and an Index to the whole work. 18s. 6d. net. Already Published. Vols. I.—IV., with 147 plates, 64s. net.

HORAE SYNOPTICAE.

Contributions to the Study of The Synoptic Problem. By the REV. SIR J. C. HAWKINS. Second Edition, Revised and Supplemented. 10s. 6d. net.

THE HINDRANCES TO GOOD CITIZENSHIP.

By JAMES BRYCE. 6s. net. Immediately. (Yale University Press Publication).

OXFORD LIBRARY OF PROSE & POETRY.

Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net each; lambskin, thin boards, gilt extra, 3s. 6d. net each.

NEW VOLUMES.SELECT POEMS OF WINTHROP MACKWORTH PRAED.

Edited, with an Introduction, by A. D. GODLEY. With a Portrait.

SHELLEY'S LITERARY AND PHILOSOPHICAL CRITICISM.

Edited, with an Introduction, by J. SHAWCROSS.

PEACOCK'S MEMOIRS OF SHELLEY, with Shelley's Letters to Peacock.

Edited, with an Introduction, by H. F. B. BRETT-SMITH. With Portraits of Shelley and Peacock.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL'S FIRESIDE TRAVELS.

With an Introduction by E. V. LUCAS.

A HUNDRED VERSES FROM OLD JAPAN.

Translated by W. N. PORTER. With 100 Illustrations from Japanese woodcuts.

POEMS OF GRAY.

A facsimile reprint of the volume of 1768.

POEMS OF KEATS.

A facsimile reprint of the volume of 1820.

Clarendon Press Catalogue (160 pages) post free on application.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, E.C.

of insects or plants, is all part of the work of a Scout." Because it gives, through the study of God's works, a better knowledge of God, Sir R. Baden-Powell especially recommends nature study "for scouting on Sundays." It is possible, however, that the scout who takes up the fascinating study of field natural history will see that he gets more than one Sunday in the week. Mr. Westell's books are always well illustrated. We have here all manner of pictures of protective mimicry, hints, says the Chief Scout, "in the great art of taking cover and adaptability to natural surroundings," of birds' nests, insect changes, and other matters of interest. A good many of these are stereographs, and the publishers very thoughtfully provide a cheap pair of twin glasses through which these nature pictures can be seen in all their roundness.

Mr. Smith's "World of Animal Life," of which a new edition is here presented, gives in attractive form a sound scientific view of the whole of animal creation. No boy worth his salt can find this a dull book. Sooner or later, he will read it through, and then he will know, perhaps, more than his best uncle about the classification of animals. Even the lad who will not read it, but only uses it for a book of reference, will get the classification into his blood. Naturally, he will not look for the lion among the fishes, if only because they are at opposite ends of the book, but he will soon find it impossible to look for the ant-eater among badgers, or the beaver in the same section as the otter. There are a lot of good illustrations in this book, including an unusually generous supply of skeletons which will prove a great aid to a mastery of the orders. A book of the same sterling merit is "The Animal Why Book," as the name of its author would guarantee. It is almost primarily an art picture-book, being full of paintings by Mr. Edwin Noble, loosely mounted on yellowish-brown paper. These pictures are animated, interesting, and true to life. Mr. Noble does not, for example, fall into the exceedingly common mistake of drawing the summer squirrel with the ear-tufts that belong to it in winter. The description of each subject takes the form, though not too rigidly, of an answer to the questions: Why has the sheep a woolly coat? Why are the horns of sheep branched? Why does the goat wear a beard? and so on. The questions are not all easy to answer, and the information imparted in this catechetic form will stick in the memory. Would many of our readers, for example, have said that the reason why the sheep-dog has a bob-tail is so that he may not be able to steer round short corners, and must, therefore, take the wider sweep that serves better for the rounding up of sheep? We cannot help wondering whether the lynx gets a similar advantage out of his caudal abbreviation. Perhaps Mr. Pycraft will take that subject in hand on some future occasion.

Mr. Hyatt is undoubtedly a master of animal biography, and his life of Biffel, the trek ox, takes high rank in that class of fiction. There is no straining of bovine intelligence here, only the selection of incident whereby we are compelled to admit Biffel to a friendship that makes him seem human. The white man who owns him and whose adventurous waggons Biffel draws with ambitious devotion stands, as most white men do, aloof from the soul of the big black bull. It is his Kaffir driver who understands him, who speaks to him and is understood by him, so that his voice and his hand on his flank make him brave in the flooded river, and can quell the madness of the scent of blood. The reader feels inclined to condemn Mayne for not understanding Biffel as Amous does, but, in reality, Mayne and the reader are equally remote, and it needs the intervention of a more primitive man to put us properly in sympathy with the ox. As for the author, surely he understands a little. Here, for example, are Biffel's supposed sensations on going for the first time into harness:—

"Biffel began to tremble violently. He wanted to fight, to rush away and hurt someone, to vindicate his independence, and yet it seemed impossible; something kept him still. . . . Biffel felt a sudden interest in his work—this was something fresh, a new test of strength, almost as good as a fight. Then he remembered the indignity of it, the way he was being compelled to do what those men wanted, and once again he tried to break free. An instant later, however, that horrible stinging lash curled round him, giving him a hateful sense of impotence and fear."

Biffel is really beaten by the fact that all the other oxen in the traces are submissive. He follows the ruck, just as any man does. But after the first day's work he takes it out of the beast that worked behind him and whose horns had pricked him when he jibbed, feeling much better after the fight. This is also the story of Peter, "a goat with a white man's soul," as the author says in his dedication. He is just a goat with spirit in the story, according to Carton Moore-Park, who illustrates it, a goat that can stand comfortably on the vertical face of a wall. He and Biffel are immense friends, and the defence of Peter from hyenas and other dangers account for some of the bull's most notable feats.

The only thing to be said against Mr. Bensusan's book is that it is not strictly a children's book. Some of the chapters were, perhaps, written for children. They are biographical and more fanciful than the others which are rather genre impressions. These others, we believe, have appeared in the "Spectator," whose pages for the most part are shunned by children. The book is not in that connected form that children like. Otherwise Mr. Bensusan deals pleasantly and clearly with the marvellous insect to which so many literary people have fallen captives. "Three-pointed" is not a correct epithet to apply to the bee's sting, and the idea that bees make tracks in the air that others can see and follow is pure fancy and at variance with known facts. So, in a sense, is the assertion that each bee has its allotted task. But that is a deep subject into which we must not enter here. The book is very readable, and we hope that a future edition will include articles all of one calibre.

SCIENCE FOR YOUNG STUDENTS.*

DR. PHILIP has given us a book covering a very wide field of chemical science, expressed in language so simple and untechnical that it cannot fail to reach the understanding of readers who have little or no knowledge of scientific things, and this without a single chemical formula. Throughout this really fascinating book the author never loses an opportunity of showing the applications of the facts of chemistry to the ordinary requirements of life. On reading a work of this kind, what will strike the average "educated" person most is his own ignorance of the nature and mode of action of some of the most ordinary appliances with which he is familiar. How many members of an average household, for example, can explain the nature of the incandescent mantles which they use daily, or of railway carriage foot-warmers with their long-continued heat, to say nothing of the structure of an ordinary candle or coal flame? These and a thousand other things experienced in common life are explained in this book in a most interesting, and yet scientifically accurate, way.

The relations of chemistry and electricity are dealt with briefly in one chapter devoted entirely to electrolysis—that is, the splitting up of compound bodies into their constituents by means of electric currents. Radium is barely mentioned; but then the nature of radium and the extent to which it affects the principles of chemistry need find no place in a work dealing with the broad facts of the subject. Two very short chapters near the end of the book, "Some Interesting Facts about Solutions" and "From Solutions to Crystals," contain a surprisingly large number of facts of a fundamental character which cannot fail to interest any reader; but, indeed, simplicity of exposition and interest of subject-matter are characteristic of almost every chapter in the book.

Mr. Scott Elliot presents us with a work of a distinctly popular character. Treatises on botany are usually of the catalogue kind—long lists of genera and species with Greek or Latin names, and elaborate details as to structure. The plan of this book is so different that it appeals to the understanding of ordinary readers who, while taking an interest in such a fascinating subject, are unversed in botanical technicalities. There is, for example, a chapter

* "The Romance of Modern Chemistry." By James C. Philip, D.Sc., Ph.D. Seeley. 5s.

"The Botany of To-day: A Popular Account of Recent Notable Discoveries." By G. F. Scott Elliot. Seeley. 5s.

"Aerial Navigation of To-day: A Popular Account of the Evolution of Aeronautics." By Charles C. Turner. Seeley. 5s.

"Locomotives of the World." By the Rev. J. R. Howden. Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton.

CONSTABLE & COMPANY.

The Two Most Beautiful Books of the Season.

THE DESERTED VILLAGE.

By OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

Illustrated by W. LEE HANKEY.

4to, cloth, 15s. net. EDITION DE LUXE, limited to 250 Copies, 42s. net.

"Messrs. Constable offer an illustrated edition of Goldsmith's famous poem, which has probably never been surpassed for the quality of its illustrations. . . . The illustrator brings to the work much more than merely artistic skill and taste. He has steeped himself in the quiet charm of that imaginary but very real little English village, and in the touching simplicity of the little events that mean so much to its inhabitants. . . . No daintier Christmas present could be given to anyone than this."

—Daily Telegraph.

GRIMM'S FAIRY TALES.

Illustrated by ARTHUR RACKHAM.

4to, cloth, 15s. net.

"The best of Mr. Rackham's work."—Westminster Gazette. "His best work is here, and all of his characteristic style."—Daily News. "The most interesting of the Rackham publications . . . as a gift-book it could scarcely be surpassed."—Birmingham Post.

SHERIDAN.

By WALTER SICHEL. 2 vols. Illustrated. 31s. 6d. net.

"A brilliant achievement."—Pall Mall Gazette."Two admirably written and finely illustrated volumes."—The Outlook.

A New Book by Professor Lanciani.

WANDERINGS IN THE ROMAN CAMPAGNA.

By RODOLFO LANCIANI. Author of "The Golden Days of the Renaissance in Rome," &c. Richly Illustrated. 4to., 21s. net.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.

THE WORKS OF GEORGE MEREDITH.
MEMORIAL EDITION.

In 25 or 27 handsome volumes. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net per vol. Limited to 1,500 Copies. Subscriptions taken in Sets only. Four volumes to be published before Christmas.

HOGARTH'S LONDON.

By H. B. WHEATLEY, F.S.A. Profusely Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

LONDON LIFE OF YESTERDAY.

By ARTHUR COMPTON RICKETT, M.A., LL.D. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Daily News.—"Mr. Rickett throws picture after picture on the sheet, each clear-cut and arresting, the whole forming, as it were, a pageant of the pride and power of London."

THE GIRLHOOD OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.

By F. A. MUMBY. With an Introduction by R. S. RAIT, M.A. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

The Globe.—"An exceedingly interesting and attractive narrative."

PEAKS AND GLACIERS OF NUN KUN.

By FANNY BULLOCK WORKMAN and WILLIAM HUNTER WORKMAN. Illustrated. 4to, 18s. net.

"Mountaineers and general readers alike will derive exceptional pleasure from Dr. and Mrs. Workman's latest book of exploration."—Pall Mall Gazette.

CERE'S RUNAWAY, and other Essays.

By ALICE MEYNELL. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

The Globe.—"We read on, fascinated and bewitched, from the first page to the last."

MISS SILBERRAD'S NEW NOVEL.

ORDINARY PEOPLE.

By UNA L. SILBERRAD,

Author of "The Good Comrade," "Desire," &c. 6s.

NOW READY AT ALL LIBRARIES & BOOKSELLERS.

Full List of Announcements on Application.

CONSTABLE & CO Ltd 10 Orange Street London WC

The BOOKS OF THE SEASON

The Temple Shakespeare.

Edited by ISRAEL GOLLANCZ, with Prefaces, Notes and Glossaries. With Etched Frontispieces by H. H. Crickmore, and from portraits and title-pages by Walter Crane. 40 vols. Cloth, 1s. net; roan, 1s. 6d. net.

Also The Larger Temple Shakespeare. In addition to Prefaces, Notes, and Glossary to each play, contains numerous Antiquarian and Topographical Illustrations from Old Prints, &c. Many plates from Portraits, &c. 12 vols. Square crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net per vol. 3 or 4 plays to a volume.

Illustrated English Essays.

Per vol., 3s. 6d. net.

DOUGLAS JERROLD. Edited, with Introduction, by WALTER JERROLD. Illustrations by H. M. BROCK. ESSAYS OF ELIA AND LAST ESSAYS OF ELIA. With an Introduction by AUGUSTINE BIRRELL. In 2 volumes, 7s. net. Illustrated by C. E. BROCK. LEIGH HUNT. Edited, with an Introduction, by ARTHUR SYMONS. Illustrated by H. M. BROCK. SIR ROGER DE COVERLEY AND OTHER ESSAYS FROM THE SPECTATOR. Edited, with an Introduction, by ARTHUR SYMONS. Illustrated by H. M. BROCK. THE BREAKFAST TABLE SERIES, 3 vols. THE POET. THE AUTOCRAT. THE PROFESSOR. By OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES. Illustrated by H. M. BROCK.

The Novels of Honore de Balzac.

An entirely new translation of the COMEDIE HUMAINE. Edited by GEORGE SAINTSBURY. Translated by Miss Ellen Marriage, Mrs. Clara Bell, and James Waring. With 3 etchings in each volume. 40 vols. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net per vol. Full list of volumes free on application.

The Novels of Captain Marryat.

Edited by R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON. Illustrated with 3 Etchings in each vol. 22 vols. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net per vol. List of volumes free on application.

Thackeray's Prose Works.

Edited by WALTER JERROLD, with Bibliographical Introductions. Illustrated by Charles E. Brock, with 300 Drawings in Crayon and Line; also with Portraits and Topographical Drawings in Photogravure, and many Reproductions from Drawings by the Author. 30 vols. Small crown 8vo, 3s. net per vol. List of volumes free on application.

Dickens' Christmas Stories.

Each volume has 8 Full-page Coloured Illustrations from Water-Colour Drawings by C. E. Brock, together with many Line Drawings by the same artist.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL.
THE BATTLE OF LIFE.
THE CHIMES.
THE CRICKET ON THE HEARTH.
THE HAUNTED MAN.

5 volumes. Large fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net per vol.; vellum, 5s. net per vol.

Scott's Waverley Novels.

Temple Edition.

Edited, with Bibliographical Introductions by CLEMENT K. SHORTER. Arranged Chronologically, with the Original Prefaces, Notes, Glossaries, &c. With Photogravure Frontispieces by Herbert Railton, and from Portraits. 48 vols. Pott 8vo. Per Volume—Cloth 1s. 6d. net; lambskin leather, 2s. net. List of volumes free on application.

The Works of John Ruskin.

Everyman Edition.

Cloth, 1s. net; leather, 2s. net; Aldine Morocco, 2s. 6d. net per volume. Also in boxes. With all the original Illustrations in Colour, Line, and Tone.

These are not merely cheap books, but are beautifully reproduced, and make admirable Christmas gifts.

VOLUMES NOW READY.

MODERN PAINTERS. In 5 vols. Introduction by LIONEL CUST.

PRE-RAPHAELITISM, LECTURES ON ARCHITECTURE AND PAINTING, ACADEMY NOTES, 1855-1859, and NOTES ON THE TURNER GALLERY. Introduction by LAURENCE BINYON.

SESAME AND LILIES, THE TWO PATHS, and THE KING OF THE GOLDEN RIVER. Introduction by Sir OLIVER LODGE.

THE ELEMENTS OF DRAWING AND PERSPECTIVE. Introduction by "A Student of Ruskin."

THE SEVEN LAMPS OF ARCHITECTURE. In 3 vols. Introduction by SELWYN IMAGE.

THE STONES OF VENICE. In 3 vols. Introduction by L. MARCH PHILLIPS.

UNTO THIS LAST, THE POLITICAL ECONOMY OF ART (re-issued in 1880 as "A Joy for Ever"), and ESSAYS IN POLITICAL ECONOMY (subsequently re-issued in "Munera Pulveris"). Introduction by Sir OLIVER LODGE.

CROWN OF WILD OLIVE.

Illustrated Catalogue sent post free on application.

J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD.,

ALDINE HOUSE,
BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

on the "Sense-Life and Sensibility" of plants, in which the author discusses the question as to whether plants have a "consciousness," a purposeful action, "taste," and "feeling," such as those possessed by animals. On such a question as this human beliefs and prejudices give way slowly; but it seems difficult to draw a hard-and-fast line between animals and plants in view of the seemingly purposeful behavior of Venus's Fly Trap, the Nepenthes which is an imitator of the Angler Fish, and the Araujia Sericifera of the Argentine, which is guilty of senseless and useless cruelty in its manner of entrapping and killing butterflies. A very interesting account is given of those wonderful leaf-cutting and farming ants which frequent the region of the Amazon and other parts of South America, as also of the nature and function of bacteria, and of the work which has been done in recent years on the action of electricity and X-rays on the growth of plants. Altogether, the work is full, not only of instruction, but of keen interest for all readers.

Not merely the readers but the students of a work such as Mr. Turner's will be counted by thousands, because it deals with the most engrossing branch of modern applied science. A very great merit of this work consists in the lucid exposition of the scientific principles involved in flight through the air, so far as these principles are at present understood. There is, of course, an adequate description of the construction of the various types of dirigibles and aeroplanes, and this is accompanied by excellent photographs and diagrams from which alone the reader may take in at a glance the essential features. Mr. Turner gives a very useful summary of the principles of mechanical flight without the use of mathematical symbols; but we would suggest to him the desirability of adding a few pages in an appendix containing the elementary mathematical theory of the subject for the benefit of those students (and they are many) who are capable of understanding the principles involved. It was, we think, in the year 1907 that Baden Powell published in "Knowledge," a series of papers dealing with the elementary mathematics of flight; and there was little in these papers that even a moderately equipped student could not follow. However, most of the results are given by Mr. Turner, though not in the form of mathematical expressions.

There is one vital problem relating to aeroplanes—the problem of automatic stability—which is still unsolved; and we can say with certainty that, until it is solved, the use of dirigibles and aeroplanes will be extremely limited. Mr. Wilbur Wright seems to think that at present stability depends on the nerve and resource of the operator; but this will not suffice to reassure the public. One naturally thinks that it can be attained by the use of gyroscopes, though Mr. Turner gives reasons for doubting the success of these.

The great question at present is, however, not that of aerial traffic, but the usefulness of airships in war. This is very fully discussed by Mr. Turner; and although his opinion inclines rather to the common-sense view than to that of the enthusiast, he is justly severe on the dilatoriness of Great Britain in aerial navigation: "Britain's dilatoriness in aeronautical matters was characteristic of the country." It is mortifying to find that the unscientific attitude of English Governments has passed into a proverb; but for this deplorable result we have to thank the training of our professional politicians, and the medievalism of the great public schools in which they have been taught.

This work of Mr. Turner's is full of interest, not merely in relation to the mechanics of flight, but also to a host of developments of our scientific knowledge—the direction and strength of currents in the upper air (which he thinks will largely secure for England immunity from invasion), the electrification of the atmosphere, and other things. The book concludes with a set of useful tables containing all kinds of data relating to flight, a glossary of technical terms illustrated by diagrams, and a list of French aeronautical terms which shows how very largely this most modern of practical sciences belongs to France. It is a work in every way instructive and entertaining.

Mr. Howden's book is one in which the school-boy with engineering aspirations will delight. The descriptive matter is not enthralling, but the large colored pictures of the world's engines are just the things in which the young enthusiast delights. If the text is studied in connection with maps of the various countries whose railways are described, much useful information is acquired in an interesting way.

BOOKS FOR GIRLS.

THE fairy tale is by no means dead, as some persons superficially suppose. It is merely masquerading in contemporary garments. Here, for instance, is "Three Fair Maids," by Katharine Tynan (Blackie, 3s. 6d.), which is, in its essence, as much a fairy tale as "Cinderella" or "Beauty and the Beast," although the fair maids live in Ireland and in our own day, instead of in the world of once-upon-a-time. Left with a house and very little income, the two elder sisters, Elizabeth and Joan Burke, persuade their widowed mother to take "paying guests." The guests are all charming persons. One of them wins the heart of Joan, and, after enough uncertainty to create a little interest, marries her. A local nobleman comes home, to fall in love with Delia, the youngest sister, and Elizabeth, the eldest, having subjugated a previously irreconcilable great-uncle, marries the young man who was to have inherited his wealth. Thus each of the three fair maids is provided with a prosperous and devoted spouse, while their various friends on the second plane of the story find partners equally devoted, but not quite so well endowed. As you see—a fairy tale! But a fairy tale of which we feel that it pleased the teller as she "made it up," and which, therefore, even while we perceive its extreme remoteness from actuality, succeeds in pleasing us as we read.

"Christabel in France," by Mrs. Albert G. Latham (Blackie, 3s. 6d.), and "Dick's Angel," by Mrs. Edwin Hohler (Constable, 2s. net), have points in common. In each of them a pair of children are lost from their homes, and remain, most improbably, for a considerable time in the hands of strangers. But, while the adventures of Christabel and her little brother are likely to be in great measure incomprehensible to the ordinary child-reader, those of Angela and Dick are precisely of the kind that children would understand and realise. The naughty, self-indulgent Angela, brought by her own act under the yoke of the stern Mrs. Gubbins, compelled to finish her unappetising rations, to wash in cold water, to dust out a shop cupboard full of heterogeneous stores, and to hem dusters, is a spectacle of which the rather obvious moral goes home without any need of exposition. In "Dick's Angel," although the events are rather "steep," the children themselves are not unnatural; whereas in "Christabel in France," while the events are even more improbable, the children also lack reality. The baby girl, in particular, is, fortunately, quite impossible. Persons whose speech is still barely articulate do not come out on every occasion with a phrase about the happiest (or the nastiest) day "of all me's yife." Neither are such words as "family" found in their vocabulary. The habit of calling herself "dear wee me" might, indeed, be acquired by a young child whose seniors were silly enough to inculcate it, and seniors who habitually called a child "Marybud" were evidently capable of encouraging a good deal of "pose." Affectation and lack of clearness are serious defects in books for children, and they are lamentably prominent in "Christabel in France."

It is a little difficult to decide for what public "Little Sister Snow," by the author of "The Lady of the Decoration" (Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.), is intended. The illustrations—apparently by a Japanese artist—are quite exquisite in their delicacy of composition and of color, and the text has much of the same charm. Of story there is almost none, and the quiet, deep feeling of the close makes it appeal surely rather to the mature than to the young. Yet the earlier pages that deal with trifling incidents of Yuki San's childhood seem to be meant for the reading of her contemporaries. How far the Japan here represented is the Japan of to-day, and not rather the Japan of yesterday, an English reader cannot venture to judge, but it is at least certain that in this gentle-mannered world, refined, remote, full of half-tones, the crude young American is as discordant as a blatant gramophone. We feel quite relieved that Yuki San's romantic fancy for him came to nothing.

"A Book of Brave Girls at Home and Abroad," by Alfred H. Miles (Stanley Paul, 5s.), is a compilation, Messrs. BELL'S BOOKS.

CHRISTMAS GIFTS. Write for Messrs. Bell's Illustrated Catalogue.

The Colour Book of the Year. Crown 8vo, 15s. net.

SAVOY OPERAS. By W. S. GILBERT.

With a new Introduction by the Author. 32 Illustrations in Colour by W. RUSSELL FLINT, and title-page and binding designed by the same artist.

This volume contains the libretti of "The Pirates of Penzance," "Patience," "Princess Ida," and "The Yeomen of the Guard," which have been revised by the author for the purpose.

"The most charming gift book we have had as yet that appeals to lovers of the stage. Therein we get a lively and anecdotal introduction from Sir William Gilbert, and a series of lovely illustrations in full colours by Mr. Russell Flint (remarkable for) admirable play and vivacity of line, the beauty of face and costume, and the felicitous way in which he has caught the sense of dramatic situation. The book is a gem of its kind."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Write for Prospectus and Colour Plate.

With numerous Illustrations. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

A LADY OF THE OLD REGIME.

By ERNEST F. HENDERSON, M.A., Ph.D.

* * An account of Elizabeth Charlotte, Daughter of the Elector Charles Louis and Granddaughter of the Winter King. She married the Duke of Orleans, brother of Louis XIV.

"'Madame' is one of the most vivid and human figures that have come down to us from those glittering times."—Observer.

With 48 Full-page Illustrations and a Map, 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

SICILY, THE GARDEN OF THE MEDITERRANEAN. By WILL S. MONROE, Author of "Turkey and the Turks," "In Viking-land," &c.

Post 8vo, 5s. net.

THE ADVENTURES OF ROBIN-

SON CRUSOE. With many Illustrations in Colour and Black and White, and Title-page, Binding, and End Papers. By GERTRUDE LEESE.

The QUEEN'S TREASURES Series.

Crown 8vo. Each with Eight Illustrations in Colour and specially designed Title-page, Covers and End-papers, 2s. 6d. net.

"To Messrs. George Bell and Sons must hearty praise be given for one of the daintiest, we may say most fragrant, series of reprints which have been offered to the public for many a long day. It was a happy fate which placed these gems of child-fiction in the hands of Miss Wheelhouse for illustration."—Bookman.

Cranford. By MRS. GASKELL. Illustrated by M. V. Wheelhouse.

Cousin Phillis. By Mrs. GASKELL. With an Introduction by Thomas Secombe. Illustrated by M. V. Wheelhouse.

Six to Sixteen. By Mrs. EWING. Illustrated by M. V. Wheelhouse.

A Flat-Iron for a Farthing. By Mrs. EWING. Illustrated by M. V. Wheelhouse.

Jan of the Windmill. By Mrs. EWING. Illustrated by M. V. Wheelhouse.

Mrs. Overthway's Remembrances. By Mrs. EWING. Illustrated by M. V. Wheelhouse.

Lob-lie-by-the-Fire. By Mrs. EWING. Illustrated by Alice B. Woodward.

Little Women. By LOUISA M. ALCOTT. Illustrated by M. V. Wheelhouse.

Write for Prospectus and Colour Plate.

MASTERS OF LITERATURE.

A Series of handy single volumes, containing the finest passages from the works of Great Writers in Prose and Verse, with full Biographical and Critical Introduction and Editorial Connections. Crown 8vo, Illustrated. 3s. 6d. net each.

NOW READY.

SCOTT. By Prof. GRANT.

FIELDING. By Prof. SAINTSBURY.

DEFOE. By JOHN MASEFIELD

CARLYLE. By A. W. EVANS.

FULL PROSPECTUS ON APPLICATION.

LONDON:

GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal St., W.C.

SPLENDID GIFT BOOKS.

When selecting your Christmas Books, consult this list; also write to Messrs. Cassell for their Catalogue for further information about the best books for Christmas Presents.

LONDON TOWN PAST AND PRESENT.

By W. W. HUTCHINGS. Lavishly Illustrated from Old Prints, Drawings, and Photographs. Two Vols., cloth gilt, 10s. net each.

CHARLES DICKENS AND HIS FRIENDS.

By W. TEIGNMOUTH SHORE. With Rembrandt Portrait and 16 Full-page Illustrations. Cloth, 6s. net.

THE NATURE BOOK.

Profusely Illustrated from Photographs and Coloured Plates. Text by well-known Naturalists. In Three Volumes. Cloth gilt, gilt edges, 12s. net each.

THE ROYAL BOTANIC GARDENS, KEW.

By W. J. BEAN. Cloth, gilt back, 20s. net. Large Paper Edition, limited to 100 copies, £3 3s. net.

EVERYDAY JAPAN.

By ARTHUR LLOYD, M.A. Profusely Illustrated. 12s. net.

A HISTORY AND DESCRIPTION OF THE OLD FRENCH FAÏENCE.

By M. L. SOLON. 24 Colour Plates and other Illustrations. Cloth gilt, 39s. net.

SACRED HEART.

Edited by A. G. TEMPLE, F.S.A. Nearly 200 Full-page Illustrations on plate paper, and descriptive text. Cloth gilt, 10s. 6d. net.

THE MacWHIRTER SKETCH BOOK.

Reproductions of Colour and Pencil Sketches from the Sketch Books of JOHN MACWHIRTER, R.A. Cloth, 5s.

CASSELL'S CABINET CYCLOPÆDIA.

Several Hundred Illustrations and Diagrams. Cloth, 7s. 6d.; leather, 10s. 6d.

THE ENCYCLOPÆDIC DICTIONARY.

3,000 Illustrations. 8 Vols. Cloth, 10s. 6d. each.

THE CENTURY SHAKESPEARE. 40 vols.

Introductions by Dr. F. J. FURNIVALL, M.A., and JOHN MUNRO, F.R.H.S. 40 volumes. In cloth, 8d. net per vol.; leather, 1s. 6d. net.

THE WORLD'S GREAT PICTURES.

Over 400 Photographic Reproductions of the Masterpieces of Europe. With 13 Coloured Plates. Cloth gilt, 10s. 6d. net.

CASSELL'S ATLAS.

Consisting of 88 Exquisitely Coloured Maps, relating to all quarters of the globe. Cloth gilt, 12s. 6d. net.

TREES AND THEIR LIFE HISTORIES.

By PERCY GROOM, M.A., D.Sc., F.L.S. With 109 Full-page Plates, and nearly 400 other Illustrations by Henry Irving. Cloth gilt, 25s. net.

THE DICTIONARY OF PRACTICAL GARDENING

Edited by WALTER P. WRIGHT. 20 Coloured Plates, &c. 2 Volumes. Half-leather, gilt top, 30s. net.

THE ROYAL FAMILY BY PEN AND CAMERA.

By SARAH A. TOOLEY. Fully Illustrated. Cloth gilt, 12s. net.

WOMEN OF ALL NATIONS

By T. ATHOL JOYCE, M.A., and N. W. THOMAS, M.A. 13 Coloured Plates and over 345 Photographs. In Two Volumes. Half-leather, full gilt back, gilt top, 15s. net each.

A HISTORY AND DESCRIPTION OF ITALIAN MAJOLICA.

By M. L. SOLON. 24 Coloured Plates and Numerous Half-Tone Illustrations. Cloth gilt, gilt top, 42s. net.

BOOK OF QUOTATIONS, PROVERBS, AND HOUSE-HOLD WORDS.

By W. GURNEY BENHAM. Cloth, 10s. 6d. net; half-leather, 12s. 6d. net.

THE DICTIONARY OF PHRASE AND FABLE.

By Rev. Dr. BREWER. Cloth, 10s. 6d.; half-morocco, Two Vols., 15s.

THE STORY OF THE HEAVENS.

By Sir ROBERT S. BALL, LL.D. With 24 Coloured Plates and other Illustrations. Cloth gilt, 10s. 6d.

POPULAR SCIENCE.

Edited by ALEXANDER S. GALT. With 24 Coloured Plates and numerous other Illustrations. Two volumes. Cloth gilt, 12s. per Vol.

FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

CASSELL'S ANNUAL FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

More than 100 Coloured Pictures and many other Illustrations. Handsome Picture Boards, 3s. 6d.; Cloth gilt, 5s.

LITTLE FOLKS.

Xmas vol.

With many ILLUSTRATIONS IN COLOUR and Black and White. Picture Boards, 3s. 6d.; Cloth gilt, gilt edges, 5s.

FIRST AT THE POLE.

A Romance of Arctic Adventure. By Capt. FRANK H. SHAW. A thrilling account of an expedition to the North Pole. Four Full-page Illustrations. Cloth gilt, 5s.

"CHUMS." Yearly vol.

Contains over 150 exciting adventure Stories by best writers. 12 beautiful Plates in Colour, and pictures on nearly every page. Cloth gilt, 8s.

CASSELL & Co. Ltd., La Belle Sauvage, London, E.C.
AND AT ALL BOOKSELLERS.

apparently from American sources chiefly, and, as far as one can guess, from publications not very recent. The collection is not very interesting, and the title is rather inexact, since some of the anecdotes do not concern girls, and some do not exemplify bravery. The literary standard is not high; girls in the younger classes of elementary schools might take kindly to the volume as a prize, but if they are English they will need an interpreter for some of the American stories.

"Heidi," by Johanna Spyri (Dent, 5s. net), may be described as a Swiss variation upon the same theme as Miss Beatrice Harraden's early story: "Things will take a turn." A simple little girl, living with a solitary grandfather; another little girl, wealthy, motherless, and too delicate to walk; the gradual restoration to health of the invalid, followed by joy and prosperity all round; these are the materials of both stories. But the background of Heidi's life, instead of being London, is a Swiss mountain, goats are her playfellows, and her nearest human neighbors are the mother and grandmother of the goatherd, who dwell lower down on the slope of the mountain. A cousin takes her off to Frankfurt to be a companion to Clara Sese-man, and she becomes acquainted with many confusing appliances, such as butlers, and barrel organs, and the alphabet. She is a delight to the lonely and sickly Clara and a bugbear to Fraulein Rottenmeier, the housekeeper; but for herself the town is a land of exile, and at last her homesickness so overpowers her that she has to be sent back, and Clara, since she cannot do without her friend, has to follow, with the very best results to her own health. Little Heidi, frank, active, unselfish, and impulsive, is a dear little soul and thoroughly alive. It is easy to imagine her story becoming the favorite book of some discerning English child.

The talent of "E. Nesbit" has something of the same quality as Mr. Barrie's. Like him, she can take an incongruous patchwork of possible and impossible things, and can cut out of that material a story that holds our attention, moves our feelings, and haunts our memories. If any practised story writer of the usual meritorious type were to try and weave together the strands that mingle so touchingly in "Harding's Luck" (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.), the result would probably be dull, silly, and confusing. Moreover, when ordinary story-writers rashly produce sequels, the sequels are inferior to the beginnings, whereas Mrs. Nesbit can carry on a tale that seemed complete, and leave it at the end twice as good as it was before. "Harding's Luck" is a case in point; it carries on the "House of Arden" (although it is quite intelligible without reference to its predecessor), and after reading it we find "The House of Arden" wonderfully illuminated. The two stories together grow into a sweet, noble, and pathetic whole; something of the spirit of "Peter Ibbetson" is in them, and something, too, of the spirit of "Peter Pan." And—which is quite marvellous—Mrs. Nesbit has found an entirely original ending for the story of the hero who sacrifices himself for his friends. What that end is it would be wrong to tell; it is enough to say that it is worthy of Dickie, and that Dickie is the most heroic and, at the same time, the most lovable boy to be found in any modern story book. So engaging is he that even a hardened reviewer, turning to a particular page in pursuit of a particular passage, becomes enthralled by the charm of him and does not lay down the volume until the final word has been read once more.

THE CHILDREN'S BOOK-SHELF.

AMONG the season's crop of books in which history is disguised as romance, we have found few likely to be more appreciated than Mr. Edward Fraser's story of the "Bellerophon" (Wells, Gardner, Darton, 6s.), and the part played by the battleships of this name in British naval triumphs. There have been four "Bellerophons" altogether, the last being one of our existing "Dreadnoughts"; but undoubtedly the most famous was the first, the old 'seventy-four that survived in succession Lord Howe's battle of the first of June, the battle of the Nile, and Trafalgar, and finally conveyed Bonaparte from the Isle d'Aix to Plymouth. Mr. Fraser gives an excellent résumé of the career of that famous vessel from the time of its launch in 1786 to 1815, when its pennant was finally hauled down. The historic battles in which the ship figured are recalled in vivid detail, and as was the case with this author's account of the "Champions" of the British Fleet, we get more than a glimpse of contemporary conditions of life and service in the Navy. As a faithful student of naval history, Mr. Fraser is only second to Captain Mahan. His judiciously selected illustrations after old prints and pictures and his carefully prepared diagrams could hardly be bettered. Another book of the same class, but dealing with a very different subject, is Ascott R. Hope's "Adventures in America" (Black, 6s. net), compiled from the records of pioneers, colonists, missionaries, from the sixteenth century onwards. The Spanish attempts on Florida, encouraged by the Mexican successes of Cortes and Pizarro; the vindictive struggle with the French Huguenots; the endless frays with Indians; the perils of the climate; these are the subjects of the first four or five chapters of the work. When the arena is shifted to Canada and the North-West, the most moving tale, perhaps, is that of the Jesuit father Jogues, who, in 1637, started his missionary career among the tribes of the St. Lawrence, and after terrible sufferings met his final martyrdom at their hands. "In the Far West" is the title of a thrilling story of 1850, concerning a small band of emigrants who set out from Illinois for California and met with ill-fortune and massacre; and "In the Frozen North" is the dramatic narrative of Sir John Franklin's attempt to discover the North-West passage. There are several capital illustrations in color by Mr. Henry Sandham.

* * *

THE scene of Mr. Robert Macdonald's "The Rival Treasure-Hunters" (Blackie, 6s.), is laid partly on the frontiers of British Guiana and Venezuela, and the adventures which his heroes meet with in their search for blue diamonds leave little to be desired in the way of stirring incidents.—Captain F. S. Brereton's "A Hero of Sedan" (Blackie, 6s.), is the story of an English medical student who fights on the French side at Sedan, and is taken prisoner, but escapes and joins the franc-tireurs. During the siege of Paris he enters the city in a balloon, helps to capture a spy, and fights against the Commune. Captain Brereton ends his tale with a hope that Britain may never find itself in such a condition of unpreparedness as France was in 1870, and that "our magnificent fleet may always be kept up to standard." He looks forward to the time when, "with a citizen army to defend our shores, with every male accustomed to the use of a rifle, Britain may sleep and work in peace." That a book for boys should teach patriotism is most desirable, but we deprecate the intrusion of shoddy Imperialistic shibboleths.

* * *

"THE STORY OF HEReward, THE CHAMPION OF ENGLAND" (Harrap, 5s. net), by Mr. Douglas C. Stedman, is based on the medieval chronicles and the histories of Thierry and Freeman, though Mr. Stedman draws upon his own imagination for matters of detail, especially in the chapters dealing with Hereward's youth. The result is a work well calculated to awaken an interest in Saxon times, while at the same time it will give the young reader a knowledge of the story of the great Englishman "who struck the last blow for England, and who held the last spot of free English land until it was betrayed by English monks to the invading Normans." Mr. Stedman has made a thorough investigation of available materials, and his style, while lively and picturesque, is free from the affected archaism which spoils many books of this type.

* * *

THE "Boarders" in Raymond Jacobson's "The Attic Boarders" (Chambers, 3s. 6d.), are dogs which Rachel Wellington, the daughter of a country vicar, takes into the vicarage in order to add to the income of the family. The dogs involve her in a number of adventures which are well told, while, at the same time, some useful information is imparted in a sensible, non-didactic style. The plan of the book is novel, and the author has carried it out excellently.

SOME R.T.S. GIFT-BOOKS

A COMPANION VOLUME TO "SCENES IN THE LIFE OF OUR LORD."
Folio (16½in by 12½in), handsomely bound in white cloth, full gilt, 16/- net.

THE GOSPEL IN THE OLD TESTAMENT

Containing 24 Original Coloured Pictures (mounted on stout artistic paper) by HAROLD COPPING, with Descriptive Letterpress by the Lord Bishop of Durham. Price 16/- net. Also bound in full Persian, gilt side and back, 24/- net.
THE GUARDIAN says:—"This is an exceedingly handsome volume, admirably produced in all respects. Mr. Copping's pictures are clever as well as attractive, and full of sympathy with his subject. The colouring and drawing are delightful throughout. The Bishop of Durham's letterpress is by way of being a devotional commentary, and is simple and adequate."
THE STANDARD says:—"The pictures are strong and vivid in conception, while the execution is marked by power and reverence."

New Edition, with 8 new Coloured Plates by HAROLD COPPING.

SCENES FROM THE LIFE OF ST. PAUL

By the Rev. J. S. Howson, D.D., late Dean of Chester. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 3/6.

This work from the pen of the late Dean Howson reflects on every page an intimate and peculiar knowledge of all that touches the character and work of St. Paul. Although not a formal Life of the Apostle, it presents in the clearest possible light the outstanding features of his character and career. Helpful in every line to the Bible student, it abounds in practical comment, and in suggestive treatment of striking episodes recorded in the "Acts." The Coloured Illustrations are from Drawings by Mr. Harold Copping, whose work in SCENES IN THE LIFE OF OUR LORD and THE GOSPEL IN THE OLD TESTAMENT has been so strikingly successful.

S. R. CROCKETT'S NEW STORY.

THE MEN OF THE MOUNTAIN

A Stirring Tale of the Franco-German War of 1870-1871.

By S. R. CROCKETT, Author of "The White Plumes of Navarre," "The Lilac Sunbonnet," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6/-.
THE TIMES says:—"This is an historical romance, as knowing and telling as Mr. Crockett's usually are, of the French 'Year Terrible'—that is 1871, mainly on the Franco-Swiss Frontier, and with a young Protestant pastor for its central figure."
THE SPECTATOR says:—"We have never seen anything better from his pen."
THE SCOTSMAN says:—"The story is told with Mr. Crockett's accustomed vigour of manner, and is always romantic and picturesque."
THE PALL MALL GAZETTE says:—"The hero is a fine type of principle and devotion."

A NEW STORY BY THE AUTHOR OF "ANDREW GOODFELLOW," ETC.

LOVE, THE INTRUDER. A MODERN ROMANCE.

By HELEN H. WATSON, Author of "Andrew Goodfellow," &c. With 4 Illustrations by VICTOR PROUT. Large Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, 6/-.
THE TIMES says:—"It is a very commendable love story of the domestic kind; mostly in the west country, the hall, and the farmhouse."
THE DAILY TELEGRAPH says:—"We cordially recommend this fresh and human story to the mothers of girls. It would make an ideal Christmas present for an English girl, divine, demure."
THE SCOTSMAN says:—"The story has the charm of unexpected development."

A Magnificent Gift-Book.

THE BOY'S OWN ANNUAL

Large demy 4to (11½in by 8½in), 832 pages, with 12 coloured or tinted plates and hundreds of other pictures, handsome cloth gilt, 8/-. containing:—Long stories by DR. GORDON STABLES, R.N., F. H. BOLTON, ADRIAN LEIGH, JOHN LEA, ALFRED COLBECK, REGINALD H. POOLE; 51 Shorter Stories, 30 Adventures on Land and Sea, 12 Indoor Amusements, 16 Outdoor Amusements. Papers by Experts on Cricket, Football, Photography, Athletics, Stamp Collecting, Boating, Boys' Pets, How to make Useful Articles; Games for all Seasons; and scores of other eye-opening, mind-forming, idle-hand employing, helpful papers, such as will attract and elevate the reader.

AN IDEAL GIFT FOR A GIRL.

THE GIRL'S OWN ANNUAL

First Volume of New Series. Large demy 4to (11½in by 8½in), 768 pages, with 12 coloured or tinted plates and hundreds of other pictures, handsome cloth gilt, 8/-. It contains long Stories by FLORENCE MORSE KINGSLEY, MARY GAUNT, CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS, and KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN. 40 Shorter Tales by well-known Authors. Musical Papers by JOSEPH HOFFMAN, MORITZ MOSZKOWSK, MADAME MELBA, and MARIE HALL. Papers on Art, Photography, Cookery Dressmaking, Church Work, Music, Nature Study, Girls' Employments, Needlework (Plain and Fancy), Recreations, Medical Papers, Household Economy, &c.; and a great variety of other helpful reading for sensible girls and their mothers.

JUST READY. Demy 8vo, profusely illustrated, 5/- net.

THE HANDY NATURAL HISTORY (MAMMALS.)

By ERNEST PROTHEROE, F.Z.S. Profusely and accurately illustrated, with Coloured Frontispiece and Title-Page. 32 Coloured Plates, 48 Black and White Plates. 114 illustrations in the Text. Demy 8vo, Cloth gilt, 5/- net.
THE STANDARD says:—"It is a highly interesting volume." THE RECORD says:—"It is a delightful book."
THE SCOTSMAN says:—"It is an excellent popular natural history."
THE DAILY MAIL says:—"Its lucidity, its accuracy, its brightness, make it a good book to have at hand."
THE WESTMINSTER GAZETTE says:—"It is a very generous five shillingsworth of pleasant Natural History."

W. G. LAWES, OF SAVAGE ISLAND AND NEW GUINEA.

By JOSEPH KING.

With Preface by DR. WARDLAW THOMPSON. Map, Portrait, and many Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 5/- net.
THE STANDARD says:—"It is the life of one of those strong yet modest men who are the salt of the Empire."

GEORGE GRENFELL:

Congo Missionary and Explorer.
By Rev. GEORGE HAWKER.

With Photogravure Portrait, Maps, and 32 pages of Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6/- net. Second Edition.
THE DAILY NEWS says:—"It is a Missionary Story that takes rank with the best of recent years, both in interest and in variety."
THE BRITISH WEEKLY says:—"It is a book of fascinating interest."

London: 4, BOUVERIE STREET and 64, ST. PAUL'S, E.C.

Please write for the Religious Tract Society's New Illustrated Christmas List.

Please ask for the "R.T.S." recent Books at the Shops.

NOTABLE BOOKS IN MR. JOHN LANE'S LIST

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF JOAN OF ARC

By ANATOLE FRANCE, a Translation by WINIFRED STEPHENS. With 2 Photogravure Portraits, 6 Black-and-White Illustrations, and a Plan. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 25s. net. [Now Ready.]

The publication of this Book has been delayed until now in order to allow of the contents being made as perfect as possible, incorporating the very latest corrections and additions. The translation is a rendering of the last French Edition, and has been carefully carried out under the supervision of M. ANATOLE FRANCE himself.

"No praise can be too high for the spirit in which M. France has dealt with his subject. . . . He has at least earned the gratitude of historians by marshalling all the authorities upon every aspect and incident, authentic or alleged, in her brief career. No previous account of the trial, sentence and death can be compared with that in Vol. II. for pathos and dignified restraint. Miss Stephens is a conscientious translator."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE LAST JOURNALS OF HORACE WALPOLE

DURING THE REIGN OF GEORGE III., from 1771 to 1783. With Notes by Dr. DORAN. Edited with an Introduction by A. FRANCIS STEUART, and containing numerous Portraits (2 in Photogravure) reproduced from Contemporary Pictures, Engravings, &c. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 25s. net.

"It is pleasant to have the work reissued in so excellent a form as this. . . . His writings are not only valuable as historical contributions; they are delightful as literature. In his witty way Walpole was a masterly phrase-maker."—Daily Telegraph.

GIOVANNI BOCCACCIO: a Biographical Study

By EDWARD HUTTON. With a Photogravure Frontispiece, and numerous other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.

"Mr. Edward Hutton has written by far the best book in our language upon a theme as attractive in itself as any literary history. It is a delightful volume. It is quick and it is balanced. It is learned and it is sympathetic. It throws a full light upon a changeable and paradoxical personality much misunderstood. Mr. Hutton's study, in a word, more than fulfils all the hopes raised by his treatment of the same theme in his well-known and masterly introduction to the edition of Boccaccio, in the Tudor Translation Series. . . . Mr. Hutton's book is unapproachable in our language. . . . For English readers the biography is one of those reconstructions which are in themselves a revelation."—Observer.

WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY

A Biography. By LEWIS MELVILLE. With 2 Photogravures and numerous other Illustrations. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 25s. net. "Mr. Melville is certainly an enthusiast, and his zeal has made him seek Thackerayana in all possible places. . . . His record of the novelist's life will be found at once interesting and useful. The thoroughness with which the work has been done may be gathered from the fact that the 'Bibliography' gives particulars of close upon thirteen hundred items."—Daily Telegraph.

MARIA EDGEWORTH AND HER CIRCLE in the Days of Bonaparte and Bourbon

By CONSTANCE HILL. With numerous Illustrations by ELLEN G. HILL and Reproductions of Contemporary Portraits, &c. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

FIRST REVIEW.—"A new book by Miss Constance Hill is a sheer delight; no one has a prettier touch in the re-creation of a forgotten period."—Daily Telegraph.

DR. JOHNSON AND MRS. THRALE

By A. M. BROADLEY. With an Essay Introductory by THOMAS SECCOMBE. With upwards of 50 Illustrations, including a Reproduction in Colour of the Fellowes Miniature of Mrs. Piozzi and a Photogravure of Harding's Sepia Drawing of Dr. Johnson. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.

PUBLISHER'S NOTE.—Practically the whole of the material in this volume is new, and consists of the MS. of Mrs. Thrale's unpublished journal of the Welsh Tour, made by Dr. Johnson and the Thrales in 1774, numerous unpublished Letters to and from Mrs. Thrale to Goldsmith, Boswell, Fanny Burney, Dr. Burney, Mrs. Montagu, &c. The original scheme of the work has been considerably enlarged owing to the discovery of new and interesting facts. It now runs to upwards of 340 pages, and contains more than 50 Illustrations.

MADAME DE MAINTENON. Her Life and Times, 1635-1719

By C. C. DYSON. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and 16 Black-and-White Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

"In a lively and entertaining manner Mrs. Dyson relates the chapters of this wonderful story. . . . With graphic touch she depicts life at the Court of Le Grand Monarque. The illustrations to the volume are excellent."—Daily Chronicle.

POETRY AND BELLES LETTRES

NEW POEMS

By WILLIAM WATSON. Crown 8vo, 5s. net. Also a Limited Edition of 75 copies on Japanese Hand-Made Vellum, £1 1s. net.

"Mr. Watson's muse comes to us dressed with Augustan grace. . . . In satire, epigram, sonnet, and lyric he shows a distinction which to-day is rare. . . . If a poet is to be judged by his power of interpreting the dreams and ideals of his fellows, then Mr. Watson must stand in a high place."—Athenaeum.

"It is indeed a refreshment in these hurried times to find a writer who is so determined to give us only his best. . . . Mr. Watson is, like Gray, a lapidary of poetry who by labour brings the jewel out of the ancient stone."—Westminster Gazette.

All the old charm and excellence . . . is here, and, besides, a newer, fuller, more intimate note as well."—Daily Telegraph.

"A glorious harvest of majestic song."—Mr. JAMES DOUGLAS in the Star.

"Mr. William Watson, the leader of the English Parnasse, teaches the poets of to-day and of to-morrow the necessity of using the enlarged English of their century as carefully and reverently as their predecessors used the old and worn restricted diction."—Outlook.

NEW POEMS

By RICHARD LE GALLIENNE. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"His hand has lost nothing of its cunning."—Daily Telegraph.

A BOOK OF SATYRS

By AUSTIN OSMAN SPARE. Large folio, 21s. net.

THE SONG OF SIXPENCE PICTURE BOOK

By WALTER CRANE. 4s. 6d.

Containing "Sing a Song of Sixpence"—"Princess Belle Etoile"—"An A B C of Old Friends." Each separately, 1s. each, with New Cover and End-Papers. Uniform with the rest of Mr. Walter Crane's Toy Books.

SPORT AND TRAVEL

LAKE VICTORIA TO KHARTOUM WITH RIFLE AND CAMERA

By Capt. F. A. DICKINSON, D.C.L.I. With an Introduction by the right Hon. WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL, M.P. With numerous Illustrations taken by the Author. Uniform with "Big Game Shooting in the Equator." Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

THE SOUL OF A TURK

Record of a Trip to Baghdad. By Mrs. DE BUNSEN. With 8 Full-Page Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"Her book is a delightfully written narrative of adventurous travel . . . for insight and sympathy with the Oriental mind we have not read anything better than these pages for a long time. . . . Some missionaries have not achieved more in years than Mrs. de Bunsen achieved in those moments when she led Hassan's thoughts to the meaning of Bethlehem. The grace and delicacy of this sketch are remarkable. . . . We thoroughly recommend this book to every one who enjoys following the travels of a plucky, entertaining, and exceptionally intelligent woman."—Spectator.

BOSNIA AND HERZEGOVINA

By MAUD M. HOLBACH. With 48 Illustrations by OTTO HOLBACH and a Map. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"An excellent, chatty, and picturesque travel companion."—Pall Mall Gazette.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON AND NEW YORK.

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 11.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1909.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K. 4d. Abroad, 1d.]

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	441	Making the Foreigner Pay. By Rowland Hunt, M.P., Arthur Aronson, Sir F. Cardew, George M. Cotton, and Charles E. Parker ...	457
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		Stanley and Joseph Thomson. By Lady Stanley ...	459
Concentration ...	444	"On the Forgotten Road." By Henry Baerlein ...	459
The Good Parliament ...	445	A Devilised Class. By R. Somervell and D.C.S. ...	460
The House of Lords Budget ...	446	The Logic of Lord Revelstoke. By H. Peters Bone ...	460
The New Censorship ...	447	The Ultimate Basis of Authority. By Liberal Voter ...	461
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		POETRY:—
The Hypocrisy of the Peers ...	449	A Master Speaks. By Rosalind Travers ...	461
A Warning to Just Men ...	450	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ...	462
On Great Families ...	450	REVIEWS:—
The Place Like Home ...	452	Lord Morley's Indian Speeches. By Sir William Wedderburn ...	463
PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS:—		A Great Adventure ...	464
The Money-Power at War. By Graham Wallas ...	453	The Atmosphere of Riches ...	466
THE DRAMA:—		A Great Scottish Ecclesiastic ...	468
Better than Sardou. By William Archer ...	455	Bar and Bohemia ...	470
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—		White and Selborne ...	472
The Electoral Policy of German Social Democracy. By Ed. Bernstein ...	456	Two Novels ...	472
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		THE CHILDREN'S BOOKSHELF ...	474
Where the Foreigner Does Not Pay the Tax. By Edward Porritt ...	457	THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By Janus ...	476

The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.

Diary of the Week.

THE last Session of the Parliament of 1906 came to a violent end on Friday week, and was formally prorogued until January 15. The King, before reciting what he truly calls the "arduous and protracted labors of the Session," made a significant reference to the invasion of his prerogative by the peers whom he had summoned to maintain the Constitution they have deliberately broken:—

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the liberality and care with which you provided for the heavy additions to the National Expenditure due to the requirements of Imperial defence and social reform.

I regret that that provision has proved unavailing.

* * *

No more than the proper emphasis has, in our view, been laid upon this language. The action of the Lords has linked the Crown with the Commons and the People in a common grievance and in a disability coolly and insultingly inflicted. The Monarch, no more than any power in his realm, likes to see his functions curtailed as the House of Lords has now curtailed the rights of the Crown. We should very much like to know whether he was even given candid and accurate information as to a plot which was devised and decided on long before it was actually put into operation.

* * *

THE fight for the maintenance of British liberties has been opened by the Liberal Party with the utmost brilliancy and power. The cause has already found powerful adherents in the Labor Party—which is behaving with a broad and statesmanlike sense of the character of the crisis, that in a closely similar situation distinguished the advanced men of 1832—the Trade Union Congress and the Free Church Council. All these bodies declare for the re-establishment of representative democracy. All will conduct the following campaign with a single eye to an end which, in our view, abolishes party distinctions and makes Liberals, Radicals, and Labor men interchangeable champions of one cause. For the moment, Irish democracy has not moved fully into line, Mr. Redmond contenting himself with stating the issue and noting Lord Lansdowne's declaration that the veto of the Lords is the only remaining safeguard against Home Rule. For our part, we cannot conceive a leader of the Irish people failing to bring his army into the field against the House which ruined his country, and to-day threatens to halve the voting power of every Irishman in Great Britain and Ireland.

* * *

At present, the only articulate voice in the country is that of Liberalism. The party which can in a week produce such speeches as those of Lord Morley, Mr. Asquith, Mr. Lloyd George, and the wonderful Lancashire series of Mr. Churchill, has fairly earned its right to interpret the intelligence and good feeling of the British people. On Friday week, at the National Liberal Club, the Chancellor of the Exchequer—who, if the Liberal organisers know the A.B.C. of their business, will at once be set the all-important task of winning London and the Home Counties—made one of the most powerful orations in the history of political combat. Every stroke told, and some of the phrases, such as the saying that "every grain of freedom is more precious than radium," belonged to a high order of thought and expression. The leading points of Mr. George's speech, which every speaker and writer on the people's side should study, were the impressive contrast between the representative and national quality of the House of Commons and the House of Lords, the damning proof that the revolutionary act of the Lords was the work, first, of its least trustworthy members, and, secondly, of feather-headed journalism, the biting dissection of the character and record of the chief wreckers. These made up a strategic attack such as John Bright himself might not have disowned. In Lancashire, Mr. Churchill's campaign, made up partly of massive and convincing argument, partly of brilliant and cogent railery, is carrying all before it.

* * *

MR. LLOYD GEORGE, speaking from his mountain-side home on Thursday, gave a lucid, convincing exposition of the Budget, woven with the strong homespun stuff that the people love. He again appealed to "vulgar, common facts," the facts that the friends of the peersthink it "so rude to mention." The Lords do not mind absorbing unearned increment; but they think it almost wicked to mention the fact. Mr. George gave a particularly cruel instance taken from the neighborhood—a little Welsh chapel, built at the cost of £150 on a mountain-side. When the lease fell in the landlord claimed another £150 as the price of its renewal. As to the need for a system of valuation to stop the robbery of one set of citizens by another, he quoted the assessments of Bute Castle and a tailor's shop at its gates. The Castle, standing in a hundred acres of sheer gold-mine, was rated at £924; the tailor's shop, 40 yards square, at £947. The Chancellor added that he had been a "backwoodsman" himself, and when, as a boy, he gathered sticks, he found that while he got nothing in calm weather, he gathered "an armful" after a storm.

* * *

On the side of the Peers, up to the present, there has been a lonely challenge from Lord Kesteven and Lord Lansdowne. The former told his audience that the Germans would soon be here "driving their bayonets into our stomachs," that "if the Budget did not make them sick, nothing would," that it was a "rotten Budget" when it was alive, and they might guess its state when Mr. Lloyd George "dug it up," and that he pitied the "beastly ignorance" of one of his audience who appeared to have forgotten Lord Kesteven's hitherto unrecorded services in the South African war. Lord Kesteven's political career, we hope, is only beginning. Now that the Peers are to rule us, we ought to know the stuff they are made of.

* * *

LORD LANSDOWNE'S speech at Plymouth was hardly up to Lord Kesteven's form. He gave the key to the Unionists' Campaign by declaring the issue to be single Chamber against dual Chamber rule, insisting that if two-House government were to be maintained the country must have a real, not a sham, Second Chamber, threw over the House of Lords as it stood, but hinted at "a little more efficient" Assembly, pleaded that the Lords had not destroyed all the Government's Bills, but only some of them, and those the least popular, and contended that they served the country by crushing what Lord Morley called "wild-cat proposals." The House of Lords had appealed to the people, for, though it did not owe its seats to its fellow-countrymen, it had "a duty" towards them.—Mr. Austen Chamberlain, who speaks honestly, has defended his father's new schedule of stomach taxes, which, on the other hand, has created something like a panic in the Protectionist camp; while Mr. Lyttelton and other Unionist members minimise the revolutionary act of the Lords on the old ground that they have done nothing in particular, but done it very well.

* * *

MR. CHAMBERLAIN has again given Mr. Balfour his marching orders. He has revised his scheme of Protection in an authoritative article in the "Birmingham Post." If his first thoughts were for scourging the people with whips, his second, and those of the Lords, are for scourging them with scorpions. The new tariff strikes not one but a multitude of blows at the materials that our laboring folk live by and work with. All the earlier exemptions are swept away, including the promised remissions of tea and sugar duties. Maize and bacon are to be taxed, as well as corn and flour—a new rod for the back of the poorest Irish folk. The corn tax is to be charged at the rate of 2s. a quarter on foreign corn. There is to be a still higher duty on flour, and the Colonies are to have a preferential tax, not the duty-free market they enjoy to-day. There are to be three rates of duty on imports, 5 per cent. on goods to which little labor has been devoted, 10 per cent. on goods more nearly approaching completion, and 15 per cent. on completely manufactured articles. Lower duties are again to be charged on Colonial produce. It would be hard to devise a more apt machinery for creating hunger, inefficiency, unemployment, and bad trade. But the "Birmingham Post" admits that there is little hope of negotiating the full Tariff Reform Budget before 1911, so that the immediate fruit of a Protectionist victory next January can only be a revival of the Corn Laws. This, therefore, is to be the first House of Lords' Budget. It is also the brief to which the (curiously silent) Mr. Balfour will have to speak.

* * *

WE hope Liberal organisers are not deceived by the silence of a party which does not aim at the persuasion of the people, but chiefly looks to intimidating and cajoling them. Already a clear campaign of corruption has been set on foot. Publicans are lowering the price of beer; employers are threatening unemployment or promising employment—both falsely—if the Budget is re-passed or destroyed; Lord Sherborne threatens to dismiss his servants, and a man, who is reported to be an Admiral, specifies his coachman and gardener as the men whom he will sacrifice to his spite against the Budget. All we can say is that we hope that diligent note will be kept of all such cases, and criminal prosecutions promptly set up against any man, be he Duke or bar-tender, who is rightly amenable to them.

* * *

IN our correspondence columns we print a letter on the subject of the depreciation in British securities from Mr. Peters Bone, who discusses it with thirty years' experience of the stock markets behind him. Mr. Peters Bone writes in answer to the article in last week's NATION on Lord Revelstoke's speech in the House of Lords, and largely endorses its main contention, that many other causes besides mistrust of the Government produced the fall in Consols out of which so much political capital has been made. He also largely agrees with our view as to what those causes were. But with regard to British securities in general he comes to a different conclusion, and ascribes a "miasma" which he alleges to be affecting them to a want of sympathy on the Government's part with City interests and opinions. It is impossible to deal adequately with this interesting assertion within the limits of a Note. We can only say that the miasma has not had the effect of enabling the investor to buy English securities with the prospect of a handsome yield. Home Railway stocks are certainly under a cloud, but the buyer of London and North Western at to-day's price gets less than $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on his money, on the basis of the last two dividends; and this is a remarkably low yield on an ordinary stock subject to all the risks of trade fluctuation, especially when it is compared with the return to be got from investments abroad. Like Consols, Home Railway stocks were too dear, and had to come down. In their case, the fall was accelerated by the accumulated results of bad finance and bad management.

* * *

WITH regard to brewery stocks, again, which Mr. Peters Bone singles out as having been definitely attacked by the Government, how much of their depreciation was due to reckless over-capitalisation and the mad scramble for licences at inflated prices—inflated by the competition of the brewers? The stock of Guinness & Co.—one of the few breweries which was not over-capitalised, and did not join in the scramble for licences—is higher now (allowing for the fact that the stock has been "watered" by 100 per cent.) than when the Government took office. And we cannot agree with Mr. Peters Bone that Lord Rothschild was correct in asserting that it is "difficult, if not impossible, to get money for even the best English enterprise."

* * *

As Mr. Winston Churchill pointed out in his speech on Monday, since the Government has been in office "we have added more spindles to our cotton plant than the whole cotton trade of Germany possesses." We admit, as we admitted last Saturday, that the City mistrusts the Government, but we maintain, as then, that this mistrust is due less to what the Government has done, or tried to do, than to the misrepresentations of the Tory Press, and the care with which leading Tories in the City have created and fostered it. We agree with Mr. Peters Bone's hint that this mistrust may, at a point, cause panic and disaster. But those responsible for the panic, if it comes, will be not the Government, but those who have, for party purposes, persistently decried British credit and British investments.

* * *

MR. TAFT is clearly not a hunter of big game. His first Presidential message is a humdrum document, relatively brief, businesslike, and free from rhetoric. Of its forty pages, sixteen are devoted to foreign affairs. Americans, on reading it, seem to have envied the lions of East Africa, and to have felt that with Mr. Roosevelt's departure, life has rather lost its savor. The message foreshadows no legislation of any importance, and the trusts are not even mentioned, though something may be heard of them later in supplementary messages. The more conservative Republicans are said to be pleased because Mr. Taft, in Mr. A. J. Balfour's phrase, will not burden them with overmuch legislation. The more Radical and Rooseveltian section is said to be furious, and a schism, against all the traditions of this highly-disciplined party, is said to be probable. On the other hand, the Imperialist note in the message is loud and persistent, though it lacks the peculiar stridency of a "big stick" utterance. "More than ever before," we are told, "American capital is going abroad," and the Government realises its "vastly increased responsibilities," particularly in Latin America. This frank realism, which clearly recognises the connection between Imperialism and the export of capital, is rather honest than reassuring. The Monroe Doctrine, the message proceeds, must not be allowed to "operate for the perpetuation of an irresponsible Government." Those words translated into Spanish will set half-a-dozen minor Republics inquiring whose turn is likely to come first.

* * *

THE immediate reference of these menacing periods is, of course, to Nicaragua. President Zelaya, having to deal with a revolution aided, and probably financed, by Americans, dared to refuse belligerent rights to interlopers, and shot two American subjects—certainly a barbarous act—who had fought against him as rebel officers. There followed an indignant note from Mr. Secretary Knox dismissing the Nicaraguan representatives from Washington, and now President Taft declares that his Government will remember "its moral obligations to Central America and civilisation." It might, perhaps, have remembered its prior duty to enforce neutrality on its citizens in the civil wars of their neighbors. The general expectation is that the States will "pacify" Nicaragua, which, however, can hardly be done without destroying President Zelaya. He is firmly entrenched in the hilly interior, and a punitive expedition would have to pass the swamps of the fever-belt on the coast, and then give battle to skilled guerillas in country which favors their movements. A naval expedition is already off the coast, but has been delayed by accidents. Little can be said in defence either of the humanity or of the political competence of the Nicaraguans. But the States, in their turn, are palpably an interested party, and the ground for intervention has been ill chosen.

* * *

THE libel action brought by Messrs. Cadbury against the "Standard," for charging them with insincerity in their action with regard to San Thomé cocoa, ended on Monday in one of those curiously illogical verdicts which are the occasional result of our system of trial by jury. There were only two possible conclusions to be drawn from the evidence. Either the plaintiffs were acting with gross hypocrisy in their ostensible efforts to remedy the terrible abuses in the system of labor in force on the Portuguese islands—in which case the "Standard" was entitled to a verdict—or they were honest in their action, in which case they had been abominably defamed, and should have been awarded substantial damages. The verdict of the jury for the plaintiffs with a farthing damages can only be explained as a compromise with a small minority in favor of the defendants. Mr. Justice Pickford showed his own view of the case pretty clearly in his luminous summing up, and by giving the plaintiffs their costs. Mr. Lecky has said that the crusade of England against the slave trade is one of the three or four perfectly virtuous pages in the history of nations. Few impartial men who read the evidence in this case will doubt that Mr. William Cadbury's persistent and unostentatious efforts on behalf of the natives of Angola will one day receive honorable mention on that page.

* * *

THE Italian Cabinet crisis is an item in the fiscal controversy, due to the growth of armaments, which is convulsing every country in Europe. The Giolitti Government was defeated on its financial proposals on December 2nd by a chance combination of the Extreme Left (which voted rather against the Government than against its measures), the Conservatives under Baron Sonnino, and a number of disaffected Liberals who resent the proposals of Signor Giolitti for the taxation of wealth. Of the future behavior of the Liberal Cave nothing is certainly known, and the new Government is likely to enjoy an uneasy tenure. The revenue is dwindling, the expenditure increasing, and this in a country already the most heavily taxed in Europe. One doubts, however, whether the Socialists, who on the whole welcome the Liberal scheme of taxation, were wise to destroy Signor Giolitti in order to put Baron Sonnino in power. This capable but rather sinister personage is slowly forming a Cabinet of Moderates, which already includes such able members as the veteran economist, Signor Luzzatti, an admirer of Gladstonian finance, and Admiral Bettolo. No alternative Government was possible, and Baron Sonnino has an adroitness and a firmness which rejoice to face such difficult situations as this.

* * *

THE death of Mr. Felix Cobbold, the junior member for Ipswich, will be deeply felt by a wide circle of friends. The charm of Mr. Cobbold's character and demeanor seemed hardly to belong to a society at once so cold-hearted and so formless as ours, though it was the stamp of a man keenly interested in modern politics and warmly associated with advanced Radical doctrine. Such graces of mind as he possessed are rare enough; rarer still is it to find a critical intellect like his joined to so much tenderness for the common lot.

Politics and Affairs.

CONCENTRATION.

SELDOM has a great electoral fight started under better omens than the coming battle. The cause is good. The issue is simple. The response of the democratic parties on all sides has been enthusiastic. There is a clear sense of the urgency of the occasion and of the supremacy of the issue. We have every reason to hope that, with a mutual exercise of goodwill and forbearance, the number of triangular contests will be insignificant, and that Labor and Liberalism will march side by side to the defence of freedom. But it must be clearly realised that the opposing forces are equally united and equally determined. We have not to fight the brewer or the landlord separately. We have to deal with a combination which has rallied to the House of Lords as the last rock of defence for every interest which thinks it has something to gain by separating itself from the nation as a whole. Every device that can be invented by the ingenuity of skilled electioneering will be perfected and utilised with all the resources of unlimited funds. Social pressure and financial pressure will be applied. There is, therefore, no room for dissensions among ourselves. We look to Mr. Asquith to formulate a clear policy, and to give a decided lead, and we look to all sections of democratic opinion, when that lead has been given, to sink individual differences and rally to the standard as one man.

We write thus with perfect confidence in advance of Mr. Asquith's declaration, because on the essential point we can entertain no doubt. The question before the electors is whether the block veto is to go or stay, and Mr. Asquith cannot hesitate in deciding that it shall go. This decision, as we have before pointed out, covers two distinct issues, the issue of finance and the issue of legislation. With regard to finance, the veto, never till to-day more than a form, will from to-day cease to be a form. With regard to legislation, whatever happens it will cease to be a permanent veto enabling the Lords to defeat the representative House whenever they think fit to do so. Now it is on this side of the question that divergencies arise, and it is here that we are concerned to argue that House of Commons men of all views should agree to postpone ideal solutions and concentrate on that which is of immediate and pressing necessity. There are those who would like to see the House of Lords completely swept away. But if they insist on their point and will take nothing less, they will find themselves in irreconcilable opposition to those who, agreeing that the present position is intolerable, are yet resolute in maintaining some sort of Second Chamber as an integral part of the Constitution. There are those, and we have much sympathy with them, who are stoutly for the abolition of the hereditary principle. But if they insist on making this the immediate point of attack, they are faced at once with the whole problem of the reform of the Lords, with all the endless debates on the precise shape which such a reform should take, and with all the doubts as to whether a reformed Chamber might not be a more formidable stronghold of Conservatism and reaction than the discredited body which is now snatching at power. We cannot go constitution-making while Rome is burning, nor potter about discussing the niceties of an ideal reconstruction while our power to construct anything at all remains unassured. The way to reconstruction is through and over the veto. The ground must be levelled before we can build upon it. The final solution may include a Chamber of Life Peers, or it may involve, as Sir Edward Grey has hinted, an elective Second Chamber. But what it is to include is a question which the people ought in future to decide through their representatives, and to decide freely, and without let or hindrance on the part of the few hundreds of irresponsible individuals who have challenged the nation. The Peers have forced upon us the necessity of constitution-making. They have destroyed the working of the Constitution as tradition had shaped it. Thus a new Constitution there must be, but it must be a Constitution made by the nation, and the Constitution can only be made anew when the nation is free from the trammels of the old one.

For this purpose then, as for the immediate execution of the important social reforms which have been outlined by Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Winston Churchill, the one thing directly necessary is the destruction of the block. This is a very moderate measure. The Campbell-Bannerman scheme showed how it could be accomplished without by any means destroying the importance of a Second Chamber in the Constitution. Time has gone on since that scheme was adopted by the House of Commons, and many who were then content with it would now like something simpler and more drastic. We ourselves should like something simpler and more drastic. But whatever we may wish, we have also to recognise the necessity that we should carry with us the great main body of moderate opinion without which no far-reaching constitutional reform in this country can go through. Provided that the principle laid down by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman is maintained, we are satisfied that the essential point is secured. That principle was very simple. It was that within the limits of a single Parliament the deliberate will of the House of Commons should prevail. This is the principle which, in the present Parliament, the Lords have directly, and hitherto successfully, challenged. If it is vindicated, their power for mischief is paralysed. An influence they may still exert, by demanding discussion and interposing delays, and it may well be a task for the future to decide whether the mere accident of birth should put men into so commanding a position. But it will be a decision which, when taken, the destruction of the permanent veto will give us the means of enforcing. To talk of the Campbell-Bannerman scheme as some have talked, as not seriously limiting, as even consolidating, the power of the Lords, is to ignore the facts of the situation and the history of the present Parliament. The removal of the financial veto destroys the power of the Lords to cause a dissolution, and the rest is nothing but a question of time. On the lines of the Campbell-Bannerman resolution every great measure which has been thrown out in this Parliament would have become law before the dissolution. The Scotch would have had their land reform. We should have had educational equality, licensing reform, and the abolition of the plural voter. This is the concrete test, and provided that the Government scheme ensures, as ensure it will, that the House of Commons can obtain the measures to which it is pledged, we shall not quarrel with the machinery which allows for a certain measure of delay. We speak as amongst the strongest opponents of the House of Lords, and as of those who have pressed the constitutional question forward from an early date in the life of this Parliament. We have therefore some title to call on all who feel as strongly, and have worked in the cause as persistently, to join us in laying aside personal preferences and combining to secure the one thing directly and immediately needful.

THE GOOD PARLIAMENT.

THE Parliament of 1906 has been ended by an act of felony, which sets in acute contrast the forces in this land that make for good and for evil government. As this world goes, we can fairly set on one side those public men who cherish the end of all religions and moralities, namely, the "desire and the hope of justice," and on the other, those who seek to maintain, or even to aggravate, the injustices that exist. What honest man doubts the place the dead Parliament deserves to fill? Its two predecessors we know, for their works follow them. They were governed and ruined by one man—Mr. Joseph Chamberlain. To the first he assigned the task of financing a reckless war. To the second he set the rôle of exploring the worthless secret of Mr. Balfour's mind on Free Trade. Their successor had three immediate purposes—to maintain free commerce, to chase the dark shadow of Chinese slavery from South Africa, and to reunite that country to the Empire. It fulfilled each one of them. Maintaining the supreme blessing of peace, it turned its mind to the neglected people of these islands. It secured them the menaced right of industrial association. It sought to re-attach them to the soil, to shorten their hours of labor, to re-build the worst parts of their cities and re-people the deserted country-side, to recruit their moral and physical energies. Its most popular Ministers threw themselves into the breach wherever serious industrial conflicts were threatened, and thereby saved labor and capital untold millions. The public offices which have most to do with social problems were made far more efficient servants of British commerce than they have ever been before, and for the first time in our history were freely opened to all men's complaints. Fresh light was sought; careful students of social evils were drawn into the public service. The prison service and factory law were thrown open to reform and amelioration. The great question of the insecurity and evil fortune which beset honest and steady labor was examined in all its bearings, and with special reference to the undeserved miseries of unemployment, industrial accidents, sickness, physical breakdown, exploited and unprotected childhood, and undowered age. A new intelligence department for labor was created; a hand was stretched out to raise the most helpless, obscure, and feeble of our working folk. Taxation was again and again adjusted so that, allowing for the excessive needs of modern government, it might press more lightly on all form of service, intellectual and manual. A great scheme of insurance was devised, embodying one of the most liberal offers ever made by a Government to a people, so that insecurity, the scourge of labor, might disappear, or almost disappear, from its life. Examining in a time of complete peace the continuous and ever-increasing prosperity of the country, its chief financier came to the conclusion that those forms of its wealth which were more directly traceable to the general labors of the community might, in moderation, be made to add to its efficiency. If, in all these processes, one trade was firmly, or even severely dealt with, it was that whose excesses scandalise our good name. But, in fact, no revolutionary means were taken or proposed. The Ministry, while progressive, has rarely been idealist. The middle classes were carefully considered, and the burdens of scores of thousands of their members sensibly lightened. The defences of the country were kept at top, in our view at superfluous, strength, and though penurious age was relieved of a burden of dishonor, the relief was only granted at the extreme limit of human life. Reform, not revolution, has been the motto of the Parliament which contained only one man, and he a weak and discredited one, whom the advocates of force or of sudden upheaval would count as an ally. Practically the reforms for which the two Prime Ministers, Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Churchill, and Mr. Burns have been responsible do no more than carry the organisation of our industrial life up to the level of the best existing models. That, more than any conscious or unconscious vision of a Socialist State, has been the aim of our constructive statesmanship. The ship has been officered, not by advanced theorists, but by men of fresh and clear intelligence, to whom the gross neglect of the last decade appeared as bad management of the national estate no less than as a moral and social disaster. Who condemns their work? Who declares it subversive or wild? The religious man? The prudent observer of the forces of modern politics? The friend of national efficiency? All that is best and most thoughtful in modern England, or all that is worst and weakest?

The work, therefore, of the dead-and-gone Parliament has been moderate, reconciling, and Christian. Since the Grand Ministry of Gladstone, there have been no such four years of modern political history. The greatest of the Parliament's schemes have been destroyed; a malicious and vengeful foe has dogged its steps, harassed its march, and finally cut off its supplies. But significant facts emerge even from its shortened and crippled activities. The Liberal Party has saved itself and renewed its life. It has done enough to make enlightened men all the world over look with hope to experiments in reform, based on a measured and fruitful co-operation with advanced parties. All these goods remain. The House of Lords cannot touch them. The perversions of European war, Protection, and an insensate class struggle, do indeed remain with us; but the example of an honest Government and a reforming House of Commons has raised formidable moral barriers against them. The greatest of these obstacles is the Budget. So long as the land taxes are approved by the electorate—as approved they are—food taxes are impossible. So long as social reform remains a fixed pre-occupation in the minds of Liberals and Radicals and Labor men, not even a bad press and a mean peerage can put back the passion for war and armaments into its old place in the national imagination. Something new has come into the perspective; and though we are quite open to the argument that sudden and extreme demands on wealth might set the forces of reaction on to a determined effort to capture the people's will and understanding, the moderation of the present schemes and proposals of the Government forbids all prospect of success to the wreckers of the Budget.

And for one special reason. Protection is no longer tricked out in the harlot's dress it assumed when it was flaunted as a device of democracy, and its advocates preached, sincerely or insincerely, the foolish, plausible doctrine that it was possible for one people to get its burden of taxation shifted on to another people's back. Mr. Chamberlain was the one British statesman fitted by character and temperament to commend such a course. In our opinion, it could not have succeeded even in this immoral guise, so long as the Liberal and Labor Parties remained firm in their opposition. The Tory Party could never persuade the democracy that it meant to deal fairly with them, and that its well-to-do champions were thinking of other men's incomes and wages rather than of their own rents and profits. But we need have no fears at all now that Protection comes commended to the people as the "alternative Budget" of the House of Lords. Even if the Lords had declared war on a faltering, unsympathetic House of Commons, the electors of this country would have hesitated long before deposing it and making kings of the Northumberlands and Clancardes. But now that the conspiracy stands unmasked, and that we have Protection appearing as a barefaced attempt to upset everything—Constitution, a reforming House of Commons and Ministry, a people's Budget, Free Trade, Land Taxes, Death Duties, Super-tax—so that food and labor taxes may be imposed by the direct action of the landowners' House, the electors will hardly take the trouble to pluck the sheep-dog's coat off the wolf that has fitted on its disguise in the sight of all the people. They will simply laugh, and vote straight for the friends they know and against the enemies they know equally well. What is better still, they will re-seat in power the party that has done half its work, but done it well and fairly; so that from the bones of a Parliament killed before its time will arise at once an Avenger of its fate and an Heir of its energies.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS' BUDGET.

In answer to the demand of Free Traders for the actual scheme of Tariff Reform, the "Birmingham Daily Post" published on Wednesday the outlines of a programme which is universally and, we do not doubt, rightly, taken as expressing the views of Mr. Chamberlain and the Tariff Reform League. Its parentage is practically admitted by Mr. Austen Chamberlain, who gives it general support as furnishing the nucleus from which a Unionist Cabinet would construct its Budget. The new scheme differs from the old one of the Glasgow speech and the 1903 campaign in some important particulars, which serve to emphasise the growth of Protectionism proper at the expense of the original idea of Colonial Preference. In the first place the famous equation which did not equate—the elaborate calculation which was to show that taxes on corn and meat were to be off-set by remissions on tea and sugar—has been wholly swept away. This cruel but honest admission that money is needed—eighteen millions, if you please—and that it must be got at whatever cost out of the stomachs of the poor, has horribly perturbed the less ingenuous Tariff Reformers, who protest, through the "Standard" and the "Morning Post," that the new gospel says too much, and is not therefore to be regarded as literally inspired. But the word has been said; and, indeed, in no other way can the Protectionist ledger even look like balancing. There is no longer to be any pretence of avoiding the tax on food. Not only so, but the exemption of maize and bacon is now placidly put down as a mistake acknowledged by Mr. Chamberlain himself, and the "food of the poorest" will come in for duty along with the food of the Duke under the new version of the gospel of equality. Next, the Colonial Preference is to be reduced. Canadian wheat is no more to be free. It is to pay one shilling duty as against the two shillings that will be charged to the foreigner. Far from extending Free Trade within the Empire, the new scheme for the first time since the abolition of the registered duty is to impose a tax on Colonial food supplies coming to our shores. It will be interesting to see how the Colonies take this proposal, which is here frankly aimed at the protective encouragement of British agriculture. Lastly, while raw materials are still to be free—most assuredly if it be true that the foreigner pays the tax—there is to be an average duty of 10 per cent. on all manufactured articles. The 10 per cent., however, is not to be uniform. It is to vary from 5 per cent. on articles which are but slightly manufactured, to 15 per cent. on completely finished products, and there is to be differentiation according to the behavior of the country of origin. Once more colonial goods are not to be free, but to enjoy a "substantial preference," and the tariff is to be used for negotiation with foreign protective countries—this although it is a revenue tariff, and is estimated to produce from sixteen to twenty millions annually!

"It's so simple," pleads the "Birmingham Post." It is already worked out. It is a complete ideal scheme, laid up in some heavenly place, in the spacious mind of Mr. Hewins, for example—and needing only the detail of a Parliamentary majority and a heaven-descended Chancellor to bring it down to earth. There will be no lobbyings here, no base disputations among rival interests. Professor Hewins has it all mapped out. What is raw material? What is a manufactured article? How much "labor put into an article" will justify a 5 per cent. duty, how much 10 per cent., how much 15 per cent.? "He knows about it all, he knows, he knows." The greater part of the scheme, if not the whole, can go through in 1910, with an acquiescent Commons in which no Labor Members are to protest against Food Taxes, and with a House of Lords which would never dream of submitting Mr. Hewins's calculations to the base arbitrament of a popular vote. To us there would seem some little difficulty on those points, and of one thing we are quite sure. Though "raw materials" in the full sense may be exempted, it is impossible to tax the majority of the articles classed by the Board of Trade without seriously raising the cost of production. The total value of the imports under this head in 1908 was £143 millions, of which £23·2 millions were re-exported, leaving in round numbers £120 millions for home consumption. An average tax of 10 per cent. on this sum would produce twelve millions, and in the opinion of the best economists, by far the greater part of this twelve millions would be added to the price of the articles, and in addition would raise the price of all home-made goods of the same kind in an equal degree. Indeed, if prices are not raised, the object of securing the "turn of the market" in favor of the British producer, which is clearly avowed by the "Post," is not secured. We may thus assume a general increase in the cost of all manufactured and partly manufactured articles which are at present imported freely from abroad, which may run up to 5, 10, or 15 per cent., according to the nature of the article, and will in all reasonable probability approximate to these figures in each class respectively.

Now, let us look at the nature of the articles affected. In the Second Fiscal Blue-Book the Board of Trade divided manufactured imports into three classes. Class A were described as "articles completely manufactured and ready for consumption," Class B as manufactured, but requiring to pass through some process before consumption, and Class C simply as "partly manufactured." In the absence of a special revelation, we may suppose that the 15, 10, and 5 per cent. duties will be applied to these classes respectively. Now, if we look at Class A, we find that it includes such things as anchors, chains, cables, tubes, cast-iron and manufactures thereof, steel and manufactures thereof, cutlery, implements, and tools, machinery and mill work, paper bags, sacks, baskets, glass bottles, cordage, oil seed cake, and so forth. None of these are raw materials, but most of them are materials or appliances used in industry, and an increase in their cost of 15 per cent., or of something approaching 15 per cent., would be no slight burden. Next take Class B. Here are included iron bars, girders, boiler plates, nails, bolts and nuts, quicksilver, wrought copper, house frames and fittings, sewing thread, certain dyestuffs, leather, plate-glass, paper, cement, zinc, paraffin, stone. But, in fact, nearly the whole list, accounting, probably, for a third of the whole mass of "manufactured goods," are of necessary use in some industry or other. The price of these appliances is to be raised by something approaching 10 per cent. There remains Class C, which is the smallest of the three divisions, and includes pig iron, steel ingots, unwrought copper, cotton and woollen yarns, certain drugs and dyestuffs, dressed skins, and furs. These are to be let off with 5 per cent., which will also clearly go to swell the general cost of production in manufacture. It is thus a very moderate computation to take the average increase in the cost of production due to the tariff at 30 per cent. less than the average duty to be imposed on "manufactured goods," that is to say, at 7 per cent. on all the great class of materials and appliances of industry now subject to foreign competition. To this extent (1) our manufactures will be handicapped in meeting foreign competition. The handicap is too general and pervasive to be met by rebate on exports. A shipbuilder might get a rebate on the foreign steel that he uses, but how is he to be reimbursed for the increased cost of machinery, and of the thousand and one appliances that he buys at home, many of which will be raised in price by the duty? (2) Cost of production being increased, the screw on wages will be tightened. Profits will suffer in the first place, but the trade unions will have a very hard fight to maintain existing standards, and will find it still more difficult to improve on them. The tendency must be for lower money wages. Meanwhile for the workman cost of living will have gone up all round—except on beer. Experience has shown that the first amount of the corn duty is recouped in the price, and there is to be an unnamed amount of additional protection for the millers, which will still further raise the price of bread. There is to be no compensation. The taxes on tea and sugar remain. There will be a tax on butchers' meat, on bacon, eggs, cheese, and butter. The tax on leather will co-operate with the tax on boots and shoes to raise the cost of this very serious item in the workman's weekly budget. House rent will tend to rise with the tax on house frames, on stone, and on cement. Thus the workman is hit on both sides by the downward tendency of money wages and the increased cost of living. But the Dukes will be saved. More motors, less bread, is the inspiring cry. Save the park by taxing the cottage! But always let the poor man's beer be free, save only for the tax on barley. It does not look like a winning hand, but the cards are on the table, and for this much thanks to the "Birmingham Daily Post."

THE NEW CENSORSHIP.

THE problem of a theatrical censorship still awaits solution, but before it is settled we are suddenly confronted with the new peril of a literary censorship. The machinery which the Libraries Association has imagined would be, perhaps, a little less absolute in its decrees, a little less universal in its power than the despotism which Mr. Redford wields. But it would be as irresponsible, as oppressive, as philistine, and as fatal to bold and original work. In one respect, it would be incomparably more deadly. Parliament can make an end of Mr. Redford whenever it so chooses. But over a commercial censorship exercised by the libraries no estate of the realm could exercise the faintest control. The proposal which these self-appointed guardians of public morality have put forward in a circular letter to the publishers is, briefly, that all new novels shall be submitted a week before publication to the censorship of an Association on which nine readers in ten depend for their supply of contemporary books. Their blackballs, so to say, will suffice to vote a book "objectionable," and to exclude it permanently from circulation in any library within the ring. Even more serious is the provision that if three members pronounce a book "doubtful," the associated organisations pledge themselves to make its circulation "as small as possible." The first category of totally prohibited books would certainly include, together with some really undesirable and worthless books, much that is harmless, and even admirable. With the experience of recent years to guide us, we see in that class, among much forgotten and undesirable work, such books as "Esther Waters," "The Kreutzer Sonata," and most of Zola's output. The class of "doubtful" books would probably include, not merely such novels of Mr. Arnold Bennett's as a stupid critic might question on grounds of morality, but also books which preached "dangerous" tendencies in politics or religion. "Mary Barton," in its day, was held to be a dangerous incitement to class warfare, and, incredible though it sounds, there are even now public libraries which refuse to place it on their shelves. Any book strongly tinged with a virus which a timid critic might pronounce to be that of Socialism or Atheism would risk a partial boycott in this "doubtful" class. There is no obvious reason why this system should be extended only to novels. In the last century it would have killed Byron and Shelley more surely than any article in the "Quarterly," and prohibited as "doubtful" and "fleshly" every volume of Swinburne and Rossetti. It is fairly certain that Darwin, under this censorship, could have achieved fame only in translations.

Any censorship exercised by average timid minds, set to search for offences and to impose the standards of the unreflecting would be open to these criticisms. But a censorship exercised by gentlemen who are by trade hirers of books would lack the merit even of honest and disinterested prejudice. Their minds have been trained to work in one groove. It is their business to ask one question only regarding each new book, "Will the public want it, and, if so, how many of it?" Their whole success depends on their ability to gauge that demand to the last dozen. Set them to play the moral censor, to judge of things objectionable and things expedient, and to bestow in "doubtful" things the charity of as small a circulation as possible, and it is certain that the commercial calculation will stray unawares into the strivings of their consciences. Books which are really doubtful or even objectionable will escape the stigma, if they are quite certain to excite a large and profitable demand. Mr. Hall Caine or Miss Corelli might sin, we imagine, with a flagrant pen, where a Gissing in his early days might not dare to hint. That will be permitted to an established reputation which would be intolerable in a beginner. And, worst of all, into the "doubtful" category will go pell-mell all the books of "advanced" tendencies, all the puzzling, elusive work which only the "intellectuals" want to read, and which the libraries cannot hope to circulate at a great profit. Nor will the mischief end with the creation of this avowed censorship. The publishers, schooled to know what they must expect, will take care not to sink their capital in any book which might conceivably be classed as "doubtful." Their readers will be told to take no risks, and presently the authors themselves will come to understand that the novel is no longer a possible vehicle for any idea or view of life at which three irresponsible salesmen might conceivably look askance. A few years of this system, unless the publishers revolt against it, or some new library breaks it down by remaining outside the ring, will effectually reduce our imaginative literature to the same level of commercial timidity that Mr. Redford has imposed upon the stage.

We should be sorry, however, to refuse all sympathy to the libraries in their blundering effort to meet what is certainly a real difficulty. There are novels which no self-respecting librarian would wish to assist to a wide circulation. It is generally easy to detect them by the advertisements, which flaunt their commercial nastiness. Nor is the evil confined to novels. A plague of books dealing with the scandals of courts, or the lives of famous courtesans, has of late made its surprising appearance. The public has no right to ask the librarian to judge for it. It has a right to resent his attempt to put a veto on its reading. But there are clearly limits to the doctrine that the librarian is a mere purveyor or middleman. The law holds even the bookseller responsible, if he includes a flagrantly indecent book among his wares. It is the elaborate organisation which is intolerable in this new censorship—the conscious hunt for objectionable books carried on at leisure by an ad hoc committee, and the pledge which binds the libraries to act with unanimity. If it is conscience which forbids the librarian to circulate a "doubtful" book, let him at least keep his own conscience. A staid library, which would guarantee its readers against any contact with disturbing ideas, would have its own highly-respectable clientèle, and might even charge an extra fee in return for its promise to respect their peace of mind. It might even go on to bar any book which contained a split infinitive, and to exclude any novel which failed to provide a happy ending. The law of supply and demand would eventually settle the fate of that library among others. The offence against liberty begins only when the libraries decide on a uniform policy, and issue an edict which will make it impossible to obtain anywhere a new book of daring tendencies or unconventional morality save by the old-fashioned method of buying it. For our part we refuse as yet to be alarmed. The publishers might be weak enough to accept the system if it allowed them to submit their forthcoming works to the new censors in manuscript. But they are likely to resent a scheme that will expose them to enormous business risks. If even for a moment the thing could succeed, the end would not be there. It would begin to dawn upon authors and public that it is hardly more tolerable to entrust the control of our reading to salesmen and capitalists than it would be to hand over the Universities to a joint-stock company. If the libraries can combine, the public can co-operate to found a free library and, if need be, a free Press.

Life and Letters.

THE HYPOCRISY OF THE PEERS.

IN spite of their affected nonchalance, the Lords evidently stand astonished at their own immoderation. Six months ago they had no notion that it was "in them" to kick over the Constitution, and play havoc with the finances of the nation. They do not, perhaps cannot, understand the spirit that has moved them. The Greeks had a name for it. They called it Hybris, the spirit of proud infatuation which, swelling up in a man, lifted him to a heady promontory where there is no footing to save him from destruction. It is not, however, a simple spirit, but one that draws its food from several sources. Hereditary wealth and settled high position alone impart that confident bearing from which blossom all the barbarian graces that draw men's homage. When the earliest memories of childhood are linked with bobbing villagers, a school and college life whose exclusiveness becomes an art of conscious cultivation, and where the great majority even of those whose education and external bearing resemble your own are "rank outsiders," this confidence assumes a deepening tone of arrogance. "Society," club-life, the Services, and, above all, the direct personal exercise of arbitrary power through the ownership of land and property, feed this spirit. Numbers of common people are continually giving way to his will or whim, the personal power he wields visibly forces them to sweat in order that he may enjoy himself. The greater his natural intelligence, the better he realises these essential facts of his "superiority." If he is an easy-natured man, and is not provoked, his self-esteem stops at a more or less refined tolerance, which, in his dealings with persons of definitely lower grade, will conceal itself as amiable condescension. But this unobtrusive pride, when it is crossed, easily passes into a full-blown insolence, whose very nature requires it to be flaunting and defiant. Even here nicer analysis will probably distinguish the tone of sincere traditional contempt for the people, their rights and liberties, expressed in the speech of Lord Curzon, from the coarse counterfeit of aristocracy presented by Lord Milner, with its modern perversion of the wisdom of the ancients, whereby "Fiat justitia, ruat coelum" becomes "Fiat injustitia—damn the consequences!"

But granted all this pride of aristocracy, resenting the attempt of the people to curb their hereditary power and to exact a tribute from their wealth, the infatuation of the Lords still stands insufficiently explained. It is not unnatural that a class of men to whom possession is ten points of the law, and in whose eyes there is no reasonable connection between the ownership of property and the performance of personal services, should oppose the endeavor to make them contribute more largely to the upkeep of the State. British Christianity has never gone very far towards inducing men to bear one another's financial burdens. No doubt it may seem mean and churlish that rich men should prefer to make poor men provide for the public needs, should prefer food taxes to land taxes. But let us try and do justice to the situation as it presents itself to the mind of the nobleman. He sees other men providing him with all the necessities and luxuries of life all the time, and he lives among people similarly placed; he knows that all this wealth of material commodities and personal service is his "rights," which he takes as a matter of course. These other people exist to feed him, clothe him, house him, beat his coverts, man his yacht. Why should they not pay his taxes? It is not his business to bear burdens; there are heaps of common people made for that.

It is, therefore, not to be wondered at that my Lord should try to dodge his taxes. Let the people pay! is the sentiment appropriate to his traditions, his upbringing, and his circumstances. It is natural that he should be a food-taxer, for food-taxing will raise his rents. It is natural that he should think that by taxing foreign manufactured goods he can improve his dividends.

For his political economy is of a very simple order, a thing of interests and prejudices strung on specious phrases.

Now, some at least of the Peers and the men of property whose case they represent are not themselves deceived. They know the truth, viz., that they, the owners of land, of brewery shares, of high incomes, and large properties, are trying to escape their share of the taxation necessary to defray the public expenditure which they have sanctioned, and that Protection seems the only feasible way of doing it. But they dare not say this outright: so they require their leaders to furnish the necessary falsehoods. These falsehoods will be their undoing. For when pride stoops to hypocrisy it is ruined. Now we believe that when the plain man confronts the bare statement of the Lords' case as put from their own mouths, he will recognise it as sheer, frigid, calculated hypocrisy. The deceitfulness of riches is nowhere more manifest than in the contempt for the intelligence of the common people which it generates. What are we to say of the state of mind represented by the Duke of Northumberland, president of the Royal Sanitary Institute, who, with the limelight of Walbottle in his face, leads the opposition to the sanitary provisions of the Housing Bill? That it should appear quite appropriate for great landowners to pose as impartial authorities upon land taxes, great brewers upon licence duties, even in the House of Commons, suggests some curious flaw in the humor or the intelligence of that assembly and of the wider public acquainted with the facts. But when Peer after Peer comes forward and professes that he is not at all concerned upon his own account at the burdens which the Budget places upon land and other forms of property, that he is willing, even eager, to bear a larger share of the public burdens, and that his sorrow and indignation are entirely due to the unemployment, the poverty, and suffering which his necessary retrenchment must inflict upon the workers to whom he "gives employment," the dependents and the recipients of his charity, a nauseating incredulity arises. The very notion that the Peers can suppose our people to be so steeped in servility as to accept this pretence is itself a striking testimony to the power of man's pride to darken his intelligence.

But one step in hypocrisy leads to another. "We should not think of taking on ourselves to reject a Budget: we are here, not to safeguard our order, to defend our property, but merely to maintain the right of popular self-government against the usurpation of the House of Commons. We are not seeking to avoid taxation or to interfere with the constitutional rights of the Commons; we are impelled to this most distasteful and even perilous task merely by a sense of duty which requires us to insist that the people shall declare its will!" Now, does any sane man of any political experience suppose that the Lords really believe in the wisdom of the electorate, or that they possess any power of divining the electoral mind so as to know whether the will of the people sanctions this measure or that, or that it is technically possible to put any single separate issue before the electorate so as to test the popular will? They say all these things: they believe none of them. In such a case, rare, we are glad to say, in the annals of high politics, plain language is required. Dr. Johnson once replied to an unscrupulous opponent, "Sir, you lie, and you know you lie." No other commentary is fit for this contention of the Lords. They are not believers in democracy, they do not believe it is their function to divine or to consult the popular will. They don't mean to take the verdict if it runs against them; they merely hope to bribe some electors, and frighten others, and confuse some more, and if all these tricks fail, they look to some turn of the party game to save them. Ignorant as they are, they are even more selfish than they are unlettered. They want to dodge their taxes, and they are foolish enough to think that they can plant this hypocrisy upon the people. We would not deign to expose it in any other manner than by placarding the country with two full-sized figures confronting one another, the honest taxpayer and the coroneted tax-dodger.

A WARNING TO JUST MEN.

THE verdict of the jury in the action for libel brought by Messrs. Cadbury against the "Standard" may be taken as a warning to all men to bethink themselves very carefully before they go about to make their fellow-men happier. If they build up a great industry which gives work to thousands, if they spend their time, their energies, and a large portion of their profits in securing for those thousands the best possible conditions of industry and social life, if they carry out housing experiments, not only to the benefit of those whom they house, but to the instruction and guidance of the world, let them beware. They are making themselves objects of criticism and detraction. They are setting up an ideal standard of employment by which they will be judged. Others will go on in the old ruts, and no one will mind. But they, if on any side they are found deviating by a hairsbreadth from the standard which they themselves have set up, will at once become a target for censure. If they go further and employ another portion of the wealth that they have gained by the organisation of a great industry in promoting on a wider scale the public objects which they have at heart, they incur still further risks. Themselves immune from criticism in the conduct of those matters for which they are directly responsible, they may yet be brought by their dealings into contact with others who are less scrupulous. They may discover that they are buying the products of sweated labor, and even, if their purchases come from abroad, of slave labor. It will be useless for them to offer the ordinary plea of the business man, that they buy where they best can, and cannot control the conditions of labor in another land. The plea of the ordinary business man will not avail them. By all that they have done to raise the level of business methods they will be judged, and if possible condemned. By everything that he has not done the average man will be held excused. By everything that the better man has done well he will be condemned. Therefore, it was not sufficient for Messrs. Cadbury to show that they had taken a practical interest in the conditions under which San Thomé cocoa was produced such as few business men could rival. It was not enough that they had spent thousands of pounds in the work of investigation, and that a member of the firm had given his own time and personal service to the work. It was not enough that they had acted in concert with the Foreign Office and by its advice, or that they had finally, when other methods failed, agreed with other English firms in a joint boycott of the slave-grown cocoa. These indisputable facts could not indeed fail to secure them a verdict upon the charge of hypocrisy, but they failed to secure them substantial damages. While all would admit that Messrs. Tom, Dick, and Harry would have done much less, the implication is that Messrs. Cadbury might have done something more. The moral which the Birmingham jury would have us draw appears plain. Do nothing but that which you are absolutely obliged to do, for so you will be judged kindly as an average man. Do anything to make your neighbors happier, and you will be judged with the searching eye of criticism as the man who would be perfect. For to him that hath done little shall much be forgiven, and to him that hath done more shall be imputed, to the last tittle, anything that he has failed to do.

It seems a mixed standard, but there is a method in it, let us say rather a kind of instinct, a happy choice of a means of discouraging social improvement by making life uncomfortable, and if it can be done, impossible, for those who seek improvement. All of us can be caught out somewhere. If we have no vices of our own, we profit by someone's vices. We ride bicycles on tyres that may, for all we know, be made of red rubber. We eat meat killed under conditions into which we might be sorry to enquire. We wear clothing, and who knows in what sweater's den it was made? We invest in a railway where lives are sacrificed unnecessarily in the goods yards. We drink tea produced by Assam coolies, of whose labor conditions we have from time to time heard. Yet we have the audacity to interest ourselves in the suppression of slavery abroad and the regulation of labor at home, the reform of the Congo State or the prevention of cruelty to animals. Satirists like Mr. Bernard Shaw find an inexhaustible theme in the inconsistencies with which human life is riddled if you analyse it far enough. But what is the practical outcome? There seem to be three possible courses. One is to wrap ourselves in our virtue, to attempt in Tolstoyan fashion to escape profiting by evil by the method of withdrawing as far as possible from affairs, simplifying life, reducing needs to a minimum, and contenting ourselves with the feeling that we at least are free from the universal taint. It is a vain illusion. The very security which we enjoy is the work of the complex society that we seek to repudiate, and rests on the entirety of the social scheme with all its maddening mixture of good and evil. To withdraw into ourselves is tacitly to accept social life as it is, to let it pass and seek a purely personal salvation by reducing to a minimum our conscious contact with it. A second course is frankly to abandon the effort. We cannot be consistent all through. If we avoid one pitfall, Mr. Shaw will prove to us that it is only to fall into another, and the same potent irony that discomfits the Liberal will be turned next day upon the Socialist. Who then is consistent but he who frankly gives up all attempt at betterment, who takes life as he finds it, and makes the most of it for himself? Let all eat and drink who can, for morally all die. No sooner does "society" recognise that this is the implied drift of the satirist (whether he knows it or not), than it takes him to its bosom. He may laugh at it, for society, rich in enjoyment, can afford to be laughed at, provided only that the reformer in his ragged cloak comes in for an equal share in the gibes. All effort is stopped so soon as perfection is demanded as the condition of a beginning.

There remains the alternative of doing what is practically in our power in a complex life and a world which it is difficult to move, of thinking a little less of our own personal position, and what may be said against us, and a little more of the good that lies actually under our hand to do, and of the human lives that it will affect, of the tangible suffering that we can directly alleviate, of the lives that we can sensibly brighten. That we ourselves cannot live in this world as it stands without profiting by the vices and miseries of others, is not a reason either for going out of life or for accepting the world as we find it. It is a reason for redressing whatever wrong comes within reach of our hands, even though there be worse things infecting us, but not through our efforts removable. Whether we are drinking slave-grown cocoa or not is one question. Whether we can stop the employment of slaves in growing cocoa is another, and it is by far the more vital of the two. If we can stop it by a boycott, then the boycott becomes at once an imperative duty. If we cannot do so, the boycott is rather a matter of personal luxury.

But if everything that we do well is to be reckoned against us until we do all things well, and not only till we do all things well, but until every relation in which we stand is placed above all criticism, then indeed we may shrink from the task. We may prefer to remain at the bottom level of inertia rather than risk the perils of the upward path. And this is precisely what "society" desires of us, and it is why it selects for its victims those who have the smallest measure of the common faults of human kind. So far as "society" can prevail, there will remain a rest for everyone except the people of God. From all who show a budding interest in social justice, it will exact that they make no move till all that they do is purged of participation in social offence. So may the nascent enthusiast be snubbed, the hardened reformer chastised, and society left to jog along in its comfortable rut, enlivened by the wit of the satirist as he lashes the discontented and the inquirer back into their places.

ON GREAT FAMILIES.

THERE is in the National Gallery a curious essay in portraiture which inspires, as one gazes at it, a mixture of fascination and fear. The males of some prosperous

Milanese family have been sketched by Borgognone on a single canvas. They stand crowded together in an attitude of conventional devotion, the old, the young, and the middle-aged, some with the apprehensive piety of decrepitude, and some with the insolent sensuality of vigor. The physical type is uncannily persistent. The facial angle hardly differs by a degree, and the same long, straight nose appears, fleshy and aggressive in youth, meagre and cautious in old age. The hair is of every shade from yellow to white, but always long and straight and straggling. The mouth, shapely and petulant in the young, has still the proportions and the destinies which will end in the straight compressed lines of the older generations. One thinks of such a family as a disciplined regiment, wearing always, amid changing fashions of raiment, this abiding uniform of the flesh, marching to the rhythm of some secret measure to the conquest of the scattered individuals, the single sentinels around it. There are minds who love to track in history the records of great families in whom can be traced the persistence of some single trait, physical or mental—the Bourbons, who learned nothing and forgot nothing; the Stuarts, with that obstinacy which mingled so oddly with their more than average intelligence; the Hapsburgs, with that under-lip which hung pendulous and sulky for so many centuries above the gaieties of Vienna; the Hohenzollerns, who have commonly contrived to combine a certain dutiful seriousness with every conceivable variety of folly and wisdom. But in all these instances the resemblance is fanciful, a theme which may amuse courtiers and furnish a tag to the weary journalist, but not a line of thought which the serious historian will trouble to follow very closely. There were Bourbons, after all, who tried very hard to learn and forget, particularly those of the younger branch.

The difficult exception is to be found in the case of the Medici. Theirs was a greatness which survived three centuries, and invaded every Power in Christendom. They mingled their blood with Stuarts, Bourbons, and Hapsburgs. An Empress of Austria died contemplating a family tree which traced her origin from Florentine bankers. The history of the Renaissance would be an unintelligible page without them. The end of the Byzantine Empire cannot be understood without reference to that Œcumenical Council which Cosimo Pater Patriæ transferred to Florence. Ask why it was that Luther dragged half of Germany into schism, and the answer is that the first of the Medici Popes was absorbed in a debauch of culture. Ask why it was that England gained a national church under Henry VIII., and again the answer is that the second of the Medici Popes adjusted the great network of his European policy to further his ends in the mother-city on the Arno, played with Francis, Charles, and Henry, as though they were merely pawns in a Florentine intrigue, and cared little that England should be lost to the Church he ruled, if only his bastard son might be raised to the Dukedom. Seek the reasons for the destruction of Protestantism in France, and again it is the face of a Medici, the Queen-Regent Margaret, which smiles above the horrors of St. Bartholomew. In all this greatness, this baseness and this blindness, the Medici were their own stewards and advisers. There is no Richelieu, no Strafford, no "grey eminence" in their story. They paid in immediate disaster for their occasional inefficiency. They reaped for themselves the whole glory of their more usual competence.

Should we see them, these perennial Medici, a phalanx of uniformed soldiers, opening the world as their oyster, each with the same smile of resolute assurance, if we could find them together on a canvas by Borgognone? An elaborate family history has at last been attempted*, written, on the whole, from the standpoint of eulogy. But, with all its wealth of portraits, with all the aid of photographed busts and reproductions from Botticelli and Bronzino, the impression is not one of unity. Colonel Young is, indeed, impressed, perhaps a little uncritically, with the hereditary talent of this powerful family. He traces their history, one by one, from the obscure greatness of their first informal despotism in 1400 down to their inglorious decay in the eighteenth century. He sets them in the rich frame of contemporary European politics, and reinforces their glory by the glitter of all the architects, the painters, the scholars, and the poets whom they patronised. If his two fat volumes have too often the manner of a compilation, they are informed, none the less, by the steady purpose of tracing what was uniform, and throwing into relief what was splendid, in the annals of these bourgeois who got more Kings than Banquo. But the one thing which they do not convey is any sense of personal identity through the successive generations of great Medici. It is possible, with the aid of Bronzino's retrospective and perhaps idealised portraits, to trace a certain physical likeness between Giovanni di Bicci, the first of the Medici who in any sense ruled Florence, Cosimo Pater Patriæ, his son, and Lorenzo the Magnificent, his great-grandson. At least they belong to the same racial type. It is not at all an aristocratic type. It suggests, indeed, powers of calculation, self-restraint, secrecy, and steadiness, but it is the head of a man of affairs, a head one would expect to encounter in a banker or a merchant, but not in a soldier, a country gentleman, or an "intellectual." The busts of the grandson, Piero il Gottoso, display bigger features and a larger head, suggest (despite his physical weakness) a muscular rather than a nervous organisation, and convey a sense of power and command. In Lorenzo's brother, Giuliano, on the other hand, we reach, for the first time, a Medici who shows in every feature, and even in the pose of the head, a gay, beautiful, sensitive personality, which might, if it had degenerated, have become insolent and self-indulgent, but could never have been crafty or cold. The two Popes were as distinct from each other, and from other notable Medici, as well could be; while the two disastrous heads of the elder branch, Pietro the Unfortunate, whose portrait by Botticelli has all the air of triumphant likeness, and Alessandro the Moor, the bastard son of Clement VII., were manifestly their mother's sons. Indeed, it was just so long as the Medici continued to marry into other Florentine families which had the same simplicity of manners, with the same high culture, the same neighborly geniality, and that Republican modesty which Tacitus, in a parallel case, used to call the civile ingenium, that they retained at once their genius and the confidence of their fellow-citizens. Their moral decline, their misfortunes, and the ruin of the old Florence, dated from the marriage of Lorenzo the Magnificent to a Roman aristocrat. They were evidently not a male stock which could transmit itself unmixed from generation to generation. The Medici inheritance was, indeed, rather a tradition than the blood of genius. Their conscious adherence to citizen manners, their preference for the reality rather than the name of power, their taste in art, their habit of public munificence, their calculated generosity to their enemies—these things were probably rather a strategy thought out in common in the banking house, a product of a certain environment, an effect of careful instruction, than the expression of a temperament which descended from father to son with the palle and the florins. There is only one other family which we can recall that showed a like uniformity of talent through so many generations. The Bachs were musical through eight generations, and professional musicians through six. They attained supreme genius in one member, distinction of the second order in three or four, competent ability in all. They had a habit of marrying their cousins, but it was their constant family meetings and the practice that the father and elder brothers should undertake the teaching of the younger Bachs which made the family tradition. They were, in fact, a school as well as a family. Physical heredity counts for incomparably less in the making of great families than the permanence of a view of life or a style in art handed down with deliberate intention from one generation to another.

When history has stripped itself of such semi-magical conceptions as heredity, and ceased to take the notion of transmitted capacity on trust, it will, we think, examine the annals of the Medici with a shrewder curiosity about their finances. Colonel Young has devoted some two pages in these two volumes to the Medici Bank. A realist historian would have taken the Bank as his starting point. It was their credit rather than their talent which made them indispensable to the Republic. They ruled Florence without troops or titles, because Florence was their debtor. It was with loans that they bought the Sforza connection and the privilege of being the Papal bankers. One is curious to know how far their partisans in Florence were also their clients, and what part their international banking played in their brilliant diplomacy. Florence tried to drive Cosimo Pater Patriae into exile, only to find after a year's experience that she could not conduct her wars without his loans. Nor could they even in exile become insignificant; they still controlled a world-wide banking system. Ask, moreover, why they seized so much power and no more, and again the answer probably is that they snatched power enough to protect their property. "It fares ill in Florence," as the great Lorenzo put it, when he ascended his invisible throne, a plain Republican, "with anyone who possesses wealth without any control in the Government." The Medici seized power to protect their bank; they were allowed to keep it because Florence needed their credit. The system they inaugurated, from Giovanni di Bicci in 1400 down to Cosimo II., who in 1609 abandoned the Bank, because it was glory enough that scions of the Medici sat on four European thrones, was in short a plutocracy centred in a single head. If the Bachs were a school, the Medici were a firm. Ask what inscrutable force of genius it was which descended from generation to generation, and shone among the sinister Grand Dukes of the younger no less than among the genial citizens of the elder branch, and the answer of the realist is in two words—the Medici millions. They rose to the head of the Florentine State primarily because the bad debts owed by our own Edward III. to the other Florentine bankers crippled their rivals at the critical moment. They valued their power for the same reason which leads Lord Rothschild to uphold the veto of the Peers. As for their European position, they achieved it by the simple expedient of buying a Pope. Their history, in short, is the epic of property, a pæan to the power of wealth. It was not genius, it was not cunning, which made the Medici great. They were great because they knew how to spend their income without squandering their capital; because their Bank was as cosmopolitan as the Church; because they understood the use, and, above all, the abuse of money. The single point in which they did show genius was that they had the skill to fill their glorious pawnshop with such a halo of Nativity angels and such a litter of Greek manuscripts that to this day historians can hardly see the ledger.

* "The Medici." By Colonel G. F. Young, C.B. 2 vols. Murray.

THE PLACE LIKE HOME.

"A HOUSE," says Mr. Edward Thomas, in his new and beautiful book, called "The South Country" (Dent)—"A house is a perdurable garment, giving and taking of life. If it only fit, straightway it begins to chronicle our days. It beholds our joys and sorrows, its untale-bearing walls know all our thoughts, and if it be such a house as grows after the builders are gone, our thoughts presently owe much to it." To those whom harsh destiny compels to live in suburbs, there must be something saddening in such a passage. How unlike is their house to a perdurable garment, how much more inclined to decay than to grow after the builders are gone! There stretches the long suburban street, "ignobly decent," as Gissing said. Each house is created in the image of its neighbor; each block of "semi-detached" follows the other like Siamese twins indefinitely repeated. The houses are not homes; they are coverts for meals and sleep, they are rows of recurring decimals, a gallery of pictures where no love is, a series of ready-made garments hung upon a string, a suit of "hand-me-downs," the products of a slop tailor, who is not even "bespoke."

It is true that even in a suburb it is possible to make a home. Mr. Wemmick made one in Walworth. The top of his house was cut out and painted like a battery mounted with guns, which, as he remarked, was his own doing, and looked pretty. There was also a real flagstaff with a real flag, a drawbridge that crossed a chasm four feet wide by two deep, and a piece of ordnance which was a Stinger, and fired at nine o'clock every night, Greenwich time. At the back of the house, out of sight, so as not to impede the idea of fortifications, was a pig, together with fowls, rabbits, and a cucumber frame; so that, as Mr. Wemmick further remarked, if the little place were besieged, it would hold out a devil of a time, in point of provisions. If not a predurable garment, that was a real home, there is no denying it. But in these altruistic and regulated days such a fortress would hardly be defensible. Would not the County Council fill up the moat, silence the Stinger, and slaughter the pig?

It is only far from cities, beyond the clutch of the suburb's longest claw, that the natural and organic house—the house that has grown and still will grow—is now to be found. No garden-city imitation, with angles and ingle-nooks, and mountains of roof, and eccentric gables built to look as though they grew there, can for a moment deceive us. Those are the preciosities of houses, the modern pastorals in Dresden china. Self-consciousness has laid its blighting touch upon them, and, far from growing, they are still-born. The live house may have only one long, straight roof, its square windows may stand all in a row, and the square door open bang in the middle of the wall, and yet a glance shows the thing to be organic. It stands square upon the flat, or clings along the hillside as though it were part of the earth itself. We cannot think of it as built otherwise, so intimately does it belong to the rocks or fields or slope of down. There it stands, shot with strange colors and remembrances, woven into the living garment of Time. It has chronicled many days, and its roll is still open. It has grown after the builders have gone, and is full, not only of records, but of promises as sweet or grave.

As with houses, so with regions of our country. For himself the motorist of cities has reduced this island to a pinpoint. To him it makes no difference where he is, seeing that he will be somewhere else in an hour, and the Suffolk of to-day may become the Shropshire of to-morrow, with only a snort between. So long as he does not fall into the sea, space concerns him no more, but is merged in time. He has the reward of fleeting acquaintanceship, but he will never even imagine the intimate knowledge of him who has slowly, and of unconscious necessity, sucked the breasts of one distinctive plain or valley in our land. To some of us that thought of home calls up the gleam of Solway ebbing and flowing between misty hills and quaking moss, crossed by the white road that leads to the enemy's ground in Eskdale and Yarrow—a country haunted by memories of grave and silent life, the scene of our finest ballads of love and battle. Others see another northern country, utterly different from those western marches, and like Peter Bell, their spirit goes trudging again:—

"Through Yorkshire dales,
Among the rocks and winding scars,
Where deep and low the hamlets lie
Beneath their little patch of sky
And little lot of stars."

Or they see what Mr. Thomas calls "the land of wild coast, of mountains, of myriad chimneys"; and some perhaps turn with a gilding memory even to the heavy midlands and the sandy wastes that lose themselves in a sandy German sea. And westward lies that strange land of expectation, where a sudden frond of spleenwort or an outcrop of red-sandstone rock gives warning that at any moment the blue line of Cader and all her hills may rise below the sunset, and where the whole mingling aspect of uncertain country and river combines with the hope of mountains to embody the very type of our strangely mingled English nature:—

"When Severn down to Buildwas ran
Colored with the death of man,
Couched upon her brother's grave
The Saxon got me on the slave."

"The sound of fight is silent long
That began the ancient wrong;
Long the voice of tears is still
That wept of old the endless ill.

"In my heart it has not died,
The war that sleeps on Severn side;
They cease not fighting, east and west,
On the marches of my breast."

But, after all, one may doubt whether the true and perdurable garment of our race, our proper house and Englishman's home, is not in reality that South Country on which Mr. Thomas, Welshman though he is, writes with the insight and knowledge of a child who has adopted a mother and perhaps loves and knows her all the better for that touch of strangeness, that absence of habitual relationship. And, indeed, in the South Country the broods of our ancestry have been most indistinguishably intermingled. Prehistoric beings with stone, and iron, and bronze, Celts and Romans, "gluttonous Jutes and Saxons lumbering about in pot-bellied equanimity," hungry Danes, venturesome, rigorous Normans, and many a stray captive or wanderer from our sweet enemy overseas—all have dwelt in the South Country, and gone to breed the stock that lives between the Thames and the Channel. For that matter, as Mr. Thomas says of us all:—

"We are not merely twentieth-century Londoners or Kentish men or Welshmen. We belong to the days of Wordsworth, of Elizabeth, of Richard Plantagenet, of Harold, of the earliest bards. We, too, like Taliesin, have borne a banner before Alexander, have been with our Lord in the manger of the ass, have been in India, and with the 'remnant of Troia,' and with Noah in the ark, and our original country is 'the region of the summer stars.'"

Of all our island, the South Country is fullest of great history and of the relics of men who have left no history but their bones and stones and ditches. More than once Mr. Thomas dwells on the peculiar beauty and suggestiveness of South Country names. There is, as he says, a wealth of poetry in the sign posts:—

"What goodly names of the South Country—Woodmansterne, Hollingbourne, Horsmonden, Wolstanbury, Brockenhurst, Caburn, Lydiard Tregoze, Lydiard Millicent, Clevancy, Amesbury, Amberley (I once tried to make a beautiful name, and in the end it was Amberley, in which Time had fore-stalled me)."

There are many more, and nearly all of them tell of history—of some heroic figure, or of nature's yield in flocks, or fruit, or crops—Appleshaw, Kelmscot, Cowfold, or Belchamps. And yet, with all its history and its beauty, the land shows little of melodrama or sensational interest. Certainly, there are a few great cathedrals and show-places, but it is easy to avoid them. Sometimes Mr. Thomas himself reminds one for a moment of the Scholar Gipsy, whom shepherds met in some lone alehouse in the Berkshire moors, and who, having turned once to watch the line of festal light in Christ Church hall, would seek his straw in some sequestered grange; for from the common grandeur of the world he turns gladly to things of low estate:—

"I prefer any country church or chapel," he says, "to Winchester or Chichester or Canterbury Cathedral, just as I prefer 'All round my hat' or 'Somer is icumen in,' to Beethoven. Not that I dislike the cathedrals, or that I do not find many pleasures among them. But they are incomprehensible and not restful. I feel when I am within them that I know why a dog bays at the moon."

It is a fine saying, worthy of Thoreau, or of Richard Jefferies, whom Mr. Thomas knows so well, or of Traherne from whose "Centuries of Meditation" he sometimes quotes with new revelation.

The land lies almost close at our door, and yet it is still beautiful, and, compared to the so-called wealthy parts of England, it is deserted and little known. Like racing greyhounds, as one of George Meredith's lovers hastening to his mistress called them, the downs run east and west in sinuous lines. Basking in sunshine, or hazy in driving mist, or dark with storm, they have a lonely dignity above their height, and from their ridges sometimes you may catch the pale glimmer of the sea. At their foot lies the ancient Weald, still heavy in soil and thick with trees. Their summits are scarred by the earthworks of long-forgotten peoples, and here and there along their sides has grown one of those habitations which are a part of nature, and breed men as naturally as a wilderness breeds lions. With the thought of them in mind, it is difficult for a patriot to walk down the long monotony of a suburban terrace and retain his hope.

Present-Day Problems.

THE MONEY-POWER AT WAR.

THREE years ago Lord Lansdowne announced that the House of Lords intended to fight the Liberal Government "upon ground as favorable as possible" to themselves. He has since discovered, as he did in South Africa, that an active enemy after an announcement of that kind may insist on being consulted as to the time and place of the fighting. But there is no doubt that the majority of the Peers have, since the appearance of the Budget, considered themselves at war, and therefore entitled to act in accordance with the ethics of war.

At first the means adopted were old-fashioned enough. The great rural landlords played once again upon that fear which besets the farm laborer and the village tradesman lest "the powers that be" should, like the gods in a Greek tragedy, suddenly withdraw their favor. This was done openly by speeches and letters. But the speeches and letters turned out to be excellent copy for Radical papers circulating among the town working men, who think of ground-landlords not as arbitrary gods but as the receivers of taxable ground rents. That method was therefore dropped—the more willingly perhaps because the intimidation of the villagers had been already carried as far as was safe in constituencies which after all vote by ballot.

Next came Lord Rosebery's plan, to create a personification called Socialism, to define it as "the end of all, the negation of faith, of family, of property, of monarchy, of empire," and to say that every vote given for the Budget was a vote for Socialism so defined. That suggestion will undoubtedly be used for what it is worth, but so far it does not seem to have been very effective. It reminds one rather too closely of the political maxims in "Coningsby."

Meanwhile, the practical modern men, whom the Peers pay, were at work, and Mr. Garvin, in last Sunday's Observer, gives a singularly illuminating account of their methods. The Tariff Reform League, he says, has "learnt by experience how to make a consummate use of money." Mr. T. W. A. Bagley, the Secretary of the League, shed the insipid traditions of the nineteenth century during "an adventurous life in West Africa and elsewhere." He has organised an altogether new body of political workers whom, with a recollection of West Africa, he calls "Missionaries." "These men," we are told, "move through the constituencies, live in the villages, engage individuals in casual conversation. . . . I had heard of them before, and of their remarkable political efficiency. Being in fact paid agents, they are taken by those with whom they 'engage in casual conversation,' to be laborers or tramping artisans like themselves. Talking to men who are off their guard they get the advantage, known to all psychologists and mesmerists, of implanting ideas by 'suggestion' rather than by argument. The dodge would be considered disreputable if it were used to advertise an aperient pill; but all's fair in war.

The effect of "suggestion" depends very largely upon apparently undesigned coincidence, and for producing this the licensing arrangements which have grown out of our eighteenth century temperance legislation are almost ideally suited. The casual conversations of the "Missionaries" take place, one supposes, mostly in public-houses, and the "tied-house" system has brought it about that a few rich men in London can order nearly all the publicans in England to put, every morning, the same bills in their windows, and to make the same unpremeditated remarks about Mr. Lloyd George to their customers.

But all these are comparatively quiet methods, suitable for the years between one election and another. One learns from the "Observer" that Mr. T. W. A. Bagley also invented for the actual election-period the "whirlwind campaign" methods which produced the "swallowing wave" of Peckham. What the coming campaign will be like one can already gather in part from the big posters which are appearing on the most expensive hoardings in London. I remember that nearly a quarter of a century ago Bernard Shaw was asked to speak at an unemployed meeting. He was at that time not very much more prosperous than some of those who would have heard him. But he answered, "No, as long as I have a watch in my pocket which I do not intend to pawn, I will not pretend sympathy with men who are actually hungry." No such scruples have influenced the "consummate users of money" who pay for these posters. Some cold-blooded young artist a few months ago must have produced a sketch of a man at the last point of starvation and despair. A professional agent said "That will do the trick." Rich men of all shades of opinion, from the few fanatics who really believe that "Tariff Reform" will make unemployment impossible, to the followers of Mr. Balfour who believe that a little Tariff Reform may slightly lessen unemployment, and those who agree with Lord Rothschild that Tariff Reform must increase unemployment will all subscribe to organisations issuing these and similar posters with gramophone records to correspond.

Since the town working men cannot be individually intimidated, every effort will be made to excite and confuse their elemental instincts. Fear will come first, fear of the unknown causes which produce depressions of trade and make life in mean streets a hell. Next will come the fighting instinct, directed, now against Germany and a whole world of imaginary enemies whom the result of the campaign may turn into real enemies, and now against the other side in the sporting contest of the election. An attempt will be made, as the day of the poll draws near, to turn every urban constituency into a Peckham, where instinct and habit, argument and fact are merged in a half serious medley of subsidised noise.

The moral and social questions raised by the new electioneering are not, of course, confined to one election or one party or one country. When Mr. Garvin declares triumphantly, "In modern politics, as in modern war, it is the 'Machine,' in the best sense of the word, that wins," he is consciously using an American term for methods avowedly copied from the organisations which American millionaires more or less willingly support. When our agrarians try to work up a national hatred of Germany in order to accuse social reformers of a want of patriotism, they use almost the same language for exactly the same purpose as the agrarians of Prussia.

What is, however, new in English Democratic politics is the almost open way in which rich men are now urged to pay for the winning argument whether they believe in it or not. In the course of a general appeal to his party, Mr. Garvin says: "The constitutional balance which the Budget also attempted to overturn once for all is a supreme issue in itself; but it will not be saved by merely constitutional arguments. Tariff Reform is what the masses understand; Tariff Reform is what the masses want. The Tariff Reform League is the agency by which the masses can be most effectually moved. Copy it—Work with it—Pay to it."

Equally new and even more sinister is the actual delight with which some of our electioneering "overmen" contemplate the process of manufacturing opinion for the advantage, not of those who vote, but of those who pay. Mr. A. A. Baumann, in the "Fortnightly" for October, first says: "I rejoice at the power of money in politics," and then, quoting a sentence from a book of my own as to the skill in the production of opinion now to be bought, urges that the English rich men should buy that skill more lavishly and so "use their enormous money power in a scientific manner." He apparently no more feels anything disgraceful in the suggestion than would Juvenal's "Graeculus Esuriens," or a fifteenth-century condottiere. In a circular issued last August, appealing for support for the Budget Protest League, that body professes to have "introduced the true twentieth-century note in the ever-fascinating art of political propaganda." The word which I have italicised is quite horribly significant.

If we on one side complain, we are told that we are merely envious. Mr. Garvin is himself a man of real, though, I believe, unbalanced sincerity. But he heads his article in praise of Mr. T. W. A. Bagley by an anecdote about Bismarck. Bismarck constantly used in peace the ethics of war. He thereby lowered the morale of European diplomacy, diminished permanently the cohesion of the European States, and may ultimately be found to have been responsible for the loss by Europe of the hegemony of civilisation. But Mr. Garvin relates that the Emperor Francis Josef, "when the courtiers were abusing Bismarck, remarked at last, 'I only wish I had him.'"

What is to be done in the presence of this force—the "consummate use of money"—organised, fully conscious, and claiming all the ethical freedom of warfare? That is the central problem of Democracy all the world over. It is useless for the adherents of the popular causes to take to themselves Mr. Garvin's advice to "Copy it." The landlords, and brewers, and financiers, and the makers of guns can always beat us in a contest carried on solely by money and the brains that money can buy.

Nor is it of the least use for the citizens of England, or of countries like Belgium, which have copied the English Constitution, to appeal to those conventions on which that constitution depends. Lord Cawdor, in the Budget debate, openly rejoiced at the fact that the "man in the street" will never recognise the difference between law and convention, or accept, for instance, the view that a Bill can come before the Lords for their consent which they are not free to reject. Convention did very well in England as long as it regulated the relations between two aristocratic parties. But when one party begins to make a scientific use of its money power in the style of Peckham, convention necessarily goes down the wind.

Obviously, therefore, we must use the opportunity the Lords have given us to create a constitution which seems to be that which it is. We may never again get so clear an issue to fight on—for the whole strategy of a privileged aristocracy in a democratic country is to prevent clear issues arising—and we must make the most of our chance. At this election, if not in Peckham, at least in the manufacturing towns and villages of the North, men can be made to hear above the gramophone and the brass bands the question, "Who pays for this?"

If we win, something may be done, and should be at once undertaken, to diminish the number and money-power of the "interests" who find it worth while to pay for the professional manufacture of political motive. The present position, for instance, of the drink monopoly, irritated by attack, but never prevented from standing to win enormous sums by a single electoral victory, surely constitutes an unnecessary danger.

In Germany the Social Democrats have fought the "scientific use of money" by building up a working-class nation within a nation, with a literature, a philosophy, a technical language, and a discipline of its own, fenced off from all outside influences whether sincere or insincere. They succeeded in standing against the organised hysteria of 1907, and will enormously improve their position in 1911. There are forces in England which will produce the same result if there is no other way, though I believe that that result involves a danger, both to the general intellectual life of the country, and to the possibility of peaceful social change, which is too serious to be lightly faced.

In America, the birth-place of those "machine-politics" which Mr. Garvin welcomes to England, men seem to despair of any defence against them except a moral change. We know too little of the great movements of the human mind to think as yet of such a change except as lying on the knees of the gods. But in many fields of life the ethics of peace have overcome at last the ethics of war, and they may do so even in the new field of our vast impersonal democracies. I dream sometimes of a Tolstoy, who should make our Established Church listen to him, as he says, "The religion of Christ is either true or false, and in either alternative you would do well to reconsider your hopes and fears." But then I remember the speaker at Bermondsey who announced that Mr. Dumphreys had the support of the Church "to a man," and my old colleague Mr. Dumphreys is not at all like Tolstoy.

Sometimes I dream of a movement which, like one of the "philosophies" of the Græco-Roman world, might spread among men of good will in all countries. The philosophy of my dream would recognise all that which students of psychology are telling us, and paid politicians are demonstrating to us, as to the imperfection of our knowledge, the weakness of our wills, and those strange facts in our nature which we can only understand when we remember our kinship with other animals. But upon that recognition it would base an appeal for simplicity as well as kindness in our converse with each other.

Meanwhile, however, we have to deal with Mr. T. W. A. Bagley.

GRAHAM WALLAS.

The Drama.

BETTER THAN SARDOU.

IF "The House Opposite" had been as strong intellectually as it is structurally, it would have been a very fine play. Even as it stands, it is far above the average in interest and power. The name of its author, Mr. Perceval Landon, is new to me; but I shall look with keen interest for its next appearance in the bills.

Mr. Landon has been reproached with taking a theme out of the "stockpot" of conventional complications. Superficially just, this is substantially a quite unjust accusation. Scores of plays, no doubt, have turned on the difficulties of a man whose "honor rooted in dishonor stands"—who cannot perform some obvious and imperative duty without betraying a woman who has trusted him not wisely but too well. The conflict of normal morality with the abnormal morality which is specifically termed "honor" is, indeed, one of the commonplaces of drama. But is it not one of the commonplaces of criticism that absolute novelty of theme is practically unattainable, and that all we can reasonably require of a dramatist is novelty of development and treatment? This Mr. Landon gives us in full measure. The bare formula of his theme is old, but his scenes are new and telling; and they depend upon studies of character which, though neither so deep nor so clear as they might be, are far from lacking in originality.

Critics who take the "stockpot" view do not seem to have recalled a play which, on the surface, exactly bears out their contention. I refer to Sardou's "Ferréol." Here, as in "The House Opposite," we have a murder witnessed by a man who is coming away from a nocturnal meeting with a married woman; here, too, the innocent person accused of the murder remains unseen throughout the play; here, too, the knot is loosed by the confession of the real murderer, but not before the husband of the nocturnal lady has got on the track of the truth. So far the parallel is exact; yet I think there is every probability that Mr. Landon never heard of Sardou's play. At any rate, if you want to see the difference between a human drama and a piece of conventional clockwork, you cannot do better than compare "The House Opposite" with "Ferréol." Sardou concentrated all his effort on the ingenious piecing-together of a detective story; in Mr. Landon's play the detective element is kept within the narrowest limits; the details of the actual crime are left entirely in the vague; the event is a mere starting-point for the true action, which consists of the interplay of four characters. At every point the English play is deeper, sincerer, stronger, simpler than the French. "Ferréol," it is true, was a poor play even for Sardou; and I am far from saying or thinking that Mr. Landon is a greater playwright than the author of "Divorçons!" The superiority of his work in this instance merely shows that there is in the air a sounder ideal of drama than there was thirty years ago.

Mr. Landon's first act is admirable. The curtain rises on a dark room: from an inner room a man comes groping his way across the stage, followed by a woman who is evidently assisting him to make a clandestine exit. For a moment they switch on the light, then turn it off again, and continue the scene in the glow which streams from the inner room. He is Richard Cardyne, she Mrs. Rivers; they are alone in the house, save for Mrs. Rivers's maid, who sleeps in a distant attic. Their talk begins as that of lovers after a first assignation. She knows that he is reputed a rake; but half-inadvertently, in his cynical fashion, he shows himself to have been quite recently the lover of a woman she detests; and the sense that she is only the successor to such a woman, the next conquest on a libertine's catalogue, fills her with humiliation. She falls into a passion of remorse and misery which makes her oblivious of everything around her; and, while she is in this paroxysm, we see a light in a window on the opposite side of the street, and we see that Cardyne's attention is strongly attracted by something that is passing there. Presently there is a distant cry of distress, and Cardyne says, "What was that? Did you not hear?" But she remains entirely unconscious of the whole incident, not even having noticed Cardyne's expressions of surprise. She makes him promise never to see her again; and, when he has gone, she slips downstairs to bolt the door after him.

The scene is painful, but true and poignant, quite apart from the incident of the window; and the character of Cardyne is very cleverly shadowed forth. In "Ferréol" the action does not begin till the day of the trial; the clandestine meeting is related in retrospect; and, though perhaps culpable in intention, it was innocent in fact, since a providential illness of the lady's child recalled her to a sense of her duties. Ferréol and Madame de Bois-Martel, in fact, are two purely conventional puppets invented for the needs of a detective story. There is not an atom of character about them.

The second act of Mr. Landon's play is a little artificial, inasmuch as, for purposes of compression, he apparently confounds the Home Office with Scotland Yard, and makes the story of the murder leak out in ways that are not entirely plausible. But essentially the process of the act is right. Before the end, it is known that an old man who lived opposite has been stabbed in his sleep, and that his housekeeper, Anne Cary, is accused of the crime. Being questioned as to whether she saw or heard anything unusual during the night, Mrs. Rivers replies that she did not. She is thunderstruck, then, when Cardyne tells her that he knows the housekeeper to be innocent, for he saw a man pass the lighted window with what looked like a knife in his hand. Of course, he cannot give this evidence without ruining Mrs. Rivers; nor is it now possible for her to say that she saw the murderer, since she has already declared that she slept quietly all night. But surely it is out of the question that Cardyne should come forward and declare what he knows? He will wait, he tells her, and see whether Anne Cary is acquitted, but, if she is not, he cannot let an innocent woman die to save another's reputation.

Cardyne, in fact, is a cynical Don Juan, with a fear of God lurking somewhere in the background of his mind; and this crude theism of the voluptuary is perhaps truer to type than the atheism of Molière's hero. At any rate, his hard, almost brutally-declared resolve is very different from the frothy hysterics of Ferréol, who rushes around in helpless agitation, until at last he does what immemorial convention demands, and—without a shadow of plausibility—accuses himself of the crime! It is here, however, that Mr. Landon's psychology begins to lag behind the requirements of his theme. The situation of Mrs. Rivers is really one of the most tragic that can be conceived; and Mr. Landon glides over it with no attempt to show us the struggle which must be rending her heart. There seems, in fact, to be no struggle in the matter; her one idea is to implore Cardyne to be silent; she seems to have no realisation either of the torture which is being inflicted on an innocent woman for her sake, or of the unspeakable baseness of letting that woman die. That this should be her dominant mood one can readily concede, but not that she should have no moments of revulsion in which she should feel that not even for the sake of her child (I forgot to mention that she has a little daughter) can she take such a burden of guilt upon her soul. There was opportunity here for some subtle and at the same time intensely dramatic writing, which Mr. Landon has not given us. Perhaps the feeling of a lost opportunity is heightened by the fact that the part of Mrs. Rivers is played by Miss Eva Moore. Mr. Landon may possibly have intended to portray in Mrs. Rivers a shallow-souled, unimaginative woman, who would be entirely dominated by the instinct of self-preservation; whereas Miss Moore always impresses one with a sense of depth and firmness of character, capable, indeed, of acute suffering, but scarcely of this ruthless absorption in the desire to save her own skin. It is possible, in short, that the actress is too deep for the character; but it is certain that the character is too shallow for the situation.

I must cut short my analysis, however. An excellent invention in the third act is the French maid's offer to save her mistress's reputation at the expense of her own, which is already not untarnished. This seems to afford a loop-hole of escape; but on examination it is found that the maid's room commands no view of the windows of the house opposite; and the gleam of hope is extinguished in blank despair. The fourth act is the least satisfactory. The French maid, now initiated into the whole situation, appears in the guise of a moralist, and tells her adored mistress that the only course open to her is to face the music. This view she expresses, however, in far more dignified and rather too copious language. Mrs. Rivers, in fact, braces herself up to confess all to her husband, Cardyne promising to stand by her in paying the penalty. So far good; but here they fall to moralising on their case in a way which is neither very probable, nor very edifying, nor very interesting. This middle part of the act drags a good deal, and contains some speeches which are not only unnecessary but pretentious. The end, on the other hand (which I have no space to describe) is very ingenious in conception, but demanded for its full effect, I think, that we should have a clearer idea than had previously been vouchsafed us of the character of the Right Hon. Henry Rivers, K.C., M.P., the heroine's husband. Mr. Waring, at any rate, did not quite succeed in making the scene plausible; and I don't think the fault was altogether his.

Mr. H. B. Irving has done nothing better than his Richard Cardyne. His distinction, his sardonic quietude, his hardness, and yet his suggestion of some finer potentialities in an otherwise very unadmirable character, combined to make a memorable impersonation. The emotional sincerity of Miss Eva Moore's performance was beyond praise; and Miss Dora Barton deserved the applause accorded her in the part of Marie.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Letters from Abroad.

THE ELECTORAL POLICY OF GERMAN SOCIAL DEMOCRACY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—On the eve of a General Election, where great and far-reaching questions are to be decided, the Labor parties of Great Britain have to settle their electoral policy in regard to this contest. It does not behove an outside comrade to give them uncalled-for advice, not to speak of criticism or worse sorts of interference. But a letter obtained from a friend in your country shows that it may be of use to give them a clear idea of the electoral policy of their German comrades. The international character of the modern Labor movement has as a natural consequence that occasionally the example of other countries is taken or called into account, and erroneous notions may thus impair the decisions one way or the other.

To understand rightly the electoral policy of the German Social Democratic Party, so far as the Reichstag is concerned, two things must be considered at the outset: the existence of the second ballot and the constitutional rôle of the Reichstag. The Reichstag is not a parliament in the British sense. It does not decide the formation of the government of the country. At a general election in Great Britain the voter goes—or can go—to the poll conscious of the fact that upon his vote depends the question which party shall in the coming legislature govern the country, make its laws, direct its administration, and manage its foreign policy. The German elector has for a long time had no such feelings, and could not have them. "After all, we are still only dogs," was the pessimistic sigh of the Liberal leader, Ludwig Bamberger, in the 'seventies, when his party was at its heyday in the Reichstag. Bamberger's saying illustrates best the restricted influence of parties on the government of the Empire. Government has quite a different meaning in Germany and in Great Britain. In the former country the Ministers are the officials of the Federated States, with the Kaiser as the head, and not the nominees of Parliament. Consequently the voter goes to the poll with the feeling that he has to elect a man who shall look after his interests against or before the Government, which itself is beyond his control. With a grain of salt you may compare it with the feeling of a man who has to choose an attorney to defend him before a court. In England the "court" is to the mass of the people a fixed concept whosoever the judges may be, and the same is in Germany the case with the concept "Government."

It is easy to understand how much this condition of things favors the splitting up of political parties, and this effect is fortified by the system of the second ballot. At the first ballot the voter has a large measure of liberty to cast his vote according to his particular mood or principles. A weakening of the party nearest to his opinions, to the profit of the party most opposed to them can, as a rule, be made good at the second ballot. Hence the much qualified sense of political responsibility and the much pronounced sense of theoretical and sectional duties amongst the German electorate.

The system has been particularly favorable to the formation, development, and rise of the German Social Democratic Party. Its natural struggle towards absolute political independence was in a high degree forwarded by it. There was no great fear of damaging Democratic Liberalism by voting at the first ballot for a Social Democrat. Almost from the outset the party could pronounce the counting of votes its first, and the election of members only its second, or even subsidiary, policy. The party, as far as the first ballot was concerned, was never faced with a tactical problem of great political consequence. At the second ballot it has, as a rule, after its own candidate had been eliminated, voted for the candidates of advanced Liberalism or for Democratic Catholics where such stood against National Liberals of the Bismarckian stamp. But, with one exception only—which happened in 1867 in a Rhenish division—it has never directly or indirectly advised its adherents to vote for a Conservative.

In other words, the political system, combined with the electoral system of the country, offered in Germany very little inducement to drop the policy of independence or particularism in favor of a policy of transactions with neighboring parties. But where other conditions existed, German Social Democracy has by no means been so Doctrinaire as is generally believed.

In opposition to the electoral system for the Reichstag the electoral system for the Prussian Diet, with the three classes of voters and the indirect vote, is almost made for compromise and transaction, particularly in those constituencies where two or three members are to be elected.

When, in the middle of the 'nineties, the German Social Democratic Party reconsidered the question of taking part in these elections, a minority opposed it at first tooth and nail, just on the ground that electoral successes, under the three-class system, were impossible without transactions, and that these must by all means be resisted. They were, however, beaten by a majority led by August Bebel and the late Ignaz Auer. After a first perfunctory but encouraging trial in 1898, the party in the autumn of 1903 went vigorously into the fight for the Prussian Diet. At a conference in the spring of that year by the whole party in Prussia, it was resolved to make, in those double-barrelled divisions where a great number of Social Democratic electors would be elected at the first or "primitive" poll (URWAHL), support of the Liberals dependent upon their conceding one seat to the Social Democrats, i.e., upon a regular transaction or understanding. And the party has acted accordingly.

In the great division of the suburbs south of Berlin, Teltow-Charlottenburg, which had to elect two members, the Conservatives obtained at the first poll 1,010, the Liberals 836, and the Social Democrats 654 electors, so that the two latter parties combined would have beaten the Conservatives. Then the Social Democratic Electoral Committee of the division wrote a letter to the Liberal Committee telling it that, in accordance with the resolutions of their party as a whole, they were prepared to come to an agreement with them. They would demand from the Liberals the election of one Social Democrat, otherwise they would abstain from voting at the second ballot of the poll of the members, i.e., leave the Liberals alone to their fate. But the Liberals refused, and Conservatism elected its two members.

Things went similarly in Breslau. There three members had to be elected. The Social Democrats declared themselves ready to vote for two Liberals if the Liberals would vote for one Socialist. But, although one of the Liberal candidates, that genuine Radical, Dr. Gothein, was willing to withdraw in favor of a Socialist, the Liberal Committee would not entertain the idea, and here, too, the Conservatives got all the seats.

It is thus quite a mistake to suppose that German Social Democrats have rejected the policy of transaction. In some of the South German States, as Bavaria, Baden, etc., such transactions have actually come to pass when important political questions—a franchise reform, the prevention of a reactionary majority—were at stake. And if in Prussia such an arrangement has not been come to, it is not the unwillingness of the Social Democrats, but the unreadiness of the Prussian Freisinnige which stood in the way. It is realised how the latter have had to pay the penalty of their unreadiness.

No doubt, the policy of transaction or compromise has its dangers for a Socialist party, particularly when the party is still in the process of formation. It must in each case be considered according to the particular conditions of party life and the questions at issue. None the less, it must also be considered free of misconceptions as to what is or has been done abroad.

The growing successes of German Social Democracy are in no small degree due to its traditional policy of never refusing an honorable co-operation in genuine action, for political, industrial, and educational progress.

—Yours, &c.,

ED. BERNSTEIN.

Schöneberg, Berlin, December 5th, 1909.

Letters to the Editor.

WHERE THE FOREIGNER DOES NOT PAY THE TAX.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As an American contribution to the controversy as to whether the foreigner pays the import duty, I am enclosing you receipts for duty which I paid to-day on three consignments of second-hand books from England. My booksellers' bills for the three consignments amount to £3 8s. 11d. In this amount postage is included; and there were among the books two or three published more than twenty years ago, on which duty is not charged. As you will see from the enclosed receipts, twelve of my importations were books published within the last twenty years, and the duty on these was three dollars and twenty cents. I paid the duty this morning as I have paid duty on similar importations scores of times within the last three or four years; and as I am a student and not a dealer in books I am always compelled to pay the duty on the retail value. Time and again the duty is arbitrarily assessed at the New York Customs House through which these importations come. But I have no appeal against the assessments of value—certainly no appeal that is of practical use.

Twice I have paid duty on books of my own which have been published in London. I have frequently suggested to the second-hand booksellers in England with whom I have regular dealings that they ought to compromise with me on the twenty-five per cent. duty. I have, however, not yet succeeded in persuading any of them that the "foreigner should pay the tax." I not only pay the tax, but I am compelled by the United States Government to fetch the consignments from the Post Office, although in each case postage has been fully prepaid, and there has been an implied contract with my bookseller in England and the Post Office that the books would be delivered by the United States Post Office. The American Post Office, in short, collects money for a service which it does not perform. Even the Post Office in this country would seem to be run in the interest of protection. It certainly imposes obstacles in the way of the importation of books, by compelling importers to fetch their consignments from the Post Office. I have been importing books in this way for six years. Looking round my shelves, I cannot put my hand on a single book so imported that was published in this country. There is but a limited sale in the United States for books on political science such as I import; and for scarcely one of these books could a market of a hundred copies have been made had it been published in America. I may add that I have had an experience with my tailor similar to that I have described with my booksellers. My tailor simply will not pay the duty or any part of it. A little while ago I imported a suit of clothes for which I paid in England £3 7s. 6d. On this importation I paid as duty eleven dollars and eighty cents. American readers of THE NATION are looking on at this controversy in its columns as to who pays the duty with good-natured amazement; for there is no doubt in the minds of intelligent and disinterested people in this country as to who has paid the duties under the McKinley, the Wilson, the Dingley, and the Payne tariffs.—Yours, &c.,

EDWARD PORRITT.

Hartford, Conn., U.S.A.

November 24th, 1909.

MAKING THE FOREIGNER PAY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Haywood did admit that foreigners might pay the import duty, and used it as an argument to show that it would therefore be no protection to our manufactures. "Manufacturer" states "that in exceptional cases the foreigner may pay the whole or part of the tax." What Tariff Reformers say is that where the foreigners' goods compete with an untaxed or less-taxed supply, grown in Britain or the oversea Empire, "that he will be willing to pay, and will pay, part of the import duty rather than lose his market." In some cases, perhaps, he may possibly pay the whole of it.

What "Manufacturer" is challenged to say is "whether he pays the average 72 per cent. on his goods sent to America; if not, what is the percentage, and could he not afford to pay his working people better wages if no import duty had to be paid to the American Government before his goods were allowed to enter the American market?" What are his goods and what is his name and address? Unless we have these particulars we cannot judge his case. He tells us "that we sell to the foreigner the goods he wants." This is exactly what the foreigner will not allow us to do. Mr. Asquith's full statement in 1894 was "that British trade in those days carried on its operations under great, formidable, and increasing difficulties, and that the wall of tariffs which excluded us from foreign markets was every day getting higher and higher." This is just what has happened, and the misery caused by want of employment has got worse.

"Manufacturer" says "that I forgot to add that American tariff discriminates against the poor." This is the exact reverse of what is the case. America taxes highly the imported luxuries of the rich which the poor never buy, whilst, alcohol and tobacco excepted, we allow all the many luxuries of the rich to come in without paying a halfpenny, and all our import taxation is on food, drink, and tobacco, and the working-classes pay far the greater part of it, and on drink and tobacco far more than the rich in proportion to value. In spite of the heavy taxation on imported luxuries America's import taxation per head is about the same as our own, according to Mr. Lloyd George himself. In America there is no tax on imported tea, coffee, or raw cocoa. In this country the working classes pay millions on these things every year, and as there is no competition with an untaxed supply they do have to pay most probably the whole of the import duty in increased price.

The general report of the Trades Unionists who went to America with the Moseley Committee was "that food was no dearer in America and that the American working-people were decidedly better off than our own."

Want of employment is not only much less in Germany, according to the statistics of both countries, but Trades Unionists and Free Traders who have visited Germany "have shown that German working people are better off than our own." This is surely better evidence than the shilling's worth of the Financial Reform Almanac. If more evidence is wanted of our decline it is surely contained in the fact that about fifty years ago, after our industries had been built up by Protection, we made more iron and steel, manufactured more machinery, mined more coal, and wove more cloth than all the great countries put together; now, after sixty years of so-called Free Trade, Germany alone has beaten us in the production of iron and steel, so has America, and the value of America's manufactures is three times that of our own, and we have Mr. Churchill's statement "of the extreme misery of millions of our people."

I can quite understand Mr. Carnegie advising British people he meets not to have Tariff Reform and Preference, because he said "that he would do anything in his power to prevent Mr. Chamberlain's scheme being adopted, because it would take Canada's market away from America and give it to Great Britain, and it was not likely that he was going to allow that if he could prevent it." He also said, at St. Andrew's University in 1902, "that Americans, because of their large home market, could and did send their surplus goods abroad at less than cost price, and pointed to the making of agricultural machinery as a case in which Americans had triumphed so much that one manufacturer in America then made more machines than all those in Britain put together, because Britain's market was open and free to them." As America pays about double our wages, how much easier can other nations do this, paying the same or less wages? America's exports on the whole are increasing faster than ours, but she does not require to export so much, because she has such an enormous home market which she rightly protects from unfair foreign competition.

"Manufacturer" says "that Imperial Preference is a glorified hypocrisy," yet Mr. Lloyd George at the Conference said "it gave British manufacturers an enormous advantage," and Mr. Asquith also acknowledged "how much it had helped us." Why did Mr. Barnard, the Free Trade Liberal member for Kidderminster, head a deputation to beg the Australians for a preference for British carpets, and Mr. Lloyd George (as reported) also beg for a preference for our slates, if tariffs and preference make no difference?

I feel that I have trespassed as much as I dare on your space, but may I, in concluding, ask for an answer as to why Lord Morley said it was a matter of life and death to us to persuade other nations to adopt Free Trade? As it is necessary to raise money by import taxation, why is it right to raise most of it by very heavy taxation on the necessities and simple luxuries of the poor, whilst almost all the luxuries of the rich are let in without paying a halfpenny? What is the sense of taxing our own people about 10 to 15 per cent. on all they produce for the upkeep of our country and market, whilst we allow foreigners to send their goods into this same market without paying a halfpenny?

Is it true or not that, if we allow subsidised surplus and bounty-fed foreign goods to come in here so cheap that we cannot produce them if our people are to earn good wages, this must mean unemployment or cheap underpaid men and women?

Are Free Traders willing that our industries and working people shall be ruined by the cheap imported manufactured goods and agricultural produce from China and Japan, where yellow men and yellow women can and do work for, and live on, wages so low that it is quite impossible for our white men and women to compete with them. Is it not true that this kind of cheapness is bound to ruin us because we are not a cheap race? Why are the rapidly diminishing number of our Free Traders so much wiser than the people of all the other great countries, and of our own Colonies, who so strongly believe in and practise the system of protecting their own industries and working people from unfair foreign competition?—Yours, &c.,

ROWLAND HUNT.

December 7th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. Rowland Hunt, is clearly of opinion that people living in a country under Tariff Reform are able to buy from the foreigner cheaper than people who live under Free Trade.

This is obviously what Mr. Hunt means by taxing the foreigner.

I had occasion last year to inquire the price of Argentine wheat in London and Berlin on a given date, with the following result: On December 29th last the price of Argentine wheat in Berlin per 480 lbs. was 50s. 6d., and in London the price of the same wheat on the same date was 37s. So as to place the matter beyond the shadow of a doubt I repeated my inquiry on January 2nd, and I found that the difference in price was identical. The tax on wheat in Germany is 11s. 10d. It will be seen from the above figures that the purchaser of the Argentine wheat in Germany pays not only the whole of the tax, but an additional 1s. 8d. If the Germans cannot under Tariff Reform make the foreigner take less for his commodities, what ground have we for believing that we shall succeed where Germany has failed?—Yours, &c.,

ARTHUR ARONSON.

The Mill House, Chipperfield, King's Langley,
December 1st, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is surprising that any intelligent person can maintain that the foreigner pays the duty—I would recommend for Mr. Hunt's perusal the pamphlet "Taxing the Foreigner," price one penny, issued by the Free Trade Union. It deserves the widest circulation, for it completely explodes the Tariff Reformer's fiction that the importer pays the duty.—Yours, &c.,

F. CARDEW.

Tudor Cottage, Whitchurch, Oxon,
December 7th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—If Mr. Hunt and his friends are going to raise so much money for the State by means of a moderate tariff, thereby allowing the taxed goods to enter our ports and markets, they have no right to go up and down the country promising, on all hands and to all conceivable industries, more work and higher wages for the workers. If the foreigner pays, his goods will come in at the same prices after the imposition of the duty as before, and the "ruined industries" are no whit affected.—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE M. COTTON.

9, Bruntsfield Crescent, Edinburgh,
December 1st, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Rowland Hunt in his letter of last week raises many points I would like to answer, but this would mean trespassing upon your space. I, therefore, take one paragraph and deal with it alone.

Mr. Hunt speaks of an import of £140,000,000 "manufactures." and contemplates the possibility of excluding £70,000,000, making these in this country, and taxing the other half, presumably by the imposition of a tax averaging 10 per cent., graduated by the work factor in the goods in question.

(1) Mr. Hunt makes no allowance for the £23,000,000 of these goods which are re-exported, of which Mr. Chamberlain has said there must be a compensating rebate, as in other countries, so as not to handicap the home re-export trade. This item would assuredly grow as it has done in other countries, because the manufacturer would naturally seek to use foreign materials for the production of the goods exported, seeing that by so doing he would secure the 10 per cent. rebate. This would be to the detriment of our home manufacturers.

(2) Mr. Hunt ignores the question of Colonial Preference, which we have been led to understand is an integral part of the Tariff Reformer's proposals. It is difficult to say what value of Colonial goods are re-exported, because they are not divided in the returns, but £9,000,000 of the £140,000,000 re-exported would be a safe estimate.

(3) Mr. Hunt makes no allowance for cost of Customs collection. Our present cost of collection is nearly £1,000,000, but this is on very few articles. The proposal to differentiate duties according to the labor factor involves a division of articles upon which duty would be collected of at least forty times as many as at present. I do not suggest that the cost of collection would be multiplied in this proportion, but no one acquainted with the cost in Protectionist countries will be prepared to challenge an estimate of £2,000,000. It must be remembered that, according to Mr. Balfour, the duties are to be low and widely spread; both conditions would go to increase the proportionate charge. Nor would the cost of collection be the only, or, perhaps, the principal item. Provision in the estimate would have to be made for the giving of Colonial Preference, the examination and payment of the claims for rebate, as well as the large capital expenditure for extra Customs Houses and other paraphernalia. This £2,000,000 (or whatever the correct figure be) is all for unproductive labor; it does not add a brass button to the comforts of life, and means that the feeding, clothing, housing, &c., of the army of civil servants is cast upon other workers. The only thing it does is to "make work," which appears to be the principal object of Tariff Reformers. They seem to be oblivious of the fact that it is not work in itself that is wanted, but the products of work, and that if work produces nothing it is economic, national, and individual waste.

(4) Mr. Hunt cannot have carefully examined the details of the £140,000,000 of "manufactures." In the Board of Trade Returns the goods are described as goods "wholly or mainly manufactured"; but even this description is very misleading. When we examine these goods in detail we find at least half are raw materials for home manufacture, which are excluded from taxation under the proposals of Tariff Reformers, and could not be manufactured economically in this country. I have selected the following goods which are materials for our home manufactures. They do not by any means exhaust the list included in manufactured articles, but embrace the principal.

Zinc (crude), copper, lead (pig and sheet), tin (in blocks, &c.), wool and yarn, chemicals, leather, paper, paraffin wax, oil seed cakes, stone slabs and marble, blooms, billets, and slabs, cotton yarns and waste, skin and furs. Total value, £53,824,073.

It may be contended that a portion of the above, although raw material for our manufactures, might economically be made here, and in harmony with the general principles advanced might be subject to a moderate duty. I contend that scarcely any of the above goods could economically be manufactured here, principally because of the cost of carriage on the raw material from abroad. For example, the wood from Slavonia, to make tanning extract, weighs six times as much as the extract produced and imported. While some small proportion of the articles in the list might be subjected to a low duty, many others which go to feed our manufactures are omitted, and ought not, for this reason, to be subject to the full ten per cent. duty. I have, however, allowed for a five per cent. duty a quarter of the £53,000,000, but this, of course, would be reduced by the proportion of goods made here as desired and intended,

I summarise the figures as follows:—

Imports of "Wholly and Mainly Manufactured goods," 1908	£143,000,000
Products in elementary stage of manufacture
Included in above	£53,000,000
Manufactured Goods from Colonies free	9,000,000
	62,000,000
Half of these, according to Mr. Rowland Hunt, excluded by duty, leaves	40,500,000
10 per cent. tax would yield	4,050,000
Add 5 per cent. on £14,000,000, as suggested	700,000
	4,750,000
Deduct rebate on Re-exported	£2,300,000
Cost of Collection, distribution of Rebate, &c.	2,000,000
	4,300,000
	4,300,000
Net balance for Exchequer	£450,000

No doubt this is a rough calculation, and Mr. Hunt, or anyone else, could easily criticise it in detail, but I challenge him to show wherein any of the figures could be materially altered. It clearly shows that, taking the Tariff Reform basis of taxation and rebates on "manufactured" goods, the balance for the Exchequer would not be half a million.—Yours, &c.,

CHARLES E. PARKER.

Penketh, Warrington,
November 29th, 1909.

STANLEY AND JOSEPH THOMSON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of November 27th you publish a letter, signed A. Werner; he writes, "Why did Stanley select men with no special qualifications and no previous experience of African travel, when he might have had the services of Joseph Thomson, for instance? The answer lies in one fatal weakness—he was not great enough to endure another near the throne." This is only another instance of the persistent calumny by which Stanley was assailed.

Stanley made no objection whatever to having Joseph Thomson under him on the Emin Relief Expedition.

The following is copied from the minutes of the British East African Company, January 19th, 1887:—

"Telegram from Mr. Thomson, offering his services unreservedly to Mr. Stanley.

"Committee decided that as the offer came so very late, and as Mr. Stanley's staff had been selected, the offer to be declined with thanks."

Stanley had already left England, and was hurrying to Zanzibar to recruit his carriers; he had nothing to do with the refusal of the Company.

Mr. Werner is "puzzled to know who the enemy were to whom Emin went over," and asks "in what sense Germany could be called the enemy?"

It was not Stanley who referred to the Germans as "the enemy," but the reviewer, obviously speaking metaphorically.

As an instance, however, of German courtesy, I may mention that all my private letters to Stanley, during the expedition, were deliberately slit open by the Germans, and returned to Stanley—many months after we were married—with a comment, in German, written across each envelope!

German friendliness is apparent.—Yours, &c.,

DOROTHY STANLEY.

2, Whitehall Court, S.W.
December 5th, 1909.

"ON THE FORGOTTEN ROAD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It usually sounds a little shrill if one attempts to question a reviewer's word, but it appears to me that when he says my book, "On the Forgotten Road," is "rather unsympathetic and disjointed," your reviewer is complaining of my coals because they are too black.

It is certain that if your reviewer would describe for us, in his turn, the Crusade of Children, he would make a book far different from mine; for he is not a mediæval farmer. I believe that books that deal with distant periods are better far—other things being equal—if written in the first person. It is not an easy way to write, and I submit, with all respect, that at the very least one should not be condemned because of this endeavor. Clearly, your reviewer would prefer a good romance. Alas! the farmer was so unromantic; even if he was in the minority, and even if he was quite reprehensible for being such a farmer, it appears to me that he should not be too severely judged for this. If to the lover of romance he seems rather unsympathetic and disjointed, I submit that he has made a fairly good display of his psychology. Some of his critics are so kind as to declare he is a living man; nor has he lived in vain, since he has called from your reviewer such a picturesque, and—if I may say so—beautifully written essay.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY BAERLEIN.

The Bath Club, 34, Dover-street, W.

December 6th, 1909.

A DECIVILISED CLASS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—You state in THE NATION of December 4th that "at Harrow" boys are "blooded by assisting at the breaking up of hares."

There is absolutely no truth in this statement. Pity so philosophical and sympathetic a writer as the one who describes "a decivilised class" cannot stick to facts.—Yours &c.,

R. SOMERVELL.

Harrow, December 9th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The article in your last issue entitled, "A Decivilised Class," contains a misstatement which I should like to correct. The writer, speaking of the influences making for barbarism among the wealthy classes, says, "At Harrow he (the upper class youth) is 'blooded' by assisting in the 'breaking up' of hares." There is absolutely no hunting or "sport" of any kind available to Harrow boys. The whole surrounding neighbourhood is, indeed, quite unsuited to such pastimes.

It is a pity the writer should have made such a blunder, as it will lead readers who are public school men to suspect that he is not merely out of sympathy, but also out of touch, with public schools, and knows very little about them; though I do not go so far as to assert that this is the case.

So far as I know, Eton is the only public school where there are facilities for "sport." The number of undergraduates at Oxford and Cambridge who indulge in this form of exercise during term time is also fairly small. These considerations suggest that it is the country homes rather than the places of education that have fostered the sporting tendencies which the writer deplores. "Sport," in all its forms, good and bad, was the staple industry of the country-house long before the "barbarians" took to sending their children as a matter of course to public schools and Universities.—Yours, &c.,

D. C. S.

December 4th, 1909.

[The attribution of these sports to Harrow was an error which we regret.—ED., NATION.]

THE LOGIC OF LORD REVELSTOKE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It was an agreeable study and a pleasant recreation to read your article in this week's NATION on the "Logic of Lord Revelstoke." As a study it was interesting as containing candid admissions with a reserve of party bias; as a recreation it was tempting to fill in personal reflections which, of course, did not occur to the writer of the article; and therefore, with your permission, I propose to offer a few observations on the matter in question, and must leave it entirely to your discretion as to whether you should publish them. My credentials to your consideration are a thirty years' experience of the stock markets, and hitherto a consistent abstention from party politics.

I agree with many of your conclusions in the article in question; at the same time I differ on many essential points. The fall in Consols was, to my mind, inevitable, and is only in a remote degree connected with party politics. There are, in my opinion, three main causes, and it is difficult to apportion their respective influences; but I should place them as follows:—

- (a) Reduction of interest from 3 per cent. to 2½ per cent.
- (b) The creation of Colonial and Municipal Stocks to rank as Trustee investments.
- (c) The issue of Irish Land Stock.

These three are, to my mind, the predominant causes of the fall in Consols, but there are others of less degree, viz.:—

- (a) The issue of Stock consequent on the Boer War; and
- (b) The insistent demand by foreign countries for loans during the last ten years.

It is hardly open to any fair-minded man to deny that the above are the contributing causes of the decline in Consols. Unfortunately, we are still under the burden of the issue of Irish Land Stock, and I believe that not even the crude and premature scheme of Old Age Pensions of the present Government is more to be condemned than the vicious and financially unsound Irish Land Purchase Bill of Mr. Wyndham. Why the British taxpayer should become a party to buying Irish land—that is to say, a depreciated and unsaleable article at an enhanced and fictitious (practically speaking) price—I have never been able to understand, nor have I ever seen in any journal a serious financial argument in its favor; but this is a digression, and we return to our securities.

As I have said, I do not think the price of Consols has been more than slightly affected by the policy of the Government, but when we turn to prices of British securities in general, I am compelled to come to a different conclusion. A "miasma" (to adopt Lord Rosebery's term) has spread over all the English securities in the Stock Exchange List, and I think it cannot be traced to any definite hostile action (with one important exception) on the Government's part, so much as to a want of sympathy with City interests and affairs; a certain derision by Cabinet Ministers of the City's opinions; the scoffing tone adopted by the Prime Minister in respect of the export of capital, and of the Chancellor in regard to the utterances and views of Lord Rothschild—whose opinion, at any rate, the City values very highly—and (the important exception referred to above) the vigorous attack on £200,000,000 of capital by the Licensing Bill; and it is only the bare assertion of the truth when I state there is in the City a profound want of confidence in the justice and equity of the Government. It may be unjustifiable, but it exists, and it is a very serious matter for the holders of English securities.

Is this feeling of insecurity astonishing? We have had personal attacks by Mr. Lloyd George on Lord Rothschild, the head of the City; we have had the Limehouse speech directed against property owners generally, and embodying Socialism under the guise of social reforms; we have had Mr. Ure declaring that the land really belongs to the people; we have had Mr. Runciman expressing his indifference to the fate of the brewery shareholder because he (the brewery shareholder) has assisted by his money to provide the liquor that has "sent many a human soul to perdition"; therefore the brewery shareholder's property may be wrecked or depreciated because his money is, according to Mr. Runciman, in an immoral trade; we have had Mr. Churchill declaring that in regard to future taxation the "origin" of individual wealth must be looked at; a novel, insidious and hypocritical suggestion. In short, what with the fiery speeches of Mr. Lloyd George, the mocking references of Mr. Asquith, the questionable commercial morality of Mr. Runciman, and the alarming suggestion as to the "origin" of wealth by Mr. Churchill, it is not astonishing that the investor in English securities is timid and that he should decide that his capital is safer in other countries where these startling theories are not adumbrated.

A great deal of nonsense has been talked by Conservative politicians as to the export of capital, and Lord Rosebery made a most unfortunate slip when he spoke of ships leaving this country "ballasted with bonds." His statement destroyed his argument. The export of capital is not to be regretted for a moment; it means orders for the manufacturers in this country; it means a good rate of interest for the capitalist who lends the money and who lives and spends the income here. Therefore the export of capital is a healthy sign unless it indicates a want of confidence at home, and this, unfortunately, is the position in the United Kingdom to-day. It is useless to deny it; anyone who mixes in City life must recognise it as a fact. Lord Rothschild was only stating the truth when he asserted that it is "difficult if not impossible to get money for even the best English enterprise."

I presume anyone will admit that the great English railways must be included in the class to which Lord Rothschild refers, and it has been stated by railway chairmen on more than one occasion that in the present state of doubt as regards English securities an appeal for money on reasonable terms by any great English railway would almost certainly have proved unavailing. Even if the railways tried to get a Bill through the House of Commons in order to effect economies, the Bill was regarded with the greatest suspicion, and it was only by granting concessions nullifying the economies aimed at that the companies received the assistance of the Government. In fact, it was generally agreed by all the great railway companies that what with the hostility of the Labor Party and the suspicions of the Radical Party, nothing could be achieved by proceeding with any Bill whatever.

That is how the matter stands, and what applies to the great industries applies equally to those of less importance. The public will not put up money for English enterprise, because they are alarmed and because they see no adequate compensation for the risk they are invited to take; always having to bear in mind the hostility—veiled or otherwise—of Radicals to capital.

Wealth is only confidence, and represented by a vast structure of credit which can be maintained only so long as its foundations remain sound and unimpaired; it is a structure reared on a slender basis of gold; it is ever growing, and its architects are ever busy. As it becomes larger so it becomes more sensitive to unfavorable influences, and it stands to-day the most stupendous monument of human effort, a mighty fabric, fragile as a piece of porcelain, yet in effect a colossus, maintained only so long as the confidence of its builders remains firm; doomed to-morrow to sudden destruction if the hands of ignorance are permitted to interfere with any of its component parts.

There is an appalling responsibility resting on any Government which does not give its condition and its destiny the most profound and anxious consideration.

Does danger threaten it to-day?—Yours, &c.,

H. PETERS BONE.

December 5th, 1909.

[We deal in the Diary of the Week with the arguments put forward by our correspondent.—ED. NATION.]

THE ULTIMATE BASIS OF AUTHORITY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Confronted with Hume and Professor Dicey, Dr. Massie lets Hume alone, and appeals from Professor Dicey the philosopher to Mr. Dicey the pamphleteer. Considering that Professor Dicey is not a suffragist, his philosophical principles can, he argues, have no reference to the case of women. Unhappily for his consistency Dr. Massie has appealed to Mr. Bryce, and on the question of the precedence of woman suffrage Mr. Bryce is against him. In the "American Commonwealth" (Vol. III., p. 303), after discussing the American aspects of the question, Dr. Massie's authority concludes: "To a European observer the question seems one rather of social than of political moment. If he saw little reason to expect an improvement in politics from the participation of women in elections and their admission to Congress and to high political office, neither does he find much cause for fear." Mr. Bryce has evidently no belief in the substantiality of the fears which are Dr. Massie's excuse for doing injustice.

Dr. Massie is wrong in the belief that when voting, alias constitutional methods, fails, physical force in the shape of armed troops is the necessary resort for the beaten side. The early Christian Church never drew the sword; but its tactics of passive resistance ultimately beat down the throne of the Caesars.

The whole history of Europe up to the democratic era proves, as Hume saw, that Governments, so far as the bulk of their subjects were concerned, did not rest on force at all; but on the consent of the governed. Such force as they possessed could only be successfully used against small minorities of rebels or wrongdoers. Dr. Massie's idea of the two sexes ranged in hostile camps is impossible seeing that men and women, unlike Puritans and Catholics, do not repel but attract each other. Further, in this country they are educated under a Christian civilisation, and both have some rough idea of duty to the commonweal.

Funniest of all, however, is his argument from war which he imagines to be a purely male affair. What about nurses? Cæteris paribus in a modern campaign, the nation whose women were willing to go to the front as nurses would beat the nation whose women were unwilling to take their part in war. Therefore, on Dr. Massie's principles, women should have a voting power equivalent to the services they render as military nurses.

In conclusion I would remind Dr. Massie of St. Augustine's words, "Remota justitia quid regna nisi magna latrocinia." If his analysis of the State is correct, if the modern State be an institution forced ex necessitate rei to oppress the weak by (inter alia) taxing them against their will, how can any Christian man see in it a means of social justice? Better go back to the Hildebrandine Papacy!

—Yours, &c.,

LIBERAL VOTER.

December 8th, 1909.

Poetry.

A MASTER SPEAKS.

THE hooter sounds, the gates are flung
Wide open on the factory yard.
The windy sunset glimmers, barred
With spouting vapors, whirled and swung.
Though all the roofs are bright with rain,
A lake of sky is shining down
Unclouded, on the broods of town,
Who fill the hollow streets again.
Women and men, the factory hands
Troop out, a listless, dingy crew.
But here and there a muttering few
Make halt, in little sullen bands.
Who cares? Let all the shambling rout, —Too slack to work, too dull to fight—
Strike if they choose! to-morrow night
A thousand keep this thousand out.
Just such another crowd as they
Will come, their sickly faces drawn,
And death-like, in the sharp white dawn,
To labor through the humming day;
Receiving—what their toil is worth!
I cannot give to youth or age,
More than the iron laws of wage
Allow, which know not ease or dearth.
Mechanical my profits flow
From these men's number, from their need.
Since they will gamble, drink, and breed
New swarms—they serve my purpose so.
These stale, town-rotten crowds are born
To slave! if one of them would rule,
He fights up through a bitter school
(As I can tell), from night to morn.
I stood alone, a man at last!
These follow some chance leader's tongue,
And drift, like idle vapors swung
Between the wind and furnace-blast.
Between his power and mine they swing,
Irresolute, half-cunning, slow.
He has not proved them yet; I know
The soil that bred them, whence I spring.
They form no moving whole; they break
Away, in jealous, single claims.
Mean self-defence and narrowest aims
Build up the laws that they would make.
They pass, with dull and lowering eye,
Each sight that patriot impulse thrills;
They go untouched by all that fills
The purposes of earth and sky;
Yet have not even the honest pride
Of work, which surely moves a clean,
Swift whirring, competent machine!
—Far less than many an engine tried
I hold them, and am justified.

ROSALIND TRAVERS.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE following is our weekly selection of books which we commend to the notice of our readers:—

"The Hindrances to Good Citizenship." By James Bryce. (Frowde. 6s. net.)

"Time's Laughing Stocks, and Other Verses." By Thomas Hardy. (Macmillan. 4s. 6d. net.)

"Memories of Sir Walter Scott." By James Skene. Edited by Basil Thomson. (Murray. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Science and Religion in Contemporary Philosophy." By Emile Boutroux. (Duckworth. 8s. net.)

"The Arts and Crafts of Ancient Egypt." By W. M. Flinders Petrie. (Foulis. 5s. net.)

"England, and Other Poems." By Laurence Binyon. (Elkin Mathews. 3s. 6d. net.)

"The Life and Letters of Susan Warner." Edited by her sister, Anna B. Warner. (Putnam. 10s. 6d. net.)

"The Idea of a Free Church." By Henry Sturt. (Walter Scott. 5s.)

"Memorials of His Time." By Lord Cockburn. (Foulis. 6s. net.)

"Light Come, Light Go—Gambling, Gamesters, Wagers." By Ralph Nevill. (Macmillan. 15s. net.)

"La Faculté de Théologie de Paris et ses Docteurs les plus célèbres." Tome Septième. XVIIIe. Siècle. Par P. Féret. (Paris: Picard. 7 fr. 50.)

"Heures d'Italie." Par Gabriel Faure. (Paris: Fasquelle. 3 fr. 50.)

"Avant et Après Sadowa." Par J. de Chambrier. (Paris: Fontemoing. 3 fr. 50.)

"La Flambee." Roman. Par Henri de Régnier. (Paris: Mercure de France. 3 fr. 50.)

* * *

A NUMBER of letters, written by Alfred de Musset to an unknown lady, will be published in Paris early in the New Year. At the time of de Musset's death the recipient of the letters wanted to have them destroyed, but she was persuaded by M. Jules Troubat, one of Sainte-Beuve's secretaries, to allow them to be preserved in the Bibliothèque Nationale. Her consent was, however, subject to the conditions that the correspondence should not be published for a space of thirty years, and that nothing likely to identify her should then be printed. The thirty years expire on January 3rd, and already Parisian editors and publishers are plotting and counterplotting to secure first publication of the letters.

* * *

SOME other letters of special promise are to be published shortly in the "Atlantic Monthly." These consist of a series written from Japan by Lafcadio Hearn, and are likely to prove a valuable supplement to the earlier collection. Hearn takes high rank as a letter writer, and the coming publication will be awaited with interest.

* * *

IF the Johnson bi-centenary has called forth no fresh study of Dr. Johnson himself, it has at least seen the publication of two books devoted to Mrs. Thrale, the friend to whom he wrote that her kindness had "soothed twenty years of a life radically wretched." The first of these is an abridged edition of Abraham Hayward's "Autobiography, Letters, and Literary Remains of Mrs. (Thrale) Piozzi," first issued in January, 1861, or at Christmas, 1860. In its new form it bears the title "Dr. Johnson's Mrs. Thrale," and is published by Messrs. Foulis, of Edinburgh. Its editor, Mr. J. H. Lobban, omits Hayward's biographical and critical essay as dealing largely with outworn controversies, but he retains the extracts from Mrs. Piozzi's writings which Hayward incorporated, and shows skill in re-grouping the materials of Hayward's volumes. Students of the period will be glad to have in handy and attractive form the pith of a work which, though of great interest, is now difficult to procure.

* * *

THE other book is intended to supplement Hayward, and is issued by Mr. John Lane under the title of "Dr. Johnson and Mrs. Thrale." It contains Mrs. Thrale's hitherto unpublished journal of the Welsh tour made with Dr. Johnson in 1774, a reprint of Johnson's diary of the same tour, and a number of fresh letters written by Mrs. Thrale and others belonging to the Streatham coterie. Mr. A. M. Broadley, who edits the volume, is to be congratulated upon the wealth of Johnsoniana to be found in his library at Bridport. A note in the Introduction suggests that further instalments of Mrs. Thrale's correspondence may see the light, for we are informed that there are two important collections of Piozzi letters in Wales which still await an editor. The journal of Mrs. Thrale, which is to some extent the basis of the present volume, will be eagerly read by students of the minutiae of Johnson's life, though it is not likely to appeal very forcibly to the general reader. Of greater interest is the material contained in the chapter on the Streatham group. Concerning the members of that famous circle, Mr. Broadley gossips in entertaining fashion, and adds something to our knowledge of the habits and haunts of Johnson, the Thrales, Sir William Pepys, the Burneys, and Arthur Murphy. But the best part of the book is the long "Essay Introductory," which comes from the pen of that arch-introducer, Mr. Thomas Seccombe. Mr. Seccombe is by many people supposed to have taken all literary biography for his province, but he is especially well equipped to write upon anything relating to Dr. Johnson. We find him here breaking a lance upon behalf of Mrs. Thrale's right to marry Piozzi, and his judicious examination of the whole question leaves little further to be said. He betrays a marked tendresse for the Thrale-Piozzi, speaks of "the plastic serenity, the delicate banter, the placable judgment of her Indian summer," and finally dismisses her to "the position she envied as a bookmark in the 'Biographia Litteraria.'"

* * *

MENTION of Hayward stirs one to some wonder that so brilliant a man of letters and so capable a biographer is still without the distinction of a biography. In politics, in letters, and in society he had an undoubted influence. He was on intimate terms with Dumas, Guizot, De Tocqueville, and Thiers, as well as with most English statesmen of the time. He was a great diner-out, and his essay on "Gastronomy," contributed to the "Quarterly Review" during its heyday, is almost a classic. Hayward had, unfortunately for his financial success, an extraordinary gift for making enemies. He rendered valuable service to the Peelites by his leaders in the "Morning Chronicle," where amongst others Mrs. Norton and Professor Goldwin Smith were his associates, but, though both Palmerston and Aberdeen admitted that he deserved some reward, his enemies prevented his appointment to a quasi-sinecure. One of these enemies was Disraeli, whom Hayward offended by discovering a classic plagiarism—the fact that an eloquent passage in the official eulogy of Wellington was borrowed from Thiers's funeral panegyric on General St. Cyr.

* * *

MR. W. H. WOODWARD, formerly a professor in the University of Liverpool, is preparing a biography of Caesar Borgia. The work is based partly on published documents and partly on fresh material discovered by Mr. Woodward in the Archivio Segreto of the Vatican.

* * *

A BOOK called "Woman's Work in English Fiction" is announced for early publication by Messrs. Putnam. Its author, Miss Clara Whitmore, examines the influence which some lesser women novelists had upon Scott and other masters of fiction, while she also studies the part played by such writers as Jane Austen, George Eliot, and the Brontës in the development of the modern English novel.

* * *

MR. UPTON SINCLAIR has written a new novel, called "Samuel the Seeker," which will appear early in the spring. About the same time two books upon which Mrs. Gertrude Atherton has been working during the past year will also be published. Another volume announced for early publication is "Corporal Sam, and Other Stories," by Mr. Quiller Couch. It deals mainly with adventure, though some of the tales treat of Troy Town and its humors.

* * *

WE learn from the "Tablet" that Monsignor Baumgarten is writing an important work on the Papal Bulls and Briefs issued from the twelfth century to the present time. He has visited this country in search of materials and found an unexpectedly large number of documents bearing upon his study at the British Museum Record Office.

Reviews.

LORD MORLEY'S INDIAN SPEECHES.*

WHEN reading a book for review, I have been accustomed to work with a red and blue pencil, marking with red what specially commends itself to me, and with blue what I do not like. In the present volume I find nearly every page marked more or less with both colors. The blue marks belong naturally to the defence of repression, and of the deportations without trial or charge, in disregard of the cogent evidence of corruption and malfeasance on the part of the police upon whose initiative such proceedings are based. Again, there is the refusal to modify the "settled fact" of the Bengal partition, although Lord Morley has more than once admitted that he does not think well of it. There is also something like harshness in his attitude towards the "impatient idealists," who, after all, represent the ideals he approves, and who are among his staunchest Parliamentary supporters. The margin of such passages is unavoidably tinged with blue. On the other hand we must mark with bright red his noble advocacy of a just and generous policy, and his vindication of the far-reaching reform scheme, based on the expansion of the Councils in India, both legislative and executive. Also, high recognition is due to the spirit in which he justifies his promotion of Indians to places of real influence and authority, both in his own Council and that of the Viceroy.

In these diverse utterances we seem to hear the voices both of Esau and Jacob. Can these discordant tones be made to harmonise? Among apparently conflicting pleas, can the anxious critic discern a consistent and well-considered course of action? No one who is acquainted with Lord Morley's public career can doubt that during these two years there has existed in his mind a fixed and even rigid line of policy. But the question is, what has been that line of policy? In a characteristic little note which prefaces this volume, he says, "A signal transaction is now taking place in the course of Indian polity. These speeches, with no rhetorical pretensions, contain some of the just, prudent, and necessary points and considerations that have guided this transaction, and helped to secure for it the sanction of Parliament." Here we have a confident claim to a well-considered and successful line of policy; but we are given no particulars. We are referred for guidance to the seven speeches contained in this volume. But portions of these speeches have caused searchings of heart to many of Lord Morley's admirers both in India and this country. I propose therefore briefly to consider the complicated circumstances under which these transactions took place, and to seek for an explanation of what appears obscure. I will also venture a forecast as to the near future. As regards the present position, the general verdict will, no doubt, be that, looking to the chaotic condition of affairs when he took charge, the formidable nature of the opposing forces, and the exigencies of party government, Lord Morley has shown consummate skill in the management of these transactions, and has achieved results of far-reaching benefit to India.

Let us first consider the circumstances under which he took over the vast and multitudinous problems which make up the Indian administration. He thus described the position: "We came in at a perturbed time; we did not find balmy breezes and smooth water. It is notorious that we came into enormous difficulties, which we had not created." This is a mild way of describing the chaos which Lord Curzon left to his successors. At a time when educated India reasonably expected the bounds of freedom to be made wider, he had struck ruthless blows at each of those free institutions which distinguished British rule from Russian despotism. The independence of the Universities, municipal self-government, the freedom of the Press and of public meeting; all these boons appertaining to the British Connection were assailed by reactionary legislation, garnished with Viceregal speeches, which insulted the national self-respect. These aggressions, culminating in the partition of Bengal, produced throughout India a general exasperation against British rule.

Such was the damnosa hereditas bequeathed to Lord Morley. And the intrinsic difficulties of his task were aggravated to an indefinite extent by the fact that he could not, at the outset, choose his own agents in India. He had, perforce, to work through the Simla clique of officials who, during the past five years, had been selected and advanced to positions of power by Lord Curzon as the instruments to carry out his Imperialistic policy of aggression abroad and repression at home. It may be true, as alleged by the "Times" correspondent, that this Simla clique lacked moral courage openly to resist a policy they dislike, that they sat "silent and cowering on the mountain tops." But though conforming outwardly, reactionary officials retained great powers of mischief, holding in their hands two poisoned weapons with which they can strike at Indian reform. Their first resource is to raise a scare in the London Yellow Press, charging the Government with making concessions to outrage, and supineness in the repression of disorder. Such a scare can readily be engineered by their confederates in England, upon whom many journals depend for their Indian editorials. And secondly, they have recourse to the still more sinister device of exciting religious discord among the races of India: the old maxim of Divide et Impera.

During the last two years both these modes of attack have been pressed. How has Lord Morley met them? It was in the House of Lords that he had to meet his most formidable opponents; and at the second reading of the Indian Councils Bill he clearly indicated his line of defence, which was "unflinching repression on the one hand, and vigor and good faith in reform on the other." It was when he insisted upon "unflinching repression" that he came into collision with his own political friends. But it is evident that his declaration on this point was the key of his position. He therefore turned almost fiercely upon his friends: "I have no apology to make," he said; and followed this up by denouncing "the cant of unsound and misapplied sentiment, divorced from knowledge and untouched by any cool consideration of the facts." In the same spirit he ridiculed the general application of principles of policy; this, according to his view, was a "most fatal and mischievous fallacy"; "What sophism can be more gross and dangerous?" Then as to those who had aspirations that were too vague, "Some of them are angry with me. Why? Because I have not been able to give them the moon. I have got no moon, and if I had I would not part with it." And in answer to complaints of repressive militarism, he says (speaking at Arbroath): "Does anybody want me to go to London to-morrow morning, and to send a telegram to Lord Kitchener, the Commander-in-Chief in India, and tell him that he is to disband the Indian Army, to send home as fast as he can despatch transports the British contingent of the Army, and bring away the whole of the Civil servants? . . . How should we bear the smarting stings of our own consciences, when, as assuredly we should, we heard through the dark distances the roar and scream of confusion and carnage in India?"

Shall I be wrong in assuming that these somewhat lurid denunciations of the "impatient idealist" formed part of the strategy by which Lord Morley warded off the attack of his philistine opponents? No doubt certain measures against disorder were necessary. But was not his vehement defence of repression and deportation of the nature of a sop to Cerberus, a cake seasoned with poppies and honey, which threw the monster fiera crudele e diversa into a timely sleep? We may also hazard the suggestion that the refusal to reconsider the Bengal partition was of the same nature, a temporary sacrifice in order to secure a permanent good. Something of this kind seems to have been in his mind when, on the amendment to the Address, he besought his protesting friends "to try for some sense of balance, instead of allowing their wrath at one particular incident of policy to blot out from their vision all the wide and durable operations to which we have set firm and permanent hands."

That his parliamentary strategy was eminently successful is shown by the results. From beginning to end he carried with him the general public opinion of this country; there was no scare of importance in the Yellow Press; no embarrassment to the Cabinet from Indian affairs; and his great measure of reform passed through both Houses of Parliament practically without serious attack. My two propositions are (1) that these results were in great measure obtained by his rigid attitude with reference to repression, deportation, and partition; and (2) that this rigor is now no longer required. Hence the forecast I venture is that these three painful matters, which have grieved his supporters, will be re-considered by Lord Morley at an early date. For has he not said that the Indians deported will be detained "not a day, nor one hour, after the specific and particular mischief, with a view to which this drastic proceeding was adopted, had abated"? No legislation is required. The Secretary of State has a free hand; and by a few strokes of his pen he can amnesty the political prisoners; return the deportees to their homes; and give contentment to the people of Bengal.

* "Indian Speeches, 1907-1909." By Viscount Morley. Macmillan. 2s. 6d. net.

W. WEDDERBURN.

A GREAT ADVENTURE.*

WHEN Dr. Sven Hedin arrived at Simla three years ago in the early summer of 1906 he had already received assurances of help from Lord Curzon in his projected explorations, and had reason to believe that his journey would be officially acknowledged and supported. It turned out, however, otherwise. Prudently, and certainly wisely, Lord Morley entirely refused to sanction any kind of expedition into the wilds of Tibet. The country was still smarting from the effects of the British march to Lhasa. It was not improbable that the exploring party would be destroyed, and its destruction might easily involve the need for reprisals. Lord Morley had no intention of being inveigled into a "punitive expedition" if he could help it, and he therefore put his foot down firmly. Dr. Sven Hedin was ordered to keep out of the country, and the frontier stations were warned to arrest him if he attempted to force a passage. That the prohibition was justified is unquestionable, though it did not turn the explorer from his object.

From his verandah at Simla Sven Hedin could see in the north the snowy Himalayan crests, white against the blue sky, beyond which lay mysterious Tibet. The action of the Government represented but one obstacle the more in his way. "Of course," he says simply, "I never thought of giving in." At Srinagar, and later at Leh, he fitted out and completed his caravan, telegraphing meanwhile to the Swedish minister in London for passports for Eastern Turkestan, whither he represented himself as bound. His preparations complete, he set out in a northerly direction for the "white horizon and jagged line of mighty Himalayan peaks," and, passing over the crest of the Karakorum range, entered the vast plateau picturesquely known as the Roof of the World. He travelled north for a fortnight, then, turning right-handed, set off on a due westerly course into Tibet, and fetching an immense curve through the heart of the country, descended from the north upon Shigatse and the waters of the Brahmaputra.

The experiences of the first two or three months were among the most arduous undergone, and that not so much from effects of excessive cold as from the rarity of the atmosphere which seems especially to have affected the mules and horses. The altitude of the Chang-lung-yogma pass through which Sven Hedin attained the plateau is close upon 19,000 feet, but the whole of the Tibetan plateau itself is but little lower, and for months the explorer and his companions were to live at a height of between sixteen and eighteen thousand feet. The effects at first were severely felt. Giddiness, palpitation, and extreme lassitude affected the men, and at very short intervals they were forced to stop to recover breath. The animals fared worse, and deaths among them occurred with alarming rapidity. The narrative of these weeks is one of extreme hardship and stubborn endurance. For eighty days the little caravan battles its way through frozen mountain solitudes before it reaches the plains where some signs of sparse and scanty vegetation have attracted the wandering nomad shepherds, and where hopes of supplies and of a temporary rest are verified. Like most men of action Dr. Sven Hedin writes with great restraint, in a perfectly matter of fact style, and without seeking to heighten his descriptions by the slightest degree of literary artifice. The narrative is even apt to be a little bald, and, perhaps, as some readers will think, uneventful in spite of its events. It is from occasional hints and interjected passages that we gather some notion of the essentials of the situation. Helped by these, we reconstruct an image of the scene. We see the vast tumultuous array of white ranges extending on all sides to the uttermost horizon, an "agitated sea of the highest mountains in the world," and in spite of their agitation we feel their curious monotony, a monotony which, in these pages, is likened to the monotony of rows of foaming waves. And through their empty defiles and among the rocks and debris at their feet, yet still at a height where valley and lake are above the level of the summit of Mont Blanc, we watch the little string of men and animals, mere specks in that Gargantuan landscape, toiling slowly and painfully along. Storms buffet and delay them. Their beasts fall from exhaustion and freeze stiff where they fall. They have, for sinister attendants, a little covey of half-a-dozen ravens, and sometimes a few lobbing wolves keep pace with their progress; nor do bird or beast of prey ever go supperless to bed. The prospects of the party were at this time certainly gloomy. It was a question if they would ever reach the plains, and, having reached them, it was a question if the Tibetans would help them or knock them on the head.

That a man under these circumstances could be entirely happy and contented with his surroundings may surprise those who have not taken the trouble to study the temperament of explorers. Dr. Sven Hedin, however, in spite of the cold, the suffering, the exhaustion, and the uncertainty as to the future, evidently enjoyed these months enormously. The reason, of course, is that he is about his own business. He is doing what nature meant him to do. There are men who are, as it were, the antennae, or feelers, of the human species, whose mission it is to investigate, examine, and report, and who in fulfilling this function discover a felicity which no outward circumstances can affect. At Tankse, on the borders of Tibet, Dr. Sven Hedin began upon his first maps, "being," as he says, "the first stroke of a work that for more than two years kept my attention riveted on every inch of the route and on every object that could be seen from it." At the same time geological work was begun, the first specimen consisting of "crystalline schists in situ, while the bottom of the valley was still covered with large and small blocks of granite." Henceforth the explorer was exploring and the troubles of the way did not exist for him. If mountains barred the road he took a map of them. If barren rock mocked the hunger of his cattle it enriched his collection of minerals. On one occasion he is all but shipwrecked on Lake Lighten, but his own safety is a secondary consideration, and in preparing for a struggle to the shore his first thought is for the note books in which he has recorded the soundings of the lake.

Six months from his setting out, Dr. Sven Hedin reached Shigatse, and in his chapters describing the town he is able to give us a great deal of interesting and curious information on the habits and manners of the people, their types and costumes, their religious ceremonies and festivals, their gruesome funeral customs, as well as on the architecture and appearance of the town itself. It is, however, on his return journey up the waters of the Brahmaputra and down the course of the Indus that the chief opportunities of the discoverer occur. "Farewell, proud stream," he had exclaimed, when, first entering Tibet, he had lost sight of the current of the Indus. "Though it cost me my life I will find some day thy source over yonder in the forbidden land." The day came when that resolution was to be made good. From Lake Manasarowar Dr. Sven Hedin struck to the northward. The country was dangerous and infested by robbers, but the explorer kept up his spirits in his usual way. "Granite predominates everywhere," he observes comfortably, "but crystalline schists occur here and there." Following up the "tiny brook" which, though sheep can step across it, still bears the mighty name of Indus, the point is reached at last where the first drops trickle from a partly concealed well in the hillside. It is impossible not to sympathise with the successful explorer in such a moment, and, when the usual exact observations have been made and registered, it is impossible not to be stirred by

* "Trans-Himalaya: Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet." By Sven Hedin. Macmillan. 2 vols. 30s. net.

THE RICCARDI PRESS BOOKS.

THE first Books printed in the Riccardi Fount, specially designed by Mr. Herbert P. Horne for The Medici Society ARE NOW PUBLISHED. The Society cannot doubt that THE RICCARDI FOUNT will be as immediately accepted for the FINEST MODERN TYPE YET DESIGNED as The Medici Prints have been recognised for the "truest facsimiles yet invented." The detailed prospectus, printed in the THE RICCARDI PRESS TYPES, will be sent post free on application.

THE STORY OF GRISELDA. Being the Tenth story of the Tenth day from the "Decameron" of Boccaccio translated by J. M. Rigg, 500 numbered copies, on Batchelor hand-made paper (9½ x 6½), Michalet grey wrapper, 5s. net; limp vellum with silk ties, 12s. 8d. net. Also 12 copies printed on vellum (10 for sale), bound in limp Kelmscott vellum, silk ties, 42s. net.

The Plates in the following are reproduced by THE MEDICI PROCESS:—

THE SONG OF SONGS WHICH IS SOLOMAN'S, in the Authorised Version, with 10 plates after the water-colour drawings by W. Russell Flint. 500 numbered copies on hand-made Riccardi paper (10½ x 7½), Michalet grey wrapper, back and paper label, £2 5s. net; limp vellum, silk ties, £2 12s. 6d. net. Also 17 copies printed on vellum (15 for sale), bound in limp Kelmscott vellum, gold lettering, silk ties, with duplicate set of the Plates, mounted, in cloth portfolio, £12 12s. net.

THE THOUGHTS OF THE EMPEROR MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS. Translated by George Long, with 12 Plates after the water-colour drawings by W. Russell Flint. 500 numbered copies, on hand-made Riccardi paper (10½ x 7½), Michalet grey wrapper, back and paper label, £2 5s. net; limp vellum, silk ties, £2 12s. 6d. net. Also 17 copies printed on vellum (15 for sale), bound in limp Kelmscott vellum, gold lettering, silk ties, with duplicate set of the Plates, mounted, in cloth portfolio, £12 12s. net.

Orders will be executed in strict rotation as received, preference being given only to Subscribers to the entire series of Riccardi Press Books. Of the copies printed on vellum very few of these remain.

The Original Water-Colour Drawings by Mr. W. Russell Flint, mentioned above, are on Exhibition at The Medici Galleries until December 24th. Admission Free on presentation of visiting card.

THE DIVINE MINSTRELS. A Narrative of the Life of S. Francis of Assisi with his Companions. By A. Bailly, translated by E. Barnes, with photogravure frontispiece after Gerard David's painting "S. Francis," cr. 8vo., cloth 5s. net; limp vellum, silk ties, 12s. 8d. net.

"A picturesque and moving narrative."—The Times. "Done with every possible refinement of literature."—The Scotsman. "Lovers of pure literature owe a deep debt of thanks."—The Academy. "Would be hailed with delight by any lover of the most fascinating of medieval legends."—The Guardian.

THE MEDICI PRINTS.

NATIONAL LOAN EXHIBITION AT THE CRAFTON GALLERIES.

BURLINGTON MAGAZINE for October, 1909, "which are at once true in general effect and will stand the test of the microscope in their details, can never be surpassed." Subscribers to these Prints may therefore be assured of possessing the most faithful replicas of these great pictures which can be obtained. They may also be assured that "nothing of the kind so good or so cheap" (the BURLINGTON MAGAZINE will be obtainable otherwise than in these Medici Prints. Finally, since in consideration of the permission to reproduce these pictures, The Society will make Special Contributions to the National Gallery Fund, Subscribers will, incidentally, aid the prime object with which the above Exhibition has been organised.

Full particulars (illustrated) of these reproductions—which will be executed in England by English workers—post free on application.

Among recent Medici Prints are:

Holbein ... The Duchess of Milan ... 24 x 11 in. ... 17s. 6d. net.

The same size in monochrome 5s. net. Colour surface.

The exact replica of the contemporary frame in the National Gallery. 35s. net.

Carpaccio ...	Vision of St. Ursula ...	30s.	Botticelli ...	Birth of Venus ...	30s.
Giorgione ...	Storm Landscape ...	21s.	Gainsborough ...	The Painter's Daughter ...	15s.
Clouet ...	Elizabeth of Austria ...	15s.	Lucchero ...	Queen Elizabeth ...	17s. 6d.
Pisanello ...	Vision of S. Eustace ...	17s. 6d.	M. da Forti ...	The Archangel Gabriel ...	17s. 6d.

*Immediately. Postage of all Prints 6d.; additional copies in same parcel 2d. each.

The above are representative selections from nearly 50 Medici Prints now ready. Complete Lists post free. Frames suitable to each subject are a specialty of The Society. Detailed prospectus, with full particulars of Frames, Annual Subscription, &c., post free 6d. stamp; special illustrated prospectus of some 150 "Printings" of the Italian, German, and Flemish Schools, post free, 6d. stamp.

DRAWINGS OF ALBRECHT DÜRER. A Series of 64 Drawings, chiefly from the Albertine Library, Vienna, reproduced in facsimile collotype, including Architectural, Natural History, Botanical, Religious, Figure, and Portrait subjects. Every drawing, whether a full water-colour or otherwise, is reproduced in the exact colours of the original. Prices from 1s. to 15s. each; framed from 3s. 6d. each. Write for the completely illustrated Catalogue, post free, 1s. stamp; or unillustrated post free, 6d. stamp.

The Times says:—"The perfection with which this Medici process reproduces the forms, the colours, and the touch of the more precise painters, especially Dürer and Holbein, is little short of amazing." "Almost disquieting, in its accuracy and beauty," says the Daily Telegraph, "of the style of reproduction." "The extraordinary fidelity to the originals," says the Morning Post, "can perhaps be fully appreciated only by some one who has been able to compare an original and a Medici facsimile side by side."

All lovers of Art are invited to pay an early visit to the Medici Society's THIRD WINTER EXHIBITION (Daily 10—6 until December 24th) where may be seen about 400 reproductions in the colours of the original Old Masters—MEDICI PRINTS and other facsimile colour-collotypes; also the entire series of the old ARUNDEL SOCIETY, etc. Admission free, on presentation of visiting card. Visitors are under no obligation whatsoever to buy. Those unable personally to inspect the Exhibition, should write for catalogues as above.

The Society cannot guarantee delivery before Christmas of certain of its Sale Orders later than this week.

PHILIP LEE WARNER, Publisher to The Medici Society, Ltd., 38, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

the feelings which he allows himself briefly to express:—

"Here I stood, and saw the Indus emerge from the lap of the earth. Here I stood, and saw this unpretentious brook wind down the valley, and I thought of all the changes it must undergo before it passes between rocky cliffs, singing its roaring song in ever more powerful crescendo, down to the sea at Karachi, where steamers load and unload. I thought of its restless course through Western Tibet, through Ladak and Baltistan, past Skardu, where the apricot trees nod on its banks, through Dardistan and Kohistan, past Peshawar, and across the plains of the Western Punjab, until at last it is swallowed up by the salt waves of the ocean, the Nirvana and the refuge of all weary rivers."

Such are the sublime moments of an explorer's life, the rare, occasional prizes, over and above the little wayside discoveries and crystalline schists of his daily life, which now and then fall to his lot. We congratulate Dr. Sven Hedin heartily on his good fortune.

And with equal sincerity do we congratulate ourselves. This is not the place to endeavor to appraise Dr. Sven Hedin's geological, geographical, and other scientific contributions to our knowledge of the Tibetan plateau. The reasons for self-congratulation we are thinking of are of another kind. It seems to us that in these days we owe to explorers a special debt of gratitude. We are driven, it is the inevitable tendency of our civilisation, to live, and act, and think more and more communistically. We herd too much. We express fluently, but we are content with transmitted forms of knowledge, and with turning over second-hand ideas. There needs an individualist now and then to come among us to remind us of the keen and exquisite delight of direct observation. Not to prune, or modify, or rearrange, but to come in contact with ideas at the moment when they leave the matter that held them is the highest intellectual ecstasy. A book like this, the book of a genuine explorer, seems to bring into our stock of ideas, grown perhaps a little languid and dull, a jet, tonic and stimulating, like the cold clear jet of a mountain spring. It is the explorer's contribution to the thought of his age, and we have need to set store by it.

THE ATMOSPHERE OF RICHES.*

MR. PONSONBY discusses in this interesting and suggestive little volume certain important but rather neglected aspects of the problem of wealth. His book is particularly opportune in the moment of its appearance, for the form which the Budget controversy has taken, and the vigor with which the theory of the necessity and value to the State of a tremendously rich class has been defended and assailed, have drawn public notice very forcibly to some of the economic consequences of leaving what Mr. Hobson calls the "surplus income" in the hands of a few individuals. Mr. Ponsonby's allusions to the economic side of this subject show that he is a disciple of Mr. Hobson, though he presents his argument in rather a different way. He sets out to show that there is a fixed limit to individual capacity for wise and useful expenditure, and that irreparable harm is caused, economically and morally, by the private possession of wealth beyond that limit. To make good his contention, he examines the modern consequences of large expenditure. The part of his discussion of this subject which will attract particular attention is that concerned with luxurious living. He asks himself how in point of fact very rich men live, what are their surroundings and their dependants, and, to arrive at an answer, he imagines himself setting forth in the spirit of one of Mr. Booth's investigators on a visit of inquiry to Mayfair. A social missionary on such an errand would have to face an unpleasant welcome. "In response to the bell the massive front door would slowly open and out of the darkness of the hall would emerge the solemn figure of an overfed butler, flanked by two giants with powdered hair. The investigator, note book in hand, if he had the courage to proceed, would ask his string of queries as to how many rooms the house contained, how many people, the cost of living, the health of the children, the employment of the man, &c., &c. But he would not get very far before the incensed and outraged dignity of the man would take an active form, and he would find himself hurled down the steps into the street." Such an investigation would have a very real value to the scientific politician. Mr. Ponsonby does not go so far as Cobbett, who contended that a J.P. who really did his duty would commit every rich man in his neighborhood who was without visible means of earning his livelihood, but he argues that in a wisely and justly governed State the affairs of the rich would be as much a matter for public curiosity and interest as the affairs of the poor.

Fortunately, he has been able to collect, by the help of friends, some very interesting details of the great establishments of the London rich.

Here, for example, is a list of the indoor servants kept in one town house. The owner has four houses. He is married and has two children. His servants are one house steward, two grooms of the chamber, one valet, two under butlers, three footmen, two steward's-room footmen, one gate porter, one hall porter, one usher of the servants' hall, two odd men, one house carpenter, one chef, one kitchen porter, four kitchen and scullery maids, two still-room maids, six housemaids, one linen maid, one lady's maid, one housekeeper, and two nurses. In this instance nineteen men and seventeen women are employed in one house to provide for the wants of a man and his wife and their two children. Taxation which should oblige this West End potentate to reduce any part of his expenditure on his pleasures and his state would be resisted by the cry that it would cause unemployment, and the rich pretend that this gross and grotesque misapplication of faculties and energies is in the long run as essential to the welfare of the poor as it is to the comfort of the rich. We hope that Budget speakers will be careful to explain from instances, such as are given in this volume, what the rich really mean when they talk of the existing relations of rich and poor as an economic web in which a single thread cannot be disturbed without causing ruin and confusion. What they mean is that society, as they conceive it, cannot go on unless millions of people go short of clothes, boots, or food, that the energies which might be spent on producing these things may be employed in maintaining the pomp and state of a tiny class. The truth must be expounded in concrete terms. It would be instructive, for example, to present a picture of the arrangements of the Duke of Northumberland's five mansions side by side with the condition of the cottages at Walbottle, and to show that, if the arguments which are employed by the Dukes are sound, the poor must always live in Walbottles because the Dukes cannot help living in palaces; and the poor must always lack the necessities of life because it takes twenty men to keep a Duke decently washed, brushed, and clothed. Other interesting tables in Mr. Ponsonby's book illustrate the comparative expenditure of rich and poor on food. Here is a weekly budget. For the household of an "unemployed man," four in family and fourteen servants: Butcher £15 2s. 7d., greengrocer £10 10s., ice merchant £1 18s., fishmonger £7 10s., grocer £5 5s., milkman £4 4s., poulterer £12, baker £3 17s. Paley preached contentment to the poor a century ago by reminding them that Nature had set a limit to the size of the human stomach, and that therefore in one sense the capacity of rich and poor for happiness was not very unequal. It might occur to some critics that the argument, such as it is, ought to be addressed not to the poor but to the rich.

Mr. Ponsonby's main preoccupation is not so much the economic as the moral consequence of treating wealth with the inordinate respect that it receives in modern society. He describes very happily and vividly the atmosphere of riches. Our general worship of great possessions creates a world of illusion in which the poor romanticise the dull lives of the idle leaders of smart society. Many people outside that little set think that its life is glorious and exciting, full of energy and dash and variety, whereas it is in fact singularly empty and monotonous. Certain newspapers feed these false ideas. "Nothing can surpass the servility of that section of the Press that recounts the doings of these parasites, describing with intense solemnity their entertainments and their hunting and shooting exploits, and giving embarrassingly intimate episodes from their private lives for public consumption. By publishing broadcast these alluring pictures it attempts to glorify their profitless and empty existence." Fielding made the same complaint of the popular presentation of high life in his day, but he lived before the days of an Americanised Press.

* "The Camel and the Needle's Eye." By Arthur Ponsonby, M.P. Fifeild. 3s. 6d. net.

FROM HODDER & STOUGHTON'S CHRISTMAS LIST

POLITICAL BOOKS.

THE HOUR OF FATEFUL DECISION. THE GREAT CAMPAIGNING BOOKS FOR LIBERALS

SECOND LARGE EDITIONS HAVE BEEN IMMEDIATELY CALLED FOR OF THE FOLLOWING BOOKS:—

(1) Mr. Lloyd George's Unanswerable Answer to the critics of the Budget.

THE PEOPLE'S BUDGET.

Explained by the Right Hon. D. LLOYD GEORGE, M.P., Chancellor of the Exchequer. Over 200 pages, paper cover 1s. net; cloth 2s. net.
"Let the people but know what the Budget really contains, and what it really means for them and their children, and I do not doubt their ultimate verdict."—From The People's Budget by D. Lloyd George.

(2) Mr. Winston's Churchill's Great Defence of Liberal Policy.

LIBERALISM AND THE SOCIAL PROBLEM.

By the Right Hon. WINSTON S. CHURCHILL, M.P. Over 400 pages, cloth 3s. 6d. net. (postage 4d.)
"Never did a great people enter upon a period of trial and choice with more sincere and disinterested desire to know the truth and to do justice in their generation. I believe they will succeed."—From Liberalism and the Social Problem, by Winston S. Churchill.

(3) Dr. Macnamara's Letters to a Working Man on the Snare of Protection.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

Letters to a Working Man. By Dr. T. J. MACNAMARA, M.P. Paper covers 6d.

Dr. Macnamara's view is that as a result of six years' persistent effort at the street corners on the part of the itinerant Tariff Reform advocates, Protection, so far from being dead, is very much alive in the minds of the operatives in our great cities. This little book is written largely in answer to the dangerous suggestion "Why not give it a trial?"

(4) "The only book we know which shows what Socialism is in the World at present."—BRITISH WEEKLY.

THE NEW SOCIALISM.

An Impartial Inquiry. By JANE T. STODDART.
Price 5s. net.

"It supplies the information which can be had nowhere else in English. A book to be read and re-read—a book which for its learning, its candour, its simplicity deserves to rank with the very best of its kind."—British Weekly.

GENERAL WORKS.

GEORGE MEREDITH. A Primer to the Novels. By JAMES MOFFATT, D.D. 6s. net.

"Dr. Moffatt begins with a sketch of Meredith's general aims and method, and follows this up with outlines and analyses of the different novels. He is able to incorporate many interesting facts concerning the books in his pages, and he evidently writes with full knowledge. It is sometimes urged that aids of this kind take away the keen edge of interest when the works of which they treat come to be read, but this is hardly likely to be the case with Meredith's novels, and many, we are sure, will find Dr. Moffatt's guide exceedingly helpful."—Westminster Gazette.

VICENZA: THE HOME OF "THE SAINT." By MARY PRICHARD AGNETTI. With a Preface by Antonio Fogazzaro. With Illustrations in Colour and Half Tone. 12s.

"Signora Agnetti's readable and pleasant book. . . . The book itself, written with a temperate and catching enthusiasm, goes over the history of the Vicentines, discusses the school of painting that flourished in their city, and goes round the town talking with taste and lightly carried learning about its fine buildings, its parks, palaces, and churches, or goes off walking to such pleasant places near by as Santa Chiara. Illustrated by photographs as well as by colour plates, it is an attractive book to look at as well as to read, and is sure of a welcome from readers who know or wish to know the beauties of Vicenza."—Scotsman.

THE REVOLUTION IN CONSTANTINOPLE AND TURKEY IN 1909. By PROF.

SIR W. M. RAMSAY, LL.D. With many Photographs. 10s. 6d. net.

Sir W. M. Ramsay, accompanied by Lady Ramsay and their eldest daughter, went to Constantinople in company with the advance guard of the Army of Liberty. They lived in the capital for seventeen days, until the siege was ended and the new Government established. They took many very interesting and successful photographs of the most striking scenes in this eventful period, both among the advancing soldiers on the railway, and in the city. They travelled thereafter for two months on the edge of the region of massacre, and over much of the central parts of Asiatic Turkey, whose loyalty to the new Government was a matter of great uncertainty, and a cause of great anxiety in Constantinople and Europe generally. Their experiences were gained among the people themselves, not at second-hand; and constitute an interesting and valuable record of a great historical event. It has not the form of a historical narrative written afterwards from a study of documents, but records day by day the impressions and the uncertainties amid which the people of Turkey had to live.

HERALDS OF REVOLT. Studies in Modern Literature and Dogma. By WILLIAM BARRY, D.D. New and Cheaper Edition. 6s.

"Canon Barry," says the Globe, "has taken a certain tendency in literature which, whether it masquerades as romanticist, realist, or merely sensual, is at bottom that of 'the Spirit which denies,' and it is his object to show us into what an abyss that tendency must eventually plunge the world. His 'Heralds of Revolt' are George Eliot, Mr. Shorthouse—looking rather strange, we confess, in this gallery—Carlyle, Amiel, Heine, most of the modern French Pagans, John Addington Symonds, Walter Pater, and Nietzsche. . . . To understand the force of Canon Barry's argument his book must be read as a whole, and we know no time more in need than is the present of the inexorable logic by which he reaches his conclusion in the philosophy of Nietzsche."

LETTERS FROM CHINA. With Particular Reference to the Dowager Empress and the Women of China.

By SARAH PIKE CONGER. Profusely Illustrated. 12s.

"Mrs. Conger, the writer of this interesting series of private letters, is the wife of a Minister who presided at the American Legation at Peking during the period between 1898 and 1904, years which covered the hostilities occasioned by the Boxer rebellion. Her letters, while they give interesting glimpses of the perilous and adventurous situation of the foreign residents at that time, are occupied in general with plain, well observed descriptions of the life out there. . . . They leave upon the mind a prepossessing idea of the amiability and strength of the Chinese character, and, illustrated as they are by many excellent photographs, cannot but prove interesting and instructive to readers seriously concerned to know the Chinese as they really are."—Scotsman.

HODDER & STOUGHTON'S detailed Catalogue of New Works in Political and General Literature will be sent post free to any reader of "The Nation" on receipt of a card addressed to—

HODDER & STOUGHTON, Warwick Square, London, E.C.

This mirage casts a glamor over selfish and brutal expenditure on luxury and show, and leads others to admire instead of to hate the character that chooses this hideous existence. But what of the expenditure of a leader of society who combines immense wealth with public spirit? We know the kind of local life that generally surrounds him. "He dispenses charity to the villagers with open-handed generosity, providing thoughtfully the sack of coals in winter, the occasional pound of tea, the knitted waistcoats for the little boys, the scarves and hoods for the little girls, and what could be more idyllic than to see the children bobbing curtsies and touching their caps to the people from the great house?" We know the kind of character that is produced in a society which can only find its light and warmth at this foyer; its dependence, its lack of life and spirit and self-respect. We know, too, the kind of character that is produced in the generous benefactor. A simple test will suffice. If we approach him and explain that the State is going to relieve him of these hospitable duties, taking from his superfluous wealth for the purpose just as much as he dispenses himself, will he be thankful or the reverse? We know that in nine cases out of ten he will show by his answer that what he values most is, not the satisfaction of feeling that the little boys are protected from the winter by knitted waistcoats, and the little girls by scarves and hoods, but the sense of power and importance which he derives from his patronage. This is the key to the mind of many rich people who are themselves openhanded to their poorer neighbors, and yet are infuriated by such a measure as the Old Age Pensions Act.

We have only space to glance at a few of the aspects of the problem which Mr. Ponsonby discusses in this stimulating book. He attacks the abuses that are inevitable in this atmosphere of plutocracy in an incisive and piquant way, but his book is not made up of invective or polemics. It is a careful study of the properties and influences of that atmosphere, tracing its subtle poison and its widespread demoralisations in relationships that often seem innocent and even admirable, and examining the advantages that are plausibly claimed for it in the name of culture and refinement. It is, in fact, just the kind of discussion that is wanted at this time when the questions that lie at the root of taxation as a means of social reform are engrossing attention, and society is obliged to consider in a new light the uses and place of the rich in the modern State. The rich themselves are treated with a sympathetic insight, and they are offered consolation as well as warning. The fate that they dread is really destined to save them from the moral and intellectual atrophy that threatens a spoilt class. "All kinds of insignificant little daily efforts keep the machine perpetually in motion and in order, ready and alert for more work, and the spirit of disinclination is shut out. . . . It has been shown in the animal world that the spoilt and carefully combed and washed pet is far less intelligent than the animal who has to look after himself, scratch his own fleas, and lick the dirt off his paws. We are under the impression that if we can get rid of the various irritations of daily life, which are our fleas, the time spent in scratching will be devoted to work of a higher order more in conformity with our powers." The book would, indeed, form a judicious Christmas present for those rich men who do not realise yet that the Budget is a blessing in disguise.

A GREAT SCOTTISH ECCLESIASTIC.*

SCOTLAND is pre-eminently the land of ecclesiastics, a circumstance which greatly perplexed and irritated beyond measure the late Mr. Buckle. Buckle was willing to admit that, indirectly, the clergy had made considerable contributions to the cause of liberty; but, taken as a whole, it would have been better, in his opinion, had the Church never existed in Scotland. The idea of the Church existing as a hostile power against the State is one which is not endorsed by the history of Scotland. Open that history where you will, you will find the two powers working towards the same end—that of raising the tone of civilisation. The one great problem with which statesmen and ecclesiastics alike had to deal was the defining of the relation between Church and State. The peculiarity of the case is that it is with this one problem that the ecclesiastical history of Scotland mainly deals. Knox, Melville, the Covenanters, Carstairs, Chalmers, Rainy—those great leaders had all to deal with the same problem. Here we have the explanation of the continuity of Scottish ecclesiastical history, and also the explanation of the fact that Mr. Carnegie-Simpson has been compelled to give such a large historical background to his "Life of Principal Rainy." To the ordinary reader, to whom the purely personal note in biography appeals, there is much in this life which will prove uninteresting. Principal Rainy's career does not lend itself to dramatic treatment. He did not, like some of his predecessors—Chalmers, Candlish, and Guthrie—bulk largely in the public mind, inasmuch as his gifts were not of the magnetic kind which were indispensable in the early stages of the Disruption movement. After the first blush of enthusiasm, when the energies of the Church had to be focussed and directed, the man of the hour obviously was not the rousing orator, but the calm diplomatist; not the victorious general, but the wise administrator. For this task Principal Rainy was admirably fitted, and certainly his powers were tried to the utmost. The part assigned to Principal Rainy by the Time-Spirit was that of negotiating the union between the Free and the United Presbyterian Churches. The first attempt, which extended over ten years, from 1863 to 1873, proved a failure, in consequence of the opposition of an influential minority, headed by Dr. Begg, who protested against the union of a Church which was committed to the Establishment principle with one which represented Voluntarism. The second attempt, nearly forty years later, was successful, but at the cost of an action in the House of Lords by the representatives of the old protesting minority, with, as result, great loss of property and disorganisation of ecclesiastical machinery.

Sandwiched between the two great epochs in Rainy's life was another, known as the Robertson Smith case, which was fraught with graver issues than the ecclesiastical problems with which his predecessors had to deal. They were occupied with defining the relations between Church and State. Rainy was confronted with a deeper and more vital problem—namely, the relation between Church and Bible. Till Robertson Smith published his epoch-making views, there had been unanimity with regard to the position of the Bible as the authoritative standard and final authority in Protestant Scotland. In fact, the Disruption Church prided itself on its orthodoxy on this point, and, because of its orthodoxy, it attracted to itself from the Established Church large numbers of earnest Evangelical laymen. But how could orthodoxy be guaranteed if the ultimate standard, the final authority, was discredited? An infallible Bible had been the rallying cry of Protestantism in its great contest with Rome. A new force had arisen, Rationalism, which could never be defeated if Protestantism had to admit that its final appeal was not to an infallible book, but simply to a literature not wholly accurate, and flavored with legendary and mythical lore. With such a rallying cry orthodoxy was greatly hampered in its battle with Rationalism. No more difficult problem ever presented itself to a Church leader. The views put forward by Robertson Smith were known to the cultured few in the Free Church, and Rainy knew that sooner or later the Higher Criticism would become a burning question. What was to be done? Robertson Smith forced the pace. Those who shared his views strove to secure liberty, but it was clear from the debates in the Assembly that the Church was far from being educated up to the Higher Criticism standard. To condemn Robertson Smith on account of his views would have been to stop theological progress; yet to leave Robertson Smith in his chair was to bring about a Disruption. Rainy got out of the difficulty by deposing Robertson Smith from his chair on the ground that the interest of the Church demanded the termination of a controversy which was doing infinite harm. In other words, it was expedient that one man should suffer rather than that the Church should be rent in twain. For a time Rainy's reputation went under eclipse. He was denounced as a trimmer, whose ideal was cold, calculating, worldly expe-

* "The Life of Principal Rainy." By Patrick Carnegie-Simpson. M.A. Hodder & Stoughton. 2 vols. 21s. net.

FROM HODDER & STOUGHTON'S CHRISTMAS LIST.

Theological and Religious.

STUDIES IN RELIGION AND THEOLOGY. By the Rev. A. M. FAIRBAIRN, M.A., D.D., D.Litt. 12s. net.

THE THOUSAND AND ONE CHURCHES. By Professor Sir W. M. RAMSAY, D.C.L., and GERTRUDE L. BELL. Illustrated. 20s. net.

THE ETHIC OF JESUS according to the Synoptic Gospels. By the Rev. Professor JAMES STALKER, M.A., D.D. 7s. 6d.

CHRISTUS CRUCIFIXUS ; or Christ's Cross, Crown, and Covenant. By the Rev. J. G. SIMPSON, D.D. 6s.

MODERN SUBSTITUTES FOR CHRISTIANITY. By the Rev. PEARSON MCADAM MUIR, D.D. The Baird Lecture, 1909. 6s.

CHRIST AND MAN: SERMONS. By the late Rev. Principal MARCUS DODS, D.D. 6s.

FOOTSTEPS IN THE PATH OF LIFE. By the same Author. 3s. 6d.

THE PERSON AND PLACE OF JESUS CHRIST. By the Rev. Principal P. T. FORSYTH, M.A., D.D. 7s. 6d. net.

THE CRUCIALITY OF THE CROSS. By the Rev. Principal P. T. FORSYTH, D.D. 5s.

THE RETURN OF THE ANGELS. By the Rev. G. H. MORRISON, M.A. 5s.

THE PRE-EMINENT LORD AND OTHER SERMONS. By the Rev. J. STUART HOLDEN, M.A. 3s. 6d.

THE PROBLEM OF THEOLOGY IN MODERN LIFE AND THOUGHT. By the Rev. ANDREW MILLER, M.A. 5s.

REVIVALS: THEIR LAWS AND LEADERS. By the Rev. JAMES BURNS, M.A. 6s.

ANTOINETTE BOURIGNON. Quietist. By the Rev. Professor A. R. MACEWEN, D.D. 3s. 6d. net.

THE REV. JOHN DUNCAN, D.D. A Memoir and a Tribute. By J. B. ALLAN, B.D. With Illustrations. 5s.

J. BEVAN BRAITHWAITE. A "Friend" of the Nineteenth Century. Life and Letters by HIS CHILDREN. With Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.

THE LIFE OF PRINCIPAL RAINY. By PATRICK CARNEGIE SIMPSON, M.A. 2 vols. With Photogravure Portraits. 21s. net.

EXPOSITIONS OF HOLY SCRIPTURE. By the Rev. ALEXANDER MACLAREN, D.D., D.Litt. Fifth and Last Series. 8 vols. Vols. 1 and 2 now ready. (1) I. and II. Corinthians (to Chap. V.) (2) The Epistle to the Ephesians. 32s. net the Set. Single vols. 7s. 6d.

THE DAY OF THE CROSS. By the Rev. W. M. CLOW, B.D. 6s.

LIFE ON GOD'S PLAN. By the Rev. HUGH R. MACKINTOSH, D.Phil. 5s.

BRANCHES OF THE CROSS. By the Rev. A. BOYD SCOTT, M.A., B.D. 6s.

FAITH'S CERTAINTIES. By the Rev. R. J. DRUMMOND, D.D. 5s.

RESPECTABLE SINS. By the Rev. JOHN WATSON, D.D. 3s. 6d.

THE MIND OF CHRIST IN ST. PAUL. By the Rev. J. G. GREENHOUGH, M.A. 6s.

THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH AND THE PRIMACY OF ROME. By Professor GIORGIO BARTOLI. 6s.

EPOCHS IN THE LIFE OF ST. PAUL. By the Rev. Professor A. T. ROBERTSON, M.A., D.D. 5s.

RELIGION AND THE MODERN WORLD. St. Ninian Lectures. 5s.

THE CITY WITH FOUNDATIONS. By Professor J. E. MCFADYEN, M.A. 5s.

THE ANALYSED BIBLE. By the Rev. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, D.D. New vol., The Epistle to the Romans. 3s. 6d.

THE ABERDEEN DOCTORS. A Notable Group of Scottish Theologians of the First Episcopal Period, 1610-1638. By the Rev. D. MACMILLAN, D.D. 6s.

LITTLE BOOKS ON RELIGION. Edited by Sir W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, M.A., LL.D. Six New Volumes: 1. THE CHURCH AND THE KINGDOM. By the Rev. Professor JAMES DENNEY, D.D. 2. LEAD KINDLY LIGHT. By Dr. ZELIE. 3. ST. JOHN'S PORTRAIT OF CHRIST. By the Rev. GEORGE MATHESON, M.A., D.D. 4. THE LITERAL INTERPRETATION OF THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT. By the Rev. MARCUS DODS, D.D., Rev. Professor JAMES DENNEY, D.D., and the Rev. JAMES MOFFATT, D.D. 5. PRAYER. By DORA GREENWELL. 6. THE MYSTERY OF PAIN. By JAMES HINTON. 7. SECOND THINGS OF LIFE. By the Rev. JAMES MOFFATT, D.D. 1s. net each.

HODDER & STOUGHTON'S detailed account with important reviews of new works in Theological and Religious Literature will be sent post free to any reader of "The Nation" on receipt of a card addressed to HODDER & STOUGHTON, Warwick Square, London, E.C.

diency. Mr. Simpson, in his admirable history of the case, claims for Rainy that by his tactics he really secured the liberty which Robertson Smith's disciples now enjoy. There is no escape from this conclusion. Rainy's action, denounced at the time, is now seen to have been dictated by statesmanship of the highest order. All the same, the problem raised by Robertson Smith has not been solved. Thanks to Rainy, the Church is no longer in a panic mood, and is now willing to look at the Higher Criticism in a comparatively calm frame of mind. That is a gain, but students of theology in Scotland are forced to admit that the changed views of the Bible created by the Higher Criticism will slowly, but surely, weaken the entire dogmatic system of Scottish Protestantism.

Till the recent crisis Principal Rainy was recognised as a leader who was more enamoured of the expedient than of the heroic; but the public saw another side of his nature when, at an age when men seek the secluded nooks of life, he braced himself, with marvellous energy and enthusiasm, to undo the blundering work of the House of Lords. The judgment by which ecclesiastical chaos was produced in Scotland stands condemned at the bar of law as well as of common sense, and men in the highest legal circles have been known to whisper condemnation of the long-robed gentlemen whose ignorance of Scottish ecclesiasticism led them to inflict a cruel blow upon a flourishing Church. To this phase in Principal Rainy's life Mr. Simpson does ample justice. In his pages Rainy appears in his true light—as those who knew him can testify—as the leader who guided his Church through a serious crisis in its history with a sagacity and ability which, had they been exercised in the political sphere, would have raised him to the highest rank of statesmanship. Mr. Simpson is an ideal biographer. In the hands of a second-rate writer, the book, owing to the large amount of historical matter necessarily important, might easily have been heavy and lumbering; but Mr. Simpson's literary deftness, his keen sense of proportion, and his crisp, incisive style, have enabled him to give us a biography which will rank as a classic in Scottish ecclesiastical literature.

BAR AND BOHEMIA.*

FROM one topic to another Mr. Crispe flows on agreeably enough. He has seen Macready, he remembers Thackeray as a lecturer, and the Rev. J. C. M. Bellew as the greatest of readers. He discusses the art of Kissing (on the stage), the night-houses of the 'fifties and the 'sixties, the judges and barristers he has known, the dinners he has eaten, the efficaciousness of the cat-o'-nine-tails, the methods of persuading juries, the morality of pocketing fees for cases not attended to, and the propriety of piling on the agony of a death sentence with the help of that "gear of terror," the Black Cap. There are "pippins and cheese" for all tasters.

Thackeray comes on as a lecturer, dissatisfied, in one instance, with his fees, in another with the style assigned him on the programme. Edinburgh had made money out of him, and he wrote to a friend: "I am in the hands of the Philistines. They have bought me for two hundred and sold me for five." For Mr. Crispe, who was then connected with the old Marylebone Institute, he delivered his lectures on the "Georges," and was rather nettled at having been announced on the bills as plain "W. M. Thackeray." We are not sure that either reminiscence was worth printing.

Here is a peep at an establishment which has lived on in the pages of Dickens:—

"One Sunday Tolfree took me to the old Queen's Bench Prison, where a friend of his was then resident, and where he himself had been an occasional inmate. His friend was just out of the tub, and was going to play a game of rackets. To my mind, the Bench seemed a pleasant place of retirement. There was a lady resident, who was in contempt as to paying some fine for selling cadetships in the East India Company, and in complicity with her there was a well-known fashionable preacher—the good old times!"

In the 'fifties, and later, Leicester Square, the Haymarket, and Covent Garden collected the night birds of London.

"Evans's," in Covent Garden, was, of course, far above its rivals, and probably there has been no other supper-room in London quite on the same Bohemian level. It was a place for an excellent late meal of the Victorian order, with some decent music thrown in. Among the regular frequenters were the men of their day in the most various ways of life: barristers, literary gents, journalists, artists, actors, managers, dramatists, together with the usual squad of men about town who wound the evening up elsewhere. "There were two rigid rules: no pipes were allowed—the cigarette had not then found vogue—and no women were admitted." Every Thackerayan knows that "Evans's" was his "Cave of Harmony"—and Thackeray, among the Bohemians of his day, was a very deacon for propriety.

Later in the evening the tide turned towards the Haymarket; and from this point a kind of rogues' march began up the hill to Windmill Street, where stood the most notorious casino of the period. This, by the way, lasted on into the 'seventies. The whole neighborhood swarmed with dancing-rooms, most of them rather ill-reputed.

But at the epoch of the 'fifties Leicester Square "was the centre of Metropolitan vice." For a time at least it existed in defiance of authority, made no secret whatever concerning its principal business, and was scarcely minded of the police. "The Square" had, as Mr. Crispe says, striven in vain for respectability. There was the Gallery of poor Miss Linwood, with her specimens of tapestry embroidery; there was a panorama; there was the Panopticon; there was the educational Mr. Wylde with his Great Globe. But these innocuous entertainments no longer pleased—in Leicester Square. Miss Linwood folded her embroideries, and her skirts, and silently withdrew. In her place came the bold Madame Wharton with the celebrated "Poses Plastiques." To-day this exhibition would be voted tame enough, and in Madame Wharton's day it was outdone in popularity by a much more indecent show a few doors distant. Next to this spectacle was that of the blackguard "Baron" Nicholson, who for a long time set the police at naught with his "Judge and Jury."

"At his court every night a jury was empanelled from the audience, and a mock trial took place, the baron presiding as judge. Witnesses were called, counsel heard, and the learned judge summed up. His addresses to the jury were humorous and racy, but under a veneer of polish there was a foul layer of indecency."

One very interesting aspect Leicester Square and its locality had at that time. It was (far more than it is at the present day) a humble kind of Paris in London. Doubtless it harbored a crowd of rogues, Communists, and swindlers; but it was the refuge also of an immense number of respectable foreigners, many of whom were genuine political refugees. This is a perfect little picture of the district as it was then:—

"It was always interesting to wander through these streets; you were out of England as completely as if you had crossed the Channel; and more so, for these strays were congregated in the area of a square mile. The shops with the foreign journals; the charcuterie, with its jambons, its truffes, olives, and other delicacies; the boutique de vin, with the long bottles and flasks of Chianti in wicker casings, the sirops, the liqueurs, all 'véritable'; the épicerie, with its macaroni, its fragrant spices, its vanilla and chocolat de Paris—all made up an attraction for the window-gazer."

Onwards from the seventh chapter these reminiscences are professional; but even before an audience of laymen a lawyer with Mr. Crispe's knack of story-telling has no need to "sink the shop": there is no dust about. He was of the "old Home" circuit, when the future Mr. Justice Day ("Judgment" Day) was Senior, and Mr. William Willis (now his Honour the Judge) one of the leaders. Mr. Day, "letting off his sparkles" at mess at the Bar Inn, must have been a different person from the gentleman whose mere visage in a wig, as he glowered from the Bench upon the dock, was a dreadful promise of punishment. And, as Mr. Crispe touches on the question of this judge's sentences, we may be pardoned one word of criticism.

Between Mr. Justice Day and his Honour Judge Willis ("the one a rigid Romanist, the other a strongly pronounced Nonconformist and passive resister"), there existed a friendship as close as it was curious. They differed, says Mr. Crispe,

"on one point, 'flogging,' for which the judge [Day] was a strong

* "Reminiscences of a K.C." By Thomas Edward Crispe. Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.

Mr. Edward Arnold's List.

By LADY ST. HELIER. 4th Impression.

Memories of Fifty Years.

By MARY JEUNE (Lady St. Helier).
With Illustrations, 1 vol. demy 8vo, cloth, 15s. net.

By LADY SARAH WILSON. 2nd Impression.

South African Memories.

With Illustrations, 1 vol. demy 8vo, 15s. net.
Evening Standard.—"Tells us exactly what we want to know."

By E. T. COOK.

Edmund Garrett.

(late Editor of the Cape Times). A Memoir. With Portrait, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Athenæum.—"A sympathetic and fascinating memoir of one journalist by another."

By Dr. H. M. BUTLER.

Ten Great and Good Men.

Lectures by HENRY MONTAGU BUTLER, D.D., D.C.L., Master of Trinity College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

The Times.—"It is not for nothing that a man has been Headmaster of Harrow and Master of Trinity, and when one whose character and ability have called him to such high places comes forward to speak of some of the greatest of his countrymen, he can hardly fail to say something which will interest, stimulate, and, what Dr. Butler has most at heart, uplift an average audience of Englishmen. No one who reads this book will doubt that the Master of Trinity does all these things in these lectures."

By G. F. ABBOTT.

Turkey in Transition.

Illustrated, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Westminster Gazette.—"Mr. Abbott's brilliant book deserves to be read not only because it is the work of one of the highest authorities on the politics of the Near East, but because it presents a picture of the Young Turks widely different from that which is commonly accepted."

By J. CLAUDE WHITE, C.I.E.

Sikhim and Bhutan:

Experiences of Twenty-one Years on the N.E. Frontier of India. Magnificently illustrated. With Map, royal 8vo, 21s. net.

Travel and Exploration.—"Mr. White has many interesting and, indeed unique experiences to describe, and tells his tale with an unassuming frankness and easy and unlaboured style which are admirably suited to his subject."

By M. EDITH DURHAM.

High Albania.

Fully Illustrated, with Map, demy 8vo, 14s. net.

Truth.—"An extraordinarily sprightly record of a still more extraordinarily plucky adventure."

By J. O. P. BLAND.

Houseboat Days in China.

Illustrated by W. D. Straight. With Map, medium 8vo, 15s. net.

The Times.—"A lively and entertaining book."

By SIR HERBERT MAXWELL, Bt.

Memories of the Month. Fifth Series.

With Photogravure Plates, large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. (Uniform with Series I., II., III., and IV.)

Field.—"To say that No. 5 of the series is worthy of its forbears is equivalent to unqualified praise."

By REGINALD FARRER.

In a Yorkshire Garden.

By REGINALD FARRER, Author of "My Rock Garden," &c. With Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

By W. M. L. HUTCHINSON.

Orpheus with his Lute.

Stories of the World's Springtime. Illustrated, crown 8vo, 5s.

British Weekly.—"These charming stories of the world's spring-time will be welcomed by young readers. The author is steeped in classical lore, and the Orpheus legend is reproduced in the richest poetical colouring."

Illustrated by MRS. ALLINGHAM.

The Cottage Homes of England.

Illustrated by HELEN ALLINGHAM, with 64 Coloured Plates, 21s. net. Edition de Luxe, 42s. net.

Since the publication six years ago of "Happy England," Mrs. Allingham's art has made a notable advance, and her new book represents her latest and best work. It is a sumptuous volume forming a lovely and unique Christmas gift.

* * PLEASE WRITE FOR PROSPECTUSES.

London: EDWARD ARNOLD, 41 & 43, Maddox St., W.

Macmillan's New Books.

Indian Speeches, 1907-1909, By Viscount Morley.

Demy 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

Dr. Sven Hedin's

New Book

TRANS-HIMALAYA:

Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet.

With 388 Illustrations from Photographs, Water-colour Sketches, and Drawings by the Author, and 10 Maps. 2 vols. 8vo, 30s. net.

The Times.—"On none of his previous journeys has he had more excitement and adventure, or probably done more to clear the map of Central Asia of unexplored patches, than on the two years' expedition the story of which he tells in the two volumes before us . . . he deserves to be placed in the first rank of pioneer explorers. . . . From the general reader's point of view this is probably the most interesting of all Sven Hedin's books. It is often diffuse, but never dull. It abounds in human interest; indeed, that is the main feature of the book."

The World.—"For all lovers of a good story of genuine travel and adventure it will be a most delightful book to read, and the fact that it deals with the hitherto untrodden region of India's great northern water-parting, will render it doubly interesting."

The Evening Standard.—"Pages might be filled with quotations showing the extraordinary human and dramatic interest of this book. Othello had not more thrilling narratives to confide to the ear of Desdemona. To a great achievement in the cause of science and super-human labours, Sven Hedin has added a narrative that immediately takes rank as a classic."

Daily News.—"No person who feels the fascination of strange countries and unexplored places can read this book without delight."

In the Grip of the Nyika.

Further Adventures in British East Africa.

By Lieut.-Col. J. H. PATTERSON, D.S.O. Author of "The Man-Eaters of Tsavo." With illustrations, 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

RALPH NEVILL.

Light Come, Light Go.

Gambling—Gamsters—Wagers—The Turf. By RALPH NEVILL. With 9 Colour Plates and other Illustrations. 8vo, 15s. net.

THOMAS HARDY.

Time's Laughingstocks and other Verses.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

The Times.—"There have been a good many volumes of poetry published this year; but has there been one that surpasses or equals this in the indefinable quality of greatness by which human productions survive?"

The Rhythm of Modern Music.

By C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

A Project of Empire.

A Critical Study of the Economics of Imperialism, with special reference to the Ideas of ADAM SMITH. By J. SHIELD NICHOLSON, M.A., D.Sc., F.B.A. Professor of Political Economy in the University of Edinburgh. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

advocate; and in some of the mercantile towns his sentences in that respect were severe but salutary."

Writers who would persuade us of the salutary effects of flogging should nowadays be more than ever careful to adduce their proofs. Severe Mr. Justice Day's sentences of flogging were; salutary they were not. To Mr. Crispe, who so well remembers the Leicester Square of the 'fifties, the judicial statistics of the 'eighties and early 'nineties cannot be altogether ancient history. It was in 1882 that Mr. Justice Day entered on his first flogging campaign at Liverpool; and during eleven years he swung the "cat" with the most relentless vigor. In 1882 there were at Liverpool fifty-six cases of robbery with violence. In 1893, when Mr. Justice Day had inflicted 2,000 lashes save forty, there were seventy-nine cases—an increase of twenty-three. Rarely did this Judge miss an opportunity of laying on the whip: his record proved the absolute futility of his punishments, and proved nothing else. Another famous Judge who comes into Mr. Crispe's pages was Mr. Justice Hawkins. He, too, in his early days on the Bench had recourse occasionally to that most useless of all punitive weapons, the cat-o'-nine-tails. Very soon he came to the conclusion that "You make a perfect devil of the man you flog"; and Hawkins (who was scarcely to be classed among the sentimentalists) dropped the "cat" and took it up no more.

But Mr. Crispe is not often on debatable ground: when he is not, he seems to us to be nearly always in the right. Every suitor, we imagine, will appreciate his remarks in Chapter VIII. on the deplorable and costly delays of the law. Justice delayed is often justice denied. The Long Vacation is—well, it is rather long; and then there are the costly High Court judges, who are far too often absent on Circuit. What, asks Mr. Crispe, prevents the establishment of legal centres, and the appointment of Assize or travelling judges? "In London there should be a Court of Justice, of at least twelve judges, sitting all the legal year round. . . . A great country like our own"—Mr. Crispe italicises these words—"should have its Courts of Law always open."

Another of Mr. Crispe's questions, in which the general public has an interest, treats of the fees of counsel—fees taken by counsel for work that he does not do. Few reviewers, we fancy, are paid for the reviews they have no time to write; but a popular K.C. may find himself called upon to appear in five different cases, and for the four briefs that he leaves to his juniors he usually receives his fees in full. Mr. Crispe's view on the matter

"is with the public, that, as a rule, to which there may be many exceptions, counsel should return their fees, where they are not able to render their services. It seems much more consistent with the attitude of a gentleman who accepts an honorarium and is free from the risk of an action if he neglects his duty. If he were not a barrister, and were paid to do work which he neglected to do, he might be mulcted in damages."

The Bar Committee, which the late F. O. Crump, Q.C., brought into existence, might consider the point. It is somewhat of a slur on the profession.

To the reader we must leave the good stories with which Mr. Crispe has packed his volume; but here is just one glimpse of that ready and happy-tempered humorist, Frank Lockwood:—

"The learned counsel, an extremely serious man, had been tormented by Lockwood's frivolities in a case in which they were opposed—at last, in despair, he held up his hands in deprecation, and said:—

"Pray! Mr. Lockwood."

"I do," returned Lockwood, with a shrug, 'but only at the proper time and place.'"

WHITE AND SELBORNE.*

It is no drawback to our appreciation of Gilbert White that we do not know all about his youth or even that we have no very trustworthy portrait of him in the mature stage of a decent and in some ways a model country vicar making the best of his rural opportunities. We can imagine him very well as a boy who loved all live things and, perhaps, like ourselves, put bees and spiders into bottles, he knew not why—though the records tell us only that he took some part in digging a cave under a ruin at Basingstoke. Surely that was a most untypical fact to have been preserved to posterity, but then Nature, whether in her day books or in the ledgers of the fossiliferous rocks, has a very haphazard way of keeping her accounts.

We are indebted for the latest book on Gilbert White and Selborne to Mr. Henry C. Shelley. He has performed with grace the task of making bricks with a limited supply of straw or other material. We cannot help thinking that he is content, as we are, that White and Selborne should speak to us on equal terms, each with their antecedents taken a little for granted and each reciprocating the other's—shall we say?—personality. The immortal book is the chief thing. It contains, so far as White is concerned, the most part of the evidence we have as to what manner of man he was, evidence that presents itself in the best manner scattered over many pages as he placed it. Yet it is usefully presented to less enthusiastic Selbornians in the form of a collected judgment such as this.

Selborne itself has been mapped, described, shown in picture many times. Mr. Shelley's book is provided with many interesting photographs, and his description brings up to us the several charms of plestor, lythe, zigzag, hangar, and their centre, the "Wakes," more pleasantly than any other book on the subject that we remember. Though it is, of course, a thing difficult to be certain of, the charm of Selborne seems to be so much in itself that it may have been the predominant collaborateur in the book. It may be that White was just a cave-digging boy—a brigand for the nonce in those Basingstoke ruins—and that the genius loci got hold of him, early in life, of course, and made him what the world knows him. On the other hand it is possible, and in a sense certain, that but for White, Selborne would never have been discovered. At any rate, it is as difficult now to think of White without Selborne, or of Selborne without White, as it is to divorce Walton from the Lea, though much of the Lea, including, as the Conservators would have it, the name, has vanished.

We do not think either that White's book can very well be separated in thought from the century in which it was written. It was, in the first place, a century of letter-writing, which this is not. It is just a little idle to find a strikingly peculiar personal grace in White's style. It is there, no doubt, but it is not everywhere there, as Mr. Shelley sometimes appears to think, and the examples he adduces, such as "procreant cradle," do not strike us as at all typical of White's charm. The letters of most men of that day are, apart from their subject matter, very much alike. White belonged to an adorable literary school, but to a fairly large one. His chief fortune and ours is that he wrote about something that really interested him and which interests us. Apart from the book itself, this book about the book and its author is a very charming way of making their acquaintance.

TWO NOVELS.*

It is a pity that English people show so little curiosity in the modern Norse writers. It would astonish most people to be told that, for pure beauty both of style and feeling, we have no novelist who can compare with the Dane, Jacobsen, a kind of prose Keats. Occasionally a translation is offered up, on the shrine of our indifference, of Selma Lagerlov, or Prydz, or Jonas Lie, but the shy gift falls unseen, lost in the annual hecatomb of English fiction. Mr. Heinemann deserves special thanks for his charming little edition of the novels of Björnstjerne Björnson. We should have been grateful to the editor, Mr. Gosse, for a Prefatory Note telling us whether "Mary" is one of Björnson's later productions. The Norwegian master's artistic development is said to have suffered seriously from his ambition to assume the leadership of social purity movements, but "Mary" shows no trace of the ethical bias so insistent in "God's Way."

The mark of a master is shown by his power of indicating by one firm stroke what others need five indecisive touches

* "Mary." By Björnstjerne Björnson. Translated by Mary Morison. Heinemann. 3s.

"The Blindness of Dr. Grey." By Canon Sheehan, D.D. Longmans. 6s.

* "Gilbert White and Selborne." By Henry C. Shelley. Werner Laurie. 6s.

A BOOK EXHIBITION.

Readers of "The Nation" are cordially invited to Mr. Fisher Unwin's Exhibition of Books, Drawings, etc., to be held at Clifford's Inn Hall, from December 13-18th inclusive. Full particulars with admission card will be sent on request. (Admission free.)
1, Adelphi Terrace.

ORIGINAL DRAWINGS BY "F.C.G." JOSEPH PENNELL, WILLY POGANY, AND OTHER FAMOUS ARTISTS ON SALE,

The following are a selection of the volumes on view.

Mr. & Mrs. PENNELL.

French Cathedrals, Monasteries, and Abbeys, and Sacred Sites of France. With 183 Illustrations by JOSEPH PENNELL. 20s. net. (Post Free, 20s. 6d.)

W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE.

A Beau Sabreur. Maurice de Saxe, Marshal of France—His Loves, His Laurels, and His Times. 39 Illustrations. 15s. net. (Post Free, 15s. 5d.)

GUIDO BIAGI.

Men and Manners of Old Florence. Vivid and Realistic Glimpses of the Social Life. With 49 Illustrations. 15s. net. (Post Free, 15s. 5d.)

MADAME DUCLAUX.

The French Procession. A Pageant of Great Writers. With 6 Photogravure Plates. 12s. 6d. net. (Post Free, 12s. 11d.)

J. J. JUSSERAND.

A Literary History of the English People. Vol. III. From the Renaissance to the Civil War. II. 12s. 6d. net. (Post Free, 12s. 11d.)

MADAME DE BUNSEN.

In Three Legations: Turin, Florence, The Hague (1856-1872). With 49 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net. (Post Free, 12s. 11d.)

JESSIE WHITE MARIO.

The Birth of Modern Italy. The Posthumous Papers of Jessie White Mario. Edited with Introduction, Notes and Epilogue, by the Duke Litta-Visconti-Arese. With 42 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net. (Post Free, 12s. 11d.)

GEORGE RENWICK.

Romantic Corsica. Wanderings in Napoleon's Isle. With a chapter on climbing. 62 Illustrations and Map. 10s. 6d. net. (Post Free, 10s. 11d.)

F. W. HACKWOOD.

Inns, Ales, and Drinking Customs of Old England. With a Coloured Frontispiece and 53 other Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net. (Post Free, 10s. 11d.)

MAUD F. DAVIES.

Life in an English Village: An Economic and Historical Survey of the Parish of Corsley in Wiltshire. 10s. 6d. net. (Post Free, 10s. 11d.)

ROBERT M. MACDONALD.

Chilagoe Charlie. A Dashing Adventure Story for Boys. Illustrated. 5s. (Post Free.)

E. NESBIT.

The Treasure Seekers. Illustrated. 6s. (Post Free.) Write for a list of E. Nesbit's fascinating books for children.

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE.

Tanglewood Tales. A wonder book for boys and girls. Illustrated by Willy Pogany. 6s. (Post Free.)

ALFRED P. GRAVES.

The Irish Fairy Book. With over 100 Illustrations. 6s. (Post Free.) Uniform with "The Welsh Fairy Book."

The Books are on Sale at all Booksellers.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

KEGAN PAUL TRENCH,
TRÜBNER, & COMPANY,
LTD.

IMPORTANT NEW PUBLICATIONS.

HISTORY OF THE FAN.

By G. WOOLLISCROFT RHEAD, R.F., Hon. A.R.C.A., Lond. With 27 Full-page Plates in Colour, 120 in Half-tone, and numerous Illustrations in the Text. Dedicated to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, one of whose Fans is reproduced as a Frontispiece to the Book. Super Royal 4to (13½ by 10½). Strictly limited to 450 numbered copies for sale in England. 24 4s. net.

"A wonderful volume."—Daily Chronicle.
"Choice and famous examples appear nearly full size, with the utmost fidelity to texture and decorative brilliancy and gloom of age of which the modern arts of colour-printing are capable. The result is a singularly engaging and sumptuous volume, greatly planned and admirably done."—Pall Mall.

"The illustrations are truly wonderful, especially the coloured plates."—Daily Mail.

A GERMAN STAFF OFFICER IN INDIA.

Being Impressions of the Travels of an Officer of the German General Staff through the Peninsular. By COUNT HANS VON KOENIGSMARK, Major of the Dragoons of Bredow, and Captain on the General Staff of the German Army. With numerous Full-page Illustrations. Royal 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

PERIODIC LAW.

By A. E. GARRETT, B.Sc. (by Research). Illustrated by Tables and Diagrams. Crown 8vo, 5s.

MUSIC: Its Laws and Evolution.

By JULES COMBARIEU, Lecturer at the Collège de France. Authorised Translation. Crown 8vo, 5s.

CHESS OPENINGS: Ancient and Modern.

By E. FREEBOROUGH, with the co-operation of the Rev. C. E. Ranken, G. B. Frazer, Esq., and the Rev. W. Wayte. Corrected up to the present time by Messrs. H. E. Atkins, J. H. Blake, and others. Fourth Revised Edition. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

SONNETS AND ELEGIACS.

By ARCHBISHOP TRENCH. With Photogravure Portrait of the Author. Small post 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net. Leather, 2s. net. (Dryden Library.)

† New Classified Catalogue and Illustrated Autumn List Sent Post Free on Application.

DRYDEN HOUSE, GERRARD STREET,
LONDON. W.

Letters from George Eliot to Elma Stuart.

Crown 8vo, cloth. 5s. net.

"All admirers of George Eliot will surely join in a feeling of gratitude to Mr. Roland Stuart for publishing this little volume of letters addressed to his Mother by the great Novelist."—Daily Telegraph.

"Every admirer of the writings of George Eliot will be delighted with these charming letters."—Publishers' Circular.

SWIFTHAND

A NEW, SIMPLE AND RAPID METHOD OF
WRITING. Invented by the

Right Hon. SIR EDWARD CLARKE, K.C.

PRESS OPINIONS—

"Extremely ingenious and clever."—The Road.

"A modified shorthand with some advantages of its own, particularly in regard to legibility."—Birmingham Daily Post.

"Easily learnt by any person of ordinary ability."—Newcastle Weekly Journal.

"It is certainly a simple system that may be mastered in a very short time."—Colonial Printer.

ONE SHILLING, of all Booksellers.

London:

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & CO., LIMITED.

to convey. As a picture of life, "Mary" is a little stiff and lacking in atmospheric charm; but how admirably firm is it in handling and draughtsmanship. In sketching his characters, Björnson dwells only on their essential traits. At first sight the result is a little meagre and disappointing, but after the reader has put the book away, the scenes rush back on him with redoubled force. Every word has counted, and the reader's mind, freed from the burden of confusing detail, retains the image etched by the sharp, sparse strokes.

In drawing the character of Marit, or Mary, his proud, high-souled heroine, of upper-class birth, Björnson is not quite in his element. The secrets of the national character in peasantry and bourgeoisie no one, perhaps, understands better than he, but the fine shades of feminine instinct, in the leisured class, are a little beyond him. For this reason the description of Marit's cosmopolitan experiences, in Paris, &c., is hard and bare. What Björnson conveys admirably, however, perhaps without knowing it, is the feeling of his Northerners' force, directness, and simplicity when set against a sophisticated European background. Frans Røy, the Norwegian engineer officer, half-barbarian and half-child, who falls violently in love with Marit, and does not understand that "to touch her is forbidden," for the girl "dwells in a remoteness which she preserves inviolate with extraordinary vigilance and tact," is a sort of latter-day Rollo, a sea-king, who thrills her with his strength and daring while he repels her by his familiarity and presumption. Marit, deeply troubled and hurt by her discovery that Frans Røy has had an intrigue with her friend, Alice Clerc, returns home to Norway, and forthwith is wooed by Røy's rival, Jörgen Thiis. The character of this second suitor, self-concentrated and sensual is drawn in masterly style. One is repelled by him, one scarcely knows why, but one understands intuitively that women will succumb to his assurance, to his assumed devotion, and that the girl selected as his wife will be his victim. The cool and quiet account of the growth of the relations between Marit and Jörgen is deeply interesting. Women often take the wrong man, not because they trust him, but because his deference flatters their own opinion of themselves. So with Marit. How she surrenders to Jörgen, and, when at his mercy, tears herself from him in a flash of instinctive hatred, we shall leave the reader to discover for himself. The last chapters, "Alone," and "The Crisis," are unerring in their force. The description of Marit's night walk in the storm to Krogsbogen, and her rescue from her despair by Frans Røy, is quite perfect. Such beauty of feeling and such simplicity show the hand of a master.

One begins Canon Sheehan's novel in a spirit of generous recognition of the picturesque claims of the old-fashioned novel. Let us for once have a holiday, one says, and get away from the "depressing fields of modern realism" into the stirring upland country of romantic incident. Hang it all! why not enjoy a story where the scene is pitched on a desolate Irish coast, and the plot carries us to and fro between the gloomy house of the stern, iron-souled parish priest, Dr. Grey, who is always at odds with his trembling parishioners, and the ruins of Dunkerrin Castle, where a band of strolling gypsies aid the gentleman smuggler, Edward Wycherley, to run contraband cargoes under the nose of the revenue officers? After all, such things do happen, even in these degenerate days, as the newspapers, with their headings, "Strange Affair at Doonvarragh," may testify. One resigns oneself comfortably into the hands of Canon Sheehan, confiding in his wide experience of men and manners to unlock that treasure chest of local drama, of which the parish priest and the trusted physician, in popular belief, hold the key. And one's faith is a little dashed, after the chest has been turned out, to find out how mouldy and faded are the old romantic properties—gypsies, and smugglers, and lawless peasantry, even moonlight assignments and elopements. If only Canon Sheehan could have written his novel without these romantic accessories, one sorrowfully concludes, how much better it might have been!

The first few chapters are promising. The hard, strong, domineering parish priest, a man of the old school, who sees the "supremacy of Law in all things earthly and divine," and would drill all human impulses and instincts into submission to the Church's decrees, is a figure that, like Ibsen's Brand, seems created to be the centre of a moving human drama. When his orphan niece, Annie, comes, against his will, from America, to make his house her home, we expect that some conflict will be precipitated in which the priest's creed will be worsted by the invasion of his long-repressed emotions. But Canon Sheehan fritters away the situation by introducing a variety of exciting side issues. Ned Kerins, an American Irishman, has been boycotted for taking an evicted farm, which is coveted by his neighbors, the Duggans. A bitter feud arises between the two families, and the gypsy, Pete, and the gypsy girl, Cora, play mysterious parts in inciting the enemies one against the other. At the neighboring house, Rohira, resides another mysterious family, the Wycherleys, whose eldest son, Ned, in collusion with the gypsies, carries on a contraband trade in smuggling. The younger son, Jack Wycherley, falls desperately in love with the priest's niece, Annie O'Farrell, and the plot switches us off abruptly to hospital scenes in London, and scenes in South Africa, where the two, now medical student and nurse, meet to work out an emotional tragedy. The stern, domineering priest, Dr. Grey, meanwhile has grown blind, and the closing chapters are devoted to the broken man's discovery that the universal and inexorable Moral Law is balanced by the "new Commandment"—"Love is celebrated everywhere as the sole law which should govern the moral world." Canon Sheehan has made the mistake of planning a story without a centre. His best chapters are intimate studies of the clerical atmosphere; in his worst his intellectual energies are dissipated in descriptions of imaginary incidents of the G. P. R. James variety. He is obviously in need of a good model, and he might do worse than study the work of the Norwegian master, Björnson, much of whose fiction is distinguished by a classic symmetry of form.

THE CHILDREN'S BOOK-SHELF.

THIRTY-THREE short stories by different authors go to make "A Book of Brave Boys," edited by Mr. A. H. Miles (Stanley Paul, 6s.). The only criticism we have to pass is that the heroes of some of the stories are hardly boys—witness the chief actor in Mr. E. Maclellan's "The Doctor's Ride." Otherwise the collection teaches several lessons, among them that bravery has its opportunities as much in the present as it has had in the past, and that its manifestations are not confined to a few particular kinds of action. "The Short Straw," a tale with an American background, by Mr. Clarence Maiko; "Old Penny-Pincher," a modern college story, by Mr. F. R. Batchelder; "The Cave of the Waters," by Mr. L. B. Miller; "A Born Coward," by Mr. Francis Synde; and "Gildea's Museum," by the ever readable G. Manville Fenn, strike us as the pick of the collection.

* * *

"THE CHILDREN'S STORY OF WESTMINSTER ABBEY" (Mill & Boon, 5s. net), by G. E. Troutbeck, is not a guide to the Abbey, but a narrative of the chief events in English history which can be brought into connection with the Cathedral. The author begins with the story of the foundation and building of the Abbey on "Thorney Isle," proceeds to an account of the coronations it has witnessed, and then, going back to Edward the Confessor, narrates the most striking historical events connected with the Abbey down to the present day. The last four chapters treat of "The Wax Effigies," "The Monastic Buildings," "Some of the Abbots," and "Westminster School." Occasionally we meet with words or allusions which children are not likely to understand, but, judged as a whole, the book is a clear, simple, and attractive introduction to English history.

* * *

"THE GRIZZLY BEAR" (Werner Laurie, 7s. 6d.), by Mr. W. H. Wright, is a book which every boy who likes true stories of adventure will be glad to read. Mr. Wright belongs to the type of hunter who is as anxious to secure a good photograph as a good shot, and the illustrations in the present volume are among the best photographs taken of wild animals we have seen. A long experience has led him to believe that there is "some kind of telepathy between man and brute as between man and man; and that an interested but sympathetic watcher can remain unnoticed when

CHAIRMAN: To those qualities of fine flavour and aroma that one requires for real enjoyment in smoking it adds the unusual attribute of coolness.

Whether smoked much or little it is always cool, always pleasing and burns evenly to the last shred.

BOARDMAN'S is the same tobacco milder, and

RECORDER the same, but fuller flavoured.

6d. per oz. from
all tobacconists.

R. J. LEA, MANCHESTER.

"I predict that another concerted effort will be made to rouse a fresh naval or military panic so as to rush the Government into the criminal extravagance of unnecessary armaments on land and sea. A successful agitation of that kind would bankrupt social reform. . . . Liberals will have themselves to blame if they lack the perspicacity and firmness to resist these manufactured cries of national danger."—MR. LLOYD-GEORGE IN THE "NATION."

EUROPE'S OPTICAL ILLUSION.

By NORMAN ANGELL. 2/6

A popular treatise designed to prove that the modern credit system, by reason of its delicate interdependence, due to instantaneous international communication, makes the military seizure or destruction of the wealth of one nation by another a practical economic impossibility, as in the credit collapse which would result from such destruction the conquering nation would necessarily be involved. This situation, the creation of the last thirty years—the historical development of which the author traces—involves consequently the economic futility of military power, thus giving the great nations no commercial advantages over the small; makes undefended wealth—like that of the small nations—as secure as that of the great military power. He cites the fact that Belgium Three per Cents. stand at 96 and German at 82, Norwegian Three and a Half at 102, and Russian at 81.

The author deals exhaustively with the political and commercial effects—notably as to the competition of armaments—of this new situation which he claims renders the problem of modern international politics fundamentally different from the ancient; and pleads for a revision of ideas in the light of modern facts.

FIRST PRESS NOTICES.

The "Financial Times."

Deserves a wide diffusion among the people whom it is calculated to enlighten on matters that most decidedly "are to their peace."

Clearly written, in popular language, and if carefully studied by the masses of all countries would be the undoing of many a scare-mongering politician's occupation.

The "Financier and Bullionist."

A well-reasoned plea, and one likely to impress the thoughtful.

The "Bradford Observer."

It is generally believed that Englishmen like a man who says what he thinks, especially when he thinks picturesquely and in violent conflict with received opinion, an exception being made, of course, in the department of morals. If this is really so this little book ought to be a brilliant success. . . . The book is one which will cause the Chauvinist, if he should read it, furiously to think.

The "Western Daily Press."

A really valuable and original contribution to the study of the most alarming political problem of the present day. . . . A book that no one can read without interest, although to many people the ideas of the writer will seem at first sight to be absolutely revolutionary. . . . The whole train of thought is so unusual that Mr. Angell must not expect immediate agreement with his ideas.

The "Manchester Courier."

One of the sanest books on international politics of the day, and one that cannot be passed over. . . . The subject is discussed with an ability, precision, and originality that are quite unusual.

The "Nottingham Daily Guardian."

Argument so ably conducted. . . . Expresses himself so clearly that it is impossible to withhold one's appreciation for the manner in which the work is done.

The "Eastern Morning News."

The author boldly challenges a universal theory, and declares it to be based upon a pure optical illusion. He sets out to prove that military and political power give a nation no commercial advantage; that it is an economic impossibility for one nation to seize or destroy the wealth of another, or for one nation to enrich itself by subjugating another. He establishes this apparent paradox.

The "Clarion."

One thing is certain, that this view of the question is almost universally ignored. . . . It may be patent to a few leading financiers and traders, but knowledge of the true condition of affairs is lacking amongst the general public. . . . This argument does not depend upon Exeter Hall platitudes about the beauties of Peace. It depends on self-interest. . . . If Mr. Angell's suggestive arguments are well founded, and I think his chief argument, at any rate, is, Europe is really the victim of a terrible illusion. We are burning witches when there is no such thing as a witch. We are using the catchwords and phrases and shibboleths of an age which is passing, if it has not already passed.

The "Christian Age."

An able plea for a complete revision of certain political ideas in the light of modern facts.

The "Methodist Recorder."

Has much to say that deserves consideration.

The "Sheffield Daily Telegraph."

A thoughtful treatise.

2s. 6d. SIMPKIN MARSHALL, LONDON.

The Strange Disappearance of a Baronet—

an eerie and whimsical story by ALGERNON BLACKWOOD
—will appear in this week's issue of

The Saturday Westminster,

which will be a SPECIAL LITERARY NUMBER enlarged to TWENTY PAGES.

Other Special Contributions to the issue will be

THE NEXT DOOR BABY: by Mrs. Neish.
FOREIGN AFFAIRS: by G. A. B. Dewar.
AN AMUSING STUDY BY "SAKI."

And in addition there will be

Special Articles on Christmas and Gift Books,
Reviews of the Season's Books, F. C. G.'s
Cartoons, and all the usual features.

'Saturday Westminster,' November 27th.

OFFICES: Salisbury Square, Fleet Street, E.C.

the presence of a hostile one might breed uneasiness, if not suspicion, in the mind of an animal." However this may be, Mr. Wright has been very successful in observing bears when off their guard, and his accounts of their behavior in different circumstances are most entertaining. Judging from Mr. Wright's observations, many of the tales current about the grizzly bear must be regarded as fictions. He hardly ever attacks man unless when compelled, and he rarely hugs his opponent. None the less, he is a formidable antagonist, as is proved by several stories in the present volume.

* * *

"THE boy has genuine ability, which he declines to use in the smallest degree. An abnormal proficiency at games has apparently destroyed all desire in him to realise the more serious issues of life." This was the school report on "Mike" (Black, 3s. 6d.), after a two years' sojourn at Wrykyn; it is the key also to the character of the story set forth in Mr. P. G. Wodehouse's latest volume. It is less a school story than a school cricket story. The triumphs and defeats, the necessary rivalries, the inevitable jealousies, the friendships and enmities of the noble game, are all illustrated with a wealth of detail. At the end of the first innings, so to speak, Mike is removed from Wrykyn to Sedleigh, where the atmosphere is at first a little less crickety. But in due course the hero raises Sedleigh's tone in this respect, and the book ends triumphantly with "Wrykyn v. Sedleigh." Mike, of course, is a type we have all met. Most of the other types are old familiar friends. One or two of them, such as Psmith—a kind of dandified Stalky—are occasionally amusing, when they are not bowling, batting, or fielding. But there is not one that we should miss from this panoramic cricket match as presented by its vivacious and enthusiastic author.

* * *

To the older boy, the boy who has begun to appreciate the value of atmosphere in a story, we can cordially recommend "My Lady Bellamy," by Miss Dorothea Moore (Nisbet, 5s.). The period in that of William of Orange, and the adventures narrated are those of Sir Gervase Bellamy, an Irish Jacobite, and the little girl, Henrietta, with whom, prior to the opening of the story, he had contracted a whimsical but binding marriage. Henrietta, who lodges with a scolding aunt, is the means of saving her grown-up husband from a plot, hatched by political opponents at the aunt's house, to arrest him, and she thenceforth becomes the partner of Sir Gervase's wanderings through Scotland, which culminate in his capture and detention in Edinburgh. Lady Bellamy, however, contrives to get to London and forestall her husband's enemies in obtaining the King's ear, with the result that a royal pardon is obtained, coupled with six years' leave of absence for Sir Gervase, at the end of which her ladyship will be able to take up the duties of married life in earnest. Of her child heroine the author has made a delightful and thoroughly consistent study, and the vein of delicate and tender romance in her relationship with Sir Gervase is preserved throughout—an antidote, as it were, to the sinister atmosphere of strife, intrigue, and treachery in which this oddly-mated pair move.

* * *

"SEEING THE WORLD" (Wells, Gardner, 5s.), by Ascott R. Hope, is concerned with the adventures of a young Tyrolese goat-herd, who, after tramping through Europe, is rescued in London by his sister, a member of a troupe of Tyrolese singers and dancers, performing at Earl's Court. The story is pleasantly told, and the adventures do not strain credulity too far.—Another adventure story is "Chillagoe Charlie" (Unwin, 5s.), by Mr. Robert M. Macdonald. The hero assumes the character of Chillagoe Charlie, a desperado wanted by the police of Northern Queensland, performs a number of notable actions in the service of the miners, and finally discloses his identity. As in another book of Mr. Macdonald's noticed elsewhere, there is plenty of revolver shooting.—"The Man From the Moon" (Richards, 6s.), by Mr. Philip Carmichael, is intended for younger children, and is one of the crowd of books called into existence by "Alice in Wonderland." That Mr. Carmichael is no rival to Lewis Carroll does not prevent his book from being, on the whole, a successful example of the genre. There are a number of good illustrations by Mr. Frank Watkins.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning, Dec. 3.	Price Friday morning, Dec. 10.
Consols 2½ per cent.	82½	82½
German Threes	83½	84
Peru Pref.	35½	36½
Buenos Ayres Pacific	92	91½
Steel Common	89½	94½
London Omnibus	17½	20½

POLITICS have not been quite the only subject of conversation in the City, though they are still exercising its attention, and its wit, in a manner that is not good for business. Financial affairs have been more interesting in themselves, and both Lombard Street and Capel Court have been able to spare a little time for their own concerns. In the first place, Bank rate has come down. Bill brokers, and other dealers in credit who live on a supply of cheap money, have for some time been maintaining that the retention of the official rate at 5 per cent. was penalising trade and business to no purpose. The Bank's position had been improved into one of great strength by the rapid increase in its reserve during November, and there seemed to be no reason why the many borrowers who base their contracts on Bank rate should still have to pay excessive prices for their loans. This clamor has been all the louder since the Bank, by lowering the price that it was prepared to pay for gold, had practically intimated that it was not very eager to build up its reserve still further. On Thursday the Bank recognised the force of their critics' contentions by lowering its rate to 4½ per cent. This action came rather as a surprise, however, for the movement, which might well have been made a fortnight ago, was more questionable now, since it was known that a large number of sovereigns was being withdrawn from Argentina, with more to follow.

HOME RAILWAYS AND HOME TRADE.

In the stock markets, Home Railway stocks have come into favor with a rush and have soared upwards under the influence of investment buying, speculative buying, and a stampede of bears for cover. The fact is that the trade of the country is behaving in a highly unpatriotic manner. After all that the Tariff Reformers have told us of the doom of our moribund industries, here are these frigid and calculating Board of Trade returns chronicling, month after month, a great increase in commercial activity. The November returns were quite scandalously good, showing, with almost brazen effrontery, that the greater part of the big increase in our export trade was contributed by manufactured articles. The traffic returns of the Home Railway companies are equally impudent, with a steady and rapid increase in the volume of goods handled, and some improvement in passenger receipts. Then comes the Railway Commissioners' decision allowing the railway companies to charge more for carrying coal. Trade prospects are admitted to be excellent, and that lamentable lack of confidence in the Government, concerning which we have heard so much from gentlemen whose interests are purely financial, does not appear to affect the genuine commercial classes.

THE LAW GUARANTEE SOCIETY.

Another sensation of the week was a report, published last Saturday by the "Financial News," by the chairman of the Law Guarantee, Trust, and Accident Society on its position, showing an estimated loss of a million and a half. The company's misfortunes appear to be due to depreciation in certain kinds of property. It guaranteed mortgages, especially on properties such as residential flats, hotels, public-houses, and also on buildings in course of erection. Properties of this kind are, of course, especially difficult to value, and a loan on them which may seem, at the time when it is entered into, to be amply secured, may easily within a very short time be found to have little behind it but unsaleable bricks and mortar, merely because a neighborhood has been overbuilt, or a change of fashion has driven folk further afield, or into places that have a cheaper train service or are better supplied with local music-halls. Mr. Harris is rather severe on the former management of the society, which seems, in his view, to have been conducted according to legal formulas rather than business principles, and the prospect for the unfortunate shareholders is gloomy enough.

JANUS.

After the theatre

After the theatre, with its pleasant excitement, its warmth and glow: after the theatre—the chill!

Sometimes the chill is hardly noticed; so don't leave the chill to chance, and the checking till too late.

Chills are checked at once by taking a hot

Mustard Bath

—a bath to which a couple of table-spoonfuls or so of COLMAN'S MUSTARD have been added. Try it yourself.

Colman's mustard

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£12 12s. OPORTO, GIBRALTAR, TANGIER, ALGIERS
PALERMO, February 15th.

£26 5s. PALESTINE, EGYPT, CONSTANTINOPLE, GREECE
March 3rd.

Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

£7 7s. —SKIING, SKATING, TOBOGGANNING
TOURS, including Second-Class Return Ticket
and Accommodation Hotel Aubepine, Ballaigues. Also Hotels at Mantana, Villars. St. Beatenberg, Wengen, Lenzerheide, etc.—
Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, S.W.

THE NEW ENGLISH ART CLUB.
42nd EXHIBITION OF MODERN PICTURES
at the Galleries of the R. B. A., Suffolk Street, Pall Mall, S.W.
Open Daily, from 10 to 6. Admission 1s.

CHARITIES.

ORPHAN WORKING SCHOOL AND ALEXANDRA ORPHANAGE. Founded 1758

Patron: H.M. THE KING.

President: H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.G.

Treasurer: SIR HORACE B. MARSHALL, LL.D., J.P., ALD.

Bankers: London Joint Stock Bank Ltd., Princes-street, E.C.

SUPPORTED BY VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTIONS
FOR OVER 150 YEARS.

500 Fatherless Children Maintained and Educated.

HELP URGENTLY NEEDED.

Subscriptions and Donations will be thankfully received and all information given by ALEXANDER GRANT, Secretary.

Offices: 73, CHEAPSIDE, LONDON, E.C.

MAKERS TO HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

A cocoa that is appreciated
and enjoyed,
because of its pleasing flavour
is

Rowntree's Cocoa

It is delicious!

LONDON LIBRARY SUBJECT INDEX

NOW READY, PRICE 31s. 6d. NET.

"Considering the vast mass of literature that it covers, its completeness of reference and the services it will offer to readers of all classes, it will be judged as a work having no rival."—MR. FREDERIC HARRISON, in the Times Literary Supplement.

"The Subject Index to the London Library is a work beyond all praise."—Daily Chronicle.

"Its value as a book of reference could hardly be exaggerated, and is by no means limited to the members of the London Library."—Spectator.

"This Index will have a signal educational value. There never was a piece of work better worth doing, or, I think, better done."—DR. WARD, Master of Peterhouse, Cambridge.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

THE LONDON JOINT STOCK BANK, LIMITED.

Notice is hereby given that the Rate of Interest allowed at the Head Office and London Branches of this Bank, on Deposits subject to seven days' notice of withdrawal, is this day reduced to 3 per cent. per annum.

CHARLES GOW, General Manager,

5, Princes Street, Mansion House. 9th December, 1909.

THE INDEX TO VOLUMES I.—V. OF THE NATION

may be had free on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School. G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Spring Term commences January 14th.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.
BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS,
Near Birmingham.

BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines Thorough Education with individual care and character training Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Recreations provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,
STAFFORDSHIRE.

503 feet above Sea Level.

Headmaster—R. L. AGER, M.A. (Rugby and Corpus Christi College, Oxford).

FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.

SESAME HOUSE for Home-life Training and for Training of Children Lady Nurses and Kindergartners.—For full particulars apply, the Principals Miss Emily East, 43A, Acacia Road, London, N.W.

ROYAL HOLLOWAY COLLEGE.

(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.)

The LENT TERM BEGINS on JANUARY 14th, 1910. The College prepares Students for the London Degrees in Science and Arts.

TWELVE ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, from £50 to £60 a year, on a certain number of Bursaries of not more than £50, tenable for three years, will be offered for COMPETITION in June, 1910.

Inclusive fee £100 a year.

For further particulars, apply to the SECRETARY, Royal Holloway College, Englefield Green, Surrey.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Healthy outdoor life, combined with thorough education on modern lines. Usual curriculum, including citizenship course, extension lectures, &c. Preparation when required for University and other careers. Handicrafts, gardening, riding, nature study, archaeology, &c.

Principal: Miss AMY KEMP.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL.

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education Cantab.)

Preparation for Universities.

Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

The Spring Term begins on January 18th.

For prospectus, etc., apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

CHANTRY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class, Tripos, Camb.)
Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK.
K. M. ELLIS.

ESTATE AGENTS.

CROHAM PARK ESTATE,
SOUTH CROYDON.

Healthy and Beautiful situation. Croham Hurst, Addington & Shirley Hills, & other lovely contiguous country.

ATTRACTIVE HOUSES.

Freehold from 1,000 guineas. Tennis Lawns, Motor-houses, & Stabling, four railway stations, 30 minutes from London.

Douglas Young and Co.,

Land Agents and Surveyors,
Office on Estate, and
61, Coleman Street, Bank, E.C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

BOOKSELLERS.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

BIBLES,
PRAYER
BOOKS, &c.

THE LARGEST SELECTION OF
OXFORD AND OTHER EDITIONS
FOR LECTERN, READING DESK, AND PRIVATE USE.

ILLUSTRATED PRIZE BIBLES.
PRAYER BOOKS from 1s. &c.

New Lists now ready, sent Post-Free.

Tel. No. THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,
Central 329 53, Paternoster Row, E.C.

GLAISHER'S DECEMBER CATALOGUES
OF PUBLISHER'S REMAINDERS AND BOOKS
FOR BOYS AND GIRLS

are now ready, and will be sent post free on application.

These TWO CATALOGUES include many ENTIRELY NEW REMAINDERS in General Literature; also a large and wide selection of well-illustrated and attractive books for the young, suitable for Christmas Presents.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., Remainder and Discount Bookseller
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

“PYRENO”

(REGISTERED).

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR.

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it

WILL BE REPLACED.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading,
Billiard and Smoking Rooms.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) Single from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."LONDON.WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71 Euston Square, W.C.AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderate

SILVER HOW.. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL. Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL 120 rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCs.

CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone 3032 Royal, 3 wiresLLANDUDNO.

The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab.. centre of Prom., facing sea

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

The Daily News

YEAR BOOK.

PREFACE BY

The Rt. Hon. D. Lloyd George.

ON SALE EVERYWHERE.

Price 6d. net.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LYNTON (Devon).

ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.

RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL. Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL Rhondda Tel No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

SOUTHPORT.KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St.. Band and Illuminations. Turkish Electric. Hydropathic. &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons. Aft'noon Teas. Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s per day. Tel. 422.

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel 506. J. Hough. Prop

ALBERT HOTEL. Ordinary daily. Sunday Table d'Hôte. H. E. Taylor

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs T Newbitt

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION
Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME. 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION
PUBLISHING Co. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

BEAUTIFUL BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS.

"In the highest civilisation the book is still the highest delight."—EMERSON.

MESSRS.

J.M.Dent & Son's Christmas Catalogue

OF

BEAUTIFUL BOOKS

Eminently Suitable for Gifts and Presentation,

IS NOW READY,

And everyone desirous of selecting some of these

LITERARY TREASURES

Should apply for a copy without further delay.

It is only possible to mention a few of the many choice Books in this List. These embrace the following:—

ART : Rackham's remarkable Illustrations to Gulliver's Travels and Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare; Hogarth's Marriage a la Mode, Morte d'Arthur, and many other beautiful Art Books.

BIOGRAPHY : Beethoven's Letters ; Life of John Hus, and other important Biographical Works.

ESSAYS : Illustrated English Essays and Others.

OUTDOOR—DELIGHTFUL BOOKS ON GARDENS AND NATURE, including Garden Colour, Trees and Shrubs of the British Isles, Nature Stalking for Boys, &c.

HISTORY : Francesco Petrarca, and further important Historical Works.

POETRY AND DRAMA : Homer and the Iliad ; Milton's Comus ; The Temple Shakespeare ; The Temple Moliere, &c.

STANDARD AUTHORS: A Comprehensive Collection of these Masterpieces containing Novels of Jane Austen, C. E. Brock's delightful old-world illustrations, Honore De Balzac, The Brontes, Charles and Mary Lamb, Thackeray, Dumas, Charles Dickens, Scott, Sterne, Fielding, Ruskin, &c.

TRAVEL AND TYPOGRAPHY: Beautiful Books on Italy, France and other countries, including the WELL-KNOWN Mediaeval Town Series.

Le Classique Francais, Everyman's Library, English Idylls, and Books for Young People are also included.

APPLY FOR HANDSOME CHRISTMAS CATALOGUE AT ONCE.

J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD., 29, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 12.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1909.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 481	Making the Foreigner Pay. By A. Grimshaw Haywood ... 500
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	Sheridan. By Walter Sichel and The Reviewer of Mr. Sichel's "Sheridan" ... 501
The Massing of the Grand Army ... 484	POETRY:—
Redress Before Supply ... 485	The Revolutionist: or, Lines to a Statesman. By G. K. Chesterton ... 501
Mr. Balfour on Security ... 486	REVIEWS:—
A Step to Anglo-German Peace 487	Tragic Life ... 502
Scaring Capital Abroad ... 488	The Character of Atterbury ... 503
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	The Earlier Wesley ... 504
"Society" and the Budget ... 490	Alive or Dead? ... 505
The Motive Force of War ... 490	Time and Clocks ... 506
The Power of Deception ... 492	The Happy Ending ... 508
The Essential Self ... 493	BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
SHORT STUDIES:—	A Military Consul in Turkey... 510
Ode on a Distant Prospect of Fleet Street. By Ephemerus 494	Masques and Phases ... 510
THE DRAMA:—	Madame, Mother of the Regent 510
"The Blue Bird" and "Blanco Posnet." By William Archer 496	Bosnia and Herzegovina ... 510
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—	Men and Manners of Old Florence ... 512
The Character of the Indian Police. By Frederic Mackarness, M.P. ... 497	The Gilded Beauties of the Second Empire ... 512
The Premier and the Franchise By H. N. Brailsford ... 497	THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By Janus ... 512
The Ultimate Basis of Authority. By John Massie, M.P., Bernard Houghton, and T. Wilson... 498

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

ON Friday week the Prime Minister delivered, to an enormous gathering in the Albert Hall, representing the flower of working Liberalism all over the country, a bold, explicit, and deeply impressive statement of the party's unalterable policy on the veto. Declaring that at the last dissolution the Liberal Government reckoned without their host, and that they would never make that mistake again, he described their "single task" to be to "vindicate and to establish upon an unshakable foundation the principle of representative government." He proceeded to make two incidental declarations on women's suffrage and Home Rule. The first question he opened to the full view of the new Parliament, saying that the Government had no desire to burke it, and repeating his offer to make a suffrage amendment to a Reform Bill an "open question." On Home Rule he went further still, stating that the only remedy for Irish discontent was "a system of full self-government," subject to the supreme authority of the Imperial Parliament, and adding that the coming House would have full liberty to apply it.

MR. ASQUITH then returned to the question of the Lords. He defined the claims of the Peers to be, first, to control the levying of taxation; secondly, to compel a dissolution of the Commons; and, thirdly, to make and unmake the Executive Government. All these "revolutionary pretensions" the Government would withstand. They would, therefore, ask the electorate to place on the Statute-book a law forbidding the Lords to "meddle, in any way, to any degree, or for any purpose, with our national finance," and, secondly, the time for "unwritten conventions" having gone by, to decree that the absolute veto should go. The House of Commons must have the power not only of debating but of making laws, and the will of the people must prevail within the limits of a single Parliament.

OR equal importance was the Prime Minister's statement of the general line of Liberal action and strategy after winning the General Election. The audience were roused to a great state of enthusiasm when he declared that neither he nor any other Liberal Minister would again submit to the rebuffs and humiliations of the last four years. He added these momentous words: "We shall not assume office, and we shall not hold office, unless we can secure safeguards which experience shows to be necessary for the legislative utility and honor of the party of progress." On these inevitable lines, therefore, the Liberal Party takes its stand. For the rest, Mr. Asquith declared for Second Chamber Government and for Shorter Parliaments, using language which, thirty years ago, every Constitutionalist would endorse, and which is, in fact, embodied in all our constitutional manuals. He defined the proper powers of the Lords as those of "revision," "amendment," "fuller deliberation," and, subject to safeguards, "delay." This, in fact, establishes the subordination of the non-representative to the representative principle, which, unless Great Britain is to be plunged into revolution, must be the form of its future government.

ON Saturday, Mr. Balfour issued, in the form of an Election Address to the City of London, a long "manifesto" which, as Mr. Churchill wittily said, manifests nothing. In a languid and interminable essay, occupying the best part of three columns of the "Times," the Tory leader devotes just fourteen lines to the exposition, if that be a fitting word, of "Tariff Reform," which he conventionally describes as the first plank in his platform. This makes about a thirtieth of his address; the other twenty-nine thirtieths he divides among a defence of the Lords, an attack on the House of Commons, and a labored hint at the policy of landownership. He accuses the Liberal Party of what he calls a "long-drawn conspiracy" to pass their own bills, and to bring about a second "single-Chamber plot" by discrediting the House which rejected them. While admitting that the House of Lords is improvable, he affirms its constitutional right to "appeal" to the people on finance, and suggests that it is enough for the representative Assembly to determine the political complexion of the Government, to control the estimates, to initiate taxation, and to dominate legislation. It will be observed that under the claim of the Lords not one of these powers remains intact or effective. Mr. Balfour hints obscurely at some change in the Poor Law, but whether in the direction of the Majority or the Minority report of the Commission he does not say. On Tariff Reform he suggests vaguely that it may help us to protect markets, modify commercial treaties, obtain Colonial preferences, and increase the demand for labor. On other aspects of Tariff Reform, he concludes, "I will here say nothing."

ON Thursday Mr. Lloyd George addressed a powerful and thoroughly representative gathering of Free

Churchmen in Queen's Hall on the special issues of the election in which Nonconformists are interested. Replying to Lord Curzon's quotation of Renan that civilisation depended on aristocracy, Mr. George suggested that the Carpenter's Son of Nazareth might have had more to do with it. He recalled the great political act of the Puritans which made our first English Revolution—an act, due, as the Chancellor said, to a grievance on Supply. The House of Lords was hostile on all Nonconformist questions: not one Bill in which Nonconformists were directly interested had it ever favored. It was a vital question for the Church whether she or the drink trade was to be the stronger social and political force; if the condition of the people in its least hopeful aspects were unrelieved, the responsibility would lie on her altars and on the heads of those who bowed before them.—On the same day Mr. Chamberlain issued a kind of manifesto, in the shape of a preface to a book of Mr. Garvin's, in which he tries to do for Tariff Reform what Mr. Balfour declines to do. He suggests it as "the only alternative to the Budget," and declares that the Liberal policy virtually abolishes the Second Chamber, "in disregard of the experience of our own flesh and blood."

* * *

WE cannot chronicle all the election speeches, though we advise men to read the moderate and searching series of addresses which Sir Edward Grey has addressed to his constituency, in Scotland and in the North of England. On the Opposition side, the wild Peers have been let loose for their promised campaign, and they are likely to supply the comic relief of this grave election. Some, like Lord Harris and Lord Kesteven, fail to get a hearing, and others, like Lord Newton, defend an ideal House of Lords by declaring that the present body is indefensible. The most pertinent of interruptions appears to have been addressed to Lord Donoughmore, who, like other enemies of the Budget, talks, not of the land taxes which he hates, but of the tobacco tax, which he thinks the people hate. To his attack on the tobacco tax, a voice replied, "We don't mind a bit extra, if you pay your share." This appears to us to condense the popular and thoroughly truthful view of the Budget.

* * *

THE only intellectual defence of the Peers has been made by Lord Curzon, whose speech at Oldham will certainly be the main text of the Liberal attack. It was an out-and-out defence of the hereditary principle, which, said Lord Curzon, was "familiar and acceptable" in every branch and aspect of our life. He argued that the House of Lords was not only equal to the House of Commons, but morally, intellectually, and constitutionally superior to it. The House of Commons was "subject to great changes," "gusts of passion swept over it," and the electors, after all, only amounted to seven and a-half millions of people. Meanwhile, the House of Lords represented the "steady, immutable, stable factor" in the national sentiment and national judgment. It represented the national life "from generation to generation," it was neither "driven by caucuses," nor "bound by pledges." True, it contained no workmen, but it was full of generals, field marshals, and governors, and it was cant of the Liberals to call it our "effete oligarchy," as since 1830 they had created more Peers than the Tories. If the Liberals carried their plans, the teeth of the Lords would be drawn. "We can then," says Lord Curzon, "only nibble at the legislation of the future with our toothless gums." This is precisely the table which the Peers have spread for themselves.

THE electoral campaign continues to go magnificently for the House of Commons. Mr. Redmond has issued a Manifesto in favor of the Government, and some of the three-cornered contests between Liberal and Labor candidates, such as those in Leeds and in South Wales, have been averted, largely by the pressure of the leaders of the Labor Party. The chief source of trouble remains in the North-east corner of England, and in the West of Scotland, where the claims of the miners have yet to be adjusted to those of the Liberal candidates. One or two transactions in the way of exchange of seats would settle most of these difficulties, and we cannot help thinking that, if the local Liberals would appoint, say, the Chancellor of the Exchequer as an arbitrator, a settlement could be arrived at, which, even with their fixed and tight-bound constitution, the Labor Party might accept. The general reports are splendid, especially from the North, where Liberals talk not only of holding seats but of winning them.

* * *

KING LEOPOLD THE SECOND OF BELGIUM died on Thursday night, aged seventy-four, under circumstances not more scandalous than his life. It is hard to speak of a man as destitute of virtue, but King Leopold's character was singularly remote even from the amiability which is supposed to soften vice. Intellectually he was not to be despised. He inherited his father's masterful temper, and he had qualities which would have made him a millionaire even if he had not also been a monarch. Speculator and gambler as he was, he invested with great shrewdness, especially when he dealt in flesh and blood. His family life was not less odious than his public acts. The story of the Congo State stamped the one, all Europe was a witness of the harshness and licence of the other. History has known no more tragic comedy than his appointment as the mandatory of Europe for the development of civilisation on the Congo, and the later efforts of Europe to save the Congo from her mandataire. Such a career could only be described adequately out of the pages of Gibbon or Tacitus. But it ended in the peace which a calculating brain secured, as well as in a mixed atmosphere of avarice and splendor. Few worse men ever wore a crown; many better, even in our own time, lost it in exile or at the hand of the assassin.

* * *

THE new German Chancellor has made his début with a very quiet and sensible speech in the Reichstag which has already produced the happiest impression abroad. His references to Franco-German economic co-operation in Morocco have been very well received in Paris, and to Alsace he has promised certain concessions. That is an appeal not merely to the pockets of French financiers, but directly to French sentiment. His approach to ourselves was so frank and handsome that only our absorption in a constitutional crisis can excuse the scant notice it has received. He desires, he states, a rapprochement with Great Britain, which could best be brought about by a solution of pending questions. This is, we presume, a reply, and a most satisfactory reply, to the single pregnant sentence in Mr. Asquith's Guildhall speech. The hint has been accepted and followed up by a public invitation. To the nature and subject of the proposed negotiations no clue is yet given. There have been negotiations about the Congo and Central Africa. It is now known that Sir Ernest Cassel is in Berlin to resume the discussion of Anglo-German co-operation in the Bagdad railway which Mr. Balfour dropped. Any beginning is good, and we have always held that the Bagdad railway was a particularly suitable ground for common action. The negotiations can hardly even begin without checking the worst tendencies of the naval rivalry, nor go far without producing the temper in which an arrangement may become possible.

* * *

THE third of the three great treason trials in which the Serb race has stood accused of more or less disgraceful conspiracy has passed through several dramatic moments during the week. There was no justice to be had or hoped for at Cettigne or Agram, but at Vienna the procedure is scrupulous and the jury may be fair. Professor Friedjung, one of the foremost historians and stylists who use the German tongue, came forward during the late Balkan crisis as an academic exponent of Baron von Aerenthal's policy. He accused Servia of engineering a vast plot against Austria chiefly among the Serbs and Croats of Croatia. With the editor of the "Reichspost" he published a series of documents which purported to be minutes of the secret meetings of the "Slovensky Jug," a Pan-Serb organisation, originally composed of students, which had its centre, ostensibly for literary work, in Belgrade. If the documents were genuine they would have convicted the leaders of the Croats of complicity in a dangerous plot for a general rising, and incidentally of accepting bribes and subsidies from Belgrade. Other documents, if genuine, must have been stolen from the Servian official correspondence.

* * *

THE course of this trial, in which the Serbo-Croatian leaders sue Dr. Friedjung for libel, so far goes to suggest that the whole conspiracy rests on elaborate forgery. The originals of the documents cannot be produced nor the man who divulged them traced. They are signed by a Belgrade Professor Markovitch. He has put himself voluntarily in the lion's mouth, and brought forward an alibi to the effect that at the time when he was said to have presided over these plotters' meetings in Belgrade, he was really at an academic conference among German professors in Charlottenburg. If enquiry corroborates this statement—and it is so detailed that one cannot doubt it—the whole basis of Dr. Friedjung's exposure of Servian policy is destroyed. An ugly episode was caused by the statement under oath of an ex-official, Baron Chlumecky, that he had himself repeatedly bribed M. Supilo, the Croatian Parliamentary leader, in such grotesquely small sums as ten florins at a time. M. Supilo's followers stand by him staunchly, and this accusation like the rest may ultimately recoil on those who made it. The whole atmosphere of intrigue is fetid. But at present the Austrian secret police fares worse than the Servian "plotters."

* * *

EVENTS move slowly in the Nicaraguan crisis. But clearly Mr. Taft is anxious to impress on his party that if his administration is likely to be tame at home it will be enterprising abroad. In an address on a ceremonial occasion he boldly declared that Washington's doctrines of foreign policy are obsolete. They didn't know everything down in Judee. "Now we are a nation with tremendous power and wealth." The power is to be used, as commonly happens in this world, to increase the wealth. There are signs that a decision to smash President Zelaya has been taken. He has given no fresh cause of offence; no more American "volunteers" have tried to blow up his transports. His new crime is success. There is no longer much doubt that if left to himself he will soon crush his rival, General Estrada, the American protégé.

THE Ottoman Chamber has passed this week through a peculiar and rather mysterious crisis, on which we hesitate to pronounce a judgment without knowing exactly what passed in the secrecy of lobbies and ante-rooms. Hilmi Pasha's Government had granted a concession to the venerable and powerful English Lynch Steamship Company, which allows it to absorb the Imperial Hamidieh Line, thus securing an effective, if not a legal, monopoly of the navigation of the Tigris and Euphrates. To the general surprise, this action was challenged by Halil Bey, the leader of the Committee majority in the House, on the ground that such concessions ought to be submitted for ratification to the Chamber. The principle seems entirely proper, and corresponds to our own practice in regard to railway amalgamations. Indeed, if the Government is to be irresponsible in granting such considerable concessions as this, a safeguard has been removed against a return to the jobbery of the past. Halil Bey carried his motion, but, despite his explanation that it was not intended to be a vote of no confidence, Hilmi Pasha, and later Djavid Bey, the Minister of Commerce (the latter one of the founders of the Committee), took a defiant line, told the House there was no time for such details, and bade it look for other Ministers if it insisted on this prerogative.

* * *

THE result was that Halil Bey proposed a fresh discussion of the question, and adjourned the debate, himself coming forward to propose a new motion on Monday to the effect that the fusion was desirable, and that such matters should be left to the Executive alone when no financial liability was involved. This second motion was carried with practical unanimity. We do not know whether to rejoice that Turkey has a strong Ministry or to regret that it has a weak Chamber. Meanwhile, it is satisfactory to note that twenty-six Moslems have at last been hanged for their share in the massacre of Adana, though few, if any, of them, we fear, were persons of real importance. It would have been better to hang two or three high officials than a score of their ignorant dupes.

* * *

WE much regret to read of the death of Mr. Frederick Greenwood, an event which leaves Lord Morley the only living representative of the great journalism of the 'sixties and 'seventies. Mr. Greenwood was truly described by George Meredith as having "a statesman's head," a large, sagacious, and well-tempered view of political and national life. His style was a model of firmness, strength, and good balance; neither cold nor hysterical. His Conservatism was Imperialist in tone, and strongly influenced by his personal ties with Disraeli and his revulsion from Gladstonian ideals. But it was not extravagant; the "Pall Mall Gazette" under his editorship was a great organ of widely-held opinion. Mr. Greenwood held aloof, in stern contempt, from the later developments of Mr. Balfour's sham leadership of Toryism, and Mr. Chamberlain's real control of it.—We may, without offence, join an expression of regret at Mr. Greenwood's death with a word of congratulation to Mr. Herbert Paul on his appointment as second Civil Service Commissioner. Mr. Paul, coming later than Mr. Greenwood's day, fitly carried on his tradition of scholarly writing, and sincere and consistently brilliant advocacy of a political faith. No man ever left Fleet Street with a more stainless record; or joined to continuous and arduous journalism an undiminished capacity for the most finished kind of literary and historical criticism.

Politics and Affairs.

THE MASSING OF THE GRAND ARMY.

WE rejoice to think that the massing of the Grand Army of Democracy, which alone can meet and beat the assault of the House of Lords on representative government, is to-day almost complete. The Nonconformists, obeying a call to action closely resembling that which first brought Puritanism into the field, have come into line as one man. The Irish Democracy, with Home Rule restored to its rightful place on the Liberal banners, has followed suit. The chiefs of the Labor Party, with a less closely disciplined following, are busily organising their ranks, so that this auxiliary force may bring its utmost power to bear upon the common enemy. On this point, the only difficult one in the situation, we should like our leaders to turn their attention to their own party, and we suggest that they could not follow a better model than that of the Liberal Two Hundred of Norwich. At a recent meeting of this body, it was unanimously decided to run only one Liberal candidate, and to leave the second seat to Labor. Now, in Norwich, as elsewhere, there have been acute, even bitter, conflicts between the Liberal and Labor parties. It was decided to put them absolutely aside, and to treat the Labor candidate as a comrade-in-arms in the battle for British liberties. This advice was tendered by the Liberal candidate, by all the party leaders, by the chief Nonconformist Minister, the veteran Dr. Barrett, and by Professor Stuart, the managing director of the great firm of Colman's. Not a voice or a hand was lifted against it. Liberal votes were asked for Mr. Roberts, the Labor member, as freely as for Sir Frederick Low, the Liberal candidate. We recognise that all questions of the choice of candidates and the distribution of seats between Liberalism and Labor are not as simple as those which present themselves in the two-member constituencies, and that here and there both personal and party claims may not be easy to settle. But we confess that as the Norwich example presents the high-water mark of politic good sense and local statesmanship, that of the Gateshead Liberals seems to us to exhibit the least rational standard. In this case, Mr. Johnson has of late become a Labor instead of a Liberal candidate. He is known to all men as of moderate opinions, which cannot be supposed to have changed on four-fifths or nine-tenths of the Liberal programme. Yet the Liberals who voted for him four years ago are now, in presence of the most urgent impulse to unity, disowning this excellent House of Commons' candidate and setting up a rival who can only give the seat away to the champion of the House of Lords. It seems to us that such self-defeating action must disappear as soon as the full current of sympathy and co-operation is set flowing, and both sides recognise, as the Reformers of 1832 and the French Republicans of 1877 recognised, the presence of a supreme necessity. On the issue of this fight hangs the fate of representative democracy, first in this country and then all over Europe. If the House of Commons goes down, there is an end not only of Free Trade and of democratic finance, but of those elementary powers that every constitutional writer who set pen to paper has recognised as the inalienable birthright of our people. With the loss of the power of the purse, all goes. Every Progressive Ministry is doomed from its birth—intimidated in its first hour, craftily watched till its popularity begins to fail, never sure of passing a single Bill or Budget, or daring to go beyond a paltry juggling with taxes on approved Conservative lines, and finally sent hurtling to a dissolution whenever "society" thinks it can resume the overt direction of Great Britain. This and no other is the prize for which the Lords have staked their existence; seeking to "refer" one Budget, in the hope of destroying all Budgets, and of catching the people in the pleasant lure of a plébiscite, in order to bind them fast with the chains forged by rank and power.

Now, this is not merely the character and meaning which Liberals assign to the struggle; it is that assumed by Lord Curzon, the true leader, with Lord Milner, of the Lords' coup d'état. Lord Curzon goes down to Lancashire to ask the people who, on an historic occasion, established one of the proudest pleas for representative democracy ever recorded, to lay their freedom at the feet of the hereditary peers. When nine out of ten, or, perhaps, nineteen out of twenty, of Lord Curzon's class hailed the birth of a Slave State, working-class Lancashire, which lived on the cotton of the South, declared for a free and a united America. Lord Curzon does not trust this impulsive type of politician. He waves aside the paltry "seven and a-half million" voters—Tories, Liberals, and Labor men—who once in five or six years obtrude their misguided wills on the "steady, immutable, stable factor" that "from generation to generation" saves this favored people from itself. He opposes to the masses—susceptible as they are to emotion, sympathy, the love of change, in a word, to all that makes men brothers and citizens of a living community—an appointed order of super-men. These demi-gods are not "threatened by gusts." Their Olympian calm is not "pestered by crochet-mongers"—(Curzonese for reformers). Best of all they are not "bound to pledges," for they are responsible to themselves alone. Mentally comparing these imperturbable beings with their own "violent oscillations" and heady "gusts of passion" the common herd of men must sink to rest, owning their masters—the unfettered, uncaucussed, stern, strong élite of the land.

Now, it is not necessary to deal with Lord Curzon's argument. This appears to be that because some sons—a very few—inherit their fathers' talent for public life, therefore all peers' sons inherit the capacity to make laws for us, descending, we suppose, in unbroken line through an ancestor's original gift either for making laws or for breaking the Commandments. But the point is that we have here proclaimed, without equivocation or limit, the doctrine of the subordination of the House of Commons to the House of Lords. Such a doctrine is an insolent attack on the whole body of voters, Conservative no less than Liberal, and therefore calls for the exclusion from the House of Commons of every candidate at this election who joins Lord Curzon's conspiracy against it. There is an avowed attempt to crush Free Trade, to force Protection on the people through the refusal of the Lords to pass the fixed and only alternative to food taxes, and to create a high Imperial Senate, fortified by fresh accessions from the ranks of the rich and the powerful, especially of men whose experience of government has been gained in the unfree parts of the Empire. Lord Curzon admitted that the House of Lords contained no representatives of hand labor. He might have added that it included no champion of Nonconformity and no spokesman of the middle-classes. But he comforted himself with the thought that it had plenty of generals, field-m Marshals, and proconsuls. Now, to put such a House in command of the Commons, even on taxes, is no less a revolution than Charles I. contemplated, and like its spiritual ancestor it can only succeed at the cost of civil war. Its complete defeat in its early stages is, therefore, an object of high policy, equally desirable in the interests of the Crown, the Commons, and the people. But that defeat can only be obtained by extraordinary exertions, by the intelligent concentration of all friends of democracy on a common purpose, and by the unselfishness, the loyalty, and, if necessary, the temporary effacement of men on whom personal ambition makes a less urgent call than public need. If to-day party spirit knocks too loudly at the bosoms of Liberals or Labor men, remorse will knock louder still if by their act the House of Lords gets a single seat that can be saved from it. If our enemies count on Democracy being a weak, venal, dim-sighted thing, easily over-borne by the shallow cajolery of men like Lord Curzon, who serve up their hatred of the people without even troubling to add the accustomed sauce of flattery, our interest is urgent in claiming for the great principle of representative government all the moral and material power which we firmly attach to it.

REDRESS BEFORE SUPPLY.

UNIONIST papers have already begun to discount the victory of the Commons at the polls, and to advance arguments to justify the Lords in disregarding it. They assume that the verdict will be taken on the issue as defined by the Lords, that is, on the Budget; not as defined by the Commons, that is, on the veto, financial and legislative. They then conceive that the Lords will dutifully accept the verdict, pass the Budget, and settle down comfortably to the work of blocking all further Liberal legislation, and claiming at their leisure the dissolution of the coming Parliament. If the House of Commons should prove unexpectedly restive, and should seek to carry out the mandate of the electors by insisting on an anti-Veto Bill, they still have sanguine expectations of the result. The Commons' majority over the Lords' men is to be too small to carry through a great constitutional change. The Lords will throw out the Bill, the Commons will have no means of enforcing it, a second dissolution will be necessary, and the constituencies, wearied of the struggle, will return a majority for the Lords and for Tariff Reform. It is a pretty programme for the Peers, based on the assumption of hopeless irresolution and impotence on the part of the Commons and their leaders. We should have thought that Mr. Asquith's speech would have sufficiently shown that the enemy was not to reckon so confidently on these valuable aids. Mr. Asquith, who is nothing if not lucid, has made two points clear to the dullest apprehension. The first is that the Commons will deal with the questions both of the legislative and the financial veto by Act of Parliament. The second is that he and his colleagues are agreed to decline office unless they are assured of the means of giving effect to the will of the Commons. The question asked the electors is whether they agree to this programme, and if the House of Commons' party obtains a majority, be it small or great, it will be a majority in answer to that question, and yielding a mandate for the necessary constitutional change. Nor, we think, will the House of Lords have the opportunity of escaping the issue which they have raised by hurriedly passing the Budget into law. It is a time-honored maxim of the House of Commons that redress of grievances must precede supply. The present grievance is the constitutional usurpation of the House of Lords, and it follows that the measure for the restriction of the veto must be presented and passed before the Finance Bill becomes law. Finance has been, and still is, the lever by which the Commons maintains its right, and we hope, for our part, that not a penny of money will be voted until the historic right of the Commons over finance is legally assured, and along with it the reduction of the legislative veto from an absolute to a suspensory power. There is every sign that this issue will take precedence of all others in the minds of electors. Day by day it is doing what no other question of our time has been able to do. It is causing separate parties to withdraw their candidates, in order to concentrate on the one supreme question of the defence of British liberty. These sacrifices of party feeling will be mocked, this unanimity and enthusiasm will be cheated, if the mandate so secured to the Commons is not carried into effect in precedence of every other measure. The King will once again, when Parliament opens, address to "Gentlemen of the House of Commons" the annual request for supplies for the public service. The answer will be that the Commons will loyally and willingly vote them as soon as they have provided that this year his Majesty shall have no reason to regret that their care and liberality have been unavailing.

But how is this security to be obtained? Unionist writers, while assuming that the Lords will bow to the will of the people on the Budget and will graciously "allow" the Finance Bill to become law, apparently contemplate a very different attitude on the main question. The Bill for regulating the Veto must, they remind us, be passed with the assent of the Lords themselves. Do we expect, then, that the Lords will give their assent to the reduction of their own powers? If not, do we contemplate violent means of enforcing their assent? The reply is that we trust that good sense will prevail, but that when good sense fails the Constitution provides a means, cumbrous and most objectionable, no doubt, but still a peaceful and orderly means, of overcoming a deadlock. What is this means? Some authorities, particularly Mr. Swift McNeill, have contended for the ancient right of the Crown to withhold writs of summons from any peer at its pleasure. To do so would be a breach of constitutional usage, but to justify its being done in this instance the plea might be advanced that when usage is broken on one side it may be necessary to right matters by breaking it on another. By rejecting the Budget the Lords have invaded not merely the right of the Commons but the prerogative of the Crown, and no less an authority than Lord Courtney warned them in the debate that the prerogative of the Crown might be used to restrict their numbers, and that it would be useless to go to any Court of Law in the hope of exercising compulsion upon the Crown. To refuse writs of summons to those absent for two or for three years in the last Parliament would be a procedure which would undoubtedly command much moral support. Yet we do not think that this procedure can be relied on. The change now required in the Constitution must be made with the fullest possible formality. It must not be open to anyone hereafter to challenge it on the ground that the House of Lords which accepted it was an incomplete House. There must be no suspicion resting on its title. It has to be added that, even if the numbers of the Peers were restricted by any test of attendance, the anti-popular majority would remain, reduced in numbers, no doubt, and improved in average debating quality, but unchanged in mental attitude to the main question.

It follows that the hostile majority can only in the end be overcome by the method of 1832, that is to say, by a definite statement of the intention of the Government to create peers in numbers sufficient to carry the restriction of the veto. Unionists, having no other weapon, seek to cover this proposal with ridicule. The idea of 275 new peers, and, perhaps, more, dissolves them in laughter. In more solemn fashion "Historicus" in the "Times"—not by any means the "Historicus" that the world once knew—refers us to the precedents of Queen Anne's reign, and the outcry occasioned by the creation of twelve peers only for the purpose of securing a Ministerial majority. It is hardly for the defenders of the Lords on this occasion to cite precedents. It is we who are defending the Constitution and relying on its historic development. The grievance against Queen Anne's Government was that it altered the balance of the Constitution in favor of the Crown. What has happened to-day is that the Lords have altered the balance of the Constitution in their own favor, and have forced us to redress the balance on behalf of the people. "Historicus" might with advantage have gone on to recite the attempt of the Lords to limit the further creation of peers by the Crown, and its utter failure—a failure rightly taken as one of our constitutional landmarks. Returning to our present crisis, we may regret the necessity of flooding the Lords with new peers, partly because new peers soon become old ones and too often undergo a sea change. However, the case is not one of choice, but, if the Lords so will, of necessity, and the enlarged peerage will, by carrying out the very purpose for which the creations are made, destroy its own powers for mischief. We can only hope that the Lords will not decide to impose this necessity upon us, but that, having clearly grasped the situation, they will recognise that we have the will and the power to settle this issue, and will not compel us to resort to a means which, distasteful to all of us, must be pre-eminently distasteful to themselves.

MR. BALFOUR ON SECURITY.

It is evident from the terms of his Election Address that poor Mr. Balfour is bored to extinction by the political crisis. It must, indeed, be very tiresome for the philosophical mind of this ever-doubting metaphysician to concern itself with sordid matters in which it takes no interest, and to prepare an address to tickle the ears of the groundlings of the City. But it had to be done. Somebody must have reminded Mr. Balfour that two to three columns were expected of him, and he evidently dictated them with many intervals of yawning and wondering what on earth he was to say next. No one can read the result without feeling sorry for the author. It is not merely that it is difficult to read, and must have been ten times more difficult to write. But when a statesman, whose acquaintance with the practical facts of life is hazy, begins to somnambulise on paper, the results are inevitably astonishing to those who dwell in a less rarified atmosphere. Most of Mr. Balfour's constituents read his trumpet call with bewilderment. Some who worked really hard at it said unkind things, and people ought not to be unkind to Mr. Balfour. Perhaps the most extraordinary episode in his dream was his excursion into the United States, and his comparison between the security of property there and here, all in favor of America. At first sight the passage appears to be a mere imitation of the diatribes concerning the downfall of British credit, by means of which those who ought to have known better have reduced the markets in British securities to a state that is now causing them some uneasiness. So it was read by some superficial observers in the City, who pronounced it to be "a bull point for Yankees," and "up against Consols." But we prefer to believe that Mr. Balfour, even in his most political moments, would not allow himself to become so basely practical or so practically base. He had to say something. Somebody had told him about the American Constitution and the checks and devices that it has arranged in order to make party legislation difficult, and he was struck by the happy thought that this was an apt and original piece of padding for his Address. Consequently he solemnly sets forth that "in the United States of America it is a fundamental principle of the Constitution that all kinds of property shall be taxed alike, and that no one form shall be prejudiced by special taxation. That Constitution is not easily changed; and before a measure like the British Budget could be legally attempted, the consent must be obtained of a two-thirds majority in both Houses," and so on. "I do not," he continues, with playful irony, "ask that the British citizen should enjoy the same security for his property as the citizen of the United States. I am not so immoderate," and he draws the appropriate moral of the beneficence of the House of Lords in helping us to struggle after the ideal so firmly established in America.

False analogy is ever a dangerous weapon, and Mr. Balfour has perhaps been telling more truth than he knew of. It is certainly true that the American Constitution is not easily changed. It is even more true that it is constantly evaded. One of its principles is the equality of all men under the spread of its protecting pinions. How far this principle is carried out, the habitual treatment of its colored citizens can at all times abundantly testify. An American Professor, a man of most enlightened ideals, was puzzled not long ago by the coldness with which a gathering of English Radicals heard him tell how in America the young men "came around with shot guns" on polling days to stop the colored voters who wanted to exercise the franchise. How far the principle of the Constitution which lays down the equality of taxation is respected, can be seen by anyone who cares to wade through the schedules of the American tariff, or to remember the months of lobbying and intrigue by which one interest after another pressed its claims for special treatment by Congress, and schemed for the chance to batten on the unfortunate consumer. In England, where the insecurity of property gives Mr. Balfour so much concern, we do not hear of bands of marauding "night-riders" burning the stores and storehouses of traders and producers who had had the bad taste to prefer to remain outside a monopolist ring. These things were a picturesque feature of a recent dispute in the American tobacco trade. The thing that is really secure in America, so secure that it resists all the attempts of the law to dislodge it, is the monopoly of the Trusts. On this subject let us quote a few extracts from a work called the "Truth about the Trusts," by Mr. John Moody, a champion of their development. In reviewing the "So-called Remedies," he tells us that—"The first general Federal law which can be regarded as a result of the Trust agitation was the Inter-State Commerce Act passed in 1897. This Act was the outgrowth of the sentiment which had been created during the previous years by the general cutting of rates by the railroads, and their inequitable dealings with shippers in all parts of the country. The relations of the railroads with the Standard Oil Trust were matters of particular criticism at this time, and the immediate purpose of the Act was mainly to eliminate the illegal discriminations in favor of the Standard, and, if possible, give all shippers the same opportunities. . . . Its results have in no way verified the predictions of its framers. . . . As a regulator of railway rates, or as a factor in preventing the tendencies of railways to assume monopoly powers, it has been quite impotent."

"The measure, which was created in 1890, and is popularly known as the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, is the law which was passed for the express purpose of eliminating monopoly in railroads or other corporations. . . . As statistics show, nearly all the great Trusts, transportation and other, have been created since the passage of this anti-trust law, and in spite of it. . . . The weakness of all this legislation lies in the fact that while it pretends to aim at the 'regulation' of monopoly, it really never touches the monopoly."

These calm statements, written with evident satisfaction by a defender of the Trusts, are on the whole more eloquent than examples, of which American periodicals and literature are now so full, of the manner in which these Trusts and monopolies master the people of the States. If the law is powerless when it tries to stop their existence, its power to check their individual acts of rapacity must be even more futile. Such is the "security" enjoyed by individuals in America under the heel of these tyrants, who are protected by the impotence of the law, and the provisions of a tariff arranged in their interests. Mr. Balfour is not so immoderate as to hope for quite the same perfection here. But the tariff reform which he blesses, in a few frigid and calculating generalities, may do much to help us in the direction of the ideal that he admires. Whether it is equally admired by the business community of this country we doubt. The memory of the City is proverbially short, but it still remembers the "security" enjoyed by depositors in American banks two years ago, when a panic was produced by over-production and over-trading, largely fostered by the philanthropists who have so successfully established the Trusts. Banking in America was smirched, perhaps unfairly, by certain disclosures of the methods of high finance, and American citizens preferred for the time being to take care of their money for themselves. American bankers met the situation by calmly refusing to pay what they owed to their customers. For a time the whole country reverted to a condition of economic barbarism, in which the average daily convenience of a currency was denied to it. And after thus committing general bankruptcy, the banks paid very satisfactory dividends to their shareholders, gradually reopened their doors as the storm abated, and went on as if nothing had happened. Such are the blessings insured by the American Constitution to those who live under it. The result, as is sorrowfully admitted by Mr. Moody, the champion of the Trusts, is that "prominent men in business, journalism, and also in financial fields, are beginning quietly to admit that they are Fabian Socialists." Mr. Moody deplores this dangerous growth. Perhaps Mr. Balfour would do likewise if he heard of it.

A STEP TO ANGLO-GERMAN PEACE.

It is an unfortunate handicap upon the foreign policy of the two great nations of Anglo-Saxon descent that they have so often to apologise to the civilised world for the character of a portion of their Press. This country, in particular, has periodically to inform the Sovereign and people of Germany that, though it cannot protect them from gross, insulting, and wickedly provocative language by certain of our newspapers, they must not understand that prudent, authoritative, or ordinarily sensible Englishmen approve it or are influenced by it, because for shame's sake they say nothing about it. For this particular occasion, they might also be informed that nothing which the "Daily Mail" says or does is of larger consequence than pertains to a party trick or a business stroke, and that one or both of these devices are to be suspected now that a General Election is pending, and it is important for the defenders of a bad cause to make the public talk of anything else. If we must further refer to Mr. Blatchford's article accusing the German Government of a set design to destroy our Empire and invade our country, it is only needful to say that this gentleman's writing, of whose literary quality its readers must judge, carries no weight with any party but the Socialists, who on this issue repudiate him. When, piercing alike through the visible and the invisible, the eye of Mr. Blatchford, of the "Clarion," sternly fixed on the Kaiser and his officers, perceives a "secret" German plot against England, which is also of so brazen a character that a "legion" of hostile acts and tongues proclaim it, and is so inevitable that not the "strongest navy in the world" can defeat it, it would seem as if Mr. Blatchford's rhetoric had answered itself. His "facts," in the half-dozen cases where they are even alleged, fall into the same category of self-accusation. Among them was the statement that "every night in every German warship," the toast was drunk "To the day" when the German fleet should destroy the British fleet. The assertion has been declared by Prince Henry of Prussia, Admiral of the German fleet, to be a lie. This every well-balanced reader of Mr. Blatchford's hysterics knew when he read it. Even Mr. Blatchford's arithmetic of one German battleship a month does not work out at his later sum of "thirty-nine battleships a year," a figure which even the sub-editor of the "Daily Mail" might have been trusted to excise. We do not know whether it is necessary to confront his further assertion that Germany has "seventeen docks" capable of building "Dreadnoughts" with the official statement last June that, while we possessed thirteen graving docks for "Dreadnoughts" and had six building, Germany had five and one building, and, while she possessed one floating dock and two building, we had two building. If Mr. Blatchford showed any susceptibility to the nature of an argument, we might meet his point as to the secret "rushing" of Germany's naval programme—in which every important step is perfectly well known to us—with the admission in the "Navy League Annual" that she is behind her time with every ship comprising her first batch of "Dreadnoughts," or we might contrast his comprehensive ignorance of his subject with Sir William White's complete knowledge of it and total dissent from Mr. Blatchford. It is more to the point to condole with Germany on the fact that, while we have our Blatchfords, she has her Hardens, and to lament that in both countries the unthinking and the unknowing act with each other against peace and common sense.

We write this article, however, less for the purpose of drawing attention to Mr. Blatchford and the "Daily Mail," than of recording the remarkable language of the new German Chancellor on Friday week. On this occasion Herr von Bethmann Hollweg, reciprocating Mr. Asquith's wishes for an improved relationship between Germany and Great Britain, declared, according to Reuter, that "the interests of both countries would be better served and more freely and largely expressed if this friendly attitude were expressed in negotiations between the two countries." The language of the "Times" reports puts this point a little less precisely, and we are inclined to think, more correctly, and makes the Chancellor speak of "the solution of questions which affect both countries." But even this statement is of great significance. It will be remembered that Mr.

Asquith held out three months ago a definite hope that if the German Government were prepared to consider a plan for the reduction of armaments, such an arrangement would meet "with a most cordial response" from this country. Here, therefore, we seem to have advanced to new ground. Last spring Sir Edward Grey thought that Germany would not enter into a naval arrangement, first, because she would not recognise our claims to a superior fleet; secondly, because he had no reason to suppose that she would respond to a British offer to abandon the right of capturing private property at sea; and thirdly, because of German suspicions of ourselves. This was not promising, or even inviting; but Herr von Bethmann Hollweg's words put out of the way the objection that Germany will not look at an attempt to solve pending questions. For both countries the greatest of these questions is that of naval armaments. A few months ago we were given to understand that Germany had repulsed a very tentative British suggestion. Now Germany has clearly made an advance, which almost amounts to the tender of an arrangement. We cannot conceive, in view of the Prime Minister's words, that it has been repulsed, or that there exists any reason, any material fact, any engagement with another European Power, which calls upon a Liberal Government to repel it. Therefore we must assume that the path is open for a removal of the only substantial peril to European good-will, a step which we note that French official opinion warmly approves. The present Government has done much for progress; but the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary would throw all its accomplishments into the shade by an act of peace between two Powers who, outside the sphere of passion, have not a single motive for war.

SCARING CAPITAL ABROAD.

For the last seven years numbers of influential politicians and protectionist landowners and manufacturers, posing as patriots, have devoted themselves to the single task of running down the industry and commerce of their country. They have represented England as a land of decaying trades, unable to hold her own markets against foreign competitors on equal terms. Every failure, every defect in our business methods, they have flaunted before the eyes of the world, every detrimental fact or figure they have gleefully picked out for political advertisement. They have applied every sort of statistical fallacy to make out their false assertion that Great Britain was unable to maintain her supremacy among the commercial nations. Their latest trick is to set "authoritative financiers" to tell us that the rats are deserting the sinking ship, that capital, despairing of any safe or profitable investment in this country, is driven abroad, and that in consequence unemployment and starvation for hosts of our workers are inevitable. Some of these financiers, as Mr. George has pointed out, merely ply their craft; vendors of foreign securities, they boom their market by disparaging the lines of goods they do not sell. One can hardly blame them: it is all in their day's work.

But their personal aims and methods cost their country dear. When well-known statesmen and a Press of world-wide circulation employ themselves in advertising and exaggerating every failure and concealing every success of the trade and commerce of their country, such persistent, wide-spread suggestion has its natural effect. During this year the protectionist propaganda has been reinforced by a fresh stream of mendacity denouncing the Budget as the beginning of a Socialistic attack upon property. These tactics are very similar to those employed in the United States in 1894, when financial and business men deliberately conspired to create a panic and a stoppage of business for electioneering purposes. Ample testimony is forthcoming from City men to the effect that investors are preferring foreign to home securities just now. It would, indeed, be strange if the political devices employed by English financiers to scare capital abroad were wholly unsuccessful. For capital is proverbially timid, and when financial advisers for political reasons disparage home investments, capital will flow abroad. In this way our "patriots" are doing something to keep back the revival of trade which is beginning to show itself in our country. They cannot do very much, because the tide of industrial revival will be too strong for them, but they may do something to retard the pace of the revival and at least to keep up the figures of unemployment over the General Election. Their malign device must finally fail, for the stream of new capital ever tends to flow into the channels of greatest industrial and commercial productivity. But for the present this anti-British policy of slandering home industry is retarding the new fertilising flow of capital into British enterprise which the prospect of a trade revival would have brought about. This deliberate exploitation of our trade and employment by political and financial gamblers, staking their petty, selfish ends against the employment and prosperity of the people, is a wantonly wicked act without parallel in our political annals.

In the long run, however, the natural and beneficial distribution of capital will assert itself. It is not true that the growth of our capital invested abroad is attended by a dearth of capital in our home industries. Home investments always have the first pull upon the savings of the country, and, even in spite of the campaign of slander, there is no evidence whatever to support the allegation that sound English investments cannot get the capital they need. The notion that a trade depression is attributable to deficiency of capital is based upon a total misunderstanding of the facts of depression. For in depressed trade there is no lack of available capital. Facing the unemployed or under-employed labor is an equal quantity of fixed capital in the shape of mines, factories, machinery, &c., technically capable, as in good times, of co-operating with the labor for the conversion of materials into commodities. The requisite circulating capital, wages, and materials, would also be forthcoming if employers could see their way to marketing the goods they could turn out at the ordinary market prices.

The increasing proportion of new British capital which flows abroad causes no constriction in the development of home industries: it could not find safe and profitable employment here. The suggestion that a Protective Tariff would keep more capital invested in this country is a false induction drawn from the fact that a tariff favoring a particular British trade might cause more capital to be employed in that trade. This enlargement of the capital structure of a particular trade, or set of trades, would be compensated, and more than compensated, by the starvation and the dwindling of capital in other trades. For the net effect of a tariff cannot be to increase the aggregate amount of capital in the country. Not only will it not prevent capital from flowing abroad as fast as it does now; it will accelerate the pace. For the result of a costly interference with the normal growth of British trades, by subsidising and enlarging some trades at the expense of others, will be to reduce the average rate of profits upon capital invested in British industries, and, therefore, to strengthen the appeal of foreign investments. The only way by which our Protectionists can keep more capital in the country is by placing a legal prohibition upon the export of British goods which constitute the real forms of the capital that goes abroad. In other words, they can only check the export of capital by stopping export trade altogether. For there is no way of discriminating in our export trade those exports which go out in direct exchange for imports and those which represent British loans to the Empire or to foreign countries.

As world civilisation develops, a larger and larger proportion of the capital of each nation will be placed outside the national area. Germany, far later than ourselves to begin the process, has already nearly as much capital invested outside its Empire as we have, for half our capital that goes abroad goes to our Colonies and Dependencies. On every ground, economic, political, and moral, it is desirable that this process of financial cross-fertilisation should proceed apace. Every fresh million invested abroad is a solid bond of common interest, making in the long run for the peace and prosperity of the world. Its immediate and direct effect is to stimulate the development of the resources of the borrowing country, and to secure for the people of the creditor nation the largest share of this benefit, by furnishing increased supplies of food and materials for her consumption and a new growing market for her manufactures. Students of the actual course of our foreign commerce recognise the intimate relations between the course of our overseas investments and that of our overseas commerce. The two are inextricably intertwined.

In normal times, when unpatriotic panic-mongers are not operating in money markets, our industries are fed with all the capital they can assimilate. There is only one way of increasing safely the quantity of capital employed in the country, viz., by raising the standard of consumption of the masses of the people. For only by raising the volume of consumption of commodities can we permanently raise the volume of production, and so the aggregate employment alike of capital and labor. To do this is the end of that policy of Social Reform to which our Government is directing its endeavors.

Life and Letters.

"SOCIETY" AND THE BUDGET.

THE word Society must be used here in the restricted sense as meaning not the general community but a comparatively small class of people who have constituted themselves into a more or less select aristocratic oligarchy and assume the rôle of leaders of fashion, manners, and conventions in the social life of the richer section of the population. Who are they? And does it signify in the least degree what they think about the Budget or any other public question?

It is difficult to define exactly who they are. But if we take the members of the House of Lords, with their wives and daughters, their relations and their personal friends, we might be including a few people who would resent being classed in this category, but we should not be excluding many who can fairly be described as members of Society. It is, in truth, this faction that gives the House of Lords its power and prestige, and the Peers of the Opposition receive a sort of perpetual mandate from them. The views of a great number of these high personages on the Budget proposals of the Government have been expressed in language of unmeasured violence. Some of their public utterances have been recorded in print, and have been appreciated at their true worth. But their private conversations and correspondence on the subject during the past few months, if they could only be recorded, would be a perfect revelation of an obstinate prejudice, an unconquerable arrogance, and a fathomless ignorance which would make any ordinary citizen blush for shame. Reasons of policy or even of party are not the guiding motive of their heated and bitter opposition. Purely selfish fears form the basis of their antagonism, and contemptuous personalities are their method of expression.

Four years ago the overwhelming Liberal majority at the general election greatly alarmed them. The country would be ruined, they declared, feeling their influence might lose its weight. Worse, there was a chance of an attack on their position—a position of generally accepted domination, which they insist on believing is the only possible arrangement of our social system. But they subsided into acquiescence in the inevitable, and they were completely reassured when they found that their own Chamber, representative, indeed, so far as they were concerned, was an effective rampart against the pressing and repeated demands of the common people. So they settled down for three years only to scoff and sneer at anything in public life that was infected with a progressive or Liberal taint. But in the fourth year came the Budget. Their fears were renewed. "A Government of cads" was forcing Socialism upon them. They had not the remotest idea what Socialism meant. Most of them had neither read nor seen a book on the subject in their lives. But it conveyed to them generally the notion that desperate men who used violence were going to deprive them of their property, their land, and their wealth. For a time they were scared to the pitch of frenzy. They cried aloud, and wondered amongst themselves whether their champions could really withstand a blow which seemed to have behind it a vast, and to them quite inexplicable, force. But when they heard the brave speeches during the Lords' debate, they knew once more they were safe. In those speeches rang the true note of the autocratic capitalist aristocracy. The division on the Second Reading, in which their fathers and brothers, and uncles and friends, played such a noble and historic part in refusing supplies for the nation's needs was a vindication of their claims and a crowning triumph for their caste.

Now, does it after all matter what such people's views are, what language they use, or what opinions they express? Unfortunately it does matter. Because the power they have is unmistakable and very effective. It is a power not only of wealth, which by itself is admittedly formidable, but it is the power of example and the subtle power of influence which reaches down into the recesses of private life where opinion is formed and character moulded. And the British—or perhaps it would be more correct to say the English—temperament is so constituted that slavish respect for rank plays a very prominent part in the general conduct and public attitude of a vast number of people. The next best thing to being an aristocrat is to know one, and behave like one, or, anyhow, to serve one, or obey one. Individually in this Society, as elsewhere, you will find disinterested and broad-minded men, but their opinion and advice do not count. Collectively, when its interests are touched, whether it be in land, liquor, or capital, "Society" acts corporately in its capacity as a band of hereditary leaders and rulers par excellence. The authority these leisured "supers" exercise in mundane and private affairs they insist on stretching into the domain of public affairs, where they find strong allies in their Press, and their Kiplings, and in the vested interests who gladly hail their co-operation. In their disregard for the general public welfare, the selfishness of their pretensions is unveiled, and the insolence of their unashamed conceit is laid bare. It would be folly to pretend that they are not a force still to be reckoned with. The upper middle class strive to be identified with them, many of the middle class fear to compromise themselves by opposing them, and some of the working class even, especially in the country districts, bow to them in return for their patronage and charity. Whether it takes the form of public-house influence, whether it is the alliance between the squire and the parson, whether it is the fear of the loss of custom which the small shopkeepers dread, or whether it is the barefaced intimidation exemplified by the brake-loads of voters driven to the poll, with the bailiff on guard at the door of the polling-station; whether, in fact, it takes the form of subservience, obedience, or alliance, we must make up our minds that in the coming election the full force of their power and the full pressure of their influence will be used and felt in every available direction.

We may despise their opinion, we may deplore their methods, we may detest their pretensions, we may denounce their thoughtless disregard for the constitutional safeguards of the country, but let us not forget that to them the coming struggle is one of life or death. Every conceivable expedient open and concealed will be used to delude the electors into the belief that they are their friends; no stone will be left unturned in order to thwart the forces of progress and to stifle the voice of the people. We must not underestimate the gravity of the issue. It is not to be a contest between two policies, but a great fight to free the country from the slow poison of an insidious and destructive tyranny. Eventual victory is assured by the natural evolution of the social laws which govern all human societies. Cannot we gain that victory now? For, if we triumph, we can leave our vanquished foes for a while to exercise their petty lordship in their own private domains; but their reckless outlawry in the nation's concerns will be put an end to once and for all.

THE MOTIVE FORCE OF WAR.

It is at once the weakness and the strength of most of the men and women who have devoted their energies to a concentrated propaganda against war that they are conscious idealists, a little better and much more sensitive than the majority of their fellows. The plain man does not trouble to meet them on the ground of morality and humanity. He readily accepts their teaching that war is wrong and brutal. But he is apt to imagine that he knows the world he lives in. He is convinced that brutality is often highly profitable. He thinks that he owes much of his present prosperity to successful aggressions in the past. He dreads to be made the victim of similar aggressions in the future. Somewhere at the back of his mind is the obscure conviction that, if the Germans should ever beat us, our trade and our prosperity would be ruined for ever, whereas if we should beat them our fortunes would be directly advanced. That the next war will be a war for trade seems to him as natural and as reasonable as it seemed to our ancestors in the seventeenth century to make wars for religion. Nor is it merely the unreflecting City man who swallows these assumptions. They are to be found blatant in the pages of the "National Review." The pacifist too often brushes them aside with an impatient moral rebuke, where he might with more effect pause to subject them to a careful economic analysis. When the conviction that war does not pay from a national standpoint, even when it is at once very wicked and very successful, begins to penetrate the mind of the middle class, the "rattle into barbarism" will be sharply arrested.

It is to this task that a new and brilliant writer, Mr. Norman Angell, has addressed himself in one of the most original pieces of pamphleteering which has appeared for many years. ("Europe's Optical Illusion," Simpkin, Marshall.) He writes a direct and virile style, in which no word is wasted and no sentence fails to tell, and he has the rarest of all virtues in a political thinker, that he dares to question everything and to peep behind even the most usual and innocent of words. It is, of course, no new thesis that war and territorial aggrandisement do not pay. The discovery has been made too often by the victor. Austrians in a cold fit are asking themselves what conceivable concrete gain they have derived from the final seizure of Bosnia. Our own Jingo, realising that the dream of racial ascendancy in South Africa must be for ever relinquished, are slowly beginning to scan their balance sheets. But still the illusion survives, and the plain man does not dare to question that some profit in wealth or trade would come to the victor in an Anglo-German struggle. But, setting sentiment aside, what concrete and material good is there that we could lose even by a disastrous struggle which should force us to accept humiliating terms and consent to the loss of our Empire? Our actual wealth, as Mr. Lloyd George has reminded the Dukes, consists in the industrial skill of our population, in our natural resources below the soil, in the moist climate which makes Lancashire the world's inevitable cotton-mill. These would survive defeat. Our goods would still make their way in neutral markets by their cheapness and their merits. It profits the English merchant nothing to-day when he meets a Belgian rival in Buenos Ayres that he has "Dreadnoughts" behind him and the Belgian has not. Switzerland can threaten our supremacy even in the Canadian market. From our self-governing Colonies we draw no tribute. We are less able to dictate a policy to General Botha than we were to President Krüger. Canada announces that she holds herself free to give or to withhold the assistance of her new Fleet if we should be at war. Against us, as against all the world, the Colonies maintain tariffs which sufficiently protect them. The loss of these very independent allies would involve us in no material disaster, and to the conqueror their gain—if he could annex them—would bring no concrete advantage. The level of prosperity and comfort is as high in the little semi-neutral countries of Europe as in any Empire; it is probably higher. Nor can it be thought that their existence is precarious or insecure, when we recollect that Belgian 3 per cents. stand at 96, and German at 82, Norwegian 3½ per cents. at 102 and Russian at 81.

But the centre of Mr. Angell's position is his insistence on the influence of the world's elaborate credit system, to restrain the successful aggressor from inflicting on a defeated enemy any injury which really would maim him. If we are not yet members one of another, we certainly are debtors and creditors one of another. A financial panic in New York causes an immediate reaction in London and Paris, which forces the bankers of England and France in mere self-defence to rush to the assistance of the States. Just as its rivals in the City were forced, in order to save themselves, to rescue Barings, so both combatants in a European war would be compelled to respect each other's solvency. We might, by a successful naval war, create an appalling industrial crisis in Germany, but its effect would be felt so sharply in the City, that the most bellicose stockbroker would ere long be calling for peace and preaching mercy.

The Marshal Bülow of to-morrow might sigh out his "Was für Plunder!" from the dome of St. Paul's, but if he were to sack the cellars of the Bank, the credit of Germany would be shaken with the shock that destroyed our own. If any Power were to profit financially and industrially from a European war, it would be the tertius gaudens who lent his money to both the shaken combatants, and pushed his goods in the world's markets while their energies were otherwise engaged. If the victor follows up his triumph by conquest, he is all the more bound to respect the prosperity and the credit-dependent wealth of the provinces he annexes. He cannot ruin their populations without also injuring himself. Added territory does not mean an increase of wealth. No German was the richer for annexing Alsace. It is only the lingering tradition of the days when the conqueror actually confiscated the lands of the conquered and filled his treasury with the spoils of looted cities, which could induce us to think otherwise. There would seem to follow the colossal conclusion that war and armaments can do nothing for trade. Sentiment apart, no civilised modern Power has anything to hope from victory, or anything to fear from defeat, save indeed the temporary disturbance to credit and industry which affects victor and vanquished in almost equal degrees. If there is no adequate motive for aggression, there can be no real necessity to face the annual ruin of defence.

It would be easy to check the march of Mr. Angell's impetuous reasoning by entering here and there a caveat and registering a query. It may be true that no Power has anything concrete to gain by conquest, but the perception of that fact may not dawn so rapidly on the strong as on the weak. If we were Dutchmen, we should be ready to prove to Germany that she had nothing to gain by annexing us, but we should not on that account disarm, even if we believed that conquest would not spell ruin. The sentimental factor counts. No German was the richer for seizing Alsace, but the Alsations are certainly unhappier for having been seized. Nor is it sweet reasonableness alone which protects Belgium and maintains her credit. It is the equilibrium of the armaments of stronger rival Powers. In the absence of international free trade, moreover, the wars which have consolidated great Empires into large areas of internal free trade have been of economic benefit. The Northern States would certainly be the poorer to-day if the Southern States had maintained their secession. But even these reservations leave Mr. Angell's central position untouched. Broadly speaking, there can, in the modern world, be no really national advantage from victorious war, and no irreparable economic disaster from defeat. But against this thesis of Mr. Angell's, which to the plain Jingo will seem an intolerable paradox, it is necessary to set up another which is itself hardly more familiar. Armaments are not maintained merely to make war or to preserve peace. They are maintained also to facilitate the export of capital. Ask why it is that the Moroccan question has twice threatened the peace of Europe and convulsed the slumbers of Spain, and the answer is that an energetic French colonial group is busy lending money to the Sultan, that it provoked an expedition which will force him to borrow still more money to pay the indemnity, that it has acquired profitable concessions for the building of harbors, and still vaster privileges for the exploitation of mines. Ask why the tension has ceased, and the answer is that the rival German group of financiers has come to terms with the French group, and that the pair will now exploit loans and mines in concert. French armaments backed the French group on Moroccan soil; German armaments on the Eastern frontier in the end made an amicable arrangement necessary. It is quite true that when a Lancashire firm is bidding against a Rhenish firm for the supply of cotton to a merchant in Smyrna, the question of "Dreadnoughts" does not come in. But if Krupps are bidding against Schneiders for the supply of ordnance to the Turkish army, or if a British group is competing with a German group for the building of a railway in China, high politics with navies behind them are at once involved. Embassies do not trouble about cotton bales, but they are called in when a new bank is being founded, a new concession granted, or a railway secured upon mortgaged customs. The shadow of an ambassador, when he pays an official visit under a semi-tropical sun, is rather apt to look like an Army Corps or a Dreadnought. The struggle to maintain what is called a balance of power in Europe is in some degree a struggle to secure for the fluid capital of the financiers of the Great Powers profitable opportunities for exporting itself to countries where there are as yet no Factory Acts and no "trail of the trade union serpent." The Lancashire operative and the suburban clerk are certainly no richer because the Navy enables us to control without owning Egypt. But the bondholders who despoiled the Khedive Ismail are immensely the richer. It is not enough that the democracies of Europe should understand that conquests and armaments are of no service to them. They must also be made to understand the entirely reasonable, if wholly selfish, calculation which makes these things so very serviceable to a limited ruling caste. The problem of armaments is national as well as international. Its solution presupposes the enlightenment of democracy and its acquisition of power. The enemy is not so much the faulty reasoning of the many as the shrewd self-interest of the few.

THE POWER OF DECEPTION.

VERY opportunely comes a little volume from the pen of Mr. Bryce, entitled "The Hindrances to Good Citizenship" (Clarendon Press), which contains the garnered fruit of deep and wide reflection upon democracy in two worlds. It is no casual coincidence that our American ambassador should have addressed to the students of Yale University a detailed criticism of the defects of popular government, every paragraph of which is closely, painfully, applicable to this country. For those who are not completely absorbed in the necessary details of the electoral struggle, there can be no more profitable reading than this faithful endeavor of a wise and devoted friend to heal, invigorate, and direct the spirit of democracy. That such help is needed there can be no doubt. For the clear convictions of a generation ago have been clouded over and the confident enthusiasm has been disappointed by events. "From 1830 to 1870 the general attitude of most of the powerful intellects and nearly all the finest characters among the thinkers and writers of Europe was a hopeful one, expecting immense gains to human progress and human happiness from the establishment of free institutions." The actual gains, though considerable, have not nearly fulfilled the expectations. Some improvement in material comfort, in health, education, morals, and in other civilised conditions has been attained for the "common people," and not a little of all this is due to better political institutions. Yet the friends of democracy are disappointed. Larger, quicker, deeper gains were hoped for. In looking for the causes of such disappointment Mr. Bryce rightly fastens his attention, not upon defects in the methods of self-government, but upon weaknesses in the character of the average citizen as affected by the play of modern political forces. For democracy throws the responsibility of progress upon the average man. Now, at all times, the average man in politics is prone to three special vices, indolence, self-interest, and abuse of party spirit. Of these the most noxious is self-interest, which not merely perverts individual honesty and intelligence, but corrupts and turns to harmful ends the wholesome instrument of party.

Unfortunately, along with the growth of formal democracy this evil force has gained an increased strength. For economic issues, which formerly divided the field of politics more equally with other issues of race, religion, and dynastic changes, have come in all modern industrial nations to a position of ascendancy. The very growth of toleration, which has abated, if it has not settled, the most urgent problems of race and of creed, the very widening of franchise and of electoral institutions have left the field more open for the naked play of economic interests. Hence it arises that behind all constitutional or legal reform stands the pressure of the popular demand for radical changes in the ownership of property, the control of industry, and for a decent and secure standard of material comfort for the working-classes.

The other side of this demand, the enemy of the people, is the Power of Money, the entrenched and consolidated forces of the powerful vested interests. The classes which, by tradition and inheritance, by superior opportunities of education, political assistance, chance or force, have built and maintain the fortresses of the Money Power, defend themselves against all popular encroachments made under the claims of labor on the State. And their defence consists chiefly in attempts to corrupt, distract, and deceive the electorate. For what other defence have they against the just and reasonable demands of the people? Mr. Bryce, though not concerned to discuss the merits of the economic issues between the people and the vested interests, is as insistent as Mr. Wallas upon the degradation of politics involved. "Perhaps with even more general truth may it be said that, as the Love of Money is the root of all evil, so the Power of Money is for popular governments the most constant source of danger, worse than ignorance, worse than apathy, worse than faction, worse than demagogism. This is because it is so multifarious, so insidious, so hard to detect, so quick to spread."

In America the Power of Money is more firmly seated in the political saddle than here: it has seized more securely the engines of Party, and pumps its will down through the elaborate machinery, to come up with the formal register of the popular will. The prevalence of the spoils system and certain other aspects of American life render this intelligible. But, as Mr. Wallas reminds us, American methods are invading this nation. The "spell-binder," the "still-hunt," and all the other tricks of menace, cajolery, and suggestion, will be employed by the Money-Power. How shall they be met? What must we do to be saved? Mr. Wallas leaves us well-nigh in despair. Mr. Bryce, who is not looking to our immediate emergency, pleads for a policy of intellectual and moral enlightenment. He sees already in America, as in Europe, signs of revolt against the dominion of Mammon, of recovery from the age of discouragement through which democracy has been passing; he finds a growing diffusion of sympathy, a stronger feeling of responsibility among the wealthier classes for their less fortunate brethren. "There is more of a sense of brotherhood, more of a desire to help, more of a discontent with those arrangements of society which press hardly on the common man than there was forty years ago." But these healing, elevating processes are by their very nature slow. What ward have we against the present perils of such a Money-Power as Mr. Wallas portrayed in our columns last week? Well, we have this. It takes more money, more energy, more ability to make a lie prevail than a truth. To buy or deceive the majority of the electorate into voting against their manifest self-interests may prove too difficult and too expensive even for the Money-Power.

Finally, justice and reason are great allies. The mind of the average elector is not equally amenable to truth and falsehood, justice and injustice. To persuade him that the Lords are his friends, while the men he elected four years ago are his enemies, that it is better for him to pay food taxes than for landowners to pay land taxes, that the rich men want to give him more power, not less, to tax them, may prove too difficult, too costly a process. Drink fuddles and gold dazzles the intelligence of electioneers, leading them to suppose, falsely, that they can "fool all the people all the time." So, while honest men must everywhere be on their guard, unmasking fraudulent pretences, and nailing lies to the counter, we need feel no desperate alarm lest money should buy the verdict. Money is not the final master of humanity. Good and evil, truth and falsehood, are not equally equipped for victory. For there is a natural tendency for greed to over-reach itself, for the liar to be caught in a trap he sets, for corruption to disgust instead of to allure. We have on one side the justice of our cause, the faith which the knowledge of that justice affords, and the ultimate integrity of the people. For herein lies the conquering power, the healing of democracy, the imperfect, not wholly conscious, but real and growing wisdom of the people, which enables it to detect truth from falsehood in great fundamental issues.

THE ESSENTIAL SELF.

If ever there was a perfect Knight, raised above the shadow of reproach, and recognised by his own and after times as the very mould of gentle valor and heroic accomplishment, one would have supposed him to be Sir Philip Sidney. We had looked upon him as happy in his life, in his friendships, his genius, and even in the early opportunity of his death. We had classed him with those scholars whose knowledge is vitalised by the hard realities of State and battle, and with the soldiers whom imaginative intellect saves from brutality. We had known him as the child of Penshurst, most beautiful of country homes, and as the sweet-tempered schoolboy of Shrewsbury, always the wildest and most romantic of our schools. We had known him at Christ Church, where he won such favor that the Dean ordered the words "preceptor of Philip Sidney, that most noble knight," should be inscribed on his own grave, and we can think of no pupil in whose honor the late Dean Liddell or the present Bishop of Oxford would do the like. Then came the years at Court and in the State's service, whether in Ireland or on embassies, in which he confronted the Emperor himself in defence of the liberties of Europe—years also of love and poetry and intimate acquaintance with the best scholars and intellects of the day. And so we reached that natural and characteristic ending at Zutphen, which for more than three centuries has rejoiced the imagination of his countrymen, when, as his friend tells us:—

"Being thirsty with excess of bleeding, he called for drink, which was presently brought him, but as he was putting the bottle to his mouth he saw a poor soldier carried along who had eaten his last at the same feast, ghastly casting up his eyes at the bottle; which Sir Philip perceiving, took it from his head before he drank, and delivered it to the poor man with these words, 'Thy necessity is greater than mine.'"

That scene has become part of our national heritage, and for his countrymen Sir Philip Sidney lives chiefly as its hero. Beyond that, they may remember his great saying that he "never heard the old song of Percy and Douglas that he found not his heart moved more than with a trumpet," and they may know him as the poet of three or four beautiful love-songs and perhaps half a dozen sonnets that Shakespeare must have heard with delight. Round these three points of noble deed and noble word and noble verse, posterity has concentrated his remembrance, and in themselves they are sufficient to present to us the picture of perfect knighthood that his very name calls up.

Or consider what his contemporaries thought of him—this man who, like General Wolfe, was killed at thirty-two. Of Henry of Navarre it is written that "he found out this Master-spirit among us, and used him like an equal in nature, and so fit for friendship with a king." When Sidney died, the Spaniard Mendoza acknowledged that "howsoever he was glad King Philip his master had lost in a private gentleman, a dangerous enemy to his Estate; yet he could not but lament to see Christendom deprived of so rare a light in these cloudy times." Similar is the testimony of Languet, the European scholar, and of Philip du Mornay, the scholarly diplomatist. But, as is known, the highest authority in Sidney's praise is Fulke

Greville, his intimate friend from the Schools at Shrewsbury till death parted them, nor can there be many finer passages of honor than that conclusion, beginning, "He was a true model of worth; a man fit for conquest, plantation, reformation, or what action so ever is greatest and hardest among men." Take only two more sentences from the lines:—

"Such a lover of mankind and goodness, that whosoever had any real parts in him found comfort, participation, and protection to the uttermost of his power; like Zephyrus, he giving life where he blew. . . . His heart and capacity were so large that there was not a cunning painter, a skilful engineer, an excellent musician, or any other artificer of extraordinary fame, that made not himself known to this famous spirit, and found him his true friend without hire, and the common rendezvous of worth in his time."

Fulke Greville, who lived to praise him, also imitated the Dean of Christ Church in asking that the sole inscription on his tombstone should be "The Friend of Sir Philip Sidney."

Was it all a hoax? Was the devotion of friends, the admiration of history, built on illusion? Sidney's latest biographer almost persuades us it was. It is true that Mr. Addleshaw, in his large and learned "Life" (Methuen) inserts passages of high praise. He esteems his hero quite highly, quite at his true value, as he supposes. He only wishes to be just, and because he has studied the subject more deeply than the rest of us, he felt bound to bring to light certain things we did not know. But, in spite of the best he can say, the result of his book is disillusion and disenchantment. Perhaps it is the result of most biography, unless the man's very faults are lovable. But Mr. Addleshaw keeps pointing out faults that are not lovable at all, and he has a peculiar power of making these faults stand forth as the most visible features in the portrait. It is partly due to a rather irritating and diffuse style, partly to a genuine and chivalrous sympathy with the persecuted Catholics of Elizabeth's time, for whom Sidney, in the thick of the dangers to freedom of thought and government, felt no pity. But throughout the book it is evident that the biographer is resolved "not to emphasise the halo," if we may adopt one of his own queer phrases. On the very first page he tells us that Sidney was "a prig and a bigot." A little later on, he confirms someone's opinion that Sidney was not an eminently engaging or profoundly interesting character, and states that our usual estimate of him is too clearly the phantom of a long tradition. He speaks of his piety as "narrow and insular to an unpleasant degree." With regard to his share in the confiscated property of Catholics, he calls him a thief, accuses him of rank robbery, and says "he plunged gaily into the game of grab and played it without a shadow of shame." Similarly, in speaking of his marriage and of his passion for Penelope Rich, he tells us everything that can make against his hero, and his excuse for insisting on all errors is plainly stated in the middle of the book:—

"As public approval," he writes, again in his more irritating style—"as public approval puts Sidney in a place quite conveniently near to St. Matthew, St. Mark, St. Luke, and St. John—and if one is to believe rumor, he is rather better than any of them—it is just as well to say, frankly, what he was. . . . It is very silly to disguise all Philip's faults. . . . To present him as a hero who was, like the traditional Bayard, 'sans peur et sans reproche,' is to coquet with folly. . . . Why it should have been considered necessary to make Philip ridiculous it is not for me to suggest. . . . We may rejoice that he was not the good boy of the Sunday school, or that he early went to heaven because the bullet of a kindly enemy sent him there."

We do not quite follow the meaning of the sneer in the last few words, but if the author thinks he is saving Sidney from ridicule by pointing out a few human failings in a noble character, he is mistaken. Goethe might say, "It is a man's errors that make him really lovable," but he was not thinking of the errors on which Mr. Addleshaw dwells—priggishness, bigotry, greed, indifference to suffering, and coldness in love. Those are not the errors that increase our affection for a man or raise him beyond the taunt of Sunday-school hero. If they are found and insisted upon in the character of a reputed knight, they in themselves bring ridicule upon a knightly reputation, and to suppose they can enhance our sympathy for a fellow man is indeed to "coquet with folly."

It is not our business to defend Sidney. Except that he was thought too serious—Languet writes, "You have too little mirthfulness in your nature"—the people of his time perceived little or nothing of the faults that Mr. Addleshaw makes so glaring, and few of us are much in advance of the morality of our time. But we will accept the truth from the Devil's Advocate, no matter how disappointing—just with this one hint of warning, that hardly any man can be a hero to his biographer. Like the valet de chambre, the biographer knows too much. He sees the hero in his hours (or perhaps his years) of weakness, depression, or commonplace existence. If he has a valet's mind, those are the periods that will strike him most; on those he will insist, and to the quick moments when the heroic spirit burns with pure flame, illuminating the world, he will be blind. So it is that some people, possessed by a passion for what they call truth, delight to show us the Virgin Queen as a wanton old harridan, or Cromwell as an ill-bred bully, or Byron as a fop clamoring for his tooth-powder, or Lamb as a slave to punch, or Wordsworth as a doddering Conservative, or Carlyle as a peevish egoist.

Mr. Addleshaw has not a valet's mind, but still he is in danger of hiding the essential self beneath unessential qualities. At the best, a man's true self is not easy to discover, either for him or for others. In the chaotic multitude of contradictions, possibilities, desires, and fears, who shall detect it with certainty? Almost obliterated by the world's slow stain, incrustated like a sea-monster with the accretions of daily life and custom, torpid with conformity and the stress of habit, thwarted by sickness and bodily circumstance, it seldom emerges into view, and is seldom conscious even of its own reality. The old commandment to Know Thyself is impossible of fulfilment, and there is hardly one among us who could foretell how he would act in a crisis. In the case of others we foretell it more confidently, having a less confused picture of others than of ourselves. But still, it is not often that we can say, "There is the man himself; there is the essential spirit, burning, though only for a moment, with pure flame, while all the rest, though it last for years, is mere twilight, clotted obscurity, or the unenumerated hours of night."

With assured instinct, the circle of the world has fixed upon the points where the radiance of Sidney's essential spirit shone. We are grateful to all historians who reveal the truth, but, even if they wished, they could not alter that vision of our own, springing from a deeper truth than the incidents of time and place. No matter with what details of evidence the biographers may overwhelm us, Sidney will remain to the world as Shelley wrote of him:—

"Sidney as he fought
And as he fell, and as he lived and loved,
Sublimely mild, a spirit without spot."

Not that we disregard evidence or consider perfection either possible or attractive, but at a few points of life we detect the gleam of the man's true spirit, and to the rest we remain indifferent, hardly having the time in our few and crowded years to regard it much. As in the case of a poet, it is not the man we admire, so much as the spirit that appears now and then to breathe through him as its almost unconscious instrument. So with Sidney, the only parts of his biography that count are those on which the world has already fixed, and the world is not to be robbed of the fine personality revealed in them. For not merely a creature of legend, but the true spirit of the man is to be found in that grave and sweet-tempered schoolboy, that ambassador who uttered his protests for freedom before the Courts of Emperors, that soldier who died at Zutphen, and the lover who wrote the lines beginning:—

"With how sad steps, O moon, thou climb'st the skies, How silently, and with how wan a face!"

and many other verses, of which Ruskin said he knew no such lovely love poems since Dante's.

Short Studies.

ODE ON A DISTANT PROSPECT OF FLEET STREET.

It is still early, but dinner is over—not the club dinner with its buzzing conversation, nor yet the restaurant dinner, hurried into the ten minutes between someone's momentous speech and the leader that has to be written on it. The suburban dinner is over, and there was no need to hurry. They tell me I shall be healthier now. What do I care about being healthier? Et propter vitam vitæ perdere causas.

Shall I sit with a novel over the fire? Shall I take life at second-hand and work up an interest in imaginary loves and the exigencies of shadows? What are all the firesides and fictions of the world to me that I should loiter here and doze, doze, as good as die?

They tell me it is a fine thing to take a little walk before bed-time. I go out into the suburban street, a thin, wet mist hangs over the silent and monotonous houses, and blurs the electric lamps along our road. There will be a fog in Fleet Street to-night, but everyone is too busy to notice it. How friendly a fog made us all! How jolly it was when I ran straight into that "Chronicle" man, and got a lead of him by a short head over the same curse! There's no chance of running into anyone here, let alone cursing! A few figures slouch past and disappear; the last postman goes his round, knocking at one house in ten; up and down the asphalt path leading into the obscurity of the Common a wretched woman wanders in vain; the long, pointed windows of a chapel glimmer with yellowish light through the dingy air, and I hear the faint groans of a harmonium cheering the people home. The groaning ceases, the lights go out, service is over; it will soon be time for decent people to be in bed.

In Fleet Street the telegrams will now be falling thick as—No, I won't say it! No Vallombrosa for me, or any other journalistic tag! I remember once a sub-editor had got as far as, "The cry is still—" when I took him by the throat. I have done the State some service.

Our sub-editor's room is humming now: a low murmur of questions, rapid orders, the rustle of paper, the quick alarum of telephones. Boys keep bringing telegrams in orange envelopes. Each sub-editor is bent over his little lot of news. One sorts out the speeches from bundles of flimsy. The middle of Lloyd-George's speech has got mixed up with Balfour's peroration. If he left them mixed, would anyone be the less wise? Perhaps the speakers might notice it, and that man from Wiltshire would be sure to write saying he had always supported Mr. Balfour, and heartily welcomed this fresh evidence of his consistency.

"Six columns speeches in already: how much?" asks the sub-editor. "Column and quarter," comes answer from the head of the table, and the cutting begins. Another sub-editor pieces together an interview about the approaching comet. "Keep comet to three sticks," comes the order. Another guts a blue-book on prison statistics as savagely as though he were disembowelling the whole criminal population itself.

There's the telephone ringing. "Hullo, hullo!" calls a sub-editor quietly. "Who are you? Margate mystery? Go ahead. They've found the corpse? All right. Keep it to a column, but send good story. Horrible mutilations? Good. Glimpse the corpse yourself if you can. Yes. Send full mutilations. Will call for them at eleven. Good-bye." "You doing Haldane, Mr. Jones?" asks the head of the table. "Cup-tie at Sunderland," answers Mr. Jones, and all the time the boys go in and out with those orange-colored bulletins of the world's health.

What's a man to do at night out here? Let's have a look at all these posters displayed in front of the Free Library, where a few poor creatures are still reading last night's news for the warmth. Next week there's a concert of chamber-music in the Town Hall. I suppose I might go to that. Then there's a boxing competition at the St. John's Arms, and a subscription dance in the Nelson Rooms, and a lecture on Dante, with illustrations from contemporary art, for working men and women at the Institute. Also there's something called the Why-Be-Lonesome Club for promoting friendly social intercourse among the young and old of all classes. I suppose I might go to that too. It sounds comprehensive.

There seems no need to be dull in the suburbs. A man in a cart is still crying coke down the street. Another desires to sell clothes-props. A brace of lovers come stealing out of the Common through the mist, careless of mud and soaking grass. I suppose people would say I'm too old to make love on a County Council bench. In love's cash-books the balance-sheet of years is kept with remorseless exactitude.

The foreign editors are waiting now in their silent room, and the telegrams come to them from the ends of the world. They fold them in packets together by countries or continents—the Indian stuff, the Russian stuff, the Egyptian, Turkish, Austrian, South African, Persian, Japanese, American, Spanish, and all the rest. They'll have pretty nearly seven columns by this time, and the order will come "Two-and-a-half foreign." Then the piecing and cutting will begin. One of them sits in a telephone box with bands across his head, and repeats a message from our Paris correspondent. Through our Paris man we can talk with Berlin and Rome.

From this rising ground I can see the light of the city reflected on the misty air, and somewhere mingled in that light are the big lamps down in Fleet Street. The City's voice comes to me like a confused murmur through a telephone when the words are unintelligible. The only distinct sounds are the dripping of the moisture from the trees in suburban gardens, and the voice of an old lady imploring her pet dog to return from his evening walk.

The voice of all the world is now heard in that silent room. From moment to moment news is coming of treaties and revolutions, of Sultans deposed and Kings enthroned, of commerce and failures, of shipwrecks, earthquakes, and explorations, of wars and flooded camps and sieges, of intrigue, diplomacy, and assassination, of love, murder, revenge, and all the public joy and sorrow and business of mankind. All the voices of fear, hope, and lamentation echo in that silent little room; and maps hang on the walls, and guide-books are always ready, for who knows where the next event may come to pass upon this energetic little earth, already twisting for a hundred million years around the sun?

The editor must be back by now. He is taking his seat in his own room, like the conductor of an orchestra preparing to raise his baton now that the tuning-up is finished. The leader-writers are coming in for their instructions. No need for much consultation to-night—not for the first leader anyhow. For the second—well, there are a good many things one could suggest: Finland or Persia or Morocco for a foreign subject; the library censorship or the price of cotton; and the cup-ties, or the extinction of hats for both sexes as a light note to finish with. He's always laboring to invent "something light," is the editor. He says we must sometimes consider the public, just as though we wrote the rest of the paper for our own private fun.

But there's no doubt about the first leader to-night. There's only one subject on which it would be a shock to every reader in the morning not to find it written. And, my word! What a subject it is! What seriousness and indignation and conviction one could get into it! I should begin by restating the situation. You must always assume that the reader's ignorance is new every morning; and anyone who happens to know something about it likes to see he was right. I should work in adroit references to this evening's speeches, and that would fill the first paragraph—say, three sides of my copy, or something over. In the second paragraph I'd show the immense issues involved in the present contest, and expose the fallacies of our opponents who attempt to belittle the matter as temporary and unlikely to recur—say, three sides of my copy again, but not a word more. And, then, in the third paragraph, I'd adjure the Government, in the name of all their party holds sacred, to stand firm, and I'd appeal to the people of this great Empire never to allow their ancient liberties to be encroached upon or overridden by a set of irresponsible—well, in short, I should be like General Sheridan when at the crisis of a battle he used to say, "Now, let everything go in"—four sides of my copy, or even five if the stuff is running well.

Somebody must be writing that leader now. Possibly he is doing it better than I should, but I hope not. When Hannibal wandered all those years in Asia at the Court of silly Antiochus this or stupid Prusias the other, and knew that Carthage was falling to ruin while he alone might have saved her if only she had allowed him, would he have rejoiced to hear that someone else was succeeding better than himself—had traversed the Alps with a bigger army, had won a second Cannæ, and even at Zama snatched a decisive victory? Hannibal might have rejoiced. He was a very exceptional man.

But here's a poor creature still playing the clarinet down the street, on the pretence of giving pleasure worth a penny. Yes, my boy, I know you're out of work, and that is why you play the "Last Rose of Summer." I am out of work, too, and I can't play anything. You say you learnt when a boy, and once played in the orchestra at Drury Lane; but now you've come to wandering about suburban streets, and when you have finished the "Last Rose" you will play "When other Lips," followed by "My Lodging's on the Cold Ground." Only a fortnight ago I was playing in an orchestra myself, not a hundred miles (obsolete journalistic tag!)—not a hundred miles from Drury Lane. It was a grand orchestra, that of ours. Day by day it played the symphony of the world, and each day a new symphony was performed, without rehearsal. The drums of our orchestra were the echoes of thundering wars; the flutes and soft recorders were the eloquence of an Empire's statesmen; and our 'cellos and violins wailed with the pity of all mankind. In that vast orchestra I played the horn that sounds the charge, or with its sharp reveillé vexes the ear of night before the sun is up. Here is your penny, my brother in affliction. I, too, have joined in the music of a star, and now wander the suburban streets.

That leader-writer has not finished yet, but the proofs of the beginning of his article will be coming down. In an hour or so his work will be over, and he will pass out into the street exhausted, and happy with the sense of function fulfilled. Fleet-street is quieter now. The lamps gleam through the fog, a motor-bus thunders by, a few late messengers flit along with the latest telegrams, and some stragglers from the restaurants come singing past the Temple. For a few moments there is silence but for the leader-writer's quick footsteps on the pavement. He is some hours in front of the morning's news, and in a few hours more half-a-million of people will be reading what he has just written, and will quote it to each other as their own. How often I have had whole sentences of my stuff thrown at me as conclusive arguments almost before the printing ink was dry!

Here I stand, beside a solitary lamp-post upon a suburban acclivity. The light of the city's existence—I think my successor would say, of her pulsating and palpitating or ebullient existence—is pale upon the sky, and the murmur of her voice sounds like large but distant waves. I stand alone, and near me there is no sound but the complaint of a homeless tramp swearing at the cold as he settles down upon a bench for the night.

How I used to swear at that boy for not coming quick enough to fetch my copy! I knew the young scoundrel's step—I knew the step of every man and boy in that office. I knew the way each of them went up and down the stairs, and coughed or whistled. What knowledge dies with me now that I am gone! Qualis artifex pereo! But that boy—how I should love to be swearing at him now! I wonder whether he misses me, I hope he does. "It would be an assurance most dear," as an old song of exile used to say.

The Drama.

"THE BLUE BIRD" AND "BLANCO POSNET."

MR. TRENCH is to be cordially congratulated on the success of "The Blue Bird." The production was a most spirited move, worthy of "high commendation, true applause, and love." All the forces of the theatre have worked together in the attainment of a most artistic and delightful presentation. Here and there—at one point and another—it would be possible to conceive something more imaginative, something more exquisite. But it is not the part of criticism to oppose a dream achievement to an actual achievement, and dwell carpingly on the differences. Everything has been done competently, almost everything delightfully. The scenery, by Messrs. Cayley Robinson, S. H. Sime, and Joseph Harker, is ingenious and beautiful. (By the way, I have not seen it noticed that the graveyard scene, "The Kingdom of the Past," reproduces a well-known picture by Arnold Boecklin.) The dresses are fanciful and pretty, the dances (arranged by Miss Ina Pelly) are graceful and spirited. All the acting is more or less good; and particularly good are little Miss Olive Walter's Tytyl, Mr. Ernest Hendrie's Dog, Mr. Norman Page's Cat, Mr. William Farren's Gaffer Tyl, Mr. C. V. France's Time, and Mr. Fisher White's Oak-Tree. Mr. Trench, I repeat, and his able producer, Mr. Lyall Swete, are unreservedly to be congratulated on an all-round success.

What, now, of the play, poem, fantasy, parable, or whatever you like to call it? Here I confess myself somewhat at a loss. I am one of the most faithful, as I was one of the earliest, of M. Maeterlinck's admirers; but I hesitate whether to rank "The Blue Bird," his greatest theatrical success, among his artistic or intellectual triumphs. It has an extraordinary superficial charm; it delighted me on a first reading; but does it quite bear thinking about? I wonder! It seems to me to fall between two stools—to be neither shallow enough for children nor deep enough for men. And in saying so I probably do injustice to the childish intelligence. There is a good deal in the play, I cannot but think, that would crumble to pieces before the uncompromising logic of childhood. I should even be inclined to doubt whether it was a suitable play for bright and impressionable children, were it not that I know several young people of that description, on both sides of the Atlantic, with whom the book is already a prime favorite.

So far as the play is designed for children, it might have taken its inspiration from a phrase of Stevenson's. In one of his early essays, he wishes that there had been someone, during his childhood, "to put him in good heart about life." That would seem to have been M. Maeterlinck's cue. His fable harps on two main themes: first, man's unlimited dominion over a hostile but ultimately conquerable Nature; second, the unreality, or rather the negligibility, of Death. The Blue Bird, it is true, is difficult to capture, and when captured is apt to change color. The only way to keep it from fading, apparently, is to give it away, cage and all, to someone else. But then the quest of it is adventurous and fascinating, and the glimpses one now and then gets of it are worth all the trouble. That is my reading of the philosophy of the play; and so far as the theory of happiness—the Blue Bird—is concerned, it is open to no particular objection. But ought a child to be taught to look for a sinister and treacherous hostility in all Nature? Ought his thoughts to be deliberately centred on the mysteries of birth and death? And, if this be considered desirable, ought he to be put off with trite sentimentalisms on the subject?

First, as to Nature. There is no doubt a sense in which the cruelty, and even, if you like to phrase it so, the treachery of Nature are fundamental facts of existence. From the point of view of humanitarian sentiment, the struggle for existence is scarcely a pleasing spectacle. But it is not this aspect of nature that M. Maeterlinck presents to us. He would have the child conceive that the commonplace Things around him are his secret and insidious foes. Even Bread and Sugar, those good familiar creatures, are presented in a most unamiable light. Sugar, it is true—especially at Christmas-time—is apt to cause a good deal of uneasiness. But it is not the sugar that is the enemy—it is the child's unbridled appetite for it—and I do not see why this obvious moral should be obscured for him. As for the trees and the domestic animals, why should the childish spirit be placed at feud with them? In the forest scene, after the battle is over, Light, the sententious and the wise, deliberately rubs in the moral: "You see that Man is all alone against all in this world"—all alone, save for the heroically abject Dog. A little earlier, the venerable Oak Tree says to the other trees and animals:—

"The child you see before you . . . is able to snatch from us a secret which we have kept since the origin of life. Now we know enough of Man to entertain no doubt as to the fate which he reserves for us once he is in possession of this secret."

Surely age has not brought wisdom to this Oak. He apparently founds his estimate of Man on the President of some American wood-pulp or turpentine trust. But this is wholly unfair. When Man is wise and happy, oak-trees, if not more numerous, will be healthier and more beautiful than ever they were. Nor do I believe that the oaks we know cherish any such short-sighted sentiments. They are perfectly willing to work out their destiny; and, if only we study their constitution, and do not subject their fibre to greater strains than it can bear, we need fear no treachery from them—they will be staunch to the death. The Horse, again—why are children to see a hypocritical enemy in that noble and patient, if somewhat silly, quadruped? I admit that the contrast between the servile, officious devotion of the Dog and the subtle selfishness of the Cat is admirably worked out. (Mr. William Watson, by the way, has drawn the same contrast in a fine poem.) But apart from this I cannot think that there is much depth, or even much relevance, in the treatment of Man's relation to the animal and plant world. There is humor and fantasy in plenty; but, from M. Maeterlinck, we look for something more.

Now, as to Death. The message on this subject, conveyed in two scenes—"The Land of Memory" and "The Kingdom of the Past"—is to the effect that the dead live in our thoughts of them, and, otherwise, have no existence at all. This is a more comfortable and suitable doctrine, no doubt, than some views of death that have in bygone days been presented to the childish mind; but I wonder whether an acute child would not be apt to suspect it at once of inadequacy and of insincerity. Will he not ask whether the poet really expects him to believe that, if "there are no dead," our memories of the departed can recall them to life in any sense that matters? Will he not divine in the vision of a graveyard converted into a "fairy-like and nuptial garden" an attempt to conceal from him something very painful, and ugly, and dreadful, under a rather thin surface-dressing of flowers—of speech? Perhaps I am attributing a prosaic and inappropriate definiteness both to the poet's message and to the child's reading of it. But, after all, what can be more definite, not to say dogmatic, than the assertion "There are no dead"? I do not think it would be an impossibly realistic child who should say, "If you must talk to me about death, let there be 'no flowers—by request.'"

The scene in the Palace of Night is delightfully humorous, and its optimism is, to my mind, better justified than the attempt to sentimentalise away the horrors of death. But here again—looking at it now from the grown-up, not from the childish, point of view—the poet's philosophy seems to be disappointingly shallow. It is all very well for Night to say, "All my Terrors are afraid, and dare not leave the house, and the greater part of my Sicknesses are ill." With a little latitude of interpretation, and looking a century or two ahead, we may admit this to be true. But there are many other caverns in the realm of Night that the poet leaves unexplored and unmentioned. What about the Injustices? What about the Cruelties? Above all, what about the grisly hole where the blind, brutish, Stupidities lie tangled in a writhing mass? As for the Ghosts, I do not know what Night can mean when she says they have "taken flight," or have "felt bored since Man ceased to take them seriously." Never, surely, have ghosts been livelier than at the present moment; never have they been taken more solemnly. Are there not learned societies all over the world devoted exclusively to their cultivation? Thirty years ago they lived only in Christmas Numbers; now there is a whole library of solid and not in the least Christmas-massy volumes devoted to their sayings and doings. Here I cannot find, with Mr. Trench, that the poet has "blended scientific observation with dream-work"; for it is certain that ghosts have of late taken a new lease of life. Or, if not ghosts, at any rate Mysteries; whereas Night complains that these, too, are at present at a discount. Seriously, the thought which inspires this scene seems to me a little perfunctory. It might have been much more relevant without being less amusing.

To sum up my doubts about "The Blue Bird," I cannot but ask myself what we should all have said if Mr. Barrie had written the play—by no means an extravagant supposition. Would not the verdict have run: "Very quaint—very charming—very humorous—but decidedly thin and superficial. How much profounder Maeterlinck would have made it!"

Last week saw the production of another philosophic play, "The Showing-up of Blanco Posnet." To call it a nail in the coffin of the Censorship would hardly be correct; for I take it the Censorship is already nailed down, and only awaits the formality of interment. Certainly it seems incredible that even the Lord Chamberlain, at this time of day, should have discerned immorality or irreverence in Mr. Shaw's fantasy. It is immensely vivacious and amusing, and its theology, so far as I can discern it, may almost be called orthodox. If Blanco Posnet had read "Literature and Dogma," he would probably have defined the divinity that shapes his ends as "something, not himself, that makes, when he least expects it, for doing the sporting thing." In the last analysis, I take it, the play is an affirmation on Mr. Shaw's part of faith in the ultimate decency of human nature—in the unaccountable fascination which the Idea of Good exercises over the human will. I do not see that that is a doctrine which ought to be suppressed by Act of Parliament.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Letters to the Editor.

THE CHARACTER OF THE INDIAN POLICE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Since you were good enough to publish my letter containing a report of the lamentable Gulab Bano case in India fresh events have occurred.

It will be remembered that this unfortunate woman was convicted in the summer of 1908 by a Sessions Judge in the Punjab (Mr. Kennedy) of having poisoned her husband on the strength of a statement held by the Judge to amount to a voluntary confession of guilt. Her answer was that this statement was wrung from her by the police under the agony of atrocious torture. Nevertheless she was sentenced to death, but when her case came up on appeal to the Chief Court of Lahore, the Judges unanimously set aside the conviction on the ground that her so-called confession was not voluntary, but was probably extorted from her by the terrible ill-treatment to which she had deposed.

Though careful not to prejudge the case, the Judges demanded a searching enquiry into the allegations against the police, and drew the special attention of the Government Advocate to the facts. Their judgment was delivered on December 2nd, 1908, but for some reason which requires explanation was not published in the Indian Press till February 2nd, 1909.

The acquittal of, and the order for, the discharge of the woman dated from December 2nd, 1908. Then comes a deplorable and impressive fact. The poor woman "died of fever on January 10th at the village of Ganda Kass, Police Station Pindi Ghe," to quote the official account. But the extraordinary thing is that though she died within a few weeks of the delivery of the Chief Court's judgment, yet no one in India, or here, seems to have been made acquainted with the fact of her death until a few weeks ago. During the intervening nine months the Government "enquiry" went slowly and silently on. Frequent questions were asked in Parliament with no result. At last came an elaborate decision by the Governor to the effect that the police were entirely innocent, and that the woman had probably inflicted upon herself the terrible injuries seen and sworn to by the official surgeon. But not one word was said to convey to the world that the most important witness, namely, the poor woman herself, had not been examined, and had been dead for nine months. Was there any enquiry as to how her fever was caused, any medical report, or any inquest?

As soon as the Government decision appeared, the Judges took the almost unprecedented course of saying that they would formally reply to it in open court. Accordingly, on November 20th, at Lahore, they read a long and carefully-prepared "order" recapitulating in full detail the grounds on which they had made the grave reflections upon the police. They again asserted that they did not in any way prejudge the case against the police, but that their suspicions still remained. They laid stress upon the fact that for three or four days the poor woman was taken by the police away from the jail without any warrant, and "was returned to jail in a deplorable condition." At the end of this "order" they announced that they proposed to append to their original judgment the following "rider":—

"No enquiry, such as was suggested by us as desirable in our judgment of 2nd December, 1908, into the conduct of the police in regard to this case has been made by the Executive Authorities, but His Honour, the Lieutenant-Governor, has called for a Memorandum from the Superintendent of Police concerned, and has considered that and the forwarding note of the Deputy Inspector-General, and the medical opinion by Colonel Cunningham, and the papers submitted to him; and after considering these papers and those of the incomplete enquiry made before the trial, has come to the conclusion that 'the injuries from which Gulab Bano was suffering on June 5th were not caused by the police, and also that the omission to call Head Constable Abdulla as a witness was not due to any intention to suppress evidence favorable to the accused.'"

The Judges had found that this Head Constable could have given evidence of the utmost importance in favor of the woman, but was not put into the box by the police.

What is the salient fact that emerges from this unique judicial pronouncement? That in spite of the earnest injunction of the Judges in December, 1908, that the evidence against the police of what can only be described as fiendish cruelty, was prima facie such as to call for searching enquiry by the Executive, no such enquiry at all has ever been held, but that the police have been completely whitewashed, simply on the strength of a secret Memorandum by the superior officers of the very men directly affected by the strictures of the Judges. Nay, more. Not only as to the truth of the allegations of torture made against the police, but as to the value and relevancy of evidence to be called, the Governor and his policemen openly set aside the opinion of the highest Court in the Province. Still worse, the clear evidence of the experienced prison doctor who examined the poor woman, and found her injuries to be exactly in accordance with her story, is discarded by the Governor in favor of a theoretical opinion given more than a year afterwards, by a medical professor in Lahore. And it is with this that Parliament and the public are expected to be satisfied. As for the Judges, the Executive thus deals with them:—

"If your Lordships find yourself unable to concur in his decision, the Lieutenant-Governor regrets that it should be so, but so far as the Government is concerned, the decision is a final one, and as such has been communicated to the Head of the Police."

—Yours, &c.,

FREDERIC MACKARNES.

December 15th, 1909.

THE PREMIER AND THE FRANCHISE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The Premier's reference to woman's suffrage at the Albert Hall leaves this most bitter and painful of our contemporary controversies exactly where it has stood for two years. He is still opposed in principle to this reform, and is prepared to allow it to be carried by a free vote of the Commons only in a way which makes its success at once precarious and remote. A Reform Bill is necessarily the work of the last session of a Parliament (which means incidentally that in a dispute with the Lords it can gain nothing from the Campbell-Bannerman plan for circumventing the veto). At the best, then, we are doomed to another four years of protest and repression. The Reform Bill, when it comes, cannot stop far short of establishing manhood suffrage. The suffragist amendment would therefore convert it into a measure of adult suffrage. When the various "limited" Bills, which would have added about 1,250,000 women voters to the register were refused facilities, we were invariably told that such a reform was much too large to be carried, save on the responsibility of a Government. It is now suggested that the vastly larger step of enfranchising 7,500,000 women at once should be carried by the leaderless votes of private members. With none of the powerful women's organisations behind it, with neither party, and with no leader of national repute to back it in the country, without so much as the aid of the Liberal Whips, adult suffrage cannot, I fear, be carried. A single suffragist organisation in three years alone has held some 20,000 propagandist meetings for the "limited" Bill, and this, we are told, is not enough. I doubt if twenty meetings, and those obscure ones, have been held for adult suffrage. But the most fatal objection of all to this plan is virtually admitted by the Premier himself. He states that all parties are divided on the suffrage. It follows that if ever this reform is to be carried without Government aid, it must be by the consent of most of its adherents in all parties. But to stipulate in advance that it must take the form of adult suffrage is to alienate at once all the Conservative votes which helped to secure (and were necessary to secure) the substantial majority for Mr. Stanger's Bill. The Government in short, while affecting to be neutral, does, in fact, intervene to veto the only hopeful tactics. "You shall," it says, "have your chance; you will be allowed a free vote, but in return for this privilege we insist that you shall divide your forces." Mr. Asquith is at least frank. He avows his hostility, and with perfect consistency goes on to prescribe a plan of action which ensures defeat.

This insistence that woman's suffrage shall be carried, if at all, only as an incidental addition to a contentious Bill dealing with the intricacies of registration, with plural votes, London areas, the second ballot, and possibly redistribution, is an attempt to ignore a great issue as pedantic as it is insulting. I talked recently on this question with two Liberal leaders whose names are household words. Both excused the shelving of woman's suffrage, one on the ground that it is "a mere side-issue," the other because it is "a tremendous revolution." A "side-issue" for which in peaceful, plethoric England 430 women have gone to prison is to me as puzzling as a "revolution" which can be effected by an amendment interpolated in an irrelevant Bill. The removal of the disability of sex is a social rather than a political question, and demands separate treatment in a Bill which stirs no party passions. Those who think of women as a form of property or as the predestined satellites and ministers of men hold one view; those who think of them (in the Kantian phrase) as citizens in a "kingdom of ends" hold another. It is a fundamental division which cuts across the boundaries between parties. The vote is an engine which will have an immense power in bettering the economic position of all women workers, but its chief importance is that it will be the symbol of the new status of women, destined to revolutionise at once the way in which we think of them, and the way in which they think of themselves. To suggest the interpolation of such a reform in a Bill for remodelling electoral areas and abolishing plural votes is as reasonable as it would be to suggest the carrying of Irish Home Rule by an unofficial amendment to a Bill dealing with Welsh and Scottish local government. I should like to hear Mr. Redmond's views on the value of such an offer as that. So long as politicians refuse to take the women seriously, so long as they affect to ignore this central fact that they are fighting for the status of their sex and not for a symmetrical remodelling of our franchise, so long will the militant campaign continue, and with abundant justification. If no Government will assume the responsibility, there remains only one way of escape—the passage in the first Session of the new Parliament, with the aid of men of good will on both front benches and with the friendly neutrality of the Government, of a simple measure removing the disability of sex. That issue settled early in the new Parliament, I hope, for my part, that the Government would go on to enlarge the boon by proposing adult suffrage before its close.

Meanwhile the horrors of this warfare are being wantonly aggravated. The hunger-strike is the sort of passive challenge to which a subject class naturally resorts (as the Quakers used to do), when it fails to persuade its nominal friends to effective action, and is too weak or too scrupulous to use a dangerous degree of force. "If you will not freely concede justice, at least you shall no longer merely ignore our claims; you shall choose between these two alternatives—to carry out what are after all your own principles, or else to persecute us." That I take to be the meaning of the women's protest; and to persecution it has now come. Forcible feeding, as Sir Victor Horsley has well said, is the "expedient of a weak Minister, and an outrage on a political offender." It is something worse than a painful and disgusting operation; it is a degradation which sears the spirit and breaks the will, in order to render possible the infliction of a degree of punishment out of all proportion either to the offence or to the sentence. Take, for example, the case of Miss Marsh, released last week from Birmingham after serving more than the normal period of her three months' sentence. She went in a spirited and beautiful girl of twenty-two. She came out, looking, as one who saw her put it, "like a bent and broken old woman." Her throat and chest were in continual pain, the result of 139 insertions of the stomach-tube. Her doctor certifies that she is "emaciated, as though recovering from a severe illness." She was, indeed, so weak that it was necessary to send a prison official with her by train to her home in Newcastle. It happened that during her imprisonment her father became mortally ill. Efforts were made to induce the Home Office to consent to her release, and she was willing to give her parole to refrain from militant action during the remainder of her full period of three months. But even the fortnight's "remission" allowed to ordinary prisoners was at first refused her, because by resisting the torture of the nasal tube she had forfeited the privileges of "good conduct." When at last, after serving two of the extra days, she was released, the tardy mercy came too late; her father died unconscious. It is a cold and deliberate malice which is pursuing these women. Another young girl, Miss Clarkson, was on Monday sentenced at Liverpool to two weeks in the second division for breaking windows, valued officially at 6d., during her imprisonment in the heat of August in a punishment cell. For four months the Home Office cherished its project of revenge, and at last, as the prosecution avowed, by its express instructions, the charge has been pressed home. What, I wonder, would be thought of a private individual who, to avenge the loss of 6d., prosecuted a private enemy after an interval of four months, knowing that imprisonment would involve starvation and torture? I will not use words to characterise such vindictiveness as this. I shall make my comment at the ballot-box in January. It lies with those of us who are not docile partisans to insist that this Minotaur Government shall cease to levy its tribute.—Yours, &c.,

H. N. BRAILSFORD.

32, Well Walk, Hampstead,

December 14th, 1909.

[Does Mr. Brailsford seriously believe that forcible feeding—objectionable as we think it to be—is a "vindictive" proceeding, or that this "Minotaur Government" has any other object in resorting to it than to avoid the death of prisoners for whose lives it is responsible?—ED. NATION.]

THE ULTIMATE BASIS OF AUTHORITY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I will make one more effort—and I will promise you, sir, that it shall be an expiring effort—to keep "Liberal Voter" to the point. But he is rather a nimble controversialist. Apparently he does not adhere even to the same anonymous signature. One week he is "Liberal Voter," another week he is "M. A." At all events, "Liberal Voter" feels himself called upon to defend "M. A.'s" letter. If I am mistaken in my identification and he is not "two single gentlemen rolled into one," he must please blame, not me, but his anonymity and his double.

Anyhow, he is nimble enough in shifting his ground. The exact point at issue is whether force is or is not the last resort of defied authority. I have, practically, put the question to him, "If force is not the last resort, what is?" To this he does not reply, unless it be a reply to suggest (by implication) that a powerful majority of the male population, if beaten at the polls by the help of a preponderance of women votes, might find a substitute for force in the passive resistance of the early Christians.

When I put in what I deemed its true relation to the "last resort" Hume's dictum that government was founded upon opinion, he says that I "let Hume alone."

When I interpret Professor Dicey's citation of Hume by his express statement that "government itself depends at bottom upon force," he says that Professor Dicey is on my side as a pamphleteer, but not as a philosopher.

When I summon Mr. Bryce also to witness for me, he produces a quotation in which Mr. Bryce, who is opposed to woman suffrage, describes it as a less fearsome thing politically than socially.

When I point out that men alone can be soldiers, he ranks this as my "funniest" argument, because women can be nurses.

When I contend that force is obviously the last resort, he flings St. Augustine and Horace at my head, as if "justice" were the last resort, and as if I dreamt that anything but justice could employ force with any hope of final success, as when injustice, with force, met justice, with force also, in our Parliamentary struggle against Charles the First and in the American Civil War. Nor when he talks of justice does he tell us what his "justice" is, but leaves us to conclude that he holds it just (or, as Mill would have said, expedient) for the weaker sex, if it has votes enough, to govern, and for political power to correspond to tax-paying.

Lastly, when I imagine a quite possible case in which the majority of women might, on some burning question of public policy, side with a minority of men, he twists my idea into that of the "two sexes ranged into hostile camps," and rebukes me sapiently for forgetting that "men and women attract each other." With what political result, may I ask? That they all find themselves on the same side? Perhaps "Liberal Voter," or "M. A.," or both, will pursue this vague conception till he (or they) can enable us to understand where it comes in.

But controversy conducted on "Liberal Voter's" nimble principles might go on for ever. To argue with such a disputant at intervals of a fortnight is utterly inadequate. To speak in metaphor from the Wild West, his hand needs spiking upon the table while the card is in it.

When a man, being persecuted in one city, flees to another, the only resource is to leave him there. And that is what I propose henceforth to do, having indeed but little leisure for the chase of mere agility. Thanking you for your courtesy.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN MASSIE.

Oxford, December 11th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Dr. Massie does not, it appears, traverse my contention that voters record their opinions and representatives are selected on grounds wholly unconnected with force whether in its primitive physical form or in its modern incarnation of highly organised armies and navies. But he asserts that, although our representatives are not soldiers, they belong to the sex which alone can be soldiers. Was there ever set forth a claim of oligarchical privilege so naked and unashamed? One figures to oneself some white-haired country solicitor thus addressing a group of recalcitrant suffragettes: "It is not through any intellectual or pecuniary considerations that I possess a vote. Many of you are my equals in wealth and in education; not a few doubtless surpass me in mental acumen, in political insight, and in all that makes for good citizenship. It is true also that personally I am not a soldier. If I held a loaded revolver in my hand those of my friends who were wise would bolt promptly for cover; should I succeed in ascending a horse one side, it would be only to descend with much accelerated velocity on the other. But no matter. I belong to the sex which produces soldiers, and therefore I possess that vote for which you so impotently clamor."

So much for the ethical aspect. And few will share Dr. Massie's apprehension of some future Civil War, when the voters shall forsake the polling booths to join in some grand Armageddon—"like 1645, only better." Things are not settled in that way now in civilised States. The existence of large and highly organised navies and standing armies, the invention of high explosives, machine guns and long range weapons of precision, have rendered the old methods of revolution for ever obsolete. That is why the revolution failed in Russia. Governments now possess weapons of overwhelming strength to crush malcontents; hence constitutional changes can only be effected by altering the opinions or the personnel of the governing body. As a matter of fact the military are employed more and more rarely in these islands; the last experiment at Belfast was distinctly discouraging.

Nor can one treat very seriously the chimera of some contested question in which the women voters shall stand mainly on one side and the men on the other. Women are human beings like ourselves, and, like ourselves, are divided into groups of different shades of political opinions. The experience in Australia, in New Zealand, and in Finland is pretty decisive on this point. But let that pass; let us suppose such a position to arise where the women voters, relying on no force other than that conferred by the Constitution, should by a vote en masse carry a measure over the heads of the men. Does Dr. Massie believe that those male voters who have seen, without a thought of reverting to violence, a mere handful of men, not more than 350 in all, possessing absolutely no power except that given by the Constitution, in no way mentally distinguished from similar numbers of educated men, wreck Bill after Bill tendered by the people's representatives, obstruct for long years all progressive legislation, and finally trample on the most cherished rights of the Commons, does he believe that a nation of such voters would take up arms when a single obnoxious measure was carried by the votes of some six million women? If so, he will find few to agree with him.

In this letter I have necessarily confined myself to the practical aspects of the question. But all those of us who remember the arguments of Herbert Spencer concerning the sinister influence of militarism on national development, will regard with regret and disapproval the procuring from so dark and ill-omened a source of weapons to combat the just aspirations of one-half of the English people.—Yours, &c.,

BERNARD HOUGHTON.

Broomy Lodge, near Ringwood,

December 6th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you allow me to protest against what seems to me the very mischievous doctrine taught in Dr. Massie's letter under this heading?

To put it strongly, he seems to me to set Pilate above Christ. Does Hume anywhere say that Government founded on opinion must have force (physical and muscular force) as its last resort?

The quotation which Dr. Massie gives from Professor Dicey's last book is just that which made that little treatise seem to me a complete fallacy. Government is, indeed, founded on force, but not on physical force; not upon bayonets, but on that moral and spiritual force called Authority or Discipline, closely akin to Public Opinion, which can command the bayonets, and they obey it.

Our country is now engaged in a great Constitutional contest, in the discharge of a national duty—the election of the fittest persons to form the representative house. We shall discharge this duty, not by physical force, but by the simple power of will. If the qualification of a voter is the same as that of a soldier, why am I, who am nearly sixty-nine years old, still permitted to vote?—Yours, &c.,

T. WILSON.

Harpenden, December 6th.

[This controversy must now close. The letters to which Dr. Massie refers were not by the same writer.—ED., NATION.]

MAKING THE FOREIGNER PAY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Rowland Hunt appears to belong to that class which believes if it says a thing often enough, true or untrue, it will come to be believed. Hence I am obliged again to tell him that an assumption and a fact are not the same thing.

Senator La Follette of Wisconsin, U.S.A., in an article lately published, says, regarding the Tariff Act of 1909, that the tariff is a tax added to the price of what the people consume in order to enable American manufacturers to pay "American" wages and retain the home market against the foreigner who is paying lower wages. For the collection of this tax the American "Captains of Industry" are made the people's tax-gatherers, but he shows that in effect the tariff has become the instrument of wholesale plunder, and is thus "an outrage upon the consuming public and a disgrace to the national Government."

Mr. Rowland Hunt will find it difficult to make Senator La Follette believe that the foreigner pays the import duties, and not he and his class. Hear his final words in regard to the results of the tariff system, a system invented to give monopoly opportunities to a limited number of manufacturers and proprietors, which Mr. Rowland Hunt and his fellows would like to see introduced into this tiny island of ours where a fiscal mistake means utter ruin:—

"These 'profits' are not profits, but are the fruits of 'graft' and theft, the plunderings of money gluttons run mad in their insatiate greed, piling fortune on fortune until their accumulated wealth has become a menace to Society, corrupting and dominating the people's Government."

The United Kingdom already sees the consequences, or a few of them, of a monopoly grown into a trust, in the liquor trade—it has captured the House of Lords, and will try and capture the constituencies through the public-house and its vile literature. If we, as a nation, are almost helpless now, what will happen to us if the disease spreads over all our commerce? This election is our Waterloo.—Yours, &c.,

A. GRIMSHAW HAYWOOD.

December 12th, 1909.

SHERIDAN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have seen one or two statements in your reviewer's depreciation of my book on Sheridan, with which I hope I may be permitted to deal, however imperfectly, for at present I am much occupied. No serious author cares to be impaled on pinpoints, or to see "vital" issues disregarded.

Throughout my two volumes I have insisted on Fox's growing suspicion and lasting disparagement of Sheridan, who was among his most attached, though he was also the most independent, of his friends. I have given a whole chain of unquestionable evidence from 1787 onwards up to the time of Fox's re-entrance into place. And I have pointed out and substantiated that in 1797—when Fox had seceded and retired from active opposition—Lord Moira emphatically declared that such suspicions ought never to have been entertained. Your reviewer, however, ignoring these general facts, and amiably suggesting that they are based on "flimsy" foundations, seeks to trip me up in a single excerpt from a letter which Fox wrote to Adair on November 25th, 1792. And he cites this as an instance of my "carelessness."

It is a point of construction. Even if your reviewer be right, and perhaps he may be, that would not upset my main position. But the construction of that letter is not quite such plain sailing as your reviewer fancies. He has omitted the context of events which he brushes away as a mere "quarrel between the two sections of the Whigs."

Let me briefly recall the crisis. At that moment of disruption the orthodox Whigs were on the verge of throwing Fox over and joining Pitt. Indeed, a letter from Grenville to Fox, received shortly after Fox's communication to Adair, is said to have decided a matter which the sway of Burke over Portland and the old guard had already rendered almost a certainty. Fox himself meditated an immediate secession, and that isolation from active politics which he carried into effect some years afterwards. No wonder that he was despondent. The orthodox Whigs followed Burke in his vindication of the anti-Jacobin war; Grey and Sheridan had joined the semi-Jacobin club of the Friends of the People, and the Whigs were further split on all sides by their internal divergences as to the re-mooted question of Parliamentary Reform. But though Fox despaired of the situation, he soon afterwards actually allowed himself to attempt one of his repeated efforts at a junction with Pitt.

Under these circumstances Fox wrote that he had overheard Adair telling Sheridan that the Portlandites were ready for conciliation with the Foxites, or, as he wrote a little later, that they would "forgive"—a word that he could not stomach. He says that he can see no such disposition, but he is sure, he adds, that Grey, Sheridan, and Lauderdale are all "manageable men," and proof against the wiles of the revolutionary societies. I construed this to mean that they were "manageable" by those orthodox Whigs from whom Fox already meditated secession, or, in other words, that Fox, who certainly was not "manageable," doubted of Grey, Sheridan, and Lauderdale seceding with him. "Manageable" here is not an ordinary word to choose. Your reviewer, preferring letter to spirit, thinks "manageable" a compliment. Why, then, did not Fox use the word "reasonable"? Would it have been "complimentary" on the part of Mr. Gladstone when the Unionists deserted him to have called, say, the late Sir William Vernon Harcourt a "manageable" man? But let this pass. Let your reviewer's construction be correct, that does not, however, invalidate my ground, nor does it establish my "carelessness." I gave him the reference to track. So be it.

Your reviewer again takes me to task for suppressing a sentence which Fox used about his attitude of hostility towards two private conferences on the part of Sheridan with Warren Hastings's friends just before Fox brought in his India Bill. I should have thought a full citation unnecessary since I summarised it in the same part of my text by saying (Vol. 2, p. 43), "Fox flatly repudiated the slightest idea of 'proposal or accommodation,'" while immediately afterwards (p. 44) I continue in my argument (which, pace your reviewer, is one for probability not certainty), "When we remember that in 1787 Fox as flatly denied the Prince's marriage with Mrs. Fitzherbert," &c. Moreover, I did quote the piece about "the necessity" for Warren Hastings's "recall." Can, then, your reviewer be said to have read my text carefully? Is this a sample of my carelessness? And I must add that he does not inform the reader that I am the first to have brought these two conferences of 1783, and the debate on them in 1786, to light.

It would be ungracious to say much more. I can assure your reviewer that my inferences are not based on "flimsy" foundations; but on knowledge—and inner knowledge—more extensive than anyone can claim without the aid of documents.

I was, however, amazed to find him impugning me for neglecting Sheridan's humanitarian exertions. I have especially emphasised them, and I have dwelt on his approaching political problems from the standpoint of human sympathy. If I have not excerpted the prisons speech, it was because in presenting the political drama within the space of two volumes the main action was the most imperative. Nor was I less amazed at the suggestion that I had not included Sheridan's pranks, and your reviewer's appeal to the late gossip of Creevey.

Once more, he has left quite out of sight my analysis and presentation of Sheridan for the first time as a generous sentimentalist.

One last consideration, in all good humor. Taking the standpoint of the reviewer, I dislike the charity of his damnation. Why, if he attacks the whole, "admire" the industry, and be disappointed at the result. Why kindly suggest that I should edit the "Rolliad"? I confess that a wild guess flitted through my mind as I read. Could it be that your reviewer himself had been one of Sheridan's bygone commentators?

After all, this is the old quarrel between the "men of leaves" and the "men of letters," and I hope that your readers will test the review by perusing the book, which I can assure its censor is standing quite firmly on its own feet.

Nor should I have troubled you (or myself) in these matters, were it not that he looked so wise, and shook his head so solemnly.—Yours, &c.,

WALTER SICHEL.

December 9th, 1909.

P.S.—As regards carelessness in trifles, "prevent," in your review, should stand "pervert," and "Creevy" "Creevey."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It would be a pleasure to be able to share Mr. Sichel's genuine enthusiasm for his book, or his confidence in his "inner knowledge" of his subject. Unfortunately, I can only judge of his ability to make use of documents that are private by the use he makes of documents that are public. I gave a few examples of his want of care in mastering and presenting the facts on which his conclusions depend. In two of these instances he thinks my criticisms unjust and superficial. I am obliged, therefore, to return to them.

Mr. Sichel contends that Fox's letter to Adair can be taken as showing that Fox at that time suspected both Sheridan and Grey. I contend that this construction is impossible. Let me give the letter:—

November 26th, 1792.

DEAR ADAIR,—Notwithstanding the apparent good spirits you saw me in, the truth is that what I saw and heard in London has made a most deep and painful impression on my mind; and I grow very doubtful about the possibility of preserving those connections which I love and esteem as much as ever, and without which I do not feel that I ever can act in political matters with any satisfaction to myself.

My reason for writing to you upon this now, is that I overheard you say to Sheridan that there was much disposition in what is called the aristocratic part of the party to concede and conciliate; and though I confess this is totally contrary to my own observation, I cannot help catching at anything that gives me the least glimpse of hope. Perhaps you only said this to Sheridan in order to inspire him and others with similar dispositions to those which you described on the other side, and this I fear to be the case, for I must repeat that not one symptom of the kind has appeared to me. If any such disposition existed, I cannot help thinking that on the other side I should have weight enough to produce a correspondent disposition, if it did not exist without my interposition. I am sure that Lauderdale, Grey, and Sheridan, are all manageable men and the rascals of the democratic party (for there are such on all sides) have not set their wits to pervert them, in the way that those on the aristocratic side have to pervert the Duke of Portland, Fitzwilliam, Windham, &c. Just as I was leaving town yesterday, I heard a report that Lord Loughborough had accepted the Great Seal, but I have reason to fear that it is not true. That event would open many eyes, and I should be full of hopes that the destruction of the Whigs was not irrevocably predestined. The circumstances of the times ought rather to excite you to going on with your plan than to deter you from it, if you have spirits for it.

Yours ever,

C. J. Fox.

If Mr. Courtney had tried in 1886 to reconcile Mr. Gladstone and Lord Hartington, and Mr. Gladstone had written to Mr. Courtney saying that he had overheard him tell Sir William Harcourt that Mr. Goschen and Lord Hartington were conciliatory, and that he was sure that if that was the case, he (Mr. Gladstone) would have some influence with Sir William Harcourt and Mr. John Morley, for they were both "manageable men," could anybody in his senses pretend that manageable meant that they were likely to desert Mr. Gladstone? What Mr. Sichel means by saying that he first brought to light the debate of 1786, or the communication between Sheridan and Scott in 1783, I cannot imagine. These speeches were not buried away in some remote hiding place; they are published in the collected speeches of Fox and Sheridan, and thousands of obscure people besides myself must have read them years before Mr. Sichel discovered them. My complaint was and is that Mr. Sichel tries to refute Dr. Parr's evidence, as given by Moore, the most important evidence there is on the subject, by representing that evidence as inconsistent with Fox's own words in the House of Commons. There is no such inconsistency, as anyone will see who turns to the speech from which Mr. Sichel quoted a fragment of a sentence.

As for Mr. Sichel's defence of his neglect of Sheridan's social and humanitarian policy, I have only to say that his book runs to over a thousand pages (not counting appendices), that it finds room for such events as a performance of Sheridan's plays in 1909, and yet it contains the barest mention of Sheridan's share in the agitation about the Coldbaths prison, and no mention at all of his great speeches against the Combination Laws. A statesman who had played Sheridan's part in those affairs would, I imagine, prefer that his biographer should mention them, rather than that he should analyse his hero as a "generous sentimentalist." Mr. Sichel is never careless in trifles.—Yours, &c.,

THE REVIEWER OF MR. SICHEL'S "SHERIDAN."

December 14th, 1909.

Poetry.

THE REVOLUTIONIST: OR, LINES TO A STATESMAN.

"I was never standing by while a Revolution was going on."
Speech by the Right Hon. Walter Long.

WHEN death was on thy drums, democracy,
And with one rush of slaves the world was free,
In that high dawn that Kings shall not forget,
A void there was, and Walter was not yet.
Through sacked Versailles, at Valmy in the fray,
They did without him in some kind of way;
Red Christendom all Walterless they cross,
And in their fury hardly feel their loss . . .
Fades the Republic; faint as Roland's horn,
Her trumpets taunt us with a sacred scorn. . .
Then silence fell: and Mr. Long was born.

From his first hours in his expensive cot,
He never saw the tiniest viscount shot;
In deference to his wealthy parents' whim,
The mildest massacres were kept from him;
The wars that dyed Pall Mall and Brompton red,
Passed harmless o'er that one unconscious head:
For all that little Long could understand,
The rich might still be rulers of the land;
Vain are the pious arts of parenthood,
Foiled revolution bubbled in his blood:
Until one day (the babe unborn shall rue it)
The Constitution bored him: and he slew it.

If I were wise and good and rich and strong—
Fond, impious thought, if I were Walter Long—
If I could water sell like molten gold,
And make grown people do as they are told,
If over private fields and wastes, as wide
As a Greek city for which heroes died,
I owned the houses and the men inside—
If all this hung on one thin thread of habit,
I would not revolutionise a rabbit.

I would sit tight, with all my gifts and glories,
And even preach to unconverted Tories
That the fixed system that our land inherits,
Viewed from a certain standpoint, has its merits,
I'd guard the laws like any Radical,
And keep each precedent, however small,
However subtle, musty, dusty, dreamy,
Lest men by chance should look at me and see me.
Lest men should ask what madman made me lord
Of English ploughshares and the English sword;
Lest men should mark how sleepy is the nod
That drills the dreadful images of God;
Walter, be wise: avoid the wild and new,
The Constitution is the game for you:
Walter, beware; scorn not the gathering throng,
It suffers, yet it may not suffer wrong;
It suffers: but it cannot suffer Long.
And if you goad it these grey rules to break,
For a few pence; see that you do not wake
Death and the splendor of the scarlet cap,
Boston and Valmy, Yorktown and Jemmappes,
Freedom in arms, the riding and the routing,
The thunder of the captains and the shouting;
All that lost riot that you did not share—
And when that riot comes . . . you will be there.

G. K. CHESTERTON.

Reviews.

TRAGIC LIFE.*

It is remarkable that the two greatest novelists of our time (or of the time that is just ending) should both have written poetry of a kind that is possibly more individual and more challenging than their prose fiction. Perhaps, however, that is not so very remarkable; although at first blush one might suppose a novelist would put his most intense work into the form of art which had become the chief nature of his creative mind. But if he does not make of his poetry a pleasant escape from peering into the keen weather of reality, he will be likely to make it the quintessence of his inspiration. George Meredith was not the man, and Mr. Thomas Hardy is certainly not the man, to desire any escape from reality; and therefore we find that the poetry of each is of this quintessential, intensely personal kind. We have no intention of concluding from this that the poetry of Meredith and Mr. Hardy is of more worth than their novels; it would be a rash brain that would attempt to decide the question of values in such a matter. But it is a point worth remembering when we consider the critical estimates placed upon the fiction and the poetry of these two great writers. The poetry of the man whose main intellectual habit has been poetry, will rarely be the quintessence of his inspiration; for he will probably find it convenient, both for himself and for those to whom he ministers, to employ, like an apothecary, some vehicle to carry the essence. The same may be said of the man whose chief mental activity has been inventing fiction; his novels will contain his inspiration enclosed in a comparatively inert vehicle. And while the inspiration is the vital and important thing, it is often the vehicle that makes it assimilable and not too confounding in its pungency. For an essence, in truth, is not always a very potable liquor; its flavors are too burning and too amazing for many palates, and, it may be, its fierce medicinal qualities too noticeable.

It is easy to see, then, that many who will delightedly drink of an inspiration when it is mixed and somewhat dulcified in a vehicle, in a novel, for instance, will find the same inspiration rather choking and perhaps repellent when they meet with it in essence. This has been true of many of Mr. Hardy's lyrical poems—for what we have been saying obviously cannot apply to "The Dynasts"; and we are sure it will be true of Mr. Hardy's latest volume of lyrics, "Time's Laughingstocks." Putting "The Dynasts," which everyone now acknowledges to be a splendid piece of work, on one side, many of Mr. Hardy's sincerest admirers have seriously doubted whether his poetical work could be in any way reckoned as considerable as his fiction, whether, indeed, he could be properly reckoned a poet at all. We believe this to be largely due to the fact that, not desiring to mix, as in his novels, his utterance with any vehicular stuff, he has in his poems reduced the mighty but discomfiting inspiration of "The Mayor of Casterbridge" and "Jude the Obscure" to a harsh, fiery essence, an essence in many ways even more disconcerting than the heady spirit of Meredith's poetry. And in "Time's Laughingstocks" Mr. Hardy's tremendous power is more disconcertingly essentialised than ever. It follows, moreover, that his poetry, being of this nature, will, like Meredith's, be written in a style in sharp contrast with most contemporary poetical styles; we find in it so little of what modern poetry gives us, so much that modern poetry carefully avoids, that many may, not excusably, yet not unnaturally, wonder if we can strictly call such writing poetry, or at any rate good poetry. Another reason for the misprision of Mr. Hardy's poetry is one that it is not possible to combat, and that is, the common English disinclination to believe that a man who has famously succeeded in one form of art can also succeed as notably in another, quite different form. This prejudice, the unusual manner of his verse, and the intensely concentrated iron-bitter spirit of it, have all worked against Mr. Hardy's reputation as a poet. Yet, as in the parallel but widely separated instance of Meredith, we believe that Mr.

Hardy's poetry will come to be recognised as being quite as notable and as honorable as his fiction.

Anyone who desires that poetry should show the way to keen, delicious raptures of thought and feeling, that it should always be ecstatic adoration of the First Beauty, will assuredly be disappointed in "Time's Laughingstocks." But there is never anything to be gained by limiting in our critical ideas the scope and purpose of poetry; and there is, moreover, a very large body of magnificent poetry in our literature to which Mr. Hardy's verse corresponds exactly, both in its positive and its negative qualities, its achievement, and its austerity. The primary aim of Mr. Hardy's poetry is the exhibition of tragic life, of the ceaseless conflict between the conscious personal will in life and "the all-immanent Will" that wields the "vast material pomp of force." So that he can do this, he is not greatly concerned about the sweet concord of words; the tragedy is the thing. And Mr. Hardy has now arrived at a marvellous precision and nicety of practice. He can give us in a few stanzas the whole bitter, struggling tragedy of a life, the consciousness of a man or a woman trapped in the ruthless procession of the world and hurried clean against personal will into anguish. There are few tears in Mr. Hardy's poetry; the sorrow of the life we see in it is dry-eyed, an agony too sharp for weeping. To be presented, in perhaps half a hundred lines, with a tragedy that would have been powerful enough if written out in a full-length novel, is something that many will hardly desire. Yet we think Mr. Hardy's example an extremely salutary one to the poets of to-day, who tend to remove their work further and further from the hard, pitiable experiences of every-day humanity. To find anything closely comparable to Mr. Hardy's poetry, we must go back to the old ballads; not to the supernatural, riding, or battle ballads, but to those noble ones which deal with tragic events among ordinary people. Dunbar speaks of "ballat-making" and "tragedie" in a breath; and many of the ballads deserve the dignity for their intense preoccupation with and profound knowledge of the human soul. This is the spirit of Mr. Hardy's poems; but to this is superadded a great speculative vision of the general drift of a world-enthralled humanity. There is no poetry of our time, and little, outside the dramatic, in all our literature, that can equal Mr. Hardy's, especially in this latest volume of his, for a revelation of tragic life. In most of the poems of "Time's Laughingstocks," the villain of the piece is, as we might expect, Time itself; it is astonishing, for instance, how frequently and with what tremendous effect Mr. Hardy uses such a trite theme as the decay of a woman's charm. Throughout the volume there are only a few poems that we cannot call the distillation into its perfect essence of a human tragedy. The urge of sex is evident in most; Mr. Hardy's vision of life is too true to underestimate the terrible value of passion in the human play. And in every tragedy there is some psychological subtlety that makes it unique. "A Trampwoman's Tragedy," the dreadful but superb "Sunday Morning Tragedy," "The Flirt's Tragedy"—these are perhaps the three greatest poems. But in "A Wife and Another" and "The Noble Lady's Tale," we have situations not mortally tragic, but nevertheless revealing the bare lineaments of character, as quicklime reveals the bones of a corpse, in a way that makes them altogether unforgettable. There are several poems that cannot come quite under the heading of tragedy, such as some brilliant sonnets and the (usually ironic) love-poems; or as a few philosophic lyrics, like "Wagtail and Baby" and "Yellham-wood's Story," or the fine poem on George Meredith; or again the remarkable version of the old legend of Christ's fatherhood, "Panthera," or those poems which are direct questionings, of, or, rather, accusations against, the Power behind life.

All these are fine; but the most notable contributions to English poetry in this volume are, after all, those poems which are poems chiefly by virtue of their intense concentration of tragic human life. Matter and manner are absolutely married in Mr. Hardy's verse. It is never a subject enclosed in poetry; seldom can we find in it any decorative phrasing, words not demanded by the central emotion. It is the common rough experience of humanity, not joined to poetry, but made poetry, fused into poetry. And when we say that the subject, the tragedy, is the thing in Mr. Hardy's

* "Time's Laughingstocks, and Other Verses." By Thomas Hardy. Macmillan. 4s. 6d. net.

poetry, we must by no means be understood to mean that he is careless of technique. On the contrary, the technique is exceedingly highly wrought, and usually takes the form of a difficult but ringing stanza, and a very strict system of rhyme. We will quote the opening stanzas of three poems; they will show the purity of his diction as well as the definiteness of his metres and rhymes. Only those, however, who read the whole book can fully realise the extraordinary appropriateness of the diction and the metre to the mood. This is the beginning of "The Revisitation," an ironic story of love lost and found:—

"As I lay awake at night-time
In an ancient country barrack known to ancient cannoneers,
And recalled the hopes that heralded each seeming brave and bright time
Of my primal purple years."

Here is the first verse of "A Trampwoman's Tragedy," a magnificent ballad of a jest's grim consequence, a tale that would have made a noble play:—

"From Wynyard's Gap the livelong day,
The livelong day,
We beat afoot the northward way
We had travelled times before.
The sun-blaze burning on our backs,
Our shoulders sticking to our packs,
By fosseway, fields, and turnpike tracks
We skirted sad Sedge-Moor."

And here is the stanza of "The Rash Bride," a swinging measure that makes the sorry tale all the more pitiable:—

"We Christmas-carolled down the Vale, and up the Vale, and round the Vale,
We played and sang that night as we were yearly wont to do—
A carol in a minor key, a carol in the major D.
Then at each house: 'Good wishes: many Christmas joys to you!'"

Nor are lines memorable for themselves lacking; though in poetry of such austere and elemental nature they are necessarily rare. But who could forget this admirable line?:—

"The wind of winter moored and mouthed their chimney like a horn."

And there is plenty of phrasing as fine as this, of a child-birth:—

"Source of ecstatic hopes and fears
And innocent maternal vanity,
Your fond exploit but shapes for tears
New thoroughfares in sad humanity."

But no poet is so difficult to represent in quotation as Thomas Hardy, for the simple reason that we must quote each poem in entirety to show its real greatness, its vivid revelation of psychology, and the perfect union of theme and medium. For Hardy-enthusiasts it is worth mentioning, perhaps, that Marty South and the Mellstock Quire reappear, the appearance of the latter, for those who can read it properly, being as grievous a tragedy as any; and throughout the book it is Wessex, Wessex all the way.

For spiritual exaltation or for radiant visionary beauty, we must, assuredly, go to other poets; but for a vision of humanity, of humanity nobly and stubbornly enduring slings and arrows, for stern questionings of comfortable morality ("A Wife and Another," and "The Dark-Eyed Gentleman" force us, in a few verses, to see morality for ourselves as clearly as any whole play of Ibsen's), for high and purging tragedy made, not out of the lives of queens and princes, but out of the lives of tramps and farm-women—for such qualities as these we can go to no poet of our time but to Thomas Hardy.

THE CHARACTER OF ATTERBURY.*

It must be held a misfortune to a man that his life should be written only by those who have little sympathy with his views. Many readers know little of Atterbury except what they have learned from Macaulay, and Macaulay's sketch is not a complete presentation of the Bishop's career and character. It does not set the literary activity of that career in its due proportions, and it reduces to one the various motives, good and bad, which prompted its political acts. It was well, therefore, that Dr. Beeching should tell again the story of that turbulent life. The biographer has been able to correct Macaulay in some minor points, and he has justly assigned to the "Defence of Luther" a higher value than Macaulay set on it. Moreover he has shown that with Atterbury the passion for what he accounted orthodoxy was at least as strong a motive as personal ambition. We make this acknowledgment at once, because we must contend that Dr. Beeching has been unfair to Macaulay, and, in particular, has brought against the historian a grave charge which can by no means be justified.

In 1722 Walpole obtained proof that Atterbury was organising a Jacobite conspiracy. Thereupon he sought an interview with the Bishop at his Deanery of Westminster. It seems that he wished by means of a bribe to save Atterbury from himself and the Ministry from that step which, in the end, it found itself obliged to take. According to Atterbury's statement, Walpole's offer included the reversion of the bishopric of Winchester and an immediate pension of £5,000 a year. Dr. Beeching says that this bishopric was understood to be his price. In fact, though Dr. Beeching makes no references to this, Atterbury had expressed a greater liking for the see of London, but the point is of little moment. Whatever the offer was, Atterbury, not then knowing that his correspondence had been betrayed, refused to accept it. Of this incident Macaulay makes no mention. On his omission Dr. Beeching comments thus: "Macaulay, who had read everything, must have known that Atterbury had refused Walpole's bribe of the bishopric of Winchester; but that fact, which would have interfered with the color scheme of his political portrait, he ignores; and attributes Atterbury's hostility to the house of Hanover to the loss of his hopes of the Archbishopric, and the contemptuous rejection by King George of his 'servility' at the Coronation." This cannot mean less than that Macaulay deliberately suppressed a circumstance in order to give a false color to the Bishop's character. It is easy to suggest several less dishonorable reasons for the omission. It may have been accidental. In the passage quoted, Dr. Beeching does not inform us that the see was not vacant, nor does he anywhere else inform us that it was not likely to be vacant. It had been filled up less than a year ago by the appointment of a man who was younger than Atterbury and could hardly hope for promotion, since York was younger than either, and Canterbury so hale that he survived all three. It could not have been foreseen that the Bishop of Winchester would die some year and a half later. Since these circumstances diminish the value of the offer, if not also the likelihood of its having been made, was not Dr. Beeching as much bound to mention them as Macaulay to mention the bribe? Again, Macaulay may have thought that, since we have only Atterbury's word for the form of an offer made by word of mouth, the whole matter must be considered dubious. But the true explanation, it may be suggested, is that Macaulay thought the incident of too little moment to be mentioned in a brief sketch. Macaulay has nowhere suggested that Atterbury could be tempted by money, and what temptation could he have to sell his soul and lose his friends for a price which he was not likely to receive, and that at a moment when he thought that his conspiracy would succeed, that England would be invaded, and himself become the great man under a restored dynasty? Thus Macaulay might well have mentioned the incident without affecting the color of his portrait. Had he been a dishonest chronicler he might have used the incident to heighten his colors. Atterbury had shown his ambition by taking the oaths in order to keep place and pay. The Tories themselves suspected him at this time of a desire to make terms with the Ministry. He might have been represented as refusing an offer which was below his price. We do not think that this would be a true picture, but it would not be easy to prove the contrary.

Again, it is incorrect to say that Macaulay ascribes Atterbury's hostility towards the house of Hanover to his baffled hopes of the Archbishopric. He contends, and for the truth of this view we have the culprit's own word, that this hostility was active while Anne was still on the throne, while the Tories were still in power, and when he might well hope to succeed the almost octogenarian occupant of Lambeth. What Macaulay does ascribe to the loss of hopes is the renewal of Atterbury's Jacobite activity in 1717. According to Atterbury's own statement, one on which Dr. Beeching makes no comment, there was no renewal because there had been no cessation. Dr. Beeching ascribes the renewal to various causes, to the triumph of the Whig system and to Atterbury's love for the Convocation of Canterbury, which, having started on a congenial heresy-hunt, had been in effect suppressed. By accepting the renewal as a fact, Dr. Beeching casts, as we shall endeavor to show, a worse slur upon the character of his "good man" than any that can be found in Macaulay.

* "Francis Atterbury." By H. C. Beeching. Pitman. 3s. 6d. net.

Dr. Beeching makes no attempt to defend Atterbury's perjuries, and admits that Macaulay is entitled to all the moral advantage of the Whig position. Nevertheless, he shrinks from setting out the perjuries in their full enormity. In his pages an ignorant reader would not discover, and a careless reader might well forget, that Atterbury took not only the Oath of Allegiance, but also the Oath of Abjuration, by which he disowned the Pretender "without equivocation or mental reservation on the true faith of a Christian." On the treason, we are to take account, says Dr. Beeching, of the circumstances and the standard of the times. "We do not call Marcus Brutus a 'bad man' because he conspired against Julius Cæsar." Perhaps not, though Dante did, and Mommsen has found plenty to say against the thin-witted and self-satisfied usurer, of whom a fancy picture has descended to us from Plutarch through Shakespeare. But the cases are not parallel, for Brutus had taken no Oath of Abjuration. Ah, says our biographer, but Atterbury's perjuries "followed inevitably from his Jacobitism as soon as that ceased to be merely sentimental." It is an ugly argument, but might pass if Atterbury's Jacobitism between 1714 and 1724 was merely sentimental. That it was not, we could hardly prove except from his own word. "I have for many years past," he wrote to the Pretender in 1717, "neglected no opportunity (and particularly no advantage my station afforded me) towards promoting the service." Dr. Beeching seems unconscious of the dilemma in which he is placed. If the letter was truthful, then Atterbury at the very moment of taking the oath was minded to break it, and this he could easily do without entering into direct communications with James. If the letter lied, an interpretation necessary to Dr. Beeching's defence, then Atterbury was claiming credit for services which he had not rendered. We may doubt whether Atterbury did not lose all sense of the difference between truthfulness and mendacity. Nevertheless, Dr. Beeching writes that "one of the things which amazes the ordinary person in the Bishop's defence is the lawyer-like skill with which he handled" those letters of his which he averred to be forgeries. The ordinary person must be as simple as Jeanie Deans, who was astonished at the self-possession with which her sister sustained her part. "I daresay you are surprised at it," said Lady Staunton, "for you have been truth itself from your cradle upwards; but you must remember that I am a liar of fifteen years' standing, and therefore must by this time be used to my character." If we are to make allowance for Atterbury, we must claim it also for his adversary. Dr. Beeching, in denouncing the Bill of Pains and Penalties, gives Walpole no credit for abstaining, with his characteristic dislike of bloodshed, from a Bill of Attainder, which would have had many precedents, ~~was~~ demanded by many voices, and would have been applauded by more. Nor can the injustice of a tribunal, though rightly denounced by the criminal at the moment, be pleaded in face of conclusive evidence at the bar of history.

Dr. Beeching protests that Macaulay took care that Atterbury, as a Tory dog, did not get the best of it, and he has clearly set himself to write impartially. Nevertheless, we cannot follow the points which he makes against the Whigs. He declares that there was "something mean in the hurrying on of the execution of the rebel lords, so that Kenmure had to apologise for the indecency of having no black clothes to die in." Kenmure pleaded guilty on January 19th, was sentenced on February 19th, and executed on the 24th. Monmouth was committed to the Tower on a Monday and beheaded on the next Wednesday, and Russell suffered within a week of his sentence. Again, Dr. Beeching holds that, after the accession of King George, there ought to have been, if possible, a coalition Ministry. Here he forgets two things. In the last days of Queen Anne, Swift and Bolingbroke had urged Harley to turn every Whig out of office. The politician sneered, and the divine gnashed his teeth at the dilatoriness of "the Dragon," as they called Harley, which alone kept a single Whig in his place. Nevertheless the first Hanoverian Ministry, though Dr. Beeching has forgotten it, actually was a coalition. For eighteen months no less a place than the Presidency of the Council was held by the leader of the anti-Jacobite Tories. Could Dr. Beeching name any other Tory who by character or services could claim a place in the Cabinet? We can think of none but Dartmouth, and Dartmouth, who remained a staunch Hanoverian, seems to have retired by his own choice. And when Dr. Beeching avows Macaulay had no right to call the Jacobite opposition factious, we must call its own men as witnesses. The Jacobite leaders, said the exiled Atterbury, would make terms if only they could get office. Hearne, who gave up place for the cause, is as decisive in his testimony, though he avowed himself sorry to give it. The Tories, he says, behaved themselves with very little courage or integrity; they have acted contrary to their principles, but the Whigs, as they professed bad principles, so they have acted accordingly, not in the least receding from what they have laid down as principles. There were honest Jacobites, but hardly among the political leaders.

We have no right to be hard on Atterbury. He was in a difficult position, and, to retain place and pay, he succumbed to a temptation which might have been too much for most of us. There was something genuine in his Toryism, something attractive in his private life; but, if he must be compared with Walpole, it must be added that Walpole would either never have taken an oath to a restored Stuart, or, having taken it, would have kept it.

THE EARLIER WESLEY.*

THE day of diaries is over. When books were scarce and periodicals few it was natural that people should commit the narrative of their lives, their personal and family history, to writing. Under the changed conditions of modern life, there is neither the need of nor the inclination to this lengthy process; the historian of the future will take his material, not from the carefully transcribed manuscript dear to our ancestors, but from the printed page. The industry of these old diarists is amazing. As early as April, 1725, Wesley began to keep a diary. The original is extant, but the cypher and the obsolete shorthand employed make its interpretation difficult. The present volume, the first of the Standard Edition now being prepared, contains Wesley's early life in the light of unpublished diaries; a description and analysis of his first Oxford diary—he kept four; the letter to Richard Morgan on the rise and design of Oxford Methodism; and—this is the substance of the book—the Georgian episode from the embarkation at Gravesend in the autumn of 1735 to the return to England early in 1738. Finally, we have the journal of the opening months of his home ministry, February 1st—June 13th, 1738.

Its religious aspect apart, "Wesley's Journal" is a historical source of the first consequence. As literature, few romances have such a power to interest and absorb the reader. Nowhere do we find so full, so vivid, so comprehensive an account of England in the Hanoverian period as here. That the world was his parish was no empty boast. From one end of the country to the other the indefatigable preacher travelled, mixing with men of all sorts and conditions, making it his business to win their confidence, observing their habits, recording their casual talk and the actions of their everyday life. "Quidquid agunt homines"; human nature is the stuff of the book. Had Wesley been a Catholic, he would have been canonised, and the man lost in a mist of edifying fiction. As it is, the strongly marked features make us wonder how hagiography would have fared had tradition preserved the saints, not as the pious imagination of a later age pictured them, but as they were. For Wesley's foibles were prominent, and his faults undeniable; he was a very eminent and a very excellent, but, at least at this stage of his life, not a very lovable man.

He began life as a High Churchman. In his day the term denoted no Romeward tendencies either in teaching or ceremonial: what it signified was an antipathy to dissent, a rather wooden adherence to the Anglican canons and rubrics, and that magnifying of the clerical office which is a pitfall to the minister as well as to the priest. In some respects, indeed, it is more mischievous in the former than in the latter case. The Catholic clergyman, great as are his claims, is limited in his exercise of them by the authority of his superiors, the laws of his communion, and the public opinion of his flock; the Protestant, if he undertakes the task of director, assumes an office unrecognised by the community in which he ministers, and is a law to himself. A sensible Jesuit would have made short work with Wesley's meddlesomeness. The system of direction is detestable; but, if we must have directors, let them be professionals, not amateurs.

* "The Journal of John Wesley." Edited by Nehemiah Curnock. Vol. I. Standard Edition. Culley. 21s.

He undertook the mission to Georgia, it appears, from fear for his own soul, rather than zeal for the salvation of others; there is "no evidence," says the editor, "that his call to evangelise the Indians was of God." Law expressed his disapproval of the project harshly enough—it was the idea, he said, of a crack-brained enthusiast: others put it down to ambition—the establishment of an American episcopate had been mooted; the simplicity of the evangelist was not yet his. Among his fellow passengers was a company of German Moravians; men, he writes, who "have left all for their Master, and who have indeed learned of Him, being meek and lowly, dead to the world, full of faith and of the Holy Ghost." They were the only people on board with whom, it seems, he had no differences during the voyage: before the vessel had left the Downs we find him "disputing" with Mrs. Walker, a sick passenger, and finding his brother Charles "perverse." He mixed himself up, unnecessarily and indiscreetly, in the quarrels that broke out between the various members of the party; and, as it included a considerable number of females, he had ample reason to regret his intervention. He was attracted by women: "neither by nature nor by vocation," Mr. Curnock assures us, "was he a loveless celibate." But it may be doubted whether any man was ever so tactless in his dealings with those of the opposite sex, or so ignorant of their distinctive qualities: he was incapable of holding aloof where women were in question, and he was easily deceived. Two of those on board, Mrs. Welch and Mrs. Hawkins,

"were, as we now know, and as Charles Wesley and Ingham at the time firmly believed, consummate hypocrites. John Wesley never saw it, and his amazing credulity nearly cost him his life, and drove him from Frederica back to the still graver perils of Savannah. Under the brief entries in the Diary are hidden the beginnings of a tragedy which, however small and sordid in itself, was fraught with stupendous consequences to Wesley, his brother, and many others."

Spangenberg put his finger on the weak point when he counselled him, in the words of à Kempis, to "be intimate with no woman; but in general to recommend all good women to God." To converse much with her—Mrs. Hawkins—he said frankly, might be dangerous: let him speak to her in few words and seldom; God would do the rest. A long series of unpleasantnesses culminated in the "Sophy" episode, in which Wesley appeared in the mixed part of judge, priest, and lover. It ended in his leaving the colony, in defiance of the magistrates, but probably not without their connivance. Rightly or wrongly, he was a disturbing element in the little community. A candid friend seems to have expressed the prevalent opinion—

"All your sermons are satires upon particular persons, therefore I will never hear you more; and all the people are of my mind. Besides they say they are Protestants. But as for you, they cannot tell what religion you are of. They never heard such a religion before. They do not know what to make of it. And then your private behavior—all the quarrels that have been here since you came have been 'long of you. Indeed, there is neither man nor woman in the town who minds a word you say."

Reflection brought wisdom: in later years he acknowledged that his ministerial discipline at Savannah had been mistaken and unwise.

Meanwhile under the outward shell the inner man was maturing. A great change had taken place, as such changes do, unconsciously, and was on the eve of manifesting itself. The teaching of the Moravians with regard to conversion and the new birth had found a soil prepared for it in his heart. It was to him what justification by faith had been to Luther—a deliverance from the old self and from the Law. Its setting was that of the time and place; but the doctrine itself was true to experience and human nature. It is probable that the New as well as the Old Theology can provide it with a framework; and it is certain that to men of a certain temperament it is the secret of interior peace. On Wesley it acted like a charm. Scales fell from his eyes; fetters from his hands; the Methodist revival had begun.

To an organised Church, with its routine, its institutions, and inevitable and necessary legalism, enthusiasm is suspect: it was on the ruins of an enthusiastic Christianity that the Catholicism of the Second Century rose. Nor were valid pretexts wanting—fanaticism, the unsettling of the weak, the danger of antinomianism, &c. Wesley found church after church closed to him: he was met by the universal formula, "Sir, you must preach here no more." It is probable that there were two sides to the matter: the opposition of so excellent a man as Butler is not lightly to be explained away. But the time called for strong remedies: the harvest was ready, and the reapers were at hand. The history of the movement will be told in succeeding volumes. This leaves Wesley embarked for Germany; on his return the evangelisation of England was to be taken in hand.

ALIVE OR DEAD?*

In Colonel Patterson's book on a sporting expedition in British East Africa there is an excellent and significant sentence. He has been describing one of those scenes which are the delight of the African traveller, and amply repay him for all the fevers, dysentery, and other discomforts which usually attend his journey. One moonlight night he had come upon sixteen rhinos standing round a waterhole, roaring at each other and struggling in their efforts to get a drink. For two hours he watched them quite close at hand. "I could easily," he continues:—

"I could easily have picked off half a dozen of them with my rifle, and some of them had very fine horns, but, of course, I had no intention whatever of molesting them. They were much more interesting alive than dead, and I never for a moment entertained the thought of disturbing their concert by firing my rifle."

"They were much more interesting alive than dead." Once, also in Central Africa, the present writer was encamped near a dry river-bed where a family of elephants came at night, and the parents, thrusting their trunks deep into the gravel, found water still running below the surface. Then what trumpeting, what baths, and ecstasy of drink! Next morning all the river-bed was trampled with huge and lesser footprints, like oval maps embossed on the sand. The whole scene is a joy to remember. But if the writer had "picked off" two or three of the family, where would have been the joy? Rotting carcasses for a few days, white skeletons still lying on the gravel, and perhaps an ivory tusk or so to adorn his ancestral hall, if he had one; but no memory except of death and blood and the sudden interruption of almost perfect happiness.

"Much more interesting alive than dead"—it is like saying that a strong man is more active than a corpse, and yet Colonel Patterson seems to mention it as something of a discovery. To sportsmen like him, indeed, it is a paradox. What usually interests them, next to the act of killing, is the dead thing—the skin torn from the flesh, the head hewn off at the neck, and scooped out from inside, so that at last it may be "mounted" by a London stuffer, and with bits of glass stuck in the eye-sockets, dabs of paint smeared on the nostrils, and a coat of varnish on the horns, it may slowly decay suspended above a doorway until the servant complains that it harbors moth. That is the "trophy"—the object for which the sportsman sports. No one who has known wild animals would call the putrefying relic beautiful; no one who has known a cat or a rabbit alive would call it interesting. Its only value is to reflect a vainglory on the man who killed it, and to afford him the opportunity of boring his friends with stories of its death.

Sportsmen like Colonel Patterson and, we suppose, like Mr. Roosevelt, who has gone killing animals under the pretext of collecting "trophies" for museums, are queer survivals of an age when the slaughter of wild beasts was sometimes protective, sometimes a necessity for food, and always difficult. Except for the sake of the slaughter, a sportsman has now no need to risk danger or hunger, and though his sport is still sometimes difficult, the odds are so strong on his side that no judge in a prize-ring would allow such a contest to come off. To be sure, Colonel Patterson is not one of the amateur butchers who kill all they see, like boys "yacking" for birds along both sides of a hedge. He abides by the "laws of honor" in sport, and if he thinks he has killed enough of one kind of animal he does not kill any more. We know, also, from his earlier book that he once cleared a place of two man-eating lions, and there is no question of his nerve and resource whether in killing lions, rhinos, or buffalo (and it is difficult to decide which of the three can be the most dangerous animal in its rage). What is more, during part of this journey he was officially engaged in tracing a reserve frontier. But still his object in visiting the wilds again was to obtain the pleasure of killing animals and securing "trophies." It is one of the contradictions in man's nature that people who feel a kind of affection for the wild creatures so rapidly vanishing from the world should find a strange delight in hastening their extinction.

* "In the Grip of the Nyika." By Lieut.-Colonel J. H. Patterson, D.S.O. Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.

Colonel Patterson is partly aware of this contradiction, and at times he tries to explain his action with the usual sporting excuses; as when he writes:—

"It always makes me feel unhappy to see a beast die, especially if he has made a good fight for his life, as this one (a kongoni) did. Of course, if the animal is killed outright at the first shot, he is dead before he can realise what is happening, and can feel little or no pain. If, however, the shot merely breaks a leg and the animal goes off limping, all my sympathy is aroused, and I am not easy in my mind again until the poor beast has been put out of its misery."

He then goes on to show that beasts of prey are sometimes more cruel than men, and quotes the case of a hyena which was found eating a wounded, but living, gazelle. Similarly the present writer once found his dog eating a living duiker which had run two miles with a broken leg before the dog caught it. But the point is, not that dogs and hyenas are cruel in their killing, but that the sportsman has no need to kill the creatures at all, whether cruelly or kindly. Of course, one sometimes kills for food, but the sportsman kills for "trophies." That is his object. He goes, in Colonel Patterson's sporting language, because he is "anxious to bag a rhino," or is "desperately keen on shooting an eland" (that large and beautiful antelope, almost as quiet as a cow). Sometimes the sport involves pain as well as death, as when a bullet "planted somewhere in the anatomy" of a rhino "gave him a sudden distaste for our society," and the wounded creature went away, probably to die in great misery; or when a lady of the party wounded a wildebeeste that could not be found; or when, again, an eland, "the instant he felt the lead, gave a kick and a buck" and ultimately fell from a precipice as he ran away. His horns, we are told, ranked second to the best on record. But the real question is, not whether the killing of these wild and usually harmless animals is painful or quick, but why it should be done at all when most sportsmen will regret their extermination, and they are "so much more interesting alive than dead."

It is useless to plead that the extermination is certain anyhow. Because a crime will be committed, that is no reason for becoming a criminal, and since the introduction of the rifle, the slaughter of big game in Africa has become little better than a crime. Natives and rinderpest have done much harm, but the sportsman kills only for pleasure or for vanity, and yet when all Africa is an empty waste, such as the Orange State and Transvaal are now, though they swarmed with animals a generation ago, the sportsman will be the loudest in his lamentations and regrets for the good old times. A kind of blindness or stupidity appears to possess him when he thinks of "game." Colonel Patterson, for instance, tells us quite interesting things about some of the tribes and regions he visited, and he often has something good to say about animals, unless he wants to kill them; but then he only talks of death—an uninteresting subject, as he admits. He is a good photographer, and enjoys a stalk with a camera. Why should he not devote himself to securing photographic "trophies"? They are as hard and dangerous to obtain as mouldering heads, and of incomparably greater interest. One has heard of that sporting nobleman who went stalking with a photographer in Somaliland, and was almost overcome by two difficulties: first, to get the lion to sit; secondly, to get the photographer to stand. But the results were, at all events, finer than the average sportsman's, and the excitement at least as great, both to himself and the photographer.

TIME AND CLOCKS.*

THE author of this book is a man of science with a genius for construction, and few people are better qualified to discourse on the subject of which it treats. His aim is stated at the end of the book: "I have endeavored not merely to give a description of clocks and various apparatus for measuring time, but to explain the fundamental principles of mechanics which lie at the root of the subject." Hence a great portion (perhaps too much) of the work is occupied with things which are usually expounded in elementary treatises on dynamics, and have not a very direct bearing on the subject. Incidentally, however, the interest of the reader, who is assumed to be youthful, is secured by a diagrammatic representation of Dante's Earth, Hell, and Heaven, the position of Jerusalem as the centre of the world, the garden of Eden, the tortuous path to Purgatory, &c., ideas the absurdity of which has not prevented their survival in the twentieth century.

Modern science makes us acquainted with constructions of human skill much more subtle and wonderful than clocks and watches; nevertheless, these still hold their own as the type of human ingenuity, and there are few of us who can refrain from inexpressible wonder on beholding a clock, such as that of Strassburg, which indicates at once the hour of the day, the day of the week, the month, the position of the sun in the ecliptic, the date of Easter, and many other things.

Familiarity with the everyday things that belong to our civilisation renders it extremely difficult for men to appreciate the amount of thought and labor which mankind had to employ in order to construct the simplest things which we now regard as necessities. Let anyone who wishes to become conscious of his utter ignorance and helplessness pause and ask himself the question "If civilisation were destroyed, how much of it could I reconstruct?" The answer would probably give him a greater respect for the achievements of palæolithic men.

Mr. Cunynghame's book is not merely, or even chiefly, a description of clocks and watches as they now are, but a very interesting history of the attempts of men to construct an accurate time-measurer—an attempt, by the way, in which, strictly speaking, they have not yet succeeded. By far the most accurate clock that we know is the earth itself, whose time of revolution on its axis has certainly not altered by the one-hundredth part of a second since the time of Ptolemy—i.e., in nearly 1800 years.

The earliest clocks were probably sun-dials, whose defects during the day are obvious enough, and which are useless after sunset. It was to supply a measure of time during the night that the Egyptians, the Greeks, and the Romans adopted the ingenious device of a water-clock. Anything that does something regularly, that is, in equal time intervals, will serve as a clock. Besides the rotation of the earth on its axis, do we know any occurrence that takes place at absolutely regular intervals of time? There are very few such, and still fewer over which we have any control. Even the water-clock, which measured equal intervals of time by the flow of a fixed volume of water through a fine tap from a large cylinder, is very inaccurate for several reasons; but there is one very simple phenomenon which makes a very close approximation to regularity and is easily controlled—namely, the time of oscillation of a simple pendulum, provided that the arc through which the bob is displaced is not large; and, moreover, the time (for a given length of pendulum) will be the same, however small the arc of oscillation may be; in other words, nothing depends on the size of this arc, provided the magnitude does not exceed a certain limit.

* "Time and Clocks: A Description of Ancient and Modern Methods of Measuring Time." By H. H. Cunynghame, M.A., C.B., M.I.E.E. Constable. 2s. 6d.

THE RICCARDI PRESS BOOKS.

THE first Books printed in the Riccardi Fount, specially designed by Mr. Herbert P. Horne for The Medici Society ARE NOW PUBLISHED. The Society cannot doubt that THE RICCARDI FOUNT will be as immediately accepted for the FINEST MODERN TYPE YET DESIGNED as The Medici Prints have been recognised for the "truest facsimiles yet invented."

The detailed prospectus, printed in the THE RICCARDI PRESS TYPES, will be sent post free on application.

THE STORY OF GRISELDA. Being the Tenth story of the Tenth day from the "Decameron" of Boccaccio, translated by J. M. Rigg. 500 numbered copies, on Batchelor hand-made paper (9½ × 6½), Michalet grey wrapper, 5s. net; limp vellum, with silk ties, 12s. 6d. net. Also 12 copies printed on vellum (10 for sale), bound in limp Kelmscott vellum, silk ties, 42s. net. Ready.

The Plates in the following are reproduced by THE MEDICI PROCESS:—

THE SONG OF SONGS WHICH IS SOLOMON'S, in the Authorised Version, with 10 plates after the water-colour drawings by W. Russell Flint. 500 numbered copies on hand-made Riccardi paper (10½ × 7½), Michalet grey boards, canvas back and paper label, £2 2s. net; limp vellum, silk ties, £2 12s. 6d. net. Also 17 copies printed on vellum (15 for sale), bound in limp Kelmscott vellum, gold lettering, silk ties, with duplicate set of the Plates, mounted, in cloth portfolio, £12 12s. net. Ready.

THE THOUGHTS OF THE EMPEROR MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS. Translated by George Long, with 12 Plates after the water-colour drawings by W. Russell Flint. 500 numbered copies, on hand-made Riccardi paper (10½ × 7½), boards, £2 12s. 6d. net; or limp vellum, silk ties, £3 3s. net. Also 17 copies printed on vellum (15 for sale), bound in limp Kelmscott vellum, gold lettering, silk ties, with duplicate set of Plates, mounted, in cloth portfolio, £15 15s. net. Ready.

Orders will be executed in strict rotation as received, preference being given only to Subscribers to the entire series of Riccardi Press Books. Of the copies printed on vellum very few remain.

 The Original Water-Colour Drawings by Mr. W. Russell Flint, mentioned above, are on Exhibition at The Medici Galleries until December 24th. Admission Free on presentation of visiting card.

THE DIVINE MINSTRELS. A Narrative of the Life of S. Francis of Assisi with his Companions. By A. Bailly, translated by E. Barnes, with photogravure frontispiece after Gerard David's painting "S. Francis," cr. 8vo., cloth 5s. net; limp vellum, silk ties, 12s. 6d. net.

"A picturesque and moving narrative."—The Times. "Done with every possible refinement of literature."—The Scotsman. "Lovers of pure literature owe a deep debt of thanks."—The Academy. "Would be hailed with delight by any lover of the most fascinating of mediæval Saints."—The Guardian.

THE MEDICI PRINTS.

NATIONAL LOAN EXHIBITION AT THE CRAFTON GALLERIES.

The Medici Society has pleasure in announcing that, by the generous permission of their owners, a small series of Medici Prints, in the colours of the Originals, will be issued in due course after selected pictures in this Exhibition. "Prints like this," says the BURLINGTON MAGAZINE for October, 1909, "which are at once true in general effect and will stand the test of the microscope in their details, can never be superseded." Subscribers to these Prints may therefore be assured of possessing the most faithful replicas of these great pictures which can be obtained. They may also be assured that "nothing of the kind so good or so cheap" (the BURLINGTON MAGAZINE) will be obtainable otherwise than in these Medici Prints. Finally, since in consideration of the permission to reproduce these pictures, The Society will make Special Contributions to the National Gallery Fund, Subscribers will, incidentally, aid the prime object with which the above Exhibition has been organised.

Full particulars (illustrated) of these reproductions—which will be executed in England by English workers—post free on application.

AMONG RECENT MEDICI PRINTS ARE:

Holbein ... The Duchess of Milan ... 24 × 11 in. ... 17s. 6d. net.

The same size in monochrome 5s. net. The exact replica of the contemporary frame in N.G., 35s. net.

Carpaccio ...	Vision of St. Ursula ...	30s.	Botticelli ...	The Birth of Venus ...	30s.
Giorgione ...	Storm Landscape ..	21s.	Gainsborough ...	The Painter's Daughters ...	15s.
Clouet ...	Elizabeth of Austria...	15s.	*Zuccherro ...	Queen Elizabeth ...	17s. 6d.
Pisanello ...	Vision of St. Eustace	17s. 6d.	M. da Forlì ...	The Archangel Gabriel	17s. 6d.

(* Immediately.) Postage of all Prints 6d.; additional copies in same parcel 1d. each.

The above are a representative selection from nearly 50 Medici Prints now ready. Complete Lists post free. Frames suitable to each subject are a speciality of The Society. Detailed prospectus, with full particulars of Frames, Annual Subscription, &c., post free, 6d. stamps.

Special illustrated prospectus of some 100 "PRIMITIVES" of the Italian, German, and Flemish Schools, post free, 6d. stamps.

DRAWINGS OF ALBRECHT DÜRER.

A Series of 64 Drawings, chiefly from the Albertina Library, Vienna, reproduced in facsimile collotype, including Architectural, Natural History, Botanical, Religious, Figure, and Portrait subjects. Every drawing, whether a full water-colour or otherwise, is reproduced in the exact colours of the original. Prices from 2s. to 15s. each; framed from 3s. 6d. each. Write for the completely illustrated Catalogue, post free, 1s. stamps; or unillustrated, post free, 2d. stamps.

The Times says:—"The perfection with which this Medici process reproduces the forms, the colours, and the touch of the more precise painters, especially Dürer and Holbein, is little short of amazing." . . . "Almost disquieting in its accuracy and beauty," says the Daily Telegraph, "of the style of the reproduction." "The extraordinary fidelity to the originals," says the Morning Post, "can perhaps be fully appreciated only by some one who has been able to compare an original and a Medici facsimile side by side."

All lovers of Art are invited to pay an early visit to the Medici Society's THIRD WINTER EXHIBITION (Daily 10–6 until December 24th) where may be seen about 400 reproductions in the colours of the original Old Masters—MEDICI PRINTS and other facsimile colour-collotypes; also the entire series of the old ARUNDEL SOCIETY, etc. Admission free, on presentation of visiting card. Visitors are under no obligation whatsoever to buy. Those unable personally to inspect the Exhibition, should write for catalogues as above.

The Society cannot now guarantee delivery before Christmas of certain of its FRAMES unless in stock.

PHILIP LEE WARNER, Publisher to The Medici Society, Ltd., 38, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

Clearly, this fact makes the pendulum a most desirable time-measurer. The world had to wait for Galileo to discover this simple truth; and Mr. Cunynghame relates how Galileo discovered it by observing the swinging of the chandeliers in the cathedral of Pisa, timing the gradually dying swings with his pulse-beats, and observing that the feeble swing took the same time as the more amplified original one.

Hence, if we can keep a pendulum freely swinging, we can make a clock; the fixing of hands which will go round quickly or slowly presents no mechanical difficulty; but how are we to keep the pendulum freely swinging without subjecting it either to the continuous disturbance of friction or to ill-timed blows which will interfere with the constancy of its time of swing?

What is so marked a merit of Mr. Cunynghame's book, as compared with the usual exposition of this clock pendulum motion given in ordinary treatises on the subject, is the clear way in which he deals with the difficulty that the motion of the pendulum must be maintained and its time of free swing not interfered with. This fundamental point is almost invariably glossed over, so that the student does not appreciate the advantage of one kind of escapement over another, or understand the conditions that must be satisfied by a perfect escapement.

Mr. Cunynghame is strong in his praise of the now somewhat rare "grandfather" clock, whose merit as an accurate time-keeper he shows to be much greater than that of the American clocks, which, with very short pendulums, can never keep good time; but it is, at any rate, a great satisfaction to know that, owing to modern means of construction, "we can now have a better watch for 30s. than we could have got for £30 twenty years ago."

We have but two suggestions to offer to the author. Nothing could be better than the clear way in which he distinguishes the mass of a body from its weight, and thereby saves his reader from speaking of the weight of the earth or of the sun—a supremely absurd expression; but we could wish him to cease from speaking of an "accelerating force" when he means simply an "acceleration": all forces are accelerating forces. Again, in some cases the lettering of his figures does not agree with the description in the text, and the name "Attwood" should be Atwood. However, he has given us an interesting and suggestive book, and no doubt many of his boy-readers will be fascinated by his egg-boiling machine, his arrangement for expelling heavy sleepers from their beds, and his sound and humorous advice about tools and apparatus.

THE HAPPY ENDING.*

A CURIOUS enquirer might possibly receive a very brisk reply to the question: "Why are the great majority of novels furnished with a happy ending?" The probable answer would be that the public liked it, and that the publisher took care that the public's wishes should be respected. But, after all, this response, true as far as it goes, does but leave us in the outer courts of the mystery; for we must inevitably go on to ask: "Why does the public like a happy ending?" And the question is by no means easy of solution. The reason, perhaps, lies in very deep places; it may be traced back both to the pessimism and optimism which are inherent in man. With few exceptions we are ill at ease in Zion or Babylon—we have, most of us, an unhappy feeling that we are round pegs placed in the square holes of this mortal life; and consciously or unconsciously we cannot help believing that somehow or other the square holes will be eventually made round, here or hereafter. But in actual life the square hole often seems to become more and more angular, more and more rigid, and so we take refuge in the rectifications of art, in the formula—"so they were married and lived happily ever after"—tasting in those two last words the joys of eternal bliss.

It is not very surprising, then, that the six books under

* "Cut Off from the World." By Frank T. Bullen. Unwin. 6s.
 "Faces in the Mist." By John A. Steuart. Clarke. 6s.
 "The Food of Love." By F. Frankfort Moore. Nash. 6s.
 "The Upper Hand." By Mrs. Frederick Dawson. Richards. 6s.
 "A Simple Savage." By G. B. Burgin. Hutchinson. 6s.
 "Beatrice the Sixteenth." By Irene Clyde. Bell. 3s. 6d.

notice all have their share in this adventure of happiness. Mr. Bullen's "Cut Off from the World" ends with all that is crooked made straight, the hero happily married, and wealth in showers for all who deserve it. The story, which is modern enough in all conscience, is yet founded on a most ancient formula, known to Mr. Nutt and the folklorists as the "Exile and Return" motive. It is probable enough that the author has never heard of "Exile and Return"—which is the basis of the Arthurian legend of Percival, of "Roderick Random" and "Nicholas Nickleby"—yet his hero who goes forth from the dull suburban home, from somewhat contemptuous relations, and from the toil of a city clerk, and sails over all the seas, and meets with adventures and misfortunes innumerable, and ends, as has been said, in a blaze of prosperity, is clearly a remote relation of the more ancient heroes who have been cited. The story is simply, even childish, told, and yet one likes it all the better for its simplicity: it is written much as the strenuous and unlearned Jemmy Tenison, the hero, would have written it. And, of course, all the technique of the deep, of the tramp steamer, and of the liner, is absolutely good and convincing.

"Faces in the Mist" is another "Exile and Return" story with a happy ending. Here you have the last scion of an ancient Highland family fallen on sorry days, on the contempt of richer neighbors, restoring the fortune of the house through the medium of an American heiress. There is the villain, Lord Benbreck, who thwarts and wrongs Chisholm even to the last chapter; there are adventures on northern crags, and amongst the brigands and the mountains of Syria. And the final ruin of Benbreck is awful and complete, and the triumph of the hero entirely satisfactory. The story, it will be seen, is conventional; the American millionaire and his wife, the sneering villain, and the faithful retainer, show us faces that are typical rather than individual; we have met them or their near relations in many previous readings. But "Faces in the Mist" is pleasant reading enough.

Mr. Frankfort Moore has more skill in the play of words than Mr. Steuart or Mr. Bullen. Apart from the plot, which is deftly contrived, there are some excellent things in "The Food of Love." There are one or two chapters that remind one of that terrible period in the life of "The Beloved Vagabond" when the Paragot of the Parisian cafés, of floods of absinthe, and of strange acquaintances, tried, for a brief season, to be an English country gentleman. There are, no doubt, county families and county families; music, and letters, and painting, are not without appreciation in many houses where evening dress is a matter of course. But it is to be feared that Mr. Moore has not exaggerated the gross stupidity and barbarism that are apt to accompany a taste for "shootin'" and "huntin'"; and his book opens with a terrible show of "county" females who have come to condole with Mrs. Neverne on the fact that her son, Maurice, has gained an European reputation as a 'cellist. And one of these ladies proposes to "bring out" Maurice and his teacher, Herr Griesbach, at a village concert; the master being a person in somewhat the same position as the late Abbé Liszt! It is good to read the great Griesbach's rebuke of this barbarous woman. But one would like to know the writer's authority for assigning the Austrian National Anthem to J. S. Bach. It has usually been attributed to Haydn.

In "The Upper Hand" we have a sensational story of society. The heroine, Fricka—childish mispronunciation of Frederica—enters on the scene of Park Lane, driving in a smart motor-car to see her friend, Lady Mabel Johnson. Fricka is horribly bedizened. She was "Very pretty from the top of her head, with its naturally curling dark hair twisting about her ears in tiny tendrils, to her little feet in the narrowest and smallest of absurd walking-shoes, in which no woman could possibly walk. She was dressed all in cream, with just a hint of pale blue showing here and there under lace insertion and beneath the broad leaf of a big shady hat, round the crown of which one long white ostrich feather curled."

And the motor-car was cream, lined with deep red leather, and the pet dog, Tony, was "adorned with a large blue satin bow under his ear—a blue of the exact shade of Fricka's trimmings." But there are better things than this in the book. There is an excellent episode of cheating at Bridge, there is a warning given to the cheat by a

GIFT BOOKS FROM THE BODLEY HEAD

A Brilliant Essay on Dr. Johnson.

DR. JOHNSON AND MRS. THRALE. Being an Account of the Welsh Tour made by Dr. Johnson and the Thrales in 1774; together with many unpublished letters and other MSS. Edited by A. BROADLEY.With an Introductory Essay (78 pp.) by THOMAS SECCOMBE. With 24 Illustrations from rare originals, including a reproduction in Colours of the Fellowes miniature of Mrs. Piozzi by Roche, and a photogravure of Harding's sepia drawing of Dr. Johnson. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.The Daily Telegraph says: "The most attractive volume Mr. Broadley has yet given us. It reviews the glittering company that used to meet round Mr. Thrale's table at Streatham. The book contrives to offer tardy justice to one of the most brilliant and attractive women who moved in the middle of that sparkling intellectual life which spanned the period between the ages of Addison and Wordsworth."

ART

THE SONG of SIXPENCE PICTURE BOOK

4/6 Walter Crane

THE ARCADIAN CALENDAR

3/6 net Vernon Hill

LAURUS NOBILIS

3/6 net Vernon Lee

THE BOOK OF SATYRS

21/- net Austin Spare

POETRY

NEW POEMS

5/- net Richard le Gallienne

NEW POEMS

5/- net William Watson

THE ONE AND ALL RECITER

2/6 net Marshall Steele

TRAVEL & SPORT

SEEKERS IN SICILY

5/- net Elizabeth Bisland

BOSNIA AND HERZEGOVINA

5/- net Maude M. Holbach

THE SOUL OF A TURK

10/6 net Victoria de Bunsen

LAKE VICTORIA TO KHARTOUM

12/6 net F. A. Dickinson

BIOGRAPHICAL & HISTORICAL

GEORGE BERNARD SHAW

5/- net G. K. Chesterton

CÉSAR FRANCK

7/6 net Vincent D'Indy

DR. JOHNSON AND MRS. THRALE

16/- net A. M. Broadley

THE LIFE OF BOCCACCIO

16/- net Edward Hutton

MARIA EDGEWORTH AND HER CIRCLE

21/- net Constance Hill

THE LIFE OF THACKERAY

25/- net Lewis Melville

THE LIFE OF JOAN OF ARC

25/- net Anatole France

6s Christmas Novels 6s

THE DIVERTING ADVENTURES

OF MAURIN ... Jean Ricard

GERMAINE ... H. C. RowlandsTHE ODD MAN ... Arnold HolcombeTRIAL BY MARRIAGE ... W. S. JacksonTHE HOLY MOUNTAIN Stephen ReynoldsTHE WHITE STONE Anatole FranceTHE EAGLE'S NEST ... Allan McAulay

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, VICO ST., LONDON, W.

"I predict that another concerted effort will be made to rouse a fresh naval or military panic so as to rush the Government into the criminal extravagance of unnecessary armaments on land and sea. A successful agitation of that kind would bankrupt social reform. . . . Liberals will have themselves to blame if they lack the perspicacity and firmness to resist these manufactured cries of national danger."—MR. LLOYD-GEORGE IN THE "NATION."

EUROPE'S OPTICAL ILLUSION.

By NORMAN ANGELL.

2s. 6d. SIMPKIN MARSHALL, LONDON.

A popular treatise designed to prove that the modern credit system, by reason of its delicate interdependence, due to instantaneous international communication, makes the military seizure or destruction of the wealth of one nation by another a practical economic impossibility, as in the credit collapse which would result from such destruction the conquering nation would necessarily be involved. This situation, the creation of the last thirty years—the historical development of which the author traces—involves consequently the economic futility of military power, thus giving the great nations no commercial advantages over the small; makes undefended wealth—like that of the small nations—as secure as that of the great military power. He cites the fact that Belgium Three per Cents. stand at 96 and German at 82, Norwegian Three and a Half at 102, and Russian at 81.

The author deals exhaustively with the political and commercial effects—notably as to the competition of armaments—of this new situation which he claims renders the problem of modern international politics fundamentally different from the ancient; and pleads for a revision of ideas in the light of modern facts.

FIRST PRESS NOTICES.

The "Financial Times."

Deserves a wide diffusion among the people whom it is calculated to enlighten on matters that most decidedly "are to their peace." . . . Clearly written, in popular language, and if carefully studied by the masses of all countries would be the undoing of many a scare-mongering politician's occupation.

The "Financier and Bullionist."

A well-reasoned plea, and one likely to impress the thoughtful.

The "Evening Standard."

A very suggestive and interesting inquiry.

The "Western Daily Press."

A really valuable and original contribution to the study of the most alarming political problem of the present day. . . . A book that no one can read without interest, although to many people the ideas of the writer will seem at first sight to be absolutely revolutionary. . . . The whole train of thought is so unusual that Mr. Angell must not expect immediate agreement with his ideas.

The "Bradford Observer."

It is generally believed that Englishmen like a man who says what he thinks, especially when he thinks picturesquely and in violent conflict with received opinion, an exception being made, of course, in the department of morals. If this is really so this little book ought to be a brilliant success. . . . The book is one which will cause the Chauvinist, if he should read it, furiously to think.

The "Manchester Courier."

One of the sanest books on international politics of the day, and one that cannot be passed over. . . . The subject is discussed with an ability, precision, and originality that are quite unusual.

The "Dundee Advertiser."

The author never seems to miss a point. . . . Admirably-written little book.

The "Glasgow Herald."

This is a very interesting and ingenious little book. The controversy in regard to disarmament has followed well defined lines. On the one side have been those who assert that Great Britain dare not disarm because the price might be her humiliation and an incalculable material loss. On the other, the pacifist has demanded concessions which yet he has been unable to argue might not involve the disaster that would follow on our invasion by a strong military and naval Power like Germany. Mr. Angell's contention is that both parties are fundamentally wrong—the one in asserting, the other in admitting—that the aggression of a Power permanently or temporarily stronger than ourselves can bring about the fearful things imagined, say, by Mr. Frederic Harrison in his letter to "The Times." This he believes to be Europe's "optical illusion." . . . The ideas he ventilates are deserving of a wider currency, for we agree with him that misconceptions prevail regarding the destructiveness of war. . . . With his plea for synchronised effort in Britain and Germany for the diffusion of sane ideas and the promotion of disarmament we are in entire agreement.

The "Nottingham Daily Guardian."

Argument so ably conducted. . . . Expresses himself so clearly that it is impossible to withhold one's appreciation for the manner in which the work is done.

The "Eastern Morning News."

The author boldly challenges a universal theory, and declares it to be based upon a pure optical illusion. He sets out to prove that military and political power give a nation no commercial advantage; that it is an economic impossibility for one nation to seize or destroy the wealth of another, or for one nation to enrich itself by subjugating another. He establishes this apparent paradox.

The "New Age."

Mr. Norman Angell is to be congratulated on having written a book which will slowly and steadily affect the political outlook of Europe. . . . Trade nowadays has no relation to strength of armaments. . . . German Three per Cents., as Mr. Angell points out, stand at 82, but Belgian reach 96. Russian Three and a Half per Cents. are only 81, as compared with Norwegian 102.

The "Clarion."

One thing is certain, that this view of the question is almost universally ignored. . . . It may be patent to a few leading financiers and traders, but knowledge of the true condition of affairs is lacking amongst the general public. . . . This argument does not depend upon Exeter Hall platitudes about the beauties of Peace. It depends on self-interest. . . . If Mr. Angell's suggestive arguments are well founded, and I think his chief argument, at any rate, is, Europe is really the victim of a terrible illusion. We are burning witches when there is no such thing as a witch. We are using the catchwords and phrases and shibboleths of an age which is passing, if it has not already passed.

The "Christian Age."

An able plea for a complete revision of certain political ideas in the light of modern facts.

The "Methodist Recorder."

Has much to say that deserves consideration.

The "Sheffield Daily Telegraph."

A thoughtful treatise.

mysterious Zulu at a fancy-dress ball, there is a hero lying under unjust suspicion of murder, and a blackmailing villain of a South African Jew. Fricka, after much misadventure, is made happy by the hero—who is, of course, the Zulu. And “her trousseau was ‘a dream.’”

Someone, cited by Mr. Andrew Lang, confessed that, though he loved Dickens with all his heart, “Ralph Nickleby was a bit too steep for him.” The writer cannot agree with this opinion; it would be as unjust to say that the Dragon slain by St. George is “too steep”; but he is willing to confess that Detmold Byng, the villain of Mr. Burgin’s “Simple Savage,” is for him somewhat precipitous. Mr. Byng is an aged man about town, and his decay is that of an over-ripe and abandoned Stilton, his badness is awful to contemplate, and the risks he ran in the cause of villainy would have made the late Charles Peace tremble. Needless to say, the machinations of Detmold Byng, though troublesome enough while they last, do no permanent damage to the happiness of hero and heroine. There is something of the occult in the structure of the story; but it is doubtful whether the “Spirit of the Air” and the “Spirit of the Stars” lend very valuable assistance. The singular power possessed by Millicent might have been obtained through more convincing agencies.

Mary Hatherley, M.B., while travelling in Syria, received a kick from a camel which stretched her senseless. She came to herself, and found that her Arab escort had disappeared, and that unknown figures were standing round her. These figures conducted the lady explorer to the great city of Alzona, the inhabitants of which spoke a kind of bastard Latin. Mary Hatherley, being a learned lady, was able with some difficulty to understand and to make herself understood, and the strange people received her with the utmost hospitality, and allotted her a comfortable apartment. And on the first night of her arrival Mary, regarding the heavens, saw that the stars were totally unfamiliar to her. They were of neither hemisphere! And the question for the reader is: Where was Alzona, and how had the traveller reached it? It would be unfair to give away the secret of a highly ingenious device; but it seems a pity that the author of “Beatrice the Sixteenth,” who possesses a very pretty talent for the marvellous, should have devoted the greater part of her book to an elaborate and somewhat unkind satire on feminism.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

A LONG and very varied experience, and, what is of equal importance, a knowledge of vernacular Turkish are an equipment which secures respect for any book about the Turks. Captain A. E. Townshend in “A Military Consul in Turkey” (Seeley, 16s. net) writes primarily for those who know little or nothing of the country. There are chapters on travelling, on inns and tents and food, on officials and on soldiers, which convey a good deal of accurate information. Politics are only incidental to the book, and its most readable pages are the anecdotes of travel and consular life. The illustrations show an eye for the picturesque and some skill in handling the camera. For the rest the point of view is frankly one of a rather comprehensive scepticism. The author delights in stories of the rottenness of the régime that is gone, but he has little faith in the omens of the new order. He has no favorites or protégés among the non-Turkish races, and writes of them very much from the outside, but not on the whole unfairly. The book has no conspicuous literary merits and no very definite political purpose to serve, but it has its value as a direct and honest personal record.

* * *

THE reader of Mr. Robert Ross’s “Masques and Phases” (Humphreys, 5s. net) will readily allow that it has wit, keen critical perception, and a dash of cynicism, though whether he will discover the “vein of high seriousness” which the author claims is open to question. We presume that Mr. Ross is most serious in his essays on Aubrey Beardsley and Simeon Solomon, and in the lecture, “There is no decay,” which ends the volume. Mr. Ross, in reaction against the tendency to depreciate contemporary genius, holds that the present age is quite as good as the past, and points to Mr. Shaw, Mr. Wells, Mr. Kipling, Mr. Galsworthy, Mr. Rothenstein, Mr. Shannon, and others for proof of his contention. These names are hardly as conclusive as Mr. Ross believes, and something further is needed to convince us that in intellectual and artistic matters we are progressing continually and continuously. For our own part we like those parts of the book best in which we can detect least seriousness, and we would cite “The Brand of Isis” as a model of pleasant banter. Two stories, “The Case at the Museum” and “The Lost Book of Jasher,” are excellent studies of the psychology of the savant. Mr. Ross always writes with distinction, and his book is of the kind to be enjoyed with one’s feet on the fender.

* * *

THE lady who called herself “Arvède Barine” has enriched French literature with a number of historical biographies of the highest excellence, and the translator of her posthumous volume “Madame, Mother of the Regent” (Putnams, 12s. 6d.) rightly lays stress on her “great charm of style and her extraordinary powers of psychological observation.” The present work was not completed at the time of Arvède Barine’s death, though all of it but the last chapter had been written, and this has been composed with the help of notes and documents found among her papers. Elisabeth Charlotte, Duchess of Orleans, the heroine of the biography, was the daughter of Carl Ludwig, Elector of the Palatinate, and, much against her will, became, at the age of nineteen, the second wife of Philippe, the brother of Louis XIV. She hated France and made many enemies at the French Court, among them Madame de Maintenon, whom she called “a wicked beast,” and whose influence over the King caused her a great deal of jealousy. Her relations with Louis were upon the whole cordial, though she bitterly resented his determination to marry her son, the future Regent, to Mademoiselle de Blois. The description of how she received news of the engagement is one of the most telling passages in Saint-Simon. On the death of the Duc of Orleans, Madame, to the surprise of most people, continued to live in France until her death in 1722. Madame’s character lends itself to the psychological method of Arvède Barine. Her outspoken and resolute nature was but ill-suited to the artificiality of the Court of Versailles, nor did the Rabelaisian frankness of her comments on all that she disliked tend to make her a favorite. In later years she sank into melancholy. “I am so accustomed to sadness,” she wrote, “that I bear it better than others do; with me, sorrow has been like poison to Mithridates.” She was an indefatigable letter-writer, expressing herself with a bluntness and, often, a want of refinement, such as are permitted only to exalted personages. The book has been well translated by Madame Charles Bigot.

* * *

“BOSNIA AND HERZEGOVINA,” by Mrs. Maude M. Holbach (Lane, 5s. net) is the animated account of a tour through two small States which assumed a sudden importance in the British mind at the time of their recent annexation by Austria. Mrs. Holbach travelled northwards from Mostar, the capital of Herzegovina, to Jayce and Banjaluka; then, turning to the south-east, to Sarajeva, made the Bosnian capital the base for a series of excursions. She visited Foca, and penetrated as far as Plevlje, and, as her journey to the latter town synchronised with its evacuation by the Austrian troops, she witnessed many interesting scenes. The book is full of fresh and enthusiastic descriptions of town, country, and people, and the jaded tourist who has had enough of the ordinary Continental routes, and is on the look-out for a new field to explore, will do well to study its pages. Considering that the journey was undertaken at a time of political excitement, the author is wonderfully free from political bias. However, she bears witness to the good work done by the Austrian Government during their period of occupation, and she appears to have been decidedly impressed by the good-will shown by Austrian officials towards her party and herself at a time when the English newspapers were severely criticising Austria’s action. The strategic importance of Bosnia and Herzegovina is dealt with lightly but effectively, and, modest as is the book’s ostensible aim, it is a fresh and by no means unimportant contribution to the study of Near

A BOOK EXHIBITION.

Visit Mr. T. Fisher Unwin's delightful BOOK SHOW at Clifford's Inn Hall, Fleet Street (near Chancery Lane), open from 10 to 6. Last day, Dec. 21. Admission Free. No tickets required.

MR. AND MRS. PENNELL

French Cathedrals, Monasteries, and Abbeys, and Sacred Sites of France. With 183 Illustrations by JOSEPH PENNELL. 20s. net (post free, 20s. 6d.)

W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE.

A Beau Sabreur. Maurice de Saxe, Marshal of France—His Loves, His Laurels, and His Times. With 39 Illustrations. 15s. net (post free, 15s. 5d.)

GUIDO BIAGI.

Men and Manners of Old Florence. Vivid and Realistic Glimpses of the Social Life. With 49 Illustrations. 15s. net (post free, 15s. 5d.)

MADAME DUCLAUX.

The French Procession. A Pageant of Great Writers. With 6 Photogravure Plates. 12s. 6d. net. (post free, 12s. 11d.)

J. J. JUSSERAND.

A Literary History of the English People. Vol. III. From the Renaissance to the Civil War. II. 12s. 6d. net (post free, 12s. 11d.)

MADAME DE BUNSEN.

In Three Legations: Turin, Florence, The Hague (1856-1872). With 49 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net (post free, 12s. 11d.)

GEORGE RENWICK.

Romantic Corsica. Wanderings in Napoleon's Isle. With a Chapter on Climbing. With 62 Illustrations and Map. 10s. 6d. net (post free, 10s. 11d.)

F. W. HACKWOOD.

Inns, Ales, and Drinking Customs of Old England. With a Coloured Frontispiece and 53 other Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net (post free, 10s. 11d.)

MAUD F. DAVIES.

Life in an English Village: An Economic and Historical Survey of the Parish of Corsley in Wiltshire. 10s. 6d. net (post free, 10s. 11d.)

JESSIE WHITE MARIO.

The Birth of Modern Italy. The Posthumous Papers of Jessie White Mario. Edited by the Duke Litta-Visconti-Arese. With 42 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net (post free, 12s. 11d.)

W. RICKMER RICKMERS.

Ski-ing for Beginners and Mountaineers. With 72 Full-page Illustrations and many Diagrams. 4s. 6d. net (post free 4s. 9d.)

ROBERT M. MACDONALD.

Chillagoe Charlie. A Dashing Adventure Story for Boys. Illustrated. 5s. (post free.)

E. NESBIT.

The Treasure Seekers. Illustrated. 6s. (post free). Write for a list of E. Nesbit's fascinating books for children.

NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE.

Tanglewood Tales. A wonder book for boys and girls. Illustrated by Willy Pogany. 6s. (post free.)

ALFRED P. GRAVES.

The Irish Fairy Book. With over 100 Illustrations. 6s. (post free.) Uniform with "The Welsh Fairy Book."

A NEW VOLUME OF MR. WILFRID BLUNT'S MEMOIRS INDIA UNDER RIPON A Private Diary

By WILFRID SCAWEN BLUNT, Author of "The Secret History of the English Occupation of Egypt." 10s. net (post free, 10s. 5d.)

"Like his 'Secret History of the English Occupation of Egypt' this book is very outspoken and reveals much of the inner machinery of Government in India, as well as the intimate thoughts of the leaders of native opinion twenty-five years ago."

The Books are on Sale at all Booksellers.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

"A REMARKABLE, A NOTABLE BOOK."—Daily Chronicle.
Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. net. Postage 3d.

THE CAMEL AND THE NEEDLE'S EYE.

By ARTHUR PONSONBY, M.P.

(Formerly Private Secretary to the late Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman.)

The Daily Chronicle in column review, under the heading, "The Problem of the Rich: A Striking Indictment," says: "After reading Mr. Ponsonby's indictment of the rich one feels that the Budget falls too lightly on accumulated wealth. The pictures which Mr. Ponsonby presents of the extravagances of the rich, their wasteful lives, their demoralising influences, suggest that the social welfare policy has been too long delayed. The object Mr. Ponsonby has in view is to enforce a lesson from the contrasts of great wealth and extreme poverty. Great riches are a menace to the existing social order and to progress, just as much as great poverty. He points out that concentrated wealth is a danger to commerce as well as harmful to the State and the individual. The lives of the rich exercise a demoralising influence not only among those around them but upon the less wealthy classes. Artificial conventional standards are set up and run through the whole strata of society. Mr. Ponsonby has brought a fresh mind to bear on the old problem. He has written a remarkable . . . a notable book, which we feel sure will exercise a healthy influence on the political thought and action of our time."

The Evening Standard says: "Mr. Ponsonby writes sincerely and concisely. To those unacquainted with sociological controversy he gives an excellent and hardly exaggerated description of social conditions."

The Observer says: "The keynote of the book is the proposition that extreme poverty is a necessary consequence of extreme wealth."

The Scotsman says: "Forcible, clear and persuasive, it cannot but prove interesting to serious-minded readers."

FURTHER INDISPENSABLE BOOKS FOR TO-DAY.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE LORDS. Clayton. 1s. nett. Postage 1½d.

THE BISHOPS AS LEGISLATORS. 3rd Edition. Clayton. 1s. nett. Postage 1½d.

LANDMOLDING IN ENGLAND. Marks. 1s. nett. Postage 2d.

THE CORN LAWS. Marks. 1s. nett. Postage 2d.

WHERE MEN DECAY. (The Rural Problem.) Lieut.-Col. D. C. Pedder. Post free 1s. 2d.

BRITISH ARISTOCRACY AND THE HOUSE OF LORDS. Edward Carpenter. 6d. nett. post free 7d.

LONDON: A. C. FIFIELD, 44, Fleet St., E.C.

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS

Trans-Himalaya:

Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet. By Dr. SVEN HEDIN. With 388 Illustrations from Photographs, Water-Colour Sketches, and Drawings by the Author, and 10 maps. 2 vols, 8vo, 30s. net.

2nd IMPRESSION NOW READY.

In the Grip of the Nyika.

Further Adventures in British East Africa. By Lieut.-Col. J. H. PATTERSON, D.S.O. Author of "The Man-Eaters of Tsavo." With Illustrations, 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Light Come, Light Go.

Gambling—Gamblers—Wagers—The Turf. By RALPH NEVILL. With 9 Colour Plates and other Illustrations. 8vo, 15s. net.

THOMAS HARDY.

Time's Laughingstocks and Other Verses.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. The Times.—"There have been a good many volumes of poetry published this year; but has there been one that surpasses or equals this in the indefinable quality of greatness by which human productions survive?"

The Rhythm of Modern Music.

By C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

A Project of Empire.

A Critical Study of the Economics of Imperialism, with special reference to the Ideas of ADAM SMITH. By J. SHIELD NICHOLSON, M.A., D.Sc., F.B.A. Professor of Political Economy in the University of Edinburgh. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Macmillan's Guide to Egypt and the Sudan. Including a Description of the Route through Uganda to Mombassa. With 35 Maps and Plans. Sixth Edition. 5s. net.

Mexico. The Wonderland of the South.

By W. E. CARSON. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 10s. net.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

The Education of Uncle Paul.

Algernon Blackwood.

Author of "Jimbo," &c.

Robert Emmet.

An Historical Romance.

Stephen Gwynn.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Eastern questions. It contains, also, some capital photographs.

* * *

FIVE essays by Dr. Guido Biagi, the Librarian of the Laurentian and Riccardi Libraries, Florence, have been translated into English and make their appearance in a volume called "Men and Manners of Old Florence" (Unwin, 15s. net). Dr. Biagi has had access to new material in his attempts to give us some glimpses of the social life in Florence from the thirteenth to the beginning of the nineteenth century, and the results of his researches, while of value to students, are almost certain to be welcomed by the general reader as well. His chapters on "The Mind and Manners of a Florentine Merchant of the Fourteenth Century," and on "The Private Life of the Renaissance Florentines" abound in those intimate touches which are often passed over by historians, but which are of the highest value in enabling us to realise the life of the past. The number of books on Florence is already large, but no one who reads the present volume will regret that Dr. Biagi has added to the number.

* * *

THE only criticism to be made upon Mr. Bryan O'Donnell's adaptation of M. Frédéric Lohé's "The Gilded Beauties of the Second Empire" (John Long, 15s. net), is that it contains the usual selection of anecdotes, many of them slightly improper, and the usual descriptions of ladies of the monde and of the demi-monde which we expect in a book of this type. The desire of some people to read about "gilded beauties" and "fascinating frail ones" seems to be inexhaustible, and as long as it lasts, books like this of M. Lohé will be written and translated. The women of the period dealt with in the present volume were costly luxuries, and when the bill was presented in 1870 an end came to one of the most unrestrained and ostentatiously frivolous epochs in French history.

The Week in the City.

	Price Friday morning, Dec. 10.	Price Friday morning, Dec. 17.
Consols 2½ per cent.	82½	82½ ⁵ / ₁₆
German Threes	84	83½
Peru Pref.	36½	35½
Buenos Ayres Pacific	91½	91½
Steel Common	94½	94
London Omnibus	20½	23

MONEY matters have been more interesting by means of an issue of Treasury bills, which went on terms very favorable to the Government, the revival of the Continental demand for bar gold in the bullion market, the increasing stringency owing to the Christmas demand for currency all over the country, and the very uncertain outlook which is puzzling the most practised observers of the monetary position. Thanks to our hereditary legislators' marauding excursion into the domain of the national finance, no one knows how much income tax will come in next quarter. As a rule coin and notes flow up to London from the provinces in payment of the direct taxes, but this time it is quite probable that this reflux will not take place. At the same time the Government will probably have to raise many millions on Treasury bills and by borrowing from the Bank of England, and it is by no means certain yet that a certain amount of dislocation and disturbance may not be caused. The foreign situation is almost equally obscure. It is known that Argentina will want a large number of sovereigns from London to finance the movement of its abundant crops. Indian demands are likely to be heavy, and Russia is known to be eager to add to its already bloated store of gold. On the other hand the trade balance that has long been so strikingly adverse to the United States may compel them to disgorge some of the metal, though it is doubtful whether they could afford to part with much, and it seems more likely that they will endeavor to dispose of securities in Europe instead of paying in cash for their balance of imports.

HOME SECURITIES DULL.

In the stock markets the Christmas holiday sentiment has been widely prevalent and business was on a very small scale. Consols and Home Railway stocks were rather bedraggled, and many of the hasty speculators who bought them on the theory that the action of the House of Lords might be followed by a Unionist victory at the polls, have been modifying their views and closing their commitments. Nobody seriously believes that a Unionist Government is required for the salvation of trade. The statistics of the position which show that trade is already reviving steadily in spite of all the dolorous dirges of the Tariff Reformers, are sufficiently emphatic to impress even the Tories of the City. But there is a tradition on the Stock Exchange that business in securities is never so active and confident when the Radicals are in power, and the existence of this tradition goes far to make it true. In the meantime the railway traffics continue to be eminently satisfactory, but the bad finance which has in past years so gravely discredited the prestige of Home Railway stocks is an influence which it will take a long time to overcome, and the yield to be derived from an investment in these is by no means tempting to the fastidious taste of the latter-day capitalist. It is curious to note that a great deal of the recent buying of them was on behalf of foreign operators, who led the way for the English investor, confidently expecting that he would follow. So far he seems inclined to await events.

LIVELIER AMERICANS.

American speculation has been rather brisker since Wall Street has succeeded in reassuring itself concerning President Taft's attitude towards the trusts. Rumors of new combinations and mergers are very much in the air. Most of them are frankly defiant of the provisions of American law, but that is a detail which does not detract one whit from their potency as a lever for hoisting prices. Indications seem to point to preparations for a vigorous bull campaign in New York as soon as easier monetary conditions after the turn of the year have made the necessary banking accommodation cheaper. But, as has been observed above, the monetary position has seldom been more obscure, and it is possible that Wall Street may be as wrong about it now as it was at the beginning of the autumn. A certain amount of anxiety has been caused to those interested in Foreign Government bonds by the emphatic assurances that nothing is amiss between Russia and Japan. These official dementis are always received with a good deal of scepticism, especially when there is no very apparent reason why they should be given.

JANUS.

EVANS'

ANTISEPTIC THROAT PASTILLES

FOR YOUR THROAT AND VOICE.

These Pastilles have a world-wide reputation for their wonderfully soothing and beneficial effects in all Throat troubles.

Should you suffer from Loss of Voice, Hoarseness, Weakness, Irritation and Inflammation of the Vocal Organs, then give Evans' Antiseptic Throat Pastilles a trial. You will be delighted with the result. Give certain relief.

PREPARED TO A FORMULA OF THE LIVERPOOL THROAT HOSPITAL.

Of all Chemists, Stores, &c., 1/- and 4/6 per box. Send 1d. stamp for sample box to Evans Sons Lescher & Webb, Ltd., Hanover St., Liverpool.

Ask for EVANS' Pastilles and refuse imitations.

ROYAL HOLLOWAY COLLEGE.

(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.)

The LENT TERM BEGINS ON JANUARY 13th, 1910. The College prepares Students for the London Degrees in Science and Arts. TWELVE ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, from £50 to £60 a year, and a certain number of Bursaries of not more than £30, tenable for three years, will be offered for COMPETITION in June, 1910.

Inclusive fee £100 a year. For further particulars, apply to the SECRETARY, Royal Holloway College, Englefield Green, Surrey.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Healthy outdoor life, combined with thorough education on modern lines. Usual curriculum, including citizenship course, extension lectures, &c. Preparation when required for University and other careers. Handicrafts, gardening, riding, nature study, archaeology, &c.

Principal: MISS AMY KEMP.

MAKERS TO H.M. THE KING.

The Flavour of Rowntree's Cocoa

delicious !

"THE TRUE WAY OF LIFE."

By EDWARD GRUBB, M.A.

The BISHOP OF HEREFORD writes in a Foreword to the book:—

"We welcome the arguments set forth in this volume. We feel that the writer is doing the best national and international service, that he is in the direct line of those great preachers of national righteousness, the Hebrew Prophets, and we believe that his preaching of the true way of national and international relationships, as herein set forth, is destined to prevail, and that the time is coming when every monarch, statesman or diplomatist of good repute and all responsible leaders of public opinion will recognise that every nation or state or government is a morally responsible personality; and that all governments claiming to be civilised should hold each other amenable to the universal moral law of veracity and fair dealing."

All the Profits on this book will be devoted to the furtherance of Anglo-German Friendship. To be obtained of all booksellers.

Price 1s. net. Post free 1s. 2d.

Headley Brothers, 14, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

Check the coming cold

You know, before it definitely grips you, that cold is coming.

If you wait for it to come, you'll have your cold with you its usual time.

But if you prepare to meet it, you'll win.

A coming cold is a cold turned-back if met by a

Mustard Bath

—a bath to which a couple of tablespoonfuls or so of COLMAN'S MUSTARD have been added. Try it yourself. And remember for next time.

Colman's mustard

FROM SEELEY & CO.'S LIST.

 A miniature Illustrated Catalogue will be sent free on application.

A MILITARY CONSUL IN TURKEY. By Captain A. F. TOWNSHEND, lately British Military Consul at Adrianople. With 29 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.
"Captain Townshend's splendid book."—Saturday Review.
"Vivid and entertaining."—Yorkshire Observer.

FAMILY NAMES AND THEIR STORY. By the Rev. S. BARING-GOULD, M.A. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
"A really entrancing volume."—British Weekly.

BOTANY OF TO-DAY. By G. F. SCOTT ELLIOTT, M.A., B.Sc. Extra Crown 8vo, with 27 Illustrations, 5s. net.
"Teems with interesting matter.—There is not a dull page."—Daily Telegraph.

SECOND EDITION.

AERIAL NAVIGATION OF TO-DAY. By CHARLES C. TURNER. Extra crown 8vo, with 70 Illustrations, 5s. net.
"Mr. Turner is well qualified to write with authority on the subject of aviation. . . Sets forth the principles of flight in plain, non-technical language, for all to read and understand."—Daily Graphic.

"THE LIBRARY OF ROMANCE."—NEW VOLUMES.
With many Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. each.

THE ROMANCE OF MODERN CHEMISTRY. By JAMES C. C. PHILIP, D.Sc., Ph.D.
"A fascinating exposition in popular language."—Illustrated London News.

THE ROMANCE OF MODERN MANUFACTURE. By CHARLES R. GIBSON.
"We have seen no better gift book for an intelligent boy this autumn."—Manchester Guardian.

THE FAERY QUEEN AND HER KNIGHTS. Stories Retold from Edmund Spenser. By A. J. CHURCH, M.A. With Illustrations in colour. Extra crown 8vo, 5s.
"Will prove an enthralling treat to the young reader—delightful illustrations."—Daily Telegraph.

HEROES OF MODERN INDIA. By E. GILIAT, M.A. With many Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 5s.
"Every Englishman will be the better for a perusal of this virile and well-written book."—Guardian.

ADVENTURES IN THE ARCTIC REGIONS. By H. W. G. HYRST. With 16 Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 5s.
"Really thrilling reading—appears at a singularly appropriate moment."—Liverpool Courier.

LONDON: SEELEY & CO., LTD., 38, Great Russell Street

TANGYES TYPE "AA" OIL ENGINE

*For Farm or Estate Work,
Country-House Lighting, &c.*

NO LAMP REQUIRED AFTER STARTING.
GRAVITY OR PUMP OIL-FEED.
SIMPLE, ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE.
REDUCED PRICES.

TANGYES LTD., BIRMINGHAM.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.
In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

TOURS.

R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."

£12 12s. OPORTO, GIBRALTAR, TANGIER, ALGIERS
PAERMO, February 15th.

£28 5s. PALESTINE, EGYPT, CONSTANTINOPLE, GREECE,
March 3rd.

Secretary 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

£7 7s. —SKIING, SKATING, TOBOGGANNING
TOURS, including Second Class Return Ticket
and Accommodation Hotel Aubepine, Ballaigues. Also Hotels at Mantana, Villars St. Beatenberg, Wengen, Lenzerheide, etc.—
Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, S.W.

THE INDEX TO VOLUMES I.—V. OF THE NATION

may be had free on application to the Manager.

PRINCIPLES AND METHODS OF TAXATION.

By G. ARMITAGE-SMITH, M.A., D.Lit., Principal of the Birkbeck College. Third Edition (just ready), 2/6 net.

In view of the great amount of attention at present being paid to the problems of taxation, it has been thought advisable to issue a new and cheaper edition of Dr. Armitage-Smith's standard work. It presents in a concise and simple form an account of the British system of taxation, and the principles on which it is based, together with some of the leading historical facts in its evolution. The book will be found invaluable by all serious students of this subject.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and
Other Bibles and Prayer
Books from
6d. to £10.

BIBLES

Illustrated,
Wide Margin,
Interleaved,
Teachers',
Interlinear
Revised,
and other Editions.
Telephone Central 329

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

LAMLEY & CO.,

DISCOUNT BOOKSELLERS AND PUBLISHERS,

1, 3, and 7, EXHIBITION ROAD, S.W.,

Invite inspection of their large and varied stock.

Interesting and out-of-the-way Books both old and new.

Christmas Catalogue sent on application.

WHO WAS SWEDENBORG?

A Lecture on "EMANUEL SWEDENBORG: HIS LIFE AND CHARACTER."

will be sent FREE AND POST FREE to ALL applicants on their sending their names and addresses to the Secretary of the SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury-street, London, W.C.

GLAISHER'S DECEMBER CATALOGUES OF PUBLISHER'S REMAINDERS AND BOOKS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS are now ready, and will be sent post free on application.

These TWO CATALOGUES include many ENTIRELY NEW REMAINDERS in General Literature; also a large and wide selection of well-illustrated and attractive books for the young, suitable for Christmas Presents.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., Remainder and Discount Bookseller,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

The Strange Disappearance of a Baronet—

an eerie and whimsical story by ALGERNON BLACKWOOD
—will appear in this week's issue of

The Saturday Westminster,

which will be a SPECIAL LITERARY NUMBER enlarged to
TWENTY PAGES.

Other Special Contributions to the issue will be
THE NEXT DOOR BABY: by Mrs. Neish.
FOREIGN AFFAIRS: by G. A. B. Dewar.
AN AMUSING STUDY BY "SAKI."

And in addition there will be
Special Articles on Christmas and Gift Books,
Reviews of the Season's Books, F. C. G.'s
Cartoons, and all the usual features.

'Saturday Westminster,' November 27th.

OFFICES: Salisbury Square, Fleet Street, E.C.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading,
Billiard and Smoking Rooms.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) Single from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."LONDON.WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill. E.C.; 70 & 71 Euston Square. W.C.AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge Every form of Bath.BOURNEMOUTH.THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence. 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderate

SILVER HOW.. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR-YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (on pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL. Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM-ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL 120 rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.

CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE. 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone 3032 Royal, 3 wiresLLANDUDNO.

The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab. centre of Prom. facing sea

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LYNTON (Devon).

ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis. Bowls. &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.

RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL. Boar's Hill. Dry. Sunny. Golf. &c.. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL. Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

SOUTHPORT.KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St.. Band and Illuminations. Turkish. Electric. Hydropathic. &c.. Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St.. Hot Luncheons. Aft'noon Teas. Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s per day. Tel. 422.

HOUGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough. Prop

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton
College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School. G.P.D.S.Co.
Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games.
Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Spring Term commences January 14th.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE.BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN. THE LICKEY HILLS, Near Birmingham.BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

TETTENHALL COLLEGE,STAFFORDSHIRE.

600 feet above Sea Level.

Headmaster—R. L. AGER, M.A. (Rugby and Corpus Christi College, Oxford).FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.*CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation.
Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines.
Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey. Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK.
K. M. ELLIS.

From Chatto & Windus's List.

NEW

From Chatto & Windus's List.

FLORENCE PRESS BOOKS.

Printed from a new fount of type specially designed by Mr. Herbert P. Horne after the finest examples of the Italian masters. "A type that can hardly be praised too highly."—The Times. "Not only is the printed page a pleasure to look at on account of its spacing and shapely letters, but it is also most delightfully clear to read."—Spectator. "Mr. Herbert Horne's work as a type designer has already given him a place beside William Morris and Mr. Charles Ricketts. Mr. Horne's older letters were individually beautiful; in his new fount their beauty is collective, as that of a fine typeshould be,"—Burlington Magazine.

SONGS BEFORE SUNRISE. By Algernon Charles Swinburne.

English Edition limited to 500 copies on Hand-Made Paper, about 7½ in. by 9½ in., bound in paper boards, 26s. net; or in Limp vellum, 36s. net. Also 10 Vellum Copies (all sold), bound in limp vellum, Ten Guineas net each. Applications for these copies should be made to the Booksellers.

THE LITTLE FLOWERS OF S. FRANCIS.

A newly revised and in parts Augmented Version of the Translation by Prof T. W. ARNOLD. The Illustrations are reproduced in Collootype, after the unique Drawings by an Unknown Hand contained in the MS. of the "Fioretti" and "Life" preserved in the Laurentian Library. The Edition is limited to 500 copies on Hand-Made Paper, size about 9 in. by 11 in., bound in paper boards, 30s. net; or in limp vellum, 42s. net. Also 10 Vellum Copies (all sold), bound in limp vellum, Eight Guineas net each. Applications for these copies should be made to the Booksellers.

BOOKS WITH COLOURED ILLUSTRATIONS.

THE FACE OF CHINA.

By E. G. KEMP, F.R.S.G.S. Travels in East, North, Central, and Western China. With some Account of the New Schools, Universities, and Missions, and the old Religious Sacred Places of Confucianism, Buddhism, and Taoism, and a Map of China. With 64 Illustrations after Water-Colours and Sepia Drawings by the Author, 20s. net; Large Paper, 42s. net.

STORIES OF THE FRENCH ARTISTS, FROM CLOUET TO DELACROIX.

Drawn from Contemporary Records. Collected and Arranged by P. M. TURNER and C. H. COLLINS BAKER. With 8 Coloured Plates and 24 in Half-Tone. Cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net; Edition de Luxe, with 5 additional Plates, crown 4to, parchment, 15s. net.

TRAVELS WITH A DONKEY.

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. Newly set in special large type, with 12 Full-Page Reproductions from Water-Colours, and 12 Facsimile Drawings, by NOEL ROOKE. 7s. 6d. net; parchment, 10s. 6d. net.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ; and DRAMATIC ROMANCES AND LYRICS.

By ROBERT BROWNING. With 10 Full-Page Illustrations after Water-Colours by E. FORTESCUE BRICKDALE. Large fcap. 4to, cloth, gilt top, 6s. net. Also 250 numbered Large-Paper Copies, on pure rag paper, the Plates mounted, bound in whole parchment, 12s. 6d. net.

A LADY OF KING ARTHUR'S COURT: A Romance of the Holy Grail.

By S. H. STIRLING. With Illustrations in Colours by CLARA ELSENE PECK. Cloth, 6s.

MELBA: AN AUTHORISED BIOGRAPHY.

By AGNES G. MURPHY, with Chapters by Mme. MELBA on the Art of Singing and on the Selection of Music as a Profession. Also an Introductory Note by J. A. FULLER MAITLAND. Photogravure Frontispiece and 37 Portraits, Views, and Facsimiles. 16s. net.

NOTES ON THE SCIENCE OF PICTURE MAKING.

By C. J. HOLMES, M.A., Slade Professor of Fine Arts, University of Oxford. NEW EDITION REVISED. 7s. 6d. net.

THE PAINTERS OF VICENZA.

By TANCRED BORENIUS. With 15 Full-Page Plates. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

THE MIND OF THE ARTIST.

Thoughts and Sayings of Artists on their Art. Collected and arranged by Mrs. LAURENCE BINYON. With 8 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

THE MASTER OF GAME.

The Oldest English Book on Hunting. By EDWARD SECOND DUKE OF YORK. Edited by W. A. and F. BAILLIE-GROHMAN. With Introduction by THEODORE ROOSEVELT. Photogravure Frontispiece and 24 Full-Page Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net; parchment, 10s. 6d. net.

EPISTOLÆ OBSCURORUM VIRORUM (1515-1517).

The Latin Text of the Editiones Principes, with an English rendering, Copious Notes, and an Historical Introduction by FRANCIS GRIFFIN STOKES. English Edition limited to 500 numbered copies. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and Facsimile Title-Page. Royal 8vo, buckram, 25s. net.

THE COLOUR OF ROME.

by OLAVE M. POTTER. With 60 Illustrations in Colours and Sepia by the Japanese Artist, YOSHIO MARKINO, who also contributes an Introductory Chapter. Fcap. 4to, 20s. net; Large Paper Parchment, 42s. net.

THE CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE.

Translated by Dr. E. B. PUSEY. Edited by TEMPLE SCOTT. With an Introduction by Mrs. MEYNELL. Large crown 8vo, cloth, with 12 Plates in 4 Colours by MAXWELL ARMFIELD, 7s. 6d. net. Also an Edition de Luxe. Crown 4to, pure rag paper, with the Plates mounted, parchment, 15s. net; pigskin, with clasps, 25s. net.

THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH.

By CHARLES READE. With 20 Full-Page Four-Colour Plates after Water-Colours, and 10 after Drawings in Line, Title-Page, Cover Design, and End-Papers by BYAM SHAW, R.I. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 12s. 6d.; parchment, 16s. net.

THE RAINBOW BOOK.

By Mrs. M. H. SPIELMANN. With Coloured Frontispiece and 15 Illustrations by ARTHUR RACKHAM, A.R.W.S., and 21 in Black and White by many other well-known Artists. 5s. net.

THE ROSE AND THE RING.

By W. M. THACKERAY. With Coloured Frontispiece, 44 Illustrations (12 in Two Tints), and Decorative End-Papers by GORDON BROWNE. 3s. 6d. net.

CAMPING IN THE FOREST.

With 12 Coloured Illustrations, many in Black and White, and Decorative End-papers by MARGARET CLAYTON. Cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

ANCIENT ENGLISH CHRISTMAS CAROLS, 1400-1700 ;

With some of Later Date, including Poems by J. ADDINGTON SYMONDS, ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE, CHRISTINA ROSSETTI, and WM. MORRIS. Collected and arranged by EDITH RICKERT. With 8 Photogravure Plates. 7s. 6d. net, in boards; 10s. 6d. net, in pigskin, with clasps.

THE RUSSIAN BASTILLE (the Fortress of Schluesselburg).

By I. P. YOUNG. Translated by Dr. A. S. RAPPO-PORT, Author of "The Curse of the Romanovs." With 16 Plates. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

ASTRONOMICAL CURIOSITIES.

By J. ELLARD-GORE, Author of "Studies in Astronomy," and Editor of "Flammarion's Astronomy." With 2 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

THE POWDER-PUFF: A Ladies' Breviary.

By FRANZ BLEI. Authorised Translation. Small crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

Essays on Love, Modesty, Mothers, A Law of Fashion, The Moral Illusion, The Kingdom of Heaven, The Symbol of Orpheus, The Jealousy of Men, The Adventuress Chastity, Veils, &c.

JOHN THORNDYKE'S CASES.

Related by CHRISTOPHER JERVIS, M.D., and Edited by R. AUSTIN FREEMAN, Author of "The Golden Pool," &c. With 6 Full-Page Illustrations by H. M. BROCK. 3s. 6d. net.

FRY'S ROYAL GUIDE TO THE LONDON CHARITIES.

Showing their Name, Date of Foundation, Objects, Income, Officials, &c. Edited by JOHN LANE. 1910 Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth limp, 1s. 6d.

THE UNLUCKY MARK. (2nd imp.).

THE KNIGHT OF THE GOLDEN SWORD. By F. E. PENNY.

INFLUENCES. By MICHAEL BARRINGTON.

KING HAL—of Heronsea. By PAUL METHVEN.

THE SON OF MARY BETHEL. By W. WILLMOTT DIXON.

PLAIN BROWN. By ELSA BARKER.

By COSMO HAMILTON.

NEW 6/- NOVELS

London : CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by THE NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, and Published by THE NATION PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.—SATURDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1909.

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 13.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1909.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	517	Heredit and Great Families.
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		By G. ...	536
Gladstone's Legacy to Demo-		Can Protection Cure Unem-
cracy ...	520	ployment? By H. & E. W. D.	537
The Two Policies ...	521	Making the Foreigner Pay. By Trade Unionism and the Law ...	522	Rowland Hunt, M.P., and
The Significance of Bagdad ...	523	Edward Taylor ...	537
Noblesse Oblige—New Style ...	524	The Campaign of the Peers.
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		By H. J. M. ...	538
Aristocracy in History ...	525	POETRY:—
A Modern King ...	526	Prince Adam. By Padraic
"Sing all the World!" ...	527	Colum ...	538
On a Nativity Picture ...	528	In Memoriam. A.I.G. By T. ...	538
SHORT STUDIES:—		THE WORLD OF BOOKS ...	539
The Workers. By John Gals-		REVIEWS:—
worthy ...	529	The Prentice Autocrat ...	540
THE DRAMA:—		Sir Hubert Parry on Bach. By
At a Music-Hall. By William		E. N. ...	541
Archer ...	531	An Eighteenth-Century Bishop ...	542
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—		A Scottish Lawyer ...	543
The Dawn of Constitutional		Novels of Marriage ...	544
Government in China. By S. 532		BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
COMMUNICATIONS:—		A Study in the Bibliography of
The Difficulties of a Liberal		Shakespeare's Plays ...	546
Government in Ireland. By		The Old Testament in the Light
A. M. Sullivan ...	535	of the Religion of Babylonia
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		and Assyria ...	548
The Judgment on Admission		Letters from the Peninsula, to the Sacrament. By the		1808-1812 ...	548
Dean of Ripon ...	535	The National Gallery Lewis
Searing Capital Abroad. By		Bequest ...	548
a Mugwump ...	536	The Work and Play of a Govern-
Home Rule and Woman Suf-		ment Inspector ...	548
frage. By D. W. ...	536	The Cottage Homes of England ...	548
		Spenser's Poetical Works ...	548

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

On Tuesday, the Prime Minister made two powerful speeches at Liverpool and Birkenhead to meetings of almost overpowering enthusiasm. In the Liverpool speech he said, of Lord Cawdor's talk of the occupation of Belfast by a German fleet, that the Navy and the Army were never better equipped and organised than to-day, and that the former was able this year, and in the years to come, to "maintain our supremacy at sea, to guarantee the integrity of our shores, the protection of our commerce, and the inviolability of our Empire." The Liberal Party was not, as Mr. Balfour pretended, a band of half-hearted Guy Fawkeses bent on blowing up the Second Chamber, but was simply struggling for its Bills against the Peers. The pretence of referring the Budget to the people was shattered by Mr. Chamberlain's confession that it must never be carried because it blocked the way of Tariff Reform, the very thing which the people condemned four years ago. Now representative government was at stake, for, if Lord Curzon's view of it prevailed, the House of Commons might be closed altogether. The question was not between two Chambers and a Single Chamber, but whether the House of Commons was to be supreme when the Tories were in power and the House of Lords when the Liberals came in.

At Birkenhead, Mr. Asquith, after an impressive review of the Government's record, declared himself to have been a warm advocate of every provision in the Budget. He pointed out, with reference to the two Chamberlain tariffs, that if they stimulated home production they were useless as revenue, and if they brought in revenue from import duties on foreign manufactures they were valueless for promoting home production. He showed how the pretence of the foreigner paying was falsified by the Protectionist refusal to tax raw materials, and also that the export of capital was often the sign and measure of our national wealth. The issue was—Would the nation send the Ministry and the Liberal Party back as mere debaters or as effective law makers?

* * *

On Tuesday, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, presiding at the National Welsh Liberal Convention, said that the Lords had blundered because the greed which drove them on at headlong speed was the wildest of all chauffeurs. He repeated his perfectly accurate statement of the Cardiff case, under which 500,000 square yards of mansion and park were rated at £921 10s., and 900 square yards of a tradesman's premises at £949 10s. He added another instance of inequality, in which a building site sold by Lord Bute to the Cardiff Corporation for £160,000 was valued at £253 a year, and yet a third, in which a kitchen garden site rated at £56 10s. was rented, when a theatre had been built upon it, at £1,200 a year. The Budget was going through, and other Bills with it, just as when one sheep found a gap in a wall all the rest went through. Those other Bills would be a great charter of security for the worker. The Lords were no protectors of industry; they protected monopoly, which plundered industry. At Swansea, after showing the large balance which the Budget left to the credit of labor, Mr. George declared that the end of Liberal policy would be to eliminate hunger from British civilisation. In South London on Friday week the Chancellor used a fine metaphor, which lights up the social side of his Budget and of progressive Liberal politics. In his native hills, he said, they knew that when the clouds lifted off the lowly valleys and hung round the lordly tops of the hills, there would be fine weather. So, in the social sky, he could see that there was a fine day coming.

* * *

In the Opposition ranks much the most noteworthy side of the election is the way in which the proconsuls—whose every word shows their peculiar unfitness to meddle with a free people's affairs—insist on claiming for the Lords a full power of usurping every right of the representative House. Lord Curzon, speaking on Tuesday at Burnley, utterly rejected Lord St. Aldwyn's plain hint that the Lords ought to be stopped from touching finance. "If a hereditary legislator is incompetent to touch finance" (as Mr. Balfour said he was), "he is incompetent to touch anything." In an earlier speech he emphasised this doctrine, adding to it an assertion which every constitutional writer denies point-blank. "To say that the House of Lords has no right to touch finance at all is to say that which is inconsistent with fact, with law, and with history." Such speech carries with it an act of war on King, Constitution, Commons, and people all in a breath.

* * *

LORD ST. ALDWYN, the only living Conservative financier of any account, has written to the "Times" to declare that he disapproved of the rejection of the Budget by the Lords, and did not think it Socialistic or revolutionary, but that he did not vote because he could not hold his party back. The Budget was not open to the charge of "tacking," and the Peers had no right to reject taxes simply because they objected to them. Now, however, that the issue has been joined, he supported the Conservatives because the Government proposed to reduce the House of Lords to impotence, not only on finance but on legislation.

* * *

MR. BLATCHFORD, Socialist, has been put in temporary command of the Tory army, though Miss Marie Corelli appears also to be a competitor. In the seventh of his articles to the "Daily Mail," he declared that our business was to maintain the balance of power in Europe and to defend, not merely our country, but France. For this purpose he asked for a vote of fifty millions for the Navy, for conscription, and for the forcible military training of children over ten. On Friday week, Lord Cromer publicly disgraced himself by endorsing these worthless productions, and the Duchess of Somerset declared that "it was curious that they had to come to a man like Mr. Blatchford to wheel them into line, but at such a time they should remember that party should not divide them." Lord Cawdor, Mr. Lyttelton, Lord Curzon, and, need we say, Lord Milner, have also "wheeled into line" or "come to heel" to Mr. Blatchford's policy of doing everything with "Dreadnoughts" and conscription except paying for them. The Lords are really making a great fuss to mask an ordinary, or rather an extraordinary, case of tax-dodging.

* * *

WE are inclined to think that the most impressive address of the election was delivered in the Devizes division of Wilts by a silver-haired old man, who, says the "Daily Chronicle," rose, after a "Tariff Reform" speech, and spoke as follows:—

"I must put in a word. I have lived in this village for nearly eighty years, and I can remember the 'Hungry Forties,' when starvation faced almost every door in this village, when bread was 1s. 11d. and 2s. a 'gallon.' It was bad times for the villages then, and I should like you to ask the audience if they wish for those times again. Keep the wolf from the door; that is my advice."

Happy for the people that some of them have memories, which wake at the voice of falsehood.

* * *

ON the whole the "Voice" which accompanies the Peers' efforts to make their case intelligible to the people seems to be getting the best of it. It thus dealt with Lord Dartmouth at Barnsley:—

Lord Dartmouth: What are you going to do with us? You can end us—

The Voice: That is what we are going to do.

Lord Dartmouth: You can mend us—

The Voice: No!

Lord Dartmouth: You can render us powerless—

The Voice: We shall do that.

And with Lord Hindlip at Ilford the "Voice," though slightly monotonous, was much to the point:—

Lord Hindlip: The House of Commons wants reforming.

The Voice: You mean the Lords, old man.

Lord Hindlip (continuing) asked what was the problem before the country.

The Voice: The Lords.

Lord Hindlip: What can the Government do?

The Voice: Abolish the Lords.

Really we feel relieved that the Christmas holidays will afford a close time for this hard-driven game.

WE have received some instructive messages as to the run of electoral opinion. A worker in the rural districts of the Home Counties tells us that he found little concern about the constitutional issue, but passionate interest in, and enthusiasm for, Old Age Pensions. Cheated by the Tories, the laborers had ceased to believe in politics, but the Pensions Act had restored all their faith and keenness. The removal of the pauper disqualification was another cogent spur to the mind and feelings of these men. In the Eastern Midlands, the Tory candidates denounced Home Rule, but found the electors completely indifferent, though steady as a rock on free trade and cheap food. All report the popularity of the land taxes, a feeling shared even by Tariff Reformers and Tory workmen and organisers. Everywhere observers report the Lords' campaign to be a new form of popular amusement. The political feeling about the Lords is said to be deepest in the North. Electoral defeat would rouse it into instant flame, but no apprehension of this is anywhere felt.

* * *

MR. BALFOUR, whose continued indisposition practically withdraws him from the election and leaves the party of the Peers without one leader of high credit or soberness, has made a very discouraging declaration on Women's Suffrage. He declared his party to be deeply divided upon it, and that these divisions showed "no signs of diminution." He therefore put it outside the Unionist programme. He said nothing of his personal opinions, but we believe that they have ceased to be friendly to the movement. For the moment, therefore, this great cause stands, by the folly of one section of its adherents, arrested, subject only to the way of progress opened, or half-opened, by the Prime Minister. Now that all the hopes of Tory aid on which the suffragettes counted have disappeared, only one line of rational action remains, that, namely, of filling the new Parliament with the largest possible number of suffragists.

* * *

ON Tuesday the House of Lords decided unanimously that the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants had acted ultra vires in making a compulsory levy upon its members for the maintenance of members of Parliament. The decision is final, and, of course, affects all trade unions. Four of the five law-lords sitting—Lord James of Hereford, with some qualification—decided that these levies were foreign to the purposes for which trade unions were established, and could not be said to be "incidental" or "ancillary" to them. Lord Shaw declined to decide the legality of these contributions, but held that the contract which affirmed them was unconstitutional as interfering with the freedom of Parliament and the rights of constituencies. A member, he said, must not bind himself to represent opinions because of any payment he might receive, and any such pledge violated representative government. The decision affects the maintenance fund of forty-nine representatives of the Labor Party and of the miners, and of sixty or seventy candidates, but no immediate financial embarrassment to the Labor campaign is likely to occur.

* * *

THE burial of Leopold II. was a more pompous and solemn ceremony than he seems to have desired. There is no doubt that, while few, if any, of his subjects loved him, the dislike, even of the Socialists, did not amount to hatred. His cruelties had been perpetrated far afield on an alien race, and the average Belgian cared to know little about them. The scandalous family life of the dead King is likely to leave behind it a heritage of litigation. To his legitimate daughters, with whom even at the end he refused to be reconciled, he left only the £600,000 which he inherited from his father. The rest of his fortune is tied and disguised in the funds of sundry corporations and companies. Some five millions sterling is believed to have been given to his favorite mistress, the Baroness Vaughan, by whom he had three children. As commonly happens in these sordid royal romances, it is now alleged that King Leopold had married the Baronessmorganatically at San Remo by a religious ceremony. It is doubtful whether, in the absence of a civil ceremony, this act, even if it could be established, would have any legal importance. The story seems improbable. King Leopold was quite without scruple or the fear of public opinion in his amours, and if he had contracted this marriage it is unlikely that he would have concealed it. But it is said that the Pope has written to his Nuncio in Belgium confirming Baroness Vaughan's claim and championing her cause.

* * *

THE exciting libel action in which the Serbo-Croatian leaders sued Baron von Aerenthal's literary exponent, Professor Friedjung, for accusing them of treason came, on Wednesday, to the inevitable end. The evidence which we summarised last week that Dr. Friedjung's documents are a mass of forgery, has since received official confirmation. He had published photographic copies of the minutes of a Servian secret society which is said to have met at Belgrade under the presidency of Professor Markovitch, who signed the minutes. There is no longer a doubt that he was all the while in Berlin. The documents attributed to the Servian Foreign Office have also been disposed of. Its Permanent Secretary is a notable stylist; these papers are drafted in language which no educated Servian would use. It is equally clear that the witness who accused the leader of the Serbo-Croatian coalition, M. Supilo, of taking bribes, was deliberately lying. When the exposure of his material was complete, Dr. Friedjung, who had doubtless been deceived by less innocent persons, came forward to withdraw his charges. The serious aspect of the case lies in this, that Dr. Friedjung had acted throughout only as the pen of the Austrian Foreign Office, which supplied him with these forged documents. Baron von Aerenthal in all his policy towards the Servians has clearly been misled by agents who were either credulous or criminal.

* * *

THE verdict of Copenhagen University on the claims of Dr. Cook to have reached the North Pole closes a singular chapter in the history of fraud. Dr. Cook had chosen the venue for his own trial; Danish opinion was almost unanimously favorable to his pretensions. But he submitted through his secretary, Mr. Lonsdale, no original documents, but merely typewritten copies of his alleged diary. The originals unfortunately failed to arrive, and the astronomical observations, like the instruments, are now said to have been left behind at Etah. There were, as the Committee unkindly remarked, "no elucidatory statements which might have rendered it probable that astronomical observations were really taken." The verdict is one of "not proven," but about its real meaning there can be no doubt. Every circumstance, from the loss of the documents, the absurdities in the original data, the disappearance of Dr. Cook himself, and the allegations of experts, who state that he bribed them to supply "faked" observations, establishes a presumption of deliberate fraud. It is now known that the verdict of the New York Explorers' Club will be adverse to the claim to have reached the summit of Mount McKinley, on which Cook's early fame rested.

* * *

PERSIA is grappling with a fresh crisis in its destinies at a moment when it is difficult to command sympathy for her plight. The new Mejliss realises that it must seek foreign aid if it is to set its finances in order. It is anxious to raise a loan of £500,000 primarily to equip a gendarmerie. It wishes to engage European financial experts and officers, but stipulates that these must be drawn from the smaller neutral States. Russia insists that only Russian officers shall command the Persian gendarmerie in Northern Persia, a claim which amounts to the creation of a new Cossack brigade to reinforce the Russian armies of occupation. British diplomacy is said to be backing this demand, which must sap what is left of Persian independence, if the two Powers are resolute in enforcing it. Meanwhile, the "Manchester Guardian" has published a photograph which exposes the methods by which the latest act of the Russian occupation was brought about. Rahim Khan, an ex-brigand and Royalist general, occupied Ardebil near the frontier, whereupon an immense Russian force was moved down to protect the town. The photograph shows Rahim Khan posing in perfect amity with the Russian officers. He was, of course, their agent.

* * *

ON Monday afternoon London was visited by an appalling catastrophe in the burning of the huge drapery shops of Messrs. Arding and Hobbs, which stand opposite Clapham Junction Station. The vast rooms were packed with flimsy Christmas gifts, some of them made of celluloid, and when an electric light wire fused in one of the windows the whole cavernous interior was doomed. In a single hour the five-storey building was a wreck, and only one of its walls remained standing. The shops were full of customers when the fire broke out, and the firm employed 300 assistants. Of these nine were either burned to death or fatally injured in the effort to escape the fearful march of the flames, and it is probable that the tale of losses is not quite complete. Mr. Burns rendered great assistance in limiting the area of the calamity. The business, large as it is, is to be re-started in a few days.

* * *

MR. GLADSTONE's appointment as Governor-General of South Africa has been gazetted. We cannot help hoping that a great name will once more be associated with South African history in the form in which the great commoner who was Mr. Gladstone's father bore it. For the rest, South Africa may be warmly congratulated on a representative of the Crown on whose good sense, experience, judgment, and constant amiability and sympathy of character, it can safely rely. Mr. Gladstone has been greatly maligned by some members of the suffragist party. He was set an almost impossible task, and he made as few mistakes as any man was likely to make. It is one of the many tragi-comedies of the movement that it has turned, perhaps, the warmest friend of the suffrage in the Cabinet into a kind of spectacular enemy. Of Mr. Gladstone's administration of industrial law little but good can be said. His work on the prison system has been open to criticism on one point, that of the indeterminate sentence; on every other it has been that of a reformer.

[Next week's issue of THE NATION will contain a contribution by Mark Rutherford.]

Politics and Affairs.

GLADSTONE'S LEGACY TO DEMOCRACY.

"Whatever we may say amidst the clash of arms and amidst the din of preparation for warfare in time of peace—amidst all this yet there is going on a profound mysterious movement, that, whether we will or not, is bringing the nations of the civilised world, as well as the uncivilised, morally as well as physically nearer to one another, and making them more and more responsible to God for one another's welfare. . . . I do most heartily thank you for having given me the credit of being actuated by the desire to consider in public transactions the wider interests of mankind, and I venture to assure you that, so far as my objects and intentions are concerned, objects of that nature, and nothing meaner or narrower, will ever be taken as the pole-star of my life."—Gladstone in Midlothian (1877).

WE are within a few days of a hundred years since Gladstone was born, and in another generation few of his countrymen who have known him familiarly will themselves be dwelling in the light of the sun. Will his memory and influence have disappeared by that time, or will his name be still a force in the shaping of British democracy? The answer to this question depends in a large degree on the form which the political life of these peoples will take. If it develops, in Lord Morley's words, on the lines of "popular right and free government and settled law of nations," we shall not have forgotten our debt to the man whose genius made all these principles part of his statecraft. On the other hand, if we tend to Protectionism, Imperialism, Conscription, and the rule of force and exclusion which they embody, we shall not only forget Gladstone and all his works, but we shall despise them. For the moment it is the habit, or even the hypocritical fashion, of perverts like Lord Rosebery to pretend that the leader whom they deserted was all the while on their side. If it was their wont to quote him against himself while he lived, it is still easier to misconstrue his doctrine now that he is dead. Nor is it possible to maintain that Gladstone's life, any more than the life of any man of action, invariably ran on all fours with his teaching. Was not the great Home Ruler the most formidable of the coercionists? Did not the friend of nationalities bring about the subjection of Egypt? Was not the arch-democrat indifferent to the social question? Had he any clear appreciation of the economic issues which arose the moment the gift of political power enabled the people to look round and examine the miseries and shortcomings of their lot?

To all these questions we can give an affirmative or a half-affirmative reply, and yet maintain that, as human nature and the opportunities of government go, Gladstone remains the best modern example of the statesmanship on which the moral sense of society can rely. Most of what can be said against him can be said against Lincoln, against Cavour, against William the Silent, against Cromwell, against the small body of powerful and truly enlightened men who have had to link actual responsibility for the daily governing of men with a sincere, though often thwarted, desire to lead them in the way they should go. When all is said and done, we know both from the outer facts and from the study of Gladstone's mind and character that he was a friend of peace, of national freedom, and of human brotherhood, and that throughout his long life, and in the continual and sometimes the hypocritical reserves and perplexities of the Cabinet system he pursued these ends and often brought them to real and splendid accomplishment. And this we can submit to a very simple test. To-day Gladstone stands out as the one conspicuous man of affairs who holds a place in the affections of other peoples than his own. Gambetta we know as the great Frenchman; Bismarck as the great German. But in scores of Bulgarian villages; in every Greek town and Montenegrin hamlet; in most Italian cities; all through the United States; in many parts of Russia, the name of Gladstone has a significance either as that of a national deliverer or as a symbol of international goodwill.

To achieve these ends, Gladstone chose two instruments and upheld two ideals. The first was the Nation; the second the Conscience of Civilised Mankind. To the first he insisted on giving the essential qualities of unity and moral force. No mere Machiavellian science of State-guile would do for him. Morals must be fearlessly extended from the private to the public sphere. Even in the 'seventies, when the social question was hardly thought of, he insisted on separating the people from "the interests," and later, in the Home Rule controversy, he distinguished "the classes" from "the masses." He regarded the main stream of public life, which he labored to maintain at the highest possible level of generous thought and emotion, as a thing apart from all that was merely timid, or purchasable, or grossly self-regarding, or fixed to the claims of caste and privilege. But he took no merely national or material view even of home questions. Patriot and stubborn Britisher as he was, he never would accept a smaller court of reference than the judgment of civilisation. To that, he insisted, all must conform—our treatment of Ireland, our foreign policy, even wars and sources of petty friction with wild border tribes on the Indian frontier, or with a Christian State like the Transvaal Republic confronting our colonial system. In the main he upheld the thesis that nations were "moral beings in the same sense as individuals, having rights for which they are entitled to respect and obligations to respect the rights of others, thus forming units in a moral system; a Society of Nations."*

Nor did he always consider whether other diplomacies maintained the same standards as he upheld. Here, like most instinctive moralists, he lit upon a real, if perilous, truth of life. A man of fearless character, he was apt, in emergencies such as the Belgian danger in 1870 and the Penjdeh confrontation, to take bold and even defiant resolutions, and it was never true of him to say that his foreign policy was either nerveless or unsuccessful. But he supported it on a far slenderer display of material force than his successors, Liberal or Conservative, have thought necessary. Was England ever safer or more respected than under Gladstone's Ministries? Yet their head fought a life-long battle with the war services, never relaxing his hostility till the last hour of his last Government. His tongue was not made smooth for the ears of tyrants, and he treated the Chancelleries to theories and phrases that would have made Metternich stare and gasp. Nevertheless, he lived to see Europe touched by his ideals as well as by those of Bismarck—to see Italy united and free, Bulgaria one and independent, the Balkan States cleared “bag and baggage” of the old Turkish régime.

* "The Crisis of Liberalism: New Issues of Democracy." By J. A. Hobson. P. S. King.

It is well therefore for us, in commemorating the centenary of Gladstone's birth, to remember, not merely the imposing and glorious pageant of his life, but its deep and, we hope, permanent influence on the State system of Europe and on the forms and substance of our own democracy. Rooted as he was in many conservative attachments—to the Anglican Church, the half-reformed Universities, the hereditary aristocracy—Gladstone advanced continuously to almost unreserved reliance on popular judgment. There, this almost passionate lover of the past, this studious formalist in manners and ceremonial, fixed his hopes of the future. No statesman, no experienced observer of the ways and wiles of men, ever came to a more optimist conclusion. In particular, Gladstone entirely changed his view of the House of Lords. He was anxious to make it the ground of his last appeal to his countrymen. His veteran captain's judgment mapped out in advance the inevitable lines of battle between the representative and the non-representative principle. He hoped nothing from privilege; he saw, not with the precision of the modern social analyst, but with an eye for broad moral truth, that regenerative and sustaining forces must arise from the bosom of society as a whole, not from any favored class. His precise creed and point of view may have grown old-fashioned for some of us; but the high seriousness and solemn urgency of the character of this great popular leader, the frequent success of his appeals to the quality of mercy in his countrymen, to their generosity, imagination, and capacity to think and feel for others, the nobility of his personal conduct and demeanor all through the transition period from aristocratic to representative rule, yield good grounds of hope for the life of the age to come.

THE TWO POLICIES.

In one sense the constitutional question is the sole issue at the coming election. Every man with a just appreciation of relative values will put aside all minor differences and all ordinary feeling of partisanship, and will give his vote consciously and deliberately for the Lords or for the Commons. In another sense the question between the Houses is only part of a wider and deeper controversy. It is a pivotal question whereon many others meet. It marks a point where two great waves of tendency collide, and, itself a question of constitutional politics, it is charged with the gravest consequences, economic, social, and imperial.

For many years two conflicting movements have been slowly gathering strength, sometimes with much accompaniment of vocal clamor, sometimes by silent education and organisation. On the one side a large mass of the propertied classes have tended to concentrate for the defence of their material interests, which they conceive to be threatened by the democracy. We do not forget that there are many individuals, and they the ablest and most enlightened, among them who take a more generous view, and who ungrudgingly pay their share of such additional burdens as the Budget imposes on them for the sake of the common good. But wherever “property” is gathered together in the well-to-do suburb, in the “residential” district, its general tone is unmistakable. By degrees it has evolved its own political ideal. It figures itself as standing for the nation. It represents itself as holding the fort, not of its own privileges, but of English supremacy and English liberty—for liberty and supremacy in its eyes are not clearly differentiated. Here is English trade threatened by foreign competition. Alarmist prophecies are repeated. Every statistical device is employed to prove the existence and exaggerate the extent of the danger. The Liberal Party is charged with indifference, and even with a traitorous partiality to foreign nations. The working classes are bidden to look to the danger of unemployment, and to rally round the captains of industry, like vassals about their feudal chiefs, who alone will provide for the defence of their trade.

The alarm is perfectly genuine, though it has been unconsciously fostered and cultivated by a sectional interest. It is sincere, although it pays. The same thing is in the main true of the other and more dangerous form of terror. Nothing is more significant of the mood of the Reaction than the sudden reappearance of the war scare on the eve of the election; yet this, too, is for many minds something so genuine and serious as to amount to an obsession. That there is much cool and crafty calculation behind it we may believe, but we should not do justice to our opponents if we did not recognise that some at least of them are as truly harassed by present fears of German invasion as by anxiety about German trade competition. Their attitude is not intelligible to one who looks coolly at the bare facts. It becomes intelligible only when one thinks of the psychology of nervous anxiety, when one remembers how an individual can work himself into a state of nerves by preoccupation with some source of worry, and then multiplies the effect a hundredfold by bringing in the actions and reactions of mind on mind, and conceives the state of national antipathy and dread as fostered by the economic and political ambitions of the class from which it originates. Explain it as we may, the result is that, marshalled behind the thin ranks of the peers, is a large party of the material interests claiming power in the land, and holding themselves out as the defenders of a nation threatened by dangerous competitors whom they are prepared to fight by the tariff first, and also by more material weapons. We do not state the case a jot or a tittle too high when we say that with the cause of the Lords is bound up the cause of class supremacy, of national antagonism, and economic protection, with universal service and European war looming very visibly and not remotely in the background.

On the other side, less advertised by an unsympathetic Press but very real and growing yearly in strength, is the hope of a better social order. What in earlier years could only be a passionate protest against economic wrong is gradually, through years of educative experiment and organisation, becoming a resolute and practical, but not an extreme or revolutionary, movement towards a consistent and constructive policy of redress. Foremost in this policy stands the problem of the land. The Budget appealed to the people through the land clauses. It showed a way by which the drain of urban wealth into private pockets might be arrested. It has given to the ordinary newspaper reader a glimpse of the economic conception of "social wealth," and has helped the ratepayer to understand why he is burdened as he is. It has shown him that the true way to relief is not to limit those social services of education, of help, of city improvement, on which the lot of the poorest, and the health and pleasantness of town life depend, but rather to place the burden where it should be—that is to say, to find sources of local revenue in the wealth which the locality is itself creating. Beyond the question of rates and of housing lies the still wider problem of rendering the land available for the people by fair purchase, for public objects, and for the establishment throughout the country of a class of small holders in place of the landless laborers who now form the bulk of our dwindling agricultural population. Here, again, a way of hope has been indicated, by Lord Pentland's Bill in Scotland, and by valuation and the development tax in England, and we may expect that a strengthened Small Holdings Bill will follow on such a victory of the constitutionalists as will paralyse the obstruction of the Lords.

Next to the question of the land is the problem of working-class poverty. Here the new forces won three decisive victories—the measures for the feeding of children, for the establishment of Wages Boards, and, above all, the Old Age Pensions Act. The dead Parliament has brought about a complete change of attitude in the relation of the State to poverty. It is no longer a question of intervening for the relief of the destitute. It is a question of preventing destitution by attacking poverty, and of attacking poverty by the frank recognition that the forces of competition will not of themselves fix the rate of remuneration for the average workman at a point which enables him to face unaided all the contingencies of life. In dealing with these contingencies, the State now offers him a partnership, and the development of this conception of partnership and its careful application in detail must be the work of the immediate future. It is this ideal which prompts the extension of Old Age Pensions by the removal of the pauper test, and the proposals of insurance against sickness, invalidity, and unemployment so brilliantly expounded by Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Churchill. Much will have to be said about the practical working out of these proposals, and no hard-and-fast scheme is yet ready for adoption. But the idea will ripen, and a way will be found of realising it, provided that the democracy shows the resolution and persistence necessary to retain the control of affairs in its own hands. Against the rule of property based on national antagonism there is fairly set up the standard of a far more real social co-operation than any which the world has yet known, and its counterpart in foreign affairs is free commercial relations, and a placable, reasonable attitude to foreign Powers. There are those who think politics a game, and those who look on it as a somewhat sordid business. To us nothing is clearer than that a controversy such as the present sounds the very depths of human association, and is to be brought to an issue that will fructify in peace, in social equity, in a nobler independence for the mass of men, and a more generous sense of co-operation, only by the energetic operation of those impulses which lie at the base of the truest religion.

TRADE UNIONISM AND THE LAW.

WE should have been more impressed with the decision of the House of Lords on the legality of trade union levies for the maintenance of Labor members had it not been based on different grounds by different judges, and in one case on grounds that were not legal at all. We are bound to add that those law-lords who were the strongest in maintaining that these levies were ultra vires showed the least knowledge of the actual character of modern trade unions. Lord Halsbury, Lord Macnaghten, and Lord Atkinson, for example, treated a trade union as if for all practical purposes it were as far outside the sphere of politics as an average trading corporation. Lord James, with his more intimate knowledge of industrial life and law, declined to lend himself to any such proposition. He admitted that it might be in the interests of a trade union to devote its fund to the payment of Parliamentary representatives. But he thought that the agreement to obey the whip of the Labor Party would commit such members to the promotion of public ends—such as the passing of the Budget—which did not directly concern the interests of Labor. Finally, Lord Shaw declined to commit himself at all on the question of law, but was very clear on that of constitutional propriety. In his view the taking of a pledge which bound a member of Parliament to surrender his judgment to a party committee was unconstitutional and a violation of the principle of representative government. This seems to us a long step from the question of legality, and we should be glad to know whether it applies a common brand of unconstitutionality to Irish Parliamentary Nationalism and to the Labor Party. If so, it declares that one-sixth of our Parliamentary representation is conducted on lines opposed to public policy. It seems to the point to ask whether in fact the Labor Party has been guilty of any tyrannous or anti-national use of its constitution.

Indeed, the decision of the House of Lords, while it may be held to settle the appeal to law, in no way establishes the equities of the case. Those who ask the trade unions to give up politics, for that is what the House of Lords invites them, in practice, to do, can have little knowledge of how great a part the framing of industrial and sanitary law plays in the modern State. The judges might be pleased to see the trade unions sent back to their earlier position of organisers of strikes and sick benefits. No modern statesman would care to see such a reversion, least of all to assist it. Many friends of labor have long seen that the far too rigid character of the constitution of the Labor Party, pressed as it was upon the whole body by an extreme section, was an obstacle to its development, and must sooner or later break down under the legal stress. It is clearly ill-suited to a political crisis such as that which the action of the Lords has brought about; and it must act with coercive effect on the Liberal or Conservative or merely indifferent minority in a trade union. But it is also obvious that we have not reached finality in the status of trade unionism. It is, after all, the natural seed-bed of labor representation; and labor representation, whether men like it or no, has come to stay. The whole difficulty would, of course, be settled by payment of members, its natural and historic solution. The Labor Party will have to consider whether this shall be their precise claim on the Liberal Government, or whether they will aim at a direct re-habilitation of the claim to set up compulsory levies. The wit of man might be hard put to it to frame an acceptable Bill on such lines. But the business of restoring the full civic status of trade unionism, now seriously imperilled, seems to us to fall well within the scope of Liberalism.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF BAGDAD.

It is typical of our modern habits of thought in diplomacy that the news of a renewal of negotiations over the Bagdad Railway should have seemed to have a bearing on the wider aspects of Anglo-German relations. That a notable financier of German origin should have gone to Berlin to discuss the monetary basis of a great German venture in the East seems, at a first glance, the most banal and the least political of events. Yet we know that Sir Ernest Cassel has his place at Court; he has played his part in the development of Egypt; he founded a bank in Constantinople which was intended to inaugurate the revival of our political and commercial influence in Turkey. Nor can we forget that the hot debate over our participation in the Bagdad scheme of 1903 was the turning point in the history of our relationship with Germany. Its abandonment under pressure from the school which was just then beginning to foment a jealousy which has steadily grown through the succeeding years, marked the end of the brief effort to establish, under Mr. Chamberlain's auspices, a Pan-Teutonic alliance. There is nothing more evanescent than the sentiments which accompany these fluctuations between fraternity and panic. There is nothing so insincere as the military alarms in which they find their popular expression. Beneath the sentiments and the armaments the tangible reality is precisely such schemes as this—schemes for the penetration of distant Empires, and the exploitation of suspected wealth. The irrigable fields of the Nile Valley, the provinces of China awaiting the railways, the timber forests of Northern Korea, the gold-mines of the Transvaal, and the iron-ore of Morocco, these are the concrete things about which most of the diplomacy of the past twenty years has turned. We have been hostile to France when she threatened us on the Nile, friendly when she accepted our occupation, and the history of the Moroccan tangle falls into two chapters divided by the moment when the French and German financial groups came to terms. It may be that an arrangement over the Bagdad Railway is destined to play for some years a decisive part in determining the attitude of two peoples, among whom hardly one elector in a hundred could associate with Bagdad any memory more recent than the "Arabian Nights."

There clearly is to-day, what there was not in 1903, something like the equipoise of influences which makes a bargain possible. At that time Germany was all-powerful in Constantinople. She had bought her way into Yildiz Palace, where we were detested as much for our disinterested championship of the Armenians as for our success in holding Egypt. The concession to construct the railway was in German hands. Even in the Persian Gulf our position had been threatened by a still jealous France and a still hostile Russia. The work of carrying the line beyond the Taurus range would indeed be difficult and costly. Berlin would have welcomed the aid of British and French capital; but not as yet on terms that would have involved the surrender of the effective control of a great German enterprise. But all these conditions are reversed to-day. Yildiz Palace yawns empty, and the influence which German diplomacy had acquired there at so heavy a price in moral prestige is now only a ground for suspicion among the popular parties who control the Government. British influence, if not perhaps so unchallenged as it was in the first days of the revolution, is still the most stable and the most powerful of the foreign factors in the development of the new Turkey. The shifting of the European kaleidoscope has left us without a rival in the Gulf. The French have forgotten that they ever dreamed of out-flanking us. The Russians, steadily pursuing their schemes in Northern Persia and threatening the independence of the kingdom, are content to leave us unchallenged in the south. The surrender of the navigation of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers to an English monopoly in the hands of the Lynch Company is one symptom of the changed aspect of affairs. The readiness of the Young Turks to entrust Sir William Willcocks with the supervision of the irrigation of Mesopotamia is another. That means, indeed, that before the German line can reach Bagdad, the work of developing the riches of the vast plain will have been organised under English guidance. The Germans will have crossed continents, tunnelled under mountain ranges, trafficked with despots, and drilled army corps, only to find that the Sea Power, secure on the gulf and the river, had arrived before them. The cards, in short, are no longer in their hands. For even if no arrangement were reached over the Bagdad railway, it is always open to British capital, if once it has come to believe in the possibilities of Mesopotamia as a wheat-field and a cotton-plantation, to tap it by constructing the short and inexpensive alternative line by the south from Bagdad to Damascus and the Syrian coast. It is clearly to the advantage of both Powers to reach a working arrangement. The section from Bagdad to the Gulf might be left in our hands, or the entire line might be internationalised. That is probably as the Germans prefer it. In any event our position is now so secure that we can certainly reckon on better terms than the Germans were willing to grant in 1903.

We are fully sensible of the advantages which might be extracted from any co-operation with Germany, and anxious that they should be turned to the best account. An understanding reached even in so limited a field as this would react at once upon all our relations, and pave the way to the true goal of Anglo-German policy—an agreement over armaments. But one caveat there is which can hardly be entered too firmly. To gain the goodwill of Germany we must not sacrifice the regard of Turkey, nor incur the suspicions of the Turkish people by our complacency to the financiers of the City and Berlin. Already the Lynch navigation monopoly has made difficulties. It was opposed by the Members for Bagdad, one of whom happens to be among the most enlightened and influential of the Young Turkish leaders. The manner in which this was pressed by the Government caused a revolt in the Ottoman Chamber, and all but brought about the fall of Hilmi Pasha's administration. The excuse which the Government made in the lobbies, if not in debate, for a procedure which was undoubtedly unconstitutional, seems to have been that the English insisted on the concession. A few more incidents of that sort would affect our whole standing in Turkey. Let it once be suspected that our Government is hunting for concessions at the Porte, as the Germans used to hunt for them at Yildiz, let it once be said that we are insisting on these concessions against the wishes of the local population, and we shall be on the high road to share the unpopularity which is the lot of the Germans to-day. We are apt to think of a railway as a beneficent work of civilisation. Built, as all the German railways in Turkey have been, for through traffic or military needs, with a sublime disregard of local convenience, their finance based on a kilometric guarantee, which makes them indifferent to the earning of legitimate profits, and fed by the mortgaged tithes of the peasants and the onerous customs of the merchants, these lines are at present a very doubtful benefit. If we share in these lines, we shall also share in the curses which the farmers heap upon their promoters. A great work to be done for civilisation, if the Turks have the enlightenment and the patriotism to conduct it on lines which will secure the full benefit for the commonwealth which they govern. Our aid may be very valuable. But even in the name of Anglo-German friendship we must not lend ourselves to any scheme for the spoliation of a people as yet too inexperienced and too raw to understand all the risks it may run.

NOBLESSE OBLIGE—NEW STYLE.

"Yes, my rosy fox-hunting brothers, a terrible Hippocratic look reveals itself (God knows, not to my joy) through those fresh buxom countenances of yours. Through your Corn Law Majorities, Sliding Scales, Protecting Duties, Bribery Elections, and triumphant Kentish fire, a thinking eye discerns ghastly images of ruin, too ghastly for words; a handwriting as of MENE, MENE. Men and brothers, on your Sliding-scale you seem sliding, and to have slid—you little know whither! Good God! Did not a French Donothing Aristocracy, hardly above half a century ago, declare in like manner, and in its featherhead believe in like manner, 'We cannot exist, and continue to dress and parade ourselves, on the just rent of the soil of France; but we must have farther payment than rent of the soil, we must be exempted from taxes, too—we must have a Corn Law to extend our rent'? This was in 1789: in four years more—Did you look into the tanneries of Meudon, and the long-naked making for themselves breeches of human skins! May the merciful Heavens avert the omen; may we be wiser, that so we be less wretched."—Carlyle on the Lords.

THE business of "referring" the Budget to the people proceeds apace. The Lords have "referred" the question of unemployment. They have "referred" such selected bits of Mr. Chamberlain's Tariff No. II., or Mr. Chamberlain's Tariff No. I., as would not too crudely reveal their purpose of substituting for a rent-taxing Budget a rent-raising one, framed on the classic model of the Corn Laws. They have "referred" the question of Single-Chamber Government as the most plausible form of words for masking the acts under which, during the last four years, they have set up Single-party Government, and given the electors fair warning that the only House of Commons they will tolerate is a Tory House of Commons, the only Budget a food-taxing Budget, the only Ministry one resting broad-based upon their will. They have also "referred" the question of Socialism—i.e., of Family, Religion, and Property. Finally, they have "referred" the imminent prospect of a German invasion, taking as their chief mentor a Socialist and Agnostic, who accepts their views neither of Religion, nor of Family, nor of Property. Thus, according to the "Spectator," they are revealing the essential "honesty" of their appeal. Its "sound common-sense," not to say its refinement and complete aloofness from the electioneering manners of the average bargee, they have revealed by describing Mr. Lloyd George as "Bill Sikes," "an outsider," a person who had not been "properly brought up," a fellow with the "predatory instincts of a Welshman" (a compendious insult to a man and his country), by calling one of his colleagues a "prize liar," and the Liberal Party a "pirate crew of tatterdemalions," by declaring, through an ex-chief of the Admiralty, that Home Rule meant the handing over of Belfast to Germany as a dockyard and the base of the German fleet, and by an occasional splutter of stable-room slang. Thus, having thoroughly convinced the country of their knowledge, sobriety of judgment, sense of responsibility, calmness of mind, and complete absence of party feeling and class passion, the "referees" have nobly gone to the people for a leader, and a Duchess flings herself (after the manner of the best brands of Harmsworth fiction) on the broad bosom of the editor of the "Clarion," with the ecstatic cry—"Wheeled into line at last!!"

What a party and what an election! If any intellectual pride were left to the heirs of Peel and Salisbury, it might be worth their while to pause before the general movement of affronted disgust with which the Colonies have received the ignoble, ever-shifting, self-destroying falsehood of their Protectionist designs, their flagrant attack on the Constitution, their open advocacy of conscription and European war, their ignorant outcry against a form of taxation in which every progressive community in the world has made liberal experiments. It is already clear that the predominant opinion in Canada and Australia profoundly disapproves these anarchic tendencies in modern Toryism. A "prominent colleague" of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, speaking to the Ottawa correspondent of the "Manchester Guardian," forbodes the return to office of the party which is likely to disturb the growing friendship of Canada and the United States, and to use a tone of insolence to "every foreign Power not an actual treaty ally." Everyone in Canada, says this statesman, "condemns the action of the Lords in rejecting the Budget and precipitating a Dissolution," an opinion which is strongly and almost unanimously echoed in the Australian Press, as well as in the newspapers of the Dominion. Not less significant is this gentleman's contemptuous dismissal of Mr. Chamberlain's new form of Colonial preference. "Such a proposal," he says (amounting as it does to a Canadian preference in wheat of three half-pence a bushel over the American wheat-grower), "is calculated to make the very jackasses laugh."

But what can be thought by the free-spoken democracies of the Atlantic and Pacific of a party that sets to work to establish Protection, the most intricate of fiscal machines, as a kind of bye-product of the destruction of the taxing power of the Commons? The peoples of Canada and Australia know, in our view know too well, the perils and complexities of tariff-making. But at least they have done it in the light of day, through their elective bodies, and with a series of checks and counterpoises devised in the interests of labor by its representatives. Does any one imagine that they would have taken it from the hands of their Legislative Councils, pale ineffectual shadows as they are of the House of Lords? Nothing could be more odious to the Colonies than to associate Protection either with the hatred of land taxes, or—if, per impossibile, they could conceive such a thing as an hereditary aristocracy massed into a single voting phalanx—with an all-powerful Second Chamber. Yet this is to be the agent and chief forwarder of Protection here. The House of Lords is in future to be its Old Man of the Sea. Never will the people think of the two apart, and we may well thank God for a reinforcement of the Free Trade cause which makes it almost superfluous to re-argue it before the sons and grandsons of the victims of the "Hungry 'Forties." The hook is simply unbaited; dear food, unemployment, the loss of political power, the driving of the people into barracks and warships, with Lord Milner and Lord Curzon as directors of the new press-gang, appear for what they are, so many gaping traps for democracy. One or another of their powers the people of this country might conceivably lose. They might qualify Free Trade. After a war-scare they might be enticed into some insidious form of forced service. They might back the Lords when they throw out a liquor Bill or a Home Rule Bill. But they will not throw away their birthright all at once at the call of men who, like Lord Curzon, cannot conceal the proud task-master's soulless contempt for the mass of mankind.

Life and Letters.

ARISTOCRACY IN HISTORY.

THERE is a pathetic tendency among some royal personages to take all their courtiers tell them as true. The monarch comes to attribute to himself in some real sense the achievements of the great men of his time, and in particular of that which statesmen, generals, and diplomatists do in his name. Far stronger is the tendency of aristocracies to suck into themselves all the credit of national achievement. With them, too, it is partly an illusion, not unaided by the courtier-class of literary men, and by the tendencies to mutual admiration which operate within an hereditary class as elsewhere. In part it is due to the exaggerated estimate placed upon any achievement of one who already has a name and a title to eminence. The minor feats of royalties and even of dukes are chronicled, and the public is divided between mild surprise that these eminencies too can achieve things that need sheer human faculty, and a gratified sense of the condescension of the august in mixing with the world of serious effort. Besides this the aristocracies have a very tangible claim to occupy a large portion of the national Pantheon, because they have been careful to reserve to themselves as much as possible of those fields of glory where the entry to the Pantheon is won. In this metaphorical sphere as elsewhere they hold a land monopoly, and absorb an unearned increment. An hereditary caste will monopolise power as far as it can for generations, and then blandly point to the names of those who have held power all that time to prove the intrinsic superiority of hereditary rank. So Lord Curzon the other day in his lecture on the Quintessence of Olympianism at Oldham (of all places) took credit to the House of Lords for the number of Prime Ministers, statesmen, field-m Marshals, and soldiers that it contains. He forgot to remark that these eminent peers fall into two categories. Some have risen, perhaps from humble stations, to peerages which they have accepted as the reward of merit. Their careers may illustrate the value of a Second Chamber, and may point to the materials of which such a Chamber might not unfitly be composed. But they provide not the beginning of an argument for the hereditary principle. The other class were, indeed, "sons of their fathers," but what Lord Curzon forgot to ask was how far and in how many cases their hereditary position and not their inherited talents was the cause of their success. During a great part of modern history the advantages of the aristocracy in the Church, in the Services, and in politics were so great as at times to approach monopoly. What elements of sense are there in an argument which chooses illustrious names from this period and points to their connection with the peerage as a recommendation of the hereditary principle? There are certainly families in which we find a succession of able men in conspicuous positions, sometimes for two generations, sometimes for more. But whether unaided ability would have sufficed to bring to eminence, say, the two Grenvilles whom Lord Curzon mentions, is another question. What the Olympians do not understand is that the able son of a poorer man spends the years from twenty to forty in painfully making a position. At the end of that time he is often a wearied, sometimes a broken, man.

In connection with an hereditary chamber, the very name of aristocracy is an offence. When Lord Curzon quotes Renan's saying that "all civilisation is the work of aristocracy," he does not deign to consider that in this connection the word has its true etymological meaning. How far the work of the world is forwarded by the select few who really are the "best," how far by the patient toiling mass, is a question which may be fairly argued. How far it is the work of an hereditary aristocracy is a question which would be foolish to raise. The negative answer is too clear. Aristocracies, as in Rome and England, have sometimes built up empires, evolved systems of constitutional law, and kept alive a torch of freedom where more popular institutions might have failed. But to associate them with the progress of the world is ludicrous. Consider the great achievements of England, its work for poetry, literature, art, philosophy, science, industry, freedom—all the heads of progress in which England has moved in the van of civilised nations. What have Shakespeare, Milton, Pope, Burns, Wordsworth, Keats, Browning, Arnold to do with peers and peerages? Tennyson, it is true, conferred lustre on the House of Lords, but he gained nothing from it. Shelley was a country gentleman's son, and Byron alone among the great names was by birth a peer. The scrivener, the exciseman, and the linen-draper hold as honorable a place in the ancestry of our poetry as the man of title. Macaulay and Bacon became peers, but what credit can the hereditary peerage claim of them? Stockjobbers, booksellers, wine merchants, peasants, masons, ministers of religion, doctors, bankers, shoemakers have claims as good as, or better than, the peerage to have produced our men of letters and our thinkers. Gibbon, Robertson, Johnson, Burke, Milman, Grote, Carlyle, J. R. Green—these may be said to have done something for civilisation. What did hereditary nobility do for philosophy to compare with the work of Hobbes, Locke, Berkeley—a bishop, it is true, and said to have some kinship with Lord Berkeley, whoever that may be—of Hume, Dugald Stewart, and Reid, of the Mills, Spencer, T. H. Green, and Caird, with the work of Bishop Butler, son of a draper, or of Jeremy Bentham, son of an attorney. Cavendish and Boyle are "aristocratic" names in science, though heredity, as limited by primogeniture, did not ennoble them. In our own day Lord Rayleigh is a name of real eminence. Sir William Thomson did not refuse a peerage. But neither he, nor Newton, Black, Priestley, Dalton, Davy, Faraday, Clerk Maxwell, Darwin, Huxley, J. J. Thomson owed a jot of their world-wide fame to titles, hereditary or other. Watt and Stephenson, Arkwright, Cartwright, Crompton, and Hargreaves between them initiated changes which have revolutionised the world, at a period when the House of Lords was chiefly distinguishing itself by maintaining the death penalty for a large variety of minor offences. English art knows Reynolds, Gainsborough, Turner, Romney, Watts, and Burne-Jones as painters, and it knows dukes and marquises as patrons and purchasers, and the patrons and purchasers, forsooth, think that it is they who foster the arts. They served literature by suggesting themes of satire to Thackeray, but among them all they never produced a Dickens, or among their womenfolk a Jane Austen, a Brontë, or a George Eliot. The descent of Fielding is indeed chronicled in a gorgeous passage of Gibbon, and is justly claimed as conferring on his family an immortality which will outlast the Palace of the Escorial and the fame of the elder, but less illustrious, line known to history as the House of Hapsburg. But Fielding again was of a younger branch, the Olympians of primogeniture knew him not.

In all this wonderful panorama of British energy, in all that our country has justly to boast in science, in literature, in art, philosophy, or religion, how slight is the work of the territorial aristocracy, which all along has had all the advantages of education and leisure in its hands, and how far beneath contempt the fraction contributed by those enjoying hereditary titles! It is in the face of such an array of facts that we are told that the aristocracies move the world. Having learnt so much, we are prepared to swallow the audacious attribution of the Factory Acts to the Upper House—the Factory Acts, the product of years of popular agitation, the work of Sadler, Oastler, Stevens, and a hundred obscure men who fought and endured in their humble way, that now, after two generations, the hereditary House may take the praise. But they were led by Lord Ashley, the son of a peer? They were, and when he entered the House of Lords as Earl of Shaftesbury when the fighting was over he complained of being relegated to a "dormitory." Such was his view of the strenuousness of the Chamber to which Lord Curzon gives the credit of a victory that was won elsewhere. Even the Truck Acts, of which the chief was pushed through Parliament by Charles Bradlaugh, are claimed by Lord Curzon for the Peers. But space forbids to pursue Lord Curzon to the end. In the face of his mass of half-truths, quarter-truths, and zero-truths, we take refuge in the comprehensive formula of Carlyle, "All which propositions I content myself for the moment with modestly, but peremptorily and irrevocably, denying."

A MODERN KING.

WATTS has immortalised a conception of "physical energy" which has in it nothing that is brutal or gross. One may associate the rider who bestrides that colossal horse with knightly adventures and the swift passion of brave deeds. There is another little masterpiece in a species of statuary which deserves to bear the same title. It is a rude wooden toy by Caran D'Ache, which represents the late King of the Belgians. That tall and erect form, those gaunt features, carved, as it were, out of granite by the rough tools of a violent and primitive craftsman, the long nose, the patriarchal beard, the air of slow and massive decision, the suggestion of some great mass in deliberate motion—they told the tale which the whole record of the man confirms. It was a purely animal energy which inhabited that great frame, gave to its vulgar appetites a vigor so portentous, and set the brain beneath the crown to utilise the forces of a nation for its vast but simple ends. Kings are more often than not mediocre specimens of the average sensual man. But the energy, the self-reliance, the megalomania of the dead King raised a mind, vulgar and commonplace in its texture, to a sinister greatness. The master of a pocket Paris, and the ruler of a little bourgeois State unvexed by national ambitions, he made himself, by his shrewd manipulation of great wealth, an international power. But the world in which he moved was the world of the senses. The most characteristic expression of himself which he ever attained was in the vast building schemes which absorbed such part of the blood tribute of the Congo as he did not spend upon his personal pleasures. It was a constructive mind, happiest when it was shaping vast things which it could see. The remodelling of Brussels, the decoration of Ostend with a frieze of showy architecture, the building of palaces, and the laying out of pleasure grounds—these were the man's most intimate renderings of himself. Stone and stucco were adequate media. His eternity was summarised in a solid foundation. He believed in what he could see and handle. His imagination was not haunted by the blood which flowed on the distant Congo before a stone of his vast structures could be hewn or shaped. He looked straight before him, and the color of the stones he saw was grey and white. So it must have been that the Pharaohs built their pyramids with forced and driven labor, and the Assyrians raised their towers on the backs of captive slaves. The figure of the man as we in England see it, with none of the distortion of self-interest, seems scarcely human in its brutality and its greed. But in Brussels and in Paris, under the genial influence of the wealth which he set in motion, the verdict of the average sensual man is by turns tolerant and admiring. He lived in a glass house of cynicism. His sensuality was public; his unrelenting cruelty to his own daughters was blazoned to the world; the crimes of his colonial adventure were acknowledged at the end. But he attained his end. The great stones rose in orderly rows. The streets stretched north and south like lines upon a plan. His name was dreaded in mid-most Africa. His millions played with the destinies of provinces in China. His treasury was full of gold. Men call him a great king.

It was no simple problem which destiny and temperament had set King Leopold. His energies demanded an outlet; his megalomania asked for scope. But in what way could the King of a little neutral State achieve greatness? He could not hope to enlarge his patrimony in Europe, for there are no Belgians un-redeemed beyond the borders. The other Coburg in Sophia might cherish such dreams, but they were forbidden to him. William of Orange, though he was but the First Magistrate of Holland, could raise himself by his diplomatic skill and his wise audacity to be the leader of a European coalition. But the conditions of neutrality forbade such an ambition as that. An intellectual would have attempted to win for Brussels a primacy in the world of learning or art; an idealist might have turned the very neutrality of his country to account by assuming the leadership in the organisation of European peace. The conception of King Leopold was more realist and more modern. He aspired to play a hand in the game of world-policy. He realised that the possession and control of capital is equipment enough. He continued, like his father before him, to encourage the industrial development of his country. He inherited a great personal fortune, which bred in his hands. But more remarkable than his skilful manipulation of his own possessions was his skill in attaining the leadership of great financial groups. He gathered bankers around him as other kings have gathered courtiers, or artists, or Churchmen. First in Brussels, then in Paris, and latterly even in New York, he made himself a recognised captain of investors. His cars carried us from Ostend to Stamboul, from Madrid to Moscow. He directed a great exportation of Belgian capital, always in concert with French allies, into the immense field of Russian investment, planting it in cotton mills and iron-works, and building up its prosperity, in concert with the Wittes and the Kohovtseffs, on the basis of a protective tariff. He shared through the Belgian customs officers, whom he lent to Persia, in the last effort of Russia to exclude her English rivals. He reinvested the millions extorted from the Congo in the semi-political railway squabble in China. He stood outside the risks of the European struggle, yet he made himself an indispensable factor in alliances built upon finance. He played in the old world the part which the oil kings have usurped in the new. They have dignified trade by meddling in politics, and corrupted politics by introducing trade. He operated in diplomacy as they deal in a party game. The method had at least the distinction of originality. The old-world counters of dynastic ties, sentimental affinities, and military pressure were alike discarded. He played at high finance as a Rockefeller or a Rothschild might have done, and used the prestige of birth and the glory of sovereignty to dignify and assist the manœuvres of the Bourse.

It would be hard to say precisely what part the crowning adventure of the Congo played in the scheme of his life. At the outset he entered upon it in a mood of megalomania, which may not have been primarily commercial. He dreamed of making Belgium great by giving her, despite her lack of army or navy, and in the teeth of the quiet, home-keeping instincts of her population, a colonial Empire. When he dotted the vast map with his trading stations, and parcelled it out among concessionaires, he may have conceived that he was carrying out a constructive work, and laying out an estate. It is not probable that this cynical and realistic mind derived any pleasure from the talk about civilisation, which was always in the mouth of his apologists. He may have seen with his limited imagination as the essential symbols and results of his activities the neat official residences along the great river, the steamboats, and the railroad. But, as the work of exploitation progressed, it is inconceivable that he can have thought of the Congo save as the source from which he drew the resources which his other activities demanded. It was in the façades at Ostend and the ornamental arches at Laeken that the blood and tears of the Congolese were crystallised. Even from his own materialist standpoint King Leopold must have known that the Congo was being rapidly ruined. The abandoned villages, the decimated tribes, the dwindling yield of rubber, and the impossibility of enforcing the corvée by which it was collected—these symptoms must have warned him that the "civilising work" would leave behind it in Africa no monument to the builder. That, no doubt, was at the last the reason why he sold out by consenting to the annexation. The adventure had endured for his life-time. He left behind him in full view the millions and the structures which were his real objective. The student of human nature must have asked himself continually of late years how it was possible for any human being to bear the responsibility for the misery which he caused in the pursuit of wealth. No individual in our time has pushed a purely economic exploitation to so dire an extremity. But the vulgarest sweater presents in essentials the same problems. He sees around him first the suburban villa, and then the country-seat, and finds them desirable. He does not see the garret in which his white slaves turn out the buttons or the blouses which are the staple of his trade. It is in the power of the human mind to arrest its operations at the wall of its own estate that the key to the puzzle lies.

"SING ALL THE WORLD!"

IN the years before Antipodes were dreamt of, it was a wise tradition that set Christmas in the winter solstice. Had June been chosen for the day, and the church-pillars hung with roses instead of holly, what a different aspect the festival would have worn, and what a loss the story of the Manger would have suffered in the memories of children! The winter wild has always seemed so natural a setting that one can hardly imagine how the Cape or Australasia can properly celebrate the season at the feverish height of their temperature, even by using the vain substitutes of salt and sprinkled wool for snow. Nigeria falls this side the equator, and December is there the cool season, as coolness counts in that perpetual hothouse; yet even in Nigeria how incredible to any Christmas child is the picture called up by the following card from the Coast:—

"Where Niger flows, at Merry Christmastide, Fewer tornadoes clear the house inside,
The glass drops down to ninety in the shade,
Soldiers prepare a punitive parade,
And fever's not so bad—as fever goes—
Where Niger flows.

Dear England! you're deprived of joys like these,
No Ju-ju warbles in your Christmas trees,
No hippo sports beneath your twilight pale,
No crocodile improves his shining tail,
You eat no mangrove oyster, such as grows
Where Niger flows.

Yet, Mother Island, in your fog and ice,
We dream of you as demi-paradise,
And from the swamp and forest far away,
Send you a Christmas-card for Christmas Day (Excuse the robin, and we don't have snows
Where Niger flows).

That could be no true Christmas such as our fathers welcomed when they made the "Ancient English Carols" which Miss Edith Rickert has now collected for Messrs. Chatto & Windus. For them the joy of Christmas was grafted on to the joy of all Northern peoples when the sun is beginning his return, and already bears with him on his way the slow but certain spring. The festival was itself the gladder by contrast with the winter, and the long months of dark nights and foul ways could hardly have been endured but for that outburst of song and merriment in the middle of them. So the ancient Church, always ready to enrol in God's service the existing customs of man, transformed the Yuletide songs of heathendom into carols for the Virgin's glory. Often beneath a hymn on the mystery of the Incarnation we may trace some primitive song of love or revelry, just as under a doctrinal palimpsest one may sometimes spell out the lines of Greek tragedy. As an example, we might probably take the traditional carol beginning, "Joseph being an aged man truly, He married a virgin fair and free," in which each of the sixteen verses ends with the words "dearest dear," sometimes applied to Mary, and sometimes to Christ Himself, instead of to the lover for whom they were intended. There are a few of our most beautiful ballads that seem only to have escaped being converted into carols by a kind of divine accident; such as the strange and exquisite verses beginning:—

"As ye came from the holy land
Of Walsingham,
Met you not with my true love
By the way as you came?"

Simple-minded people, educated in the realities of country hardship, naturally found an added charm in the beautiful story of Christmas when they were told of the stable surrounded by snow, or thought of the shepherds huddled together against the cold, or of the Kings and wise men following the star under frosty skies. The young-eyed purity of the scene was enhanced when winter was at its priestlike task of purification. It was natural that the cattle in David's city should then be gathered into the shed for warmth, and against the darkness of a December morning the orange light thrown around the manger appeared more divine. When the truth of every detail was held with childlike belief by all villagers, one can imagine the innocent pleasure of the scene in any village church, from the thirteenth century at all events down to the Reformation. There were the oxen and asses standing round, and intermingled with them the wise and powerful of an unknown world bringing gifts, while in the centre sat the Mother and her Child, throned in a manger, and unseen voices gave out the carol:—

"As the angels before did say,
O thou man, O thou man!
As the angels before did say,
So it came to pass;
As the angels before did say,
They found a babe where it lay,
In a manger wrapped in hay,
So poor he was."

We cannot wonder that the most beautiful carols were the lullabies. The sight of the Rose of Roses, the Star of the Sea, nursing her holy Child and putting Him to sleep suggested the service of common motherhood, and the sacred carols were often interchanged with the lullabies of every woman's hearth.

"In a dream late as I lay,
Methought I heard a maiden say,
And speak these wordes mild:
'My little son, with thee I play,
And come,' she sang, 'by, lullaby.'
Thus rockèd she her child.
*By-by, lullaby, by-by, lullaby,
Rockèd I my child.
By-by.*"

That, or the carol beginning:—

"I saw a sweet and seely sight
A blissful bride, a blossom bright,
That mourning made and mirth among,"

and many others of the same character hardly differ from the ordinary lullabies of the fifteenth or earlier centuries, except that the Child's mother is a maid.

Almost equally attractive with the lullabies was the scene of the shepherds watching their flocks, and in these carols also we find the frank admixture of common and contemporary life, just as we find it in the sacred pictures of the time. Take, for instance, this exact description of a shepherd, much nearer to Sussex than Syria:—

"The shepherd upon a hill he sat,
He had on him his tabard and his hat,
His tar-box, his pipe, and his flagat;
His name was called jolly, jolly Wat;
For he was a good herd's boy,
Ut hoy.
*For in his pipe he made so much joy,
Can I not sing but hoy,
When the jolly shepherd made so much joy."*

On sight of the star, having given his dog careful instructions about the sheep, jolly Wat sets off to Bethlehem, there offers his pipe, his scrip, his tar-box, and his skirt, and then, with a kind word to Mary and Joseph, hastens merrily back to mind his flock.

Still more remarkable in its disregard for the local color over which modern poets perplex their brains, is the beautiful and most popular carol beginning:—

"I saw three ships come sailing in On Christmas day, on Christmas day," and continuing to narrate how the three ships sailed into Bethlehem, while all the bells on earth did ring, and all the angels in heaven did sing. But, perhaps, even stranger is the brief carol of the sixteenth century:—

"There comes a ship far sailing then,
Saint Michael was the steersman,
Saint John sat in the horn;
Our Lord harped, our Lady sang,
And all the bells of heaven they rang,
On Christ's Sunday at morn."

And once at least the poet of a carol (though not a Christmas carol) reached a dignity not to be distinguished from the finest ballads. The verses were composed sometime before 1536:—

"He bare him up, he bare him down,
He bare him into an orchard brown.

In that orchard there was an hall,
That was hangèd with purple and pall.

And in that hall there was a bed
It was hangèd with gold so red.

And in that bed there lieth a knight,
His woundès bleeding, day and night.

By that bedside kneeleth a may,
And she weepeth both night and day.

And by that bedside there stands a stone,
Corpus Christi written thereon."

On the other hand, a carol might fall into merely nonsensical verses, like those beginning:—

"My lady went to Canterbury,
The saint her help to be;
She met with Kate of Malmesbury.
'Why sleepest thou in an apple-tree?'"

And so, with rapid degeneracy, after the Reformation, the carol was turned to mere description of good cheer and jollity, from which every touch of innocent belief had gone. Miss Rickert quotes from Nicholas Breton's "Fantasticks" (1626):—

"It is now Christmas, and not a cup of drink must pass without a carol; the beasts, fowl, and fish come to a general execution, and the corn is ground to dust for the bakehouse and the pastry . . . In sum, it is holy time, a duty in Christians in remembrance of Christ and customs among friends for the maintenance of good fellowship."

There are many carols extolling that kind of revelry, including George Wither's fine picture of a good old Christmas, beginning:—

"So, now is come our joyfullest feast, Let every man be jolly;"

in which poem there is not the smallest mention of Christ's birth at all. And that jovial ideal of Christmas has, in fact, prevailed, as is obvious from the appearance of all provision shops at this season—a proof that civilised man has not lost the savage's capacity of devouring in one day as much as would usually suffice him for a fortnight. Of late years, certainly, under the reviving sense for religious worship, there has been also some revival of the spiritual significance revealed in the winter's festival, and a few poets have even tried their hand at carols and Nativity plays again. But excellent as some of the attempts have been, they share the common fate of imitations. The early innocence has gone, and no poetic effort to reproduce its beliefs can recover it. Pope had a less hopeless task when he strove to recover the pastoral charm.

ON A NATIVITY PICTURE.

WHAT is the secret of the perennial charm of the Christmas story? What is the reason of the unfailing freshness of pictures of the Nativity, of Christmas carols, and miracle plays? Why, in tubes and underground railways, can one shut one's eyes and shut it out, the scene about one, and call up any picture of the Manger at Bethlehem, and let one's mind dwell with a new, delighted interest on all the bright, familiar figures of angels, and men, and animals around the Crib? The power of this magic is probably felt in a greater or less degree by everybody, save perhaps a very blasé and cynical minority. The capacity for feeling it is independent of belief in the historical truth of the story. M. Anatole France probably feels it as keenly as anybody. Neither is it the refined pleasure of an æsthetic few. The story is very close to the general heart. The charm is no doubt partly æsthetic, but one cannot doubt that the deep content and satisfaction which it gives comes from an intuition of the intense and lasting significance of the scene.

It is a profound remark of a great religious thinker, too little known in England, that the two great ideas necessary to human life and happiness, the idea of God and the idea of Man, are mutually hostile and destructive. Man is persecuted and annihilated by the idea of God, where it alone is dominant, crushed to the earth, bowed beneath the yoke of Eastern fatalism. It is the religion of the desert, arid and sterile, overarched by a pitiless sky. Human personality is dwarfed and stunted by that distant Immensity. On the other hand, the idea of Man without God leads straight to the madhouse. It ends in pessimism, anarchy, suicide. One turns with relief from Schopenhauer or from Nietzsche to the spectacle of happy, normal human life, the life led by "Quiet folk who live beneath

The shadow of the steeple,
The parson and the parson's wife,
And mostly married people."

These people have no thought of living without God, but the idea has been mediated for them. In the childish, gaily-painted Christmas picture the two ideas meet and are reconciled.

The note of that picture is, of course, familiarity, accessibility. A recent writer has levelled at Christianity the reproach that it uses "pet names" in speaking of God. This, of course, is literally true. In parts of Catholic Europe, "mon Jésus" is a mother's term of fondling endearment to her baby, a "petit mot," like "my duck," "my pigeon," "my goldfish." It means just precisely "my treasure."

The Nativity scene is typical of the whole religion. The great characteristic of Christianity is its bringing together of what is nearest and most far. Its whole meaning and value is enclosed in a human life lived amid homely and familiar scenes. The farm lad in Hursley parish can read his homely lesson in the Eternal Mirror where angels view the Light of the Father. The first Christians declared what they had seen with their eyes, what they had looked upon, and their hands had handled. Hence the essentially Christian idea of the goodness of common things. The earliest teachings of Christianity were "parables drawn from the vineyard and the flock." Its highest mysteries are wrought with the simple elements of bread and wine. All this is seen in its most moving, most touching form in a Nativity picture where the ineffable, transcendent mysteries are enacted to the accompaniment of rustic pipes and flutes.

It is impossible to imagine the banality and aridity of a completely secularised world, a world with no mystical background, in which we were all closely imprisoned in the material scene, and in which it had been demonstrated to the universal satisfaction and acceptance that there was no Beyond. Equally dreary and depressing is the contemplation of a Beyond that is altogether alien, that cannot be expressed in terms of human life, and has no point of contact with our earth. The Christmas picture gives us a glimpse of this mystical background of the Beyond, which never afterwards altogether passes away from us, which is for the most part dimly felt indeed, but which is always there. Hence the quality which the story has of impressing and affecting us, as though we heard it for the first time, its astonishing sense of newness, of fresh, vivid interest. The familiar scene contains the very essence of wonder and surprise. It expresses the breaking up of routine, the opening of infinite vistas, the endowment of common things with a transcendent meaning.

If this picture is even the symbol of a reality, then the possibilities of human life can never be exhausted. It means intensely and means well. An immense hope has come into the world. Into the dark room where the shutters are shut, no light may pass, there has come one long ray through the hinge's chink. As we look at the fragile little life so hymned and chanted we feel that it cannot be doomed from the first to disappointment and failure. Man is not made for death. The world cannot be merely after all a place of wasted pain and hope. A little child is perplexed and terrified when it realises the meaning of death for the first time. Our thoughts travel from the gay festival in the Manger to the storm and darkness in which the little life will end. Then, even as we shudder, we are carried at once into another scene of joy, to the time when there was gladness in the house of John, and Peter made amends, and Longinus saw clear, and new life and new hope came to all.

This is the great note alike of Christmas and Easter, the sense of newness. But can this sense of newness be maintained in a world that itself grows old and moves to its inevitable end? Can it ever be anything more than an illusion? The very need of renewal shows the law of decay. Is not an eternal newness a contradiction in terms? Will not the fruition of the great Hope itself be transitory? Science assures us of the earth's decay and extinction, the doom is certain, the law inexorable. But the Christmas picture shows us something deathless entering into the passing world. The angels have come from some eternal fête; they dance and sing round the white bud of an eternal Flower. The scene carries with it the hint of a perpetual renewal, continuous and satisfying, a "ver perpetuum," which will be ushered in at the transfiguration of all things into an eternal newness, in novissimo die, at the newest, youngest day.

Short Studies.

THE WORKERS.

THE little, squat, dark houses with snow-sprinkled roofs, having windows like the blurred eyes of old people, ran curving away from the thoroughfare. Built so long ago that they seemed as the ghosts of departed dwellings, they harbored countless workers, who could be seen plying their needles by the afternoon light, gleaming yellowish under a snow-laden sky. Indeed, in some windows tallow candles were already burning.

Unlike the doors of the shiftless, these street doors, to which clung the memory of paint, were religiously closed, and it was necessary to tap before one could enter. The woman who opened the last of those doors was about fifty-five years of age, and dressed in very crumpled clothes as of one always sitting down, with a face desiccated by deep furrows so that no two features seemed to belong to one another. She held in one hand a threaded needle, in the other a pair of trousers, to which she had been adding the accessories demanded by our civilisation. One had never seen her without a pair of trousers in her hand, because she could only manage to supply them with decency at the rate of seven or eight pairs a day, working twelve hours. For each pair she received seven farthings, and used nearly one farthing's worth of cotton; and this gave her an income, in good times, of six to seven shillings a week. But some weeks there were no trousers to be had, and then it was necessary to live on the memory of those which had been, together with a little sum put by from weeks when trousers were more plentiful. Deducting two shillings and threepence for rent of the little back room, there was therefore, on an average, about two shillings and ninepence left for the sustenance of herself and husband, who was fortunately a cripple, and somewhat indifferent whether he ate or not. And looking at her face, so furrowed, and at her figure, of which there was not much, one could well understand that she too had long established within her such internal economy as was suitable to one who had been "in trousers" twenty-seven years, and, since her husband's accident fifteen years before, in trousers only, finding her own cotton.

Her face was long and narrow, her eyes grey, and they looked at one as though they knew she ought to ask whether anything could be done for her, and knew, too, that she would not.

She spoke, indeed, very little except about her trousers. Oh! they were so common! so paltry, no quality at all! And lately they had been giving her boys' knickerbockers. She had "no patience" with them, which took every bit as much cotton, and brought you less money. In old days it had been a better class of trouser altogether, but now there seemed no heart in them—no heart at all! And they were so irregular! But you couldn't blame the woman who had them of the tailors, and gave them out—she let you have as many as she could, and only got a farthing a pair for herself. So there it was!

A bed which had neither legs, nor clothes that could be recognised as clothes, took up the greater part of the little room, which was fuller of rags, charred pans, chipped crockery, and trousers, than any room of its size ever seen. On this bed a black cat with a white nose was sleeping. Bits of broken wooden boxes were heaped up, waiting to feed the small fire. And on the wall by the side of this fire hung the ghost of a toasting fork. Very lonely and thin was that wispy piece of iron, as though for many days it had lacked bread. Hooked to the wall, with its prongs turned upwards, it was like the black shrivelled husk of an arm and hand, asking for more with its spidery fingers.

Its owners were seated with their backs to it; she just under the tightly-closed window, so as to use as long as possible a kind of light for which she had not to pay; and her husband with his crippled leg almost in the fire. He was a man with a round, white face, a little grey moustache curving down like a parrot's beak, and round whitish eyes. In his aged and unbuttoned suit of grey, with his head held rather to one side, he looked like a parrot—a bird clinging to its perch, with one grey leg shortened and crumpled against the other. He talked, too, in a toneless, equable voice, looking sideways at the fire, above the rims of dim spectacles, and now and then smiling with a peculiar disenchanted patience.

No—he said—it was no use to complain; did no good! Things had been like this for years, and so, he had no doubt, they always would be. There had never been much in trousers; not this common sort that anybody'd wear, as you might say. Though he'd never seen anybody wearing such things; and where they went to, he didn't know—out of England, he should think. Yes, he had been a carman; run over by a dray. Oh! yes, they had given him something—four bob a week; but the old man had died and the four bob had died too. Still, there he was, sixty years old—not so very bad for his age. She couldn't get through half the work but for him holding the things for her, and pressing them, and one thing and another—not up to much, of course—but he could do all that!

With those words he raised his right hand, which clasped a pair of linings, and there passed between his whitish eyes and the grey eyes of his wife one of those looks which people who have long lived together give each other. It had no obvious gleam of affection, but just the matter-of-fact mutual faith of two creatures who from year's end to year's end can never be out of arm's length of one another. For, as he said, they were not much of goers-out. Though he did get out once in a way when the weather was fine, and she had to go out to get her work and come back again. His eyes, travelling round the chaotic, grimy little room, which was as much the whole world to them as ever was his cell to a prisoner, rested on the cat, coiled-up on the ragged bed-clothes. Oh, yes! The cat. There she was, always asleep. She was a bit of company. They didn't see much company; kept themselves to themselves. Low neighborhood—people very funny! Yes, there was nice enough buildings round the corner. But you had to be in a good position to live in them. Seven and six a week—and pay it sharp. Not but what they weren't sharp after their rent here! Just a working man, their landlord, who'd got to pay his rent himself, so what could you expect? A little spurt of work just now, of course, owing to Christmas. Soon drop down again to nothing afterwards—oh, yes!

Smiling his strange smile, as of a man almost amused at what Fate had devised for him, he reached down and fed the fire with a piece of broken box; then resumed his upright posture, with his head bent a little to one side so that it favored his withered leg. They were talking, he had heard said, about doing something for trousers. But what could you do for things like these, at half-a-crown a pair? People must have 'em, so you'd got to make 'em. There you were, and there you would be! She went and heard them talk. They talked very well, she said. It was intellectual for her to go. He couldn't go himself, owing to his leg. He'd like to hear them talk. Oh, yes! And he was silent, staring sideways at the fire, as though in the thin crackle of the flames attacking the fresh piece of wood he were hearing the echo of that talk from which he was cut off. "Lor bless you!" he said suddenly, "they'll do nothing! Can't!" And, stretching out his dirty hand he took from his wife's lap a pair of trousers, and held it up. "Look at 'em! Why, you can see right through 'em, linings and all. Who's goin' to pay more than 'alf-a-crown for that? Where they go to I can't think. Who wears 'em? Some Institution I should say. They talk, but, dear me, they'll never do anything so long as there's thousands, like us, glad to work for what we can get. Best not to think about it, I say."

And laying the trousers back on his wife's lap, he resumed his sidelong stare into the fire.

The snow-laden sky seemed to have drawn nearer, so little light was there in the room; and there was no sound, as though the last word had been spoken, and the fire exhausted. In that motionless and soundless twilight the toasting fork on the wall alone seemed to be alive, with its thin, tortured prongs asking for that for which those two had never asked.

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

The Drama.

AT A MUSIC-HALL.

ONCE in every two years, or thereabouts, I find or make an opportunity of going to a music-hall, in order to study the wonderful improvement in variety entertainments of which we hear so much. Just as the drama is always going to the dogs, the music-hall is always, according to a certain type of critic, soaring nearer and nearer to the angels. I do not know which of these opinions is the more distressing piece of cant, or, at any rate, of ignorant and thoughtless babble. Closely examined, no doubt, the assertion regarding the music-hall is the more excusable. In a purely formal sense—in a sense that scarcely matters—it may even be called true. There has probably been a slight improvement during (say) the past twenty years in the average music-hall entertainment. But the essential fact is that while the drama has progressed by leaps and bounds, the music-hall has remained, not quite, but very nearly, stationary. The progress of the one is as surprising as the immobility of the other. There is much that is trivial in the theatre, and not a little that is base; but, on the other hand, it is the occasion and the scene of some of the best intellectual effort of our time. At the music-hall, it would, of course, be absurd to look for "intellectual effort"; but it is hard to find any real improvement in grace, or refinement, or humor, or even sense. There have always been, and still are, a few clever "turns"; but—the tag is too apt to be resisted—"apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto."

Does the great and increasing popularity of the "sketch" indicate a desire for better things on the part of the music-hall public? On this point I can offer no opinion—I have seen too few sketches. It was to see one that I went to the Palace Theatre on Monday evening; for Mr. Henry Arthur Jones's little play, "The Knife," is doubtless to all intents and purposes a sketch. Did it stand out amid its surroundings? Yes, of course it did; very much as the report of a railway accident would stand out in the pages of "Ally Sloper" or "Comic Cuts." It is the bare, brief, quite adroit presentation of a painful situation. An eminent surgeon, Sir Mark Ridgeway, is on the point of performing a critical operation on which the life of his friend, Archie Kingsford, depends, when he learns that Kingsford is the lover of Lady Ridgeway. Can he go on with the operation? Has he the nerve? Yes, he has. While Lady Ridgeway, in an anguish of suspense, waits in the ante-room, he carries the operation through successfully; and then he tells his wife that he will divorce her if ever he returns from South Africa—for, by way of making the atmosphere more cheerful, the scene is dated "during Colenso week of the Boer War," and Sir Mark has volunteered for service in the hospitals. The thing is done with all Mr. Jones's skill in the handling of a situation; and it affords Mr. Bouchier and Miss Violet Vanbrugh an excellent opportunity for some vehement emotional acting. But is it, artistically, quite worth while? There is no time for any development of character, and much less for any moral judgment. The little play is a "short, sharp shock" to our nerves—only that and nothing more. It was like a caviare sandwich in the midst of a banquet of lollipops. Not that it was "caviare to the general"—it was received with unbounded applause. But personally, when I am to be subjected to this surgical style of art, I think I should prefer to be placed under chloroform.

What, now, of the rest of the entertainment? When I came in, a pair of "knockabout artistes" were performing to a house which was as yet half empty. Of their patter the following specimens may perhaps suffice; they stood out, incredible as it may appear, by reason of their comparative brilliance: "Would you go through fire for your mother-in-law?" "I'd have to—she's dead." "I know something that would tickle you to death." "What?" "A feather." "We don't call them suffragettes any more—we call them Sunny Jims." "Why?" "Because they're fed by force." This sparkling sally elicited some half-hearted applause. Then came a young lady with the most nasal voice I ever heard, who sang, to a funereally slow waltz-tune, a lyric of which this was the refrain:—

"I want you for my beau;
You will be true, deary, I know.
I've made up my mind a sweetheart to find,
And I think—you'll—do."

All the time she was singing, the lady emphasised the rhythm by, not exactly dancing, but moving around in a languid and perfunctory fashion; and grown men and women sat and applauded. By this time the house was filling up, and "The Palace Girls" came on the scene. They are eight young ladies in very short, very fluffy, very swishy skirts, brailed up behind in a fashion I never saw before, who twitter inaudible words to indistinguishable tunes, and go through, with mechanical precision, a sort of ever-shifting dance-drill. The general idea of the performance was to treat the troop as a sort of long sixteen-legged insect, jiggling about in various fantastic curves, and occasionally coming apart into separate vertebræ, only to join up again and reform the perfect polypod. There is, no doubt, a certain art in the accurately consentaneous movement of sixteen legs; and the Palace Girls are much appreciated by the Palace audience. A Scotch Comedian followed, who resembled Mr. Harry Lauder in his employment of a fantastically crooked walking-stick; but not, I imagine, in anything else. He was, however, a nimble dancer. Then came the first appearance in England of Miss Adeline Boyer, in an Original Eastern Scene, "A Princess of Israel." The scene might have been original if we had never heard of Salome. Miss Boyer has an almost uncannily lithe figure, and dances, I imagine, with some skill. She dances herself into the affections of King Solomon, and, as the programme puts it, "The curtain descends on a fiery love passage between the King and the Princess." The scene is, in fact, a pas de fascination of the most modern mode. One can imagine more edifying topics than the amours of King Solomon; but to the people who like that sort of thing, it probably does no particular harm. There follows a very clever piece of lightning caricature-work by Mr. Ernest H. Mills—the only turn of the evening that was too short for my taste.

Now a thrill of expectancy ran through the audience, and a burst of applause announced the approach of a star as yet unseen. At last the luminary swam into our ken in the person of Miss Vesta Tilley, attired as a dandy in ultra modern evening dress. Her first song concerned "The Charge of the Light Brigade"—the adventures of a gang of rowdy young men who were "charged" with being drunk and disorderly. It was not exactly a parody of Tennyson's poem, but every now and then a Tennysonian phrase would be dragged in; as thus:—

"What with all the champagne and the ladies that we met,
We soon got into a skirmish, you bet,
And every fellow, I needn't tell,
Lost his head and his heart as well.
Ladies fair attacked us everywhere—
Oh, your worship, what a charge was there!"

In the innocence of my heart, I imagined that the "Champagne Charlie" style of lyric was extinct; but here it was, as flashy and alcoholic as ever. Then Miss Tilley impersonated a schoolboy in an Eton jacket, a soldier, and a Margate buck—the last a very clever piece of comedy, and almost agreeable in comparison with the schoolboy and the drunken dandy. Her work has certainly great neatness and finish; but as to its tone—well, I think the above specimen may suffice. Mr. Jones's playlet was the next item, and after it came "Miss Margaret Cooper and her Piano"—a turn in which some real talent is applied to the most trivial ends. Then came a pair of loud, metallic French comedians; and the evening wound up with a curious colored cinematograph exhibition.

"The Knife" apart, this was exactly the show one has seen at the larger music-halls any time the last ten years—no worse, maybe, but certainly no better. I have tried, so far as possible, to make it speak for itself, and not to let myself go in epithets. But more depressing than the performance on the stage was the audience that applauded it. An audience to make one despair of civilization—with its over-dressed (and under-dressed) women, its coarse-grained men, clapping their white-gloved hands at all the tedious, threadbare inanities. Significant, too, in no very cheering way, were the advertisements on the gaudy programme. Most of them celebrated the supper-resorts of the neighborhood; but three were devoted to whiskey; two invited gentlemen to open credit accounts with turf-financiers in Holland, and nearer home; one offered to the nobility and gentry the services of an international detective expert and confidential investigator. One could not help feeling that the programme was pre-eminently the place for these advertisements, and that the nobility and gentry then and there present were no doubt precisely those on whom the publican, the bookmaker, and the divorce-court spy batten and wax fat.

WILLIAM ARCHER.

Letters from Abroad.

THE DAWN OF CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT IN CHINA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The cautious Chinese character shows itself in every line of the new Constitution which has recently been promulgated. It concedes to the people through their representatives statutory rights which they already possess in informal ways, and so safeguards the authority of the Ruler that he will not lose prestige as kinsman and confederate of the supernatural powers. How much does the innovation mean? Will it work? and will it last? Has it in its germinal ideas the promise of a peaceful evolution through which the needs of a rising generation with larger knowledge and a modern passion for citizenship may be met? Or will it lend itself to some such coup d'état as engulfed the late Emperor and his well-meant schemes of reform?

The franchise upon which the elections take place would be impossible in any other part of the world. Imagine the delegates to twenty Deliberative Assemblies chosen by the combined votes of the Universities, the Chambers of Commerce, and the Trade Guilds of the country, and you have a rough and ready parallel to what has now come to pass in China. Those entrusted with the franchise are either literary graduates or owners of property amounting to 5,000 taels. Probably more than a million graduates have exercised the franchise, for if we class the graduates who possess the double qualification with the scholars rather than with the property-owners, literature will be the dominant influence. But the scheme is not so aristocratic as it may seem upon the surface. It is true the rice and millet growing lands are held in small parcels, and the humble trader may seem to have been left out in the cold, but the sense of blood kinship is so strong that the graduate may be trusted to represent the feeling of his clan. Indeed, many clans have educated out of the common family funds the graduates who are their spokesmen with the officials and their shield of defence against aggression; and it is not in the nature of the Chinaman to forget the rock out of which he was hewn. The literati have always enjoyed the privilege of direct access to the Mandarins, as have also the officials of the Trades Guilds. The new Constitution regularises rights of representation which already belong to the majority of the electors in their private capacity. The Assemblies will at least furnish the Executive Officers of the Government with a safe and sure test of the opinions of the people at large, and make the policy they pursue less haphazard. Legible barometers, in which the mind of the multitude may be read, have now been put up in every corner of the empire. The deliberations of these Assemblies will also protect the authorities from the undue private pressure sometimes used by the local gentry. A shrewd official may perhaps be able to play off one section of opinion against another, and get his own way on the ground that no clear lead is given by a strong majority either on the one side or the other. The dumb multitudes stand to gain. The separation of classes is not cruelly marked. The representatives in these Assemblies will express the views which are in favor with the unlettered cousins who gather from time to time in the family councils of the villages. The collective judgment of these bodies will certainly be stronger than the influence of their individual representatives. So far there is on the whole a well-considered advance.

For the present the power of these Assemblies, provincial and district alike, is rigidly limited. They are to be little more than training centres for future politicians and consultative gatherings giving local approval to the methods of raising revenue for the uses of the Government. Of course, the concession has been necessitated by the growing volume of Western ideas which is pouring from every side into Chinese life. But underneath these changes we can perhaps see the unconfessed desire of a weak and unfortunate Dynasty to lean, more than in the past, upon the good-will of the people. Here lies its safety in the near future. Local opinion must be rallied as far as possible to the side of the throne. Those who study Eastern problems from afar hardly realise how under ordinary circumstances the multitudes live their life without taking serious account of the Imperial administration. Now and again when Peking diplomatists seem bested by the foreign Legations, or when contending villages get into the grip of the Mandarins, the Chinaman lowers his voice and, with a sideways waggle of his deprecating hand, says unpleasant things about the Dynasty and its Counsellors, but, as a rule, a large local autonomy goes on year after year unchecked from without. And this applies not only to the management of municipal affairs, but to the punishment of misdemeanors and even crimes. The immense population of the villages only knows of the existence of the Mandarin when it has to pay the land-tax, or surrender a pirate or a fugitive law-breaker from the city for punishment in the Mandarin's Court. The symbol of the Dynasty meets the eye on every side in the city, but order is maintained in the villages through those patriarchal ideals which are as dominant as in the days of Confucius.

The scheme has certain broad outlines which are perhaps borrowed from the United States of America. It may have been thought that arrangements which suit one vast geographical area will fit another which resembles it in its imposing dimensions. The Provincial Assemblies correspond to the bodies which meet in each separate State, whilst the Imperial Parliament, to be constituted in due time at Peking, features roughly the House of Representatives at Washington. Besides the Provincial Assemblies, Prefectural and District Councils are also being summoned. Perhaps these may ultimately resolve themselves into Electoral Colleges and Committees of Ways and Means. A district is equivalent in size to an average English county, and of these districts there are said to be fourteen hundred or more. Many of them are little walled villages, and there are populous commercial emporiums which will apparently be represented only through their County Capitals. It looks as though a thousand miniature Dumas, in widely separated parts of the Empire, might get into each other's way and produce friction, mischief, and confusion. But the swarm of asteroids will doubtless exemplify in due time the law of order. This bewildering multiplication of Councils and Assemblies doubtless causes the people in every part of China to feel that they are represented, and the representation will be a safety-valve.

The reservation of foreign affairs and military questions to the sovereign shows how the German ideal, copied from Japan where it is already acclimatised, has set its mark upon this effort of Constitution-building. That a system which suits one Asiatic country will probably suit another, has been the ruling argument in favor of this proviso. It is quite in harmony, moreover, with the traditions of Chinese history. Siamese, Burmese, Thibetans, Arabs, Parthians, Mongols first came as tribute-bearers to the sovereign, and it is his prerogative to receive these envoys from afar and return their courtesies. Do not smile at the permanent power of this old tradition. A group of politicians in the old country would seem to be embracing the antiquated notion to which the Chinese are bidding farewell. Let the foreigners pay your taxes. The outer barbarians will flock to the Central Kingdom and with their handsome tribute defray the upkeep of throne and government. This reservation of foreign and military affairs to the absolute will of the throne cannot be final. The dynasty of the Mantchoos is more martial by hereditary tradition than the Chinese people themselves, and sooner or later wars will not be made by sovereigns without the consent of the people, unless the sovereigns pay for them out of a private purse and hire the victims. The plea that might be made for withdrawing these subjects from public discussion is that sixty per cent. of the people have no first-hand knowledge of foreigners. Scholars of immense learning may be met with who are quite sure that the aboriginal peoples of their own mountains have tails, and the Dutch and the Portuguese and the English have some kind of kinship with barbarian tribes. The paternal Government perhaps thinks it necessary that even literary graduates of the old school should extend their geographical and anthropological knowledge before getting any kind of control over foreign affairs. But as a matter of fact the newspapers have carried on a campaign of enlightenment for years, and the Chinese of the interior provinces, who know the least of foreigners, are not always so hostile as those who know the most. The difficulty in working existing treaties arises from the fact that the people generally are ignorant of them, and have not had, in the most indirect way, a voice in their negotiation. In some cases sections of the population have only learned of these treaties and the need to respect them, twenty-five or thirty years after they were signed. This state of things is being rapidly changed by railways, telegraphs, and the wide circulation of native papers. In the cities and villages of the interior it may sometimes be hard to enforce treaties upon which the Representative Assemblies have not been allowed a right of comment. It is possible difficulties may arise in the near future. Railway concessions have been made, which will sooner or later involve the compulsory purchase of lands in the interior, or the raising of large revenues to buy back the concessions. The Provincial and District Assemblies will be vitally touched by these transactions, and it is difficult to see how they can be debarred from the discussion of foreign affairs. Perhaps some of them would like to advise the Imperial Government to refer to the International Tribunal at The Hague those strained interpretations of half-obsolete treaties which are being used by the British opium interests to hamper native officials in carrying out a great moral reform. Chinese exclusion laws and the treatment of emigrants in some far-off lands are foreign questions many Chinamen are eager to handle.

In the meantime changes are contemplated which will clear the ground for the full-grown Parliament of 1917. Next year a new criminal code is to come into operation, and the year after reformed Courts of Justice are to be established. These changes are to be effected by an Imperial decree, a procedure analogous to that which you know at home as "By Order in Council." The first step is bold. When a Dynasty first comes into power it promulgates its own body of laws, and no radical changes are made whilst its representatives fill the seat of supreme authority. Of course, its enactments give room for elasticity of administration and incorporate early laws and customs. But the Statute Book is looked upon as a covenant between the new race of rulers and the people and their descendants. It is a Chinese idea that revived sanctions attach themselves to the laws with the providential decree which determines the arrival and establishment of a new dynasty. The present body of enactments is called "The Laws of the Great Pure Dynasty." Changes made in the Statute Book during the lifetime of a dynasty are almost like loosening the foundation-stones upon which its power rests. The Prince Regent and his Council doubtless think that with the co-operation of the people a disturbing and unprecedented change may be faced, that might otherwise jeopardise the ruling line. The question faces us—How far will the Government be able to enforce its penal code upon the villages and sweep into the new Courts of Justice forms of lawlessness that have been dealt with in the villages by the elders themselves for scores of generations? The village elders are really magistrates chosen by the heads of the groups of families in which they live, without the intervention of either a Lord Chancellor or Lord Lieutenants of the Counties, and they sometimes inflict death sentences. There are no trials by torture under this patria potestas, but the method of capital punishment is sometimes cruel. My impression is that village justice which arises from the all but absolute power of the parent for life or death over children and descendants, is better than that of the official Courts. If I were a Chinaman I should prefer trial by a bench of great uncles and a grandfather to trial in some of the yamens into which I have had glimpses. The new penal code and the new Court, presided over by a competent judge, may involve changes that will be slow in reaching the villages and pushing out the old customs. The two changes mean sooner or later the abolition of the trials of foreigners in their own Consular Courts, a procedure which has long been a grievance to the Chinese.

In a country of enormous territory and with a population of four hundred million people, a score of Provincial Assemblies, with more than a thousand District Councils, may be necessary to secure adequate representation. It looks at first as though a promiscuous multitude of bodies might aggravate local differences and sow the seeds of many Home Rule movements. Such a result is not probable. If the different parts of the country are allowed a reasonable degree of autonomy it will be found that the Chinese are too proud of the unity of the Empire to put it in peril. Immemorial use and custom secures to them rights and powers that in the countries of Europe can only be gained by large measures of devolution. It is to be hoped that the deliberations of these bodies will give strength and self-consistency to the aims of the awakening democracy and abate the antipathies which sometimes divide men of different provinces. The success of this large but eminently conservative experiment in Constitutional Government will depend to no small extent upon continuity in the administration at Peking. Clanship with its amiable characteristics often makes against efficiency. Some of the early joint-stock enterprises in China were wrecked because the native managers were almost compelled to put into positions of trust sons, nephews, and scions of associated families. Peking Government in the past has been prone to the same weakness. For the time being all but unlimited power is reserved to the Sovereign. In theory he might disband a Peking Parliament, twenty Provincial Assemblies, and a congeries of District Councils. But there is little in the changes now in progress to provoke either palace revolutions or popular risings. The day of the eunuchs is over, and as to the country at large it is difficult to find any one who is not indirectly represented under the new system.—Yours, etc., S.

Communications.

THE DIFFICULTIES OF A LIBERAL GOVERNMENT IN IRELAND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is difficult to describe the sensation of relief with which the Prime Minister's speech at the Albert Hall has been received in Ireland. The political situation of a fortnight ago was perhaps the most critical that this country has faced for thirty years. The Irish Party was confronted with an outburst of hostility for their attitude of benevolent neutrality towards the Liberals, and the weakening of the Irish Party at the present juncture would be the beginning of the end of the constitutional agitation that has been the great safeguard of our national conduct in the present generation. The past four years have been years of bitter disappointment for the Irish people, and had the Liberal leader failed to send a message of hope in his declaration of the issues of the coming struggle, support for further Parliamentary effort would have crumbled away. It must appear strange to Englishmen that prejudice against the Government has in Ireland been growing in intensity from day to day. The official Irish administration has included a Viceroy whose personal position in the esteem of the natives of our race makes them now sharers in his sorrows, as he has so honestly labored to lighten theirs. Mr. Bryce was recognised as a sympathetic friend, and the unselfish efforts of Mr. Birrell for the betterment of the country might elsewhere have won for him a position as idol of the people, yet a fortnight ago our almost universal sentiment was that we would be glad to rid ourselves of these rulers, come what come could. A consideration of the causes of this sentiment may do something to ameliorate the conditions of government during the interval that must in any event elapse before we are entrusted with the right to govern ourselves.

If the position of an anti-Irish Minister in Dublin Castle is one of difficulty, the position there of a Minister in sympathy with the people must be utterly heartbreaking. The coercionist is always surrounded by friendly members of the ascendancy, who serve him loyally, and who are in complete accord with his policy. He is doing their work, and they in return place at his disposal their resources, social and material. Far different is the lot of the Liberal Chief Secretary. Though he is endeavoring to act as far as possible in accord with Irish opinion, he is cut off from intercourse (save of the most formal character) with the leaders of opinion in Ireland. He can, indeed, ascertain whether a given policy will in the main be regarded as satisfactory or unsatisfactory. But in the thousand little details that make government either acceptable or intolerable, a Liberal Minister receives no assistance from the one great division of Irish sentiment, while he is subjected to most unfair criticism from the other. His difficulties do not end there.

During the Tory régime there are but two parties known in Ireland, separated by natural lines of cleavage. They are the Irish Nationalists, differing occasionally among themselves on minor details, but on the main issue unanimous in favor of government of Ireland by the inhabitants of Ireland. On the other hand, there are the anti-Irish colonists, who in spite of small divergences of opinion are united in favor of governing Ireland by a resident, privileged ascendancy, supported by an English Ministry at Westminster. There is no other division of parties that counts for anything. The difference of these two is further accentuated in that the political division between them corresponds to the division of races and creeds.

The inhabitants of the country are divided between these two camps, and so long as the unsettled question is there as a subject of contention, they will continue to be so divided. The two armies include all the best intellect of the country that is given to public life. Neither has the monopoly of genius. The pity is that, while the cause of strife remains, the genius is given up to party that might serve the nation.

Upon the resignation of Mr. Balfour's Cabinet four years ago, we Irishmen were surprised to learn that there existed among us a third party. None of its members had been previously known in active political life; but many of them were known as disappointed applicants for favors from the Tory administration. The Unionist government of Ireland was openly based on the spoils system. No salaried office, administrative or judicial, was allotted to any applicant who could not produce a satisfactory receipt for monies spent and services rendered in the Unionist cause. We hoped that the end of this infamous system had come when Mr. Balfour left office, and we learnt with indignation that this new party of obscurities, calling themselves "Irish Liberals," were arranging a continuance of the Tammany system, under the "friendly" Government of Campbell-Bannerman.

They succeeded in this arrangement, and they debased the standard of honesty in public life in Ireland, until their example has become a menace to the propriety of conduct of local bodies in the selection of their officers. The intervention of this third party is perhaps the greatest of all the difficulties the Chief Secretary has to contend with. He cannot personally know the merits or demerits of those who come forward to offer assistance. He can only seek the best counsel he can procure, and if the Tories are hostile and the Irish refuse advice, he has to take the assurances of these mercenaries one for another.

At first glance it may be said that the blame of this regrettable state of affairs must be borne in part at least by the Irish Party. Believing this, I suggested shortly after the arrival of Mr. Bryce that the unquestionable sincerity of the then Prime Minister and of the Chief Secretary would justify a relaxation of the attitude of Irishmen towards the Administration. I thought that it might be permissible for Nationalists to open up friendly relations with the Irish Minister and convey to him informally such matters as might enable him to ascertain true Irish sentiment. The answers to my suggestion were, to my mind, conclusive. In the first place, the Liberal Government had for the time being ceased to proclaim Home Rule as its Irish policy. This involved a continuance of the Unionist policy of controlling the country by a resident clique, and it was no part of the Nationalist scheme to assist in such a performance. Furthermore, there was the question, who were the persons who might tender advice? The members of the Irish Party, even were they men of affairs, would be practically debarred. No Englishman can appreciate the influence that the Irish Party has so deservedly won by its unalterable refusal to allow members of the party to have hand, act, or part in seeking to influence Ministerial patronage. This collection of men, mostly of humble rank, is subject to the infirmities and open to the criticism applicable to all human societies. Their enemies find many topics of abuse, but whatever individual exceptions there may have been from time to time, the party as a party stands without rival in the unselfishness with which the men who compose it refuse to seek reward in patronage either for themselves or for their friends. As long as the smallest taint of political reward affects the question of preferment in Ireland, no Irish member can discuss the matter with an English Minister, who, however friendly, must be left to blunder for himself.

If the Irish members may not speak, the rank and file of their supporters are necessarily condemned to silence also. No man can be of any real use in public life in Ireland unless his motives are above suspicion. Under present circumstances, holding intercourse with any Castle official implies the negation of Nationalist principles, and meddling with the allotment of office implies in the mind of the people a mean engagement to render party services to the Government in the expectation of reward. Though the difficulties are great, it seems to me desirable that, at the risk of misunderstanding, an effort should be made to end the present system of patronage in Ireland that has rendered the Government so hateful. It would be a great misfortune that self-government should be undertaken by a people imbued by disgraceful example with the idea that no man should be admitted to the public service unless he be subservient to the controllers of the ruling clique. Public efficiency requires that a State that pays for the best men should always command the services of the best, and no honest man believes that personal genius comes and goes according as political parties wax and wane. Politics should not be permitted to make or mar the professional career of any honest man. It is absurd that one of the highest character and ability should be refused advancement that he has won by merit, because he honestly states that he is opposed to the Government, while an obscure mediocrity is given a position for which he is unfit, provided that he dishonestly professes to approve of the policy of the Executive.

There is no one in Ireland who does not regret, above all else, the position of contempt to which the taint of politics has reduced the administration of the law. Successive Governments have competed with one another in their efforts to represent to the people that the control of the dispensation of justice is part of the warfare of politics. To end this, one should be willing to risk much. It needs no statute, with or without the consent of the House of Lords, to extend to the selection of higher officers in the Civil Service in Ireland the impartial methods by which the junior clerks are chosen. It needs no statute to enable the Ministry to repudiate the system of preferment for political services or for political subscriptions. It needs only courage to dignify the administration of justice by an example of justice in the selection of its instruments, by the appointment of the most worthy, though he be a political opponent. If advice is needed it should be sought from those who will stand personally unbiassed in the giving of it. When these conditions are fulfilled, Nationalists will be enabled, without risking the esteem of their countrymen, to give, as far as he will accept it, assistance to a Minister who wishes to befriend their country.

Another result of repudiation of the spoils system would be the opening for the first time of a career for talent among Irishmen. In the lower grades of the Civil Service, where competition regulates selection, Irishmen win about sixty per cent. of the posts. In the higher grades of the public service, and in the judiciary, where appointments are regulated by politics regardless of merit, native Irishmen obtain a little less than ten per cent. of the prizes, and those who do win, win by such means as forfeit all public confidence. Jobbery among the Tories is, to some extent, mitigated in so far as the Irish ascendancy includes many men of the highest training with an aptitude for public affairs. These men are honestly engaged in defending what they believe to be their natural privileges. They stand for some principles, and when we have self-government, they will be most useful and influential citizens. There is no such party allied to Liberalism in Ireland. The natural party of progress in this country is the Nationalist Party. No other army held the field against the forces of the ascendancy in the many dark years of the last quarter of a century. Nationalist talent refuses to engage in the public service while suspicion of jobbery affects it. For Liberal intrigue there then remains an organisation openly founded and conducted for the appropriation of patronage, a body without talent and without principle. The members of this association of political adventurers can be of no service to the Liberal Government, and the principles of Liberalism forbid the maintenance of such a band to prey upon the country. We Irishmen feel that having borne our share of the battle of the last General Election, we should not have been handed over to the camp followers of the army of our allies.

Party feeling runs high now, and will be more bitter when the Home Rule measure is introduced. The Unionists are utilising the scandals of the past four years on the pretence that such public misconduct is a foretaste of Home Rule. Everyone in this country is aware that the only effective protest against jobbery was made by Irish Nationalists, and that our national demand is for equal opportunities all round. If we are selfish to the extent that equal opportunity will admit us for the first time to compete for the highest prizes, we at least desire to exclude from the contest no man with ability to serve our country, whether he marches in the Tory ranks, or poses beneath the title of an "Irish Liberal." Now that Home Rule is once more inscribed upon the Liberal banner, we are free to assist the Chief Secretary, and for a time "to govern Ireland according to Irish ideas," provided that he appreciates that the Irish ideals of public life demand impartial honesty and fair play.—Yours, &c.,

A. M. SULLIVAN.

Altona House, Dublin,
December 20th, 1909.

Letters to the Editor.

THE JUDGMENT ON ADMISSION TO THE SACRAMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The Bishop of Birmingham, in a letter to the "Times" on the judicial decision requiring the admission to the Holy Communion of one who has married his deceased wife's sister, makes assumptions which, though they appear to him axiomatic, are to me, and I venture to say to an increasing number of thoughtful men, untrue and disastrous. Let me take two points out of many.

1. It appears to the Bishop "intolerable" that the Parliament of this Christian nation and the Courts established by it should decide upon such a case. Let me set against this the words of a highly esteemed divine, Dr. Bigg, late Professor of Ecclesiastical History at Oxford, in the remarkable volume of his sermons just edited by the Dean of Christ Church. In the sermon on the words of our Lord, "Who made me a judge or divider over you?" (P. 236), Dr. Bigg says: "It has been asked, what is the relation of Church and State? They are the same thing—that is the answer." It is evident that to the Professor, and to those who think with him, there can be nothing contrary to Christian principle in the nation, which is both Church and State, deciding by its supreme Parliament and judicature "All causes, ecclesiastical as well as civil."

2. The Bishop assumes that the Church is a sect marked off from the general community by special ordinances and practices, so as to "unchurch" all the rest, their brother-Christians included. Such a sect, he says, was founded by Christ—when and where he omits to say—and that He gave it legislative and disciplinary powers over its members. I believe that this, as applied to a state of things in which we have many bodies of Christian worshippers, and in which the Christian spirit is diffused throughout the community, is untrue and unchristian, and is felt to be so more and more. The Bishop says that things have changed since the sixteenth century; and the change seems to him to mean the narrowing-down of the Church to such a sect as I have just described. This he looks upon as progress; and he has set up a Church Reform Society to hasten this change. I agree with him that the world has changed; but I believe the change in Christian conviction to be in the contrary direction to that which he asserts. We judge men now, not by sectarian rules and dogmas, about which Christ said nothing, but by that which was the essence of his life and teaching, justice, and mercy, and truth. This is the standard to which every English judge tries to conform; it is the standard by which we shall all be judged; it is the standard adopted by our Prayer-book, which tells us that the true worship is righteousness and holiness of life. Holding to this conviction, we have a right to feel that the moral system embodied in English law, and interpreted by English judges, is infinitely preferable (because infinitely more Christian) to any law set up by the clericists and their adherents, whether in former ages or our own. Our present system is the happy inheritance of our country; and we have a right to feel that, in acting upon it, we are in harmony with the Bible, the Prayer-book, and the best interests of the nation.—Yours, &c.,

W. M. FREMANTLE.

Deanery, Ripon,

December 16th, 1909.

SCARING CAPITAL ABROAD.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your strong, but not too strong, protest against the wicked attempt to undermine national credit for party ends comes none too soon: it ought to have been made long ago, and echoed with gravity and force by every responsible statesman and by every self-respecting journal. Even if it were true that British capital is timidly taking wings abroad, a patriotic statesman would hesitate to speak of it in public, lest he should help to swell a panic in a sphere where the very breath of panic is disastrous. A criminal prosecution would be the only proper treatment for such an act of treason as the deliberate creation of such a panic.

As you properly point out, Lord Rothschild and Lord Revelstoke speak as the heads of firms which stand to gain by the effect of a panic which will lead investors to buy the foreign securities in which they deal. The majority of stockbrokers are Tories, and for that reason very ready to believe any charge against the wicked Radical; while they, too, will profit if investors take to transferring their holdings, for there is a commission to be earned on every transfer. We need not believe that either the great financiers or the smaller fry do not honestly suppose what they are saying to be true, for, as you have pointed out, it is in a measure true—they have themselves helped to verify their own prophecies. We know how easily men are biassed by their own interests, and blinded by their prejudices. But we expect the big men to rise above these mists.

If they are to prove their contention (and what abominable wickedness it would be to launch such a panic without being sure of their facts!) they must demonstrate three things:—

1. That British trade and industry have been seriously crippled during the last four years, and especially since last April, by withdrawals of capital. The test of this, and the only test, is to be found in the Board of Trade Returns.

2. That British investment abroad has not only increased during the last four years (a reasonable increase would only prove that we were prosperous and had money to spare to lend to our neighbors), but has increased at an alarming and unprecedented rate, while at the same time our trade has been diminishing and that of our rivals increasing. It is notorious that the rate of increase of British investments abroad has been much slower in the last four years than in the ten years preceding.

3. That the British investor not only thinks, but has reason for thinking, that his capital will be less safe under the British Government than under the Governments of those countries to which exported capital mainly goes. Those countries are the South American Republics, China, the Russian Empire, Australia (land of Labor Governments), and South Africa (where we have "handed over a conquered country to a disloyal enemy"!).

It is obvious that none of these three contentions has been, or can be, established. Until they are established, those who repeat this parrot cry are convicted of an offence which is none the less criminal because there is no law against it. But their vague assertions have undoubtedly, as you have pointed out, affected the minds of the old-maidish type of investors. I received not long ago a letter from a Conservative friend, a man of some means but of no business experience, who had undertaken a certain obligation from which he now finds it necessary to withdraw. He explained that owing to the insecurity created by this wicked Radical Government he had been forced to transfer all his capital from British to foreign concerns, with (as he complained) the inevitable result that his income was largely reduced! Of course, he attributed the reduction entirely to the Government; he saw neither the stupidity nor the unpatriotic character of his own action. It is upon this kind of mind that the irresponsible clamor of the Press and the politicians has been working.

Until this election I have never cast a vote. If I had a thousand votes, I should cast them all for Liberal, Labor, or Nationalist candidates—for any candidates who are opposed to the present action of the Lords. And my reasons are, not love of the Budget, about which I don't know very much, but (1) indignation at the wickedness of the attack on national credit for party purposes; (2) disgust at the way in which rancor and acrimony against Germany are being deliberately stirred up for party purposes—like Lord Cromer, I fear the Germans; I think the fortunes of this nation may soon be imperilled by the hostility of Germany; and for that reason I will not vote for a party which uses this subject in such a way and at such a time; and (3) profound disillusionment in regard to the House of Lords. I am a Conservative by temperament, and have always believed in the House of Lords, because it seemed to me, despite its obvious defects as a legislative body, to stand for that respect for tradition, that loyalty to constitutional usage, which has been the greatest strength of English political life. And now I find them light-heartedly wrecking the Constitution because they are in a hurry to bring about a fiscal revolution. My vote must go for the Constitution.—Yours, &c.,

A MUGWUMP.

December 22nd, 1909.

HOME RULE AND WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Justice, like mercy, is twice blessed. England would benefit by the concession of Home Rule to Ireland, and men by that of the suffrage to women. These two claims are so analogous that it seems unnatural when those who see the justice of the one fail to sympathise with the other. That this is often the case arises possibly as much from ignorance as from our tendency to perceive and resent injustice to ourselves more than injustice to others. Opponents do not always know that Nationalists demand merely the management for Ireland of her own internal affairs, and that the suffragists ask for women only one-seventh of the voting power of the country, and that, by the by, through indirect representation by men.

Anyone wishing to understand why women so persistently seek enfranchisement, should read Lady McLaren's pamphlet entitled: "Better and Happier." Her statement is clear and practical, and quite free from the sentimentality that often marks the anti-suffragists' pronouncements. The title of the pamphlet is taken from a speech of the Home Secretary, the Right Hon. Herbert J. Gladstone, in the House of Commons, February 28th, 1908: "I believe that the country would be made better and happier by the admission of women to the franchise."

In a speech at the Dublin Mansion House on the 15th inst., Mr. John Redmond speaks hopefully of the Nationalist prospects in the present political juncture. He believes that the House of Lords is the chief if not the only obstacle in the way of Home Rule. The people of the dominant island, if no longer enthusiastic for it, are not now opposed to its being granted. And so the Irish leader says the Irish Party will support the Liberals.

In the same issue of the Dublin "Freeman's Journal," which reports above, are some columns headed: "Votes for Women," being an account of a deputation to Mr. John Redmond of ladies representing the Irish Franchise League. He received them most courteously, and complimented them on the moderation, point, and great ability with which they put forward their views. He did not think any man of his acquaintance could have spoken better. Though much impressed, however, by their representations, he could not promise them what they asked, that the National Party would make women's suffrage a party question. The overwhelming majority of them, he said, had voted in favor of women's enfranchisement, and had done so since the party came into existence thirty years ago. He himself had voted for women's suffrage, and later against it, and now refrains from voting on the question. He strongly reprobated the treatment of suffragist agitators as common criminals, instead of as political prisoners. For addressing his constituents in a manner distasteful to the Government, he had been subjected to hardships and indignities with the lowest convicts, and he sees no difference between his grievance and that of the women who are similarly treated for advocating their cause.

Forty years ago, in America, a colored gentleman, an ardent woman suffragist, told me that his own son had said to him: "Let us colored men get the vote first, and then we can help the women." To which the father had replied: "I would not trust you." And American women are still knocking at the door of the American Constitution, and get no special assistance from the colored men who have gained an entrance.

Let us hope that whichever cause triumphs first, Nationalism or Women's Suffrage, will try to further the other.

Both are entirely independent, and ready to accept fair dealing from either Liberals or Conservatives.

But some of us would rather that the People's Party, the Party of Progress, should atone—so far as atonement is possible—for their frequent betrayals of Ireland's faith in them, and for their late barbarous treatment of women.—Yours, &c.,

D. W., AN IRISHWOMAN.

December 21st, 1909.

HEREDITY AND GREAT FAMILIES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The writer of your interesting article on "Great Families" decries very severely the potency of heredity—"such semi-magical conceptions as heredity." His theory is that a view of life or a style of art handed down with deliberate intention in a family counts for practically everything, and inherited characteristics, physical or other, for practically nothing in the continuance of prominent families. The Bachs were a school of music, the Medici a family of bankers, and it was the principles of the school and the firm, not the family genius, which were transmitted from generation to generation. As for the Medici, "ask what inscrutable force of genius it was which descended . . . and the answer of the realist is in two words—the Medici millions."

The realist here would do well to study heredity where its working can be observed with minuteness and quite unqualified by the influence of family ideas or possessions. My business obliges me to concern myself somewhat with questions affecting the breeding of horses, cattle, and other animals—animals the compass of whose life gives man a complete command over their breeding through the course of several generations. Does your realist know that where quality has to be produced for the very realistic purpose of earning £ s. d. heredity is the dominant factor in the industry of breeding, the factor rigidly observed and placed above all others by men who go, not upon theory, but upon proved experience? The case of "Eclipse," whose descendants won 82 out of 127 Derbys, is a simpler and more remarkable one than that of the Medici; and there is no commoner phenomenon in horse-breeding than the transmission by what is known as a "forcible" sire of some characteristic or "caste-mark" like the Hapsburg lip, such as a peculiar ear, or turn of the foot, or streak of color in the mane, through many generations. I have before me as I write the pedigree for seven generations of a horse which is being recommended for purchase for stud purposes, and the thing most relied on in his favor is that in his pedigree (which includes 111 ancestors) the blood of a certain famous sire, dead a hundred years, whom he is supposed to resemble, occurs a certain number of times.

Instead of heredity being over-estimated in man-breeding, in my opinion it is not at all estimated enough.

It is, I believe, one of the scientific studies of the future whether for the historian, the statesman, or the "eugenic" philosopher.—Yours, &c.,

Dublin, December 15th, 1909.

G.

CAN PROTECTION CURE UNEMPLOYMENT?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your article on December 4th, you seem to allow that Protectionists are right in saying that, if imports are stopped by tariffs, the goods intended for export might still be made, but instead of exchanging against foreign goods, they will exchange against the home-made goods that have been produced to take the place of the imports.

May I ask whether the following answer to the Protectionist (given to me by a business man who is a Free Trader) is correct, and if so, whether it does not justify the Free Trade position that to stop imports cannot increase employment?

If an English merchant buys £100 worth of goods in Germany, it at once encourages a foreign merchant, with £100 to spend, to purchase goods in England, because the action of the rate of exchange and the bank rate make it profitable for him to do so. Two quite separate sums of £100, one in England and one in Germany, are thus brought into action.

On the other hand, if the English merchant spends his £100 in England, no second £100 is necessarily employed in consequence.

In neither case, therefore, is there more demand in England, or more employment, than is produced by a purchasing power of £100.

If this is correct, a point which seems to require further explanation is why there is a difference in the method of exchange in the case of transactions where two different countries are involved, and transactions within the same country.—Yours, &c.,

H.

December 18th, 1909.

[There is no difference in the method of exchange in the two cases. Goods are bought and paid for by goods, whether the two sides of the transaction are contracted within the same national area or not. In either case each side of the transaction requires the employment of capital and labor. Other things equal, domestic trade is more advantageous for a country than foreign trade, for both gains from exchange are kept in the country. But when a tariff operates, other things are unequal: the political interference has damaged the process of exchange.—ED., NATION.]

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of the 4th instant, you quote the Protectionist reply to the contention that reduced imports result in less employment in export trades.

You rightly quote the argument only as far as it goes in Protectionist hands. The Tariff Reformer is ever careful to avoid pushing his arguments to lengths at which they might appear absurd.

Of course, as you say, when articles formerly imported are made at home, the articles formerly exported to pay for them are still produced, the only difference being that "instead of exchanging against foreign goods, they will exchange against the home-made goods that have been substituted for the former by the tariffs." Home production for export is thus simply converted into home production for home consumption, and home production of goods formerly imported remains a clear gain of employment. If before this re-arrangement there is already full employment—

But that is a merely academic point, which it is not necessary to discuss.

Paradoxically enough, the argument applies to both countries concerned. Our exports to our rival having ceased, these goods are now made by him within his frontiers; and the goods formerly exported by him to us in exchange for them do not cease to be manufactured, but are exchanged within his frontiers for his own new manufacture, our former export, which is thus a clear gain to him in employment.

Thus may we cheerfully cast aside any fear of injuring the foreigner by Tariff Reform, in the knowledge that it does in the fullest sense mean "work for all." The higher the tariff, the more effectually will it reduce, not only our own, but the foreigner's unemployment.—Yours, &c.,

E. W. D.

H.M. Dockyard, Malta,

December 9th, 1909.

MAKING THE FOREIGNER PAY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Parker makes out "that a tariff on manufactured goods will cost two millions to collect and only give half-a-million to the Exchequer." The answer is, how is it that all other nations continue such an absurd practice, and how is it that America succeeds in raising forty-five million pounds a year by import taxation on things which the poor do not buy? How is it that America, by doing this, can allow tea, coffee, and raw cocoa to come in free, whilst we are obliged to tax them heavily?

If we leave out twenty-three millions of re-exported goods, it leaves 120 millions of manufactured goods still imported. If we made half of these ourselves, we should gain £7,200,000 by internal taxation at 12 per cent. We might fairly say that the Government would get £3,500,000 and that the rest went to local taxation. It must also be allowed that at least thirty million pounds would be paid in wages to our own people which are now paid to foreigners, and the money would be spent among our own shopkeepers instead of among foreign.

On the sixty millions still imported £7,200,000 would be paid to our own Government, the average 12 per cent. duty being regulated so as to give a preference to the other parts of the Empire. This makes £10,700,000 in revenue to our Government, besides helping local taxation. Of only eleven kinds of agricultural produce, almost the whole of which our soil and climate are very suitable for producing, we import yearly 180 million pounds' worth, although we have millions of acres of good land untouched by the plough, and producing very little, in comparison to what they might produce if Free Traders did not insist that it is better for us to buy all we can of agricultural and manufactured goods from abroad, produced by labor abroad, so long as it is supposed to be a little cheaper to do so.

If we only produced one quarter of the amount at home, it would mean £5,400,000 from internal taxation and millions in wages and profit for our agriculturalists. If the Government only got two millions of this, the rest would go to help local taxation. The 135 million pounds worth still imported, even at an average (including Imperial preference) of 5 per cent. would give the Government £6,750,000. The Government would get roughly nineteen millions and a-half, and local taxation would be considerably helped. I can see no reason why the extra amount for collection should come to more than half-a-million, even if it came to so much.

Mr. Haywood quotes one American Senator against trusts, but we have trusts in this country, and the American Beef Trust, which is a foreigners' trust, rules the price of beef in this country according even to that eminent Free Trade paper, the "Westminster Gazette."

Even the American Senator tells us "that the American manufacturers are enabled by a tariff to pay American wages and so retain the home market against the foreigner paying lower wages." From this it appears quite clear that if the tariff was removed, down would come American wages. In other words, it proves that cheap merchandise means cheap men and cheap women.

Mr. Grimshaw tells me "that an assumption is not the same thing as a fact." This was unnecessary as I was quite aware of it. I have, however, quoted facts against what is called Free Trade, such as taxing the poor heavily and letting off the rich, taxing our own people and letting off the foreigners, to which he has not even attempted to make a reply. The decision at the coming Election rests entirely in the hands of the people. Will they look back at the lessons of history and remember that all nations must be ready to defend their commerce and liberty? Will they vote for fair play for themselves and prosperity and continued power for their race and Empire, or will they vote for sentimental weakness and the almost certainty of becoming the conscript dependents of a stronger Power? This is the question British men and British women have to ask themselves, and the strongest warnings have been given to them over and over again by all sorts and kinds of people from our greatest Socialist to our greatest soldier.—Yours, &c.,

ROWLAND HUNT.

December 20th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In this controversy on Free Trade and Protection we hear a great deal of the benefit to the manufacturer and, to a less extent, of the benefit to the workman; but nothing at all about the consumer, who is by far the largest class, and supplies the money by which the others live.

A passage in Mr. Hunt's last letter to you puts this matter in a very interesting form to the consumer. He says, quoting from Mr. Carnegie, "that the Americans, because of their large home market, could, and did, send their goods abroad at less than the cost price." If so, as no man can carry on any business at a loss, it is clear the home consumer is taxed to pay the manufacturer's profit. If society were on a Socialist basis, though protective duties might be unwise, there would be little or no injustice in them, as then the profits would be applied for the benefit of all; but where one set of people pay the cost, and another, much smaller, set pocket the profit, Protection, so-called, is sheer robbery.—Yours, &c.,

EDWARD TAYLOR.

25, Kenilworth Road,
St. Leonards-on-Sea,
December 18th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—One point in connection with Mr. Rowland Hunt's suggestion that the foreigner can be made to pay the tax no one seems to have noted. When an English firm buys goods abroad, it does not go to the first firm it sees and say "send us on a few tons of so and so—at your own price, of course, my dear sir." A capable merchant goes from one firm to another, obtains in the open competition of the whole world (which we alone command), the best price for the best article—and not till then completes his bargain. If he does his work right, at the close of his bargain he has got his article at the lowest profit for the seller that the seller will take. No intelligent man will suggest that the addition of an equal expense to all the foreign manufactured goods at the English port will cause a variation in the price they will accept. All will add the cost of the duty, and charge the extra cost thereby caused to the English purchaser—their minimum profit will still be their minimum profit, unless it happens to be a minimum percentage, in which case, of course, it will grow in proportion to the tax. Mr. Hunt will perhaps reply that he has not added an extra duty to all manufactured goods, but only to those of the foreigner. "Now," says he, "I have handicapped the foreigner against the Englishman, and he must pay the tax, and still bring in goods, or lose his trade to the Englishman." Mr. Hunt here ignores the fact that the foreign manufacturers A, B, C, and D had competed, that A had obtained the order, and hence, presumably (if the English merchant knew his business), B, C, and D had reached the point at which they had rather lose the business than lower prices. The assumption that the man who—under the same conditions—has beaten them, will still have up his sleeve the modest 10 per cent (not, be it noted, on his profits, but on the whole bulk order) proposed from Birmingham, is a laughable example of Tariff Reform reasoning.—Yours, &c.,

RONALD F. WALKER.

Yorks. 99 Club,
December 14th, 1909.

THE CAMPAIGN OF THE PEERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The campaign of the Peers has been productive of abusive statement intolerable to our self-respect and sense of veracity. As a flagrant example of the discreditable tactics pursued, I would call your attention to a passage in Earl Cawdor's speech at Leeds. I quote from the "Times." The noble lord, in painting in lurid colors the threatened despotism of the House of Commons, when uncontrolled by an operative House of Lords, said:—

"But what was the limit of power of a Government under such conditions? It was absolutely limitless. Now Parliament was restricted by the Septennial Act; but what was to prevent a free, independent Government from repealing that Act and sitting for fourteen or even twenty-one years?"

This statement can only be taken in two ways. It is either a deliberate misrepresentation of the Prime Minister's statement at the Albert Hall in favor of quadrennial and quinquennial Parliaments, or was made in unpardonable ignorance of it. And this is the spokesman of a class which arrogates to itself power to decide vital political issues.—Yours, &c.,

H. J. M.

December 20th, 1909.

Poetry.

PRINCE ADAM.

PRINCE ADAM left the couch, and with his thought
He paced the outer world: his thought was Eve;
Last night they watched a star, and now, to him
Eve was a star withdrawn, for she had gone
Veiled with reserve and with a look more strange
Than when the woman first looked on the man.
Prince Adam paced the morning, and his mind
Was tempted to division. Adam said:
"Lo, as the Worlds, each Soul has its own course
And Being from Being is ever separate:
The Shaping Word said also—Course and Form
And Separateness. Old Chaos in me cries
Against the pains God has imposed on her."

He said:

"Have pride instead of sorrow, pride in thy thought, Pride in the pain thy thought has given thee."

The deer

Brought back her swiftness, and he saw the trees
That had her grace. Pain moved in Adam's heart.
Alone he paced the morning, under skies
Still darkened with a sense of God withdrawn.

PADRAIC COLUM.

IN MEMORIAM.

A. I. G.

Once he sprang to the challenge of May,
Once he breasted the hill,
Once he loved the wind and the day,—
His spirit loves them still.

God gave him courage and strength of frame,
And joy in a friendly strife;
God set in his face like quivering flame
Pulsing and bountiful life.

Now the glow of his eyes is blind;
The ring of his voice is fled,
Caught up like thistledown on the wind,
On the wind caught up—and dead.

The life that blossomed so full and true
Is robbed of its fresh delight,
As the leaves of a chestnut avenue
Drop dead in a frosty night.

Once he sprang to the challenge of May,
Once he breasted the hill,
Once he loved the wind and the day,—
His spirit loves them still.

T.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

INSTEAD of our usual weekly selection of new books we print this week a list of the more notable English books published during the past year. The guiding principle has been to include only books that are of some permanent value as contributions to the subjects with which they deal.

BIOGRAPHY.

"A Memoir of the Right Hon. William Edward Hartpole Lecky." By His Wife. (Longmans. 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Reminiscences of Carl Schurz." (Murray. 3 vols. 36s. net.)

"The Life and Letters of James Wolfe." By Beckles Willson. (Heinemann. 18s. net.)

"The Autobiography of Sir Henry M. Stanley." Edited by Lady Stanley. (Sampson Low. 21s. net.)

"The Life of Richard Brinsley Sheridan." By Walter Sichel. (Constable. 2 vols. 31s. 6d. net.)

"Marie Antoinette." By H. Belloc. (Methuen. 15s. net.)

"The Maid of France: Being the Story of the Life and Death of Jeanne d'Arc." By Andrew Lang. (Longmans. 12s. 6d. net.)

CRITICISM AND BELLES LETTRES.

"Oxford Lectures on Poetry." By A. C. Bradley. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)

"The Springs of Helicon: A Study in the Progress of English Poetry from Chaucer to Milton." By J. W. Mac-kail. (Longmans. 4s. 6d. net.)

"The Man Shakespeare and His Tragical Life-Story." By Frank Harris. (Palmer. 7s. 6d. net.)

"A Literary History of Rome from the Origins to the Close of the Golden Age." By J. Wight Duff. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Letters of John Ruskin, 1827-1889." Edited by E. T. Cook and Alexander Wedderburn. (Allen. 2 vols. 25s. net.)

"Essays in Freedom." By H. W. Nevins. (Duckworth. 6s.)

"Scenes and Portraits." By Frederic Manning. (Murray. 6s.)

"The Moral System of Dante's Inferno." By W. H. V. Reade. (Clarendon Press. 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Romantic Movement in English Poetry." By Arthur Symonds. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)

"George Bernard Shaw." By G. K. Chesterton. (Lane. 5s. net.)

"Revaluations: Historical and Ideal." By Alfred W. Benn. (Watts. 3s. 6d. net.)

"Homer and the Iliad." By M. Stawell. (Dent. 10s. 6d. net.)

DRAMA.

"Plays: The Silver Box, Joy, and Strife." By John Galsworthy. (Duckworth. 6s.)

"Three Plays: The Marrying of Anne Leete, The Voysey Inheritance, and Waste." By Granville Barker. (Sidgwick & Jackson. 5s. net.)

"The Tragedy of Nan, and Other Plays." By John Masefield. (Richards. 3s. 6d. net.)

"Seven Short Plays." By Lady Gregory. (Maunsell. 3s. 6d. net.)

FICTION.

"Tono-Bungay." By H. G. Wells. (Macmillan. 6s.)

"Fraternity." By John Galsworthy. (Heinemann. 6s.)

"The Glimpse." By Arnold Bennett. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)

"Frank Burnet." By Dorothy V. Horace Smith. (Murray. 6s.)

"Sir Guy and Lady Rannard." By H. N. Dickinson. (Heinemann. 6s.)

"It Never Can Happen Again." By William de Morgan. (Heinemann. 2 vols. 10s.)

"The Column of Dust." By Evelyn Underhill. (Methuen. 6s.)

HISTORY.

"The Cambridge Modern History." Vol. VI., "The Eighteenth Century"; and Vol. XI., "The Growth of Nationalities." (Cambridge University Press. 16s. net each.)

"The Last Years of the Protectorate, 1656-1658." By Professor C. H. Firth. (Longmans. 2 Vols. 24s. net.)

"Garibaldi and the Thousand." By G. M. Trevelyan. (Longmans. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Ancient Greek Historians." By Professor J. B. Bury. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Rise of Louis Napoleon." By F. A. Simpson. (Murray. 12s. 6d. net.)

"Ireland under the Stuarts and During the Interregnum." By Richard Bagwell. (Longmans. 2 Vols. 28s. net.)

"The Conflict of Religions in the Early Roman Empire." By T. R. Glover. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Bourbon Restoration." By Major J. R. Hall. (Alston Rivers. 21s. net.)

"Nelson and Other Naval Studies." By J. R. Thursfield. (Murray. 12s. net.)

"The Hanoverian Queens of England." Vol. I. By A. D. Greenwood. (Bell. 10s. 6d. net.)

PHILOSOPHY AND THEOLOGY.

"The Meaning of Truth." By William James. (Longmans. 4s. 6d. net.)

"A Pluralistic Universe." By William James. (Longmans. 5s. 6d. net.)

"The Eternal Values." By Hugo Münsterberg. (Constable. 10s. 6d. net.)

"The Origin and Development of the Moral Ideas." By Professor Edward Westermarck. (Macmillan. 14s. net.)

"Studies in Mystical Religion." By Rufus M. Jones. (Macmillan. 12s. net.)

"Christianity at the Cross-Roads." By George Tyrrell. (Longmans. 5s. net.)

"The Principles of Religious Development." By George Galloway. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)

"The Survival of Man: A Study of Unrecognised Human Faculty." By Sir Oliver Lodge. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Modernity and the Churches." By Percy Gardner. (Williams & Norgate. 5s. net.)

"Philosophy and Religion." By Hastings Rashdall. (Duckworth. 2s. 6d. net.)

POETRY.

"Last Poems." By George Meredith. (Constable. 4s. 6d. net.)

"New Poems." By William Watson. (Lane. 5s. net.)

"Time's Laughing-Stocks and Other Verses." By Thomas Hardy. (Macmillan. 4s. 6d. net.)

"Insurrections." By James Stephens. (Maunsell. 1s. net.)

"The Rose and the Vine." By Rachel Annand Taylor. (Elkin Mathews. 5s. net.)

SOCIOLOGY, ECONOMICS, AND POLITICS.

"The Industrial System: An Enquiry into Earned and Unearned Increment." By J. A. Hobson. (Longmans. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Liberalism and the Social Problem." By the Right Hon. Winston S. Churchill. (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d. net.)

"The Crisis of Liberalism: New Issues of Democracy." By J. A. Hobson. (P. S. King. 6s. net.)

"Life in an English Village." By Maud F. Davies. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Unemployment: A Problem of Industry." By W. H. Beveridge. (Longmans. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Town Planning in Theory and Practice." By Raymond Unwin. (Unwin. 21s. net.)

"The Condition of England." By C. F. G. Masterman. (Methuen. 6s.)

TRAVEL.

"Trans-Himalaya: Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet." By Sven Hedin. (Macmillan. 2 vols. 30s. net.)

"The Heart of the Antarctic." By E. H. Shackleton. (Heinemann. 2 vols. 30s. net.)

Reviews.

THE PRENTICE AUTOCRAT.*

It is not an easy task to write a biography of Louis Napoleon. It is a much harder task to read one. Of the man few of us know much. His youth to all but the specialist is a vague legend. But of the usurper and the man of Sedan we have all of us a fixed and detailed conception. To read a record of his adventurous and generous youth without seeing on every page the silhouette which Victor Hugo traced so indelibly on the tablets of our memory is an almost impossible feat of mental gymnastics. The pretender must, after all, have been what the Emperor became. We are apt to read his record backwards, to interpret the motive by the achievement, and to discount the brave hope by the ultimate disaster. Against this tendency Mr. Simpson's history of the pretender's early struggles is an interesting and presumably conscious protest. The book ends with Louis Napoleon's election as President. The reader who chooses to glide from chapter to chapter without reminding himself too often of the volume which is to follow, will experience, against his own will, a singular revulsion of feeling. For this story of struggle has in it the romance of all achievements of the individual will. Be the end however little admirable, the courage and the perseverance which compelled success have in them the attraction of all striving. To censure the ambitions of Louis Napoleon would be to pass upon him an utterly unhistorical judgment. He was, like all the millions who called for him and enthroned him, the victim of the Napoleonic legend. It haunted the brain of his generation. It obsessed men who only remembered that their fathers had staggered home with the Grand Army. It inspired multitudes who were wholly disinterested. It would have been a miracle had it not also inspired this young man who incarnated the tradition in his person, and hoped, so soon as he could write his own name, one day to profit by its restoration. He was an Imperialist because he was the average sensual man of his generation. He was a pretender because he was born the son of a Buonaparte and a Beauharnais.

It is a curiously external biography which Mr. Simpson has written for us with the aid of an ample mass of documentary material, some of it as yet unpublished. He makes but little attempt to trace for us the inner life of his hero. To the problem how there evolved from the self-seeking yet generous and chivalrous exile the coldly ruthless autocrat of the early Empire, he has not in this volume addressed himself. On the other hand he has set himself to describe with much detail the curious alternation of wild adventure and methodical propaganda which made up what one might call the professional life of the exile. There is little difficulty in understanding either aspect of the man of destiny. The psychological difficulty is to understand their combination in a single character. One passes easily enough from the scanty records of the first adventure in Italy, when the two Napoleon brothers commanded, apparently with some distinction, bands of Carbonari in the raid on the Papal States, to the fuller narrative of the astonishing appearance of the pretender at Strasburg. Both exploits suggest a spirited youth, daring, imaginative, hypnotised by a historic tradition, but disposed to rely in a characteristically French way rather on audacity and improvisation than on long calculations and elaborate sapping and mining. The descent on Boulogne and the brilliant escape from Louis Philippe's prison at Ham are altogether in the same vein. The adventurer of these plots and escapades is a familiar figure, not uncommon in real life, tediously common in the world of romance.

More interesting, because more uncommon, is the business-like Napoleon who worked in the intervals of these gallant moments at the journeyman tasks of a pretender's trade with an assiduity and tact worthy of a clever salesman who creates a demand for an artificial product by skilful and unremitting advertisement. Of all the pretenders and exiles who have found a refuge in Switzerland, who but he has ever succeeded in converting an asylum into a base of operations by making himself a popular and valuable honorary citizen? What pretender before him or after him, anxious to appeal to the sympathies of the military caste, has attempted to reach it by writing competent and in some respects original books on military science? It wanted some industry to write the books; he completed it by the minute care which he took to circulate free copies with flattering letters from his own hand among influential officers. His contemporaries, who read of the wild descent upon Boulogne, a plot into which, with all the aid of Mr. Simpson's researches, one cannot read the elements of a possible success, must have dismissed him as a hare-brained conspirator. But no sooner was he shut up in his prison at Ham than the indomitable and methodical will asserted itself. He worked incessantly, now at provincial journalism, now at chemical studies, and for three long years at his history of artillery. He defeated the oblivion of captivity and made his cell a platform. At one moment he contrived to lead the protectionist interest, and forced every farmer and sugar-refiner concerned with the beet industry to circulate a singularly specious and effective pamphlet, which subtly linked the fortunes of a powerful trade with the Napoleonic idea. He followed up that success by winning amid the growing economic distress the sympathy of democrats and half-conscious Socialists for his schemes for dealing with unemployment. His scientific researches had just enough merit to gain the notice of the Academy. The Napoleonic legend would have grown in spite of him and without his conscious prompting. A reaction amid a spirited people after the humiliation of 1815 was inevitable. The fumbling foreign policy of Louis Philippe and the humiliations which Palmerston delighted to inflict upon an enfeebled monarchy conspired to foster it. The King himself acknowledged its growth, and sought to turn it to his own advantage when he brought back the remains of Napoleon from St. Helena. But it was the skill and industry of Napoleon's nephew, which succeeded, without a party, without a Press, and almost without allies, in concentrating this vague tradition in his own person.

It is in this cold and methodical work that the clue to the real Napoleon is to be sought. If he seemed in his adventures to display another side, the truth is probably that this also was calculated. He knew that, in dealing with the French character, to rely on the effect of an audacious improvisation is not to be rash; it is to make a shrewd and almost cautious calculation. Nor was his first appearance as a conspirator at Strasburg by any means the foolish and reckless adventure for which most of his contemporaries mistook it. The story, as Mr. Simpson tells it, suggests a plot which might, but for one mistake and a few strokes of bad luck, have brought immediate success. Louis Napoleon had shown considerable skill in winning to his side influential officers in that garrison town. He had only to show himself to receive the instant adhesion of the little Corporal's own artillery regiment, the Fourth. The other artillery regiment, the Third, was hardly less enthusiastic, and for some minutes he seemed to have won the remaining battalion of infantry. Had he cared to follow a purely military plan and to use the guns of the regiments which joined him to overawe the waverers, it seems probable that he could permanently have held the town which for some hours was actually in his hands. A stupider man would have succeeded where he failed. For it was a certain exaltation of mind, call it vanity or call it idealism, which caused him to reject the obvious plan of using the guns when he had won the gunners. He was determined that there should be no bloodshed. He wanted the town to rally to him, and for that purpose actually sent out his artillerymen to distribute proclamations in the streets. And finally, instead of surrounding or threatening the barracks of the one regiment which wavered, he preferred to leave his forces behind him and to march almost unescorted into its courtyard. He might have used heavy guns. He preferred to trust to the magic of the name he bore. The convincing evidence which Mr. Simpson has got together inclines one to think that even this audacious procedure was not so rash as in the sequel it appeared. The infantry did for one glorious moment capitulate to his name. The catastrophe came only when a clever, if unscrupulously "loyal," officer rushed forward to announce that this young man who was posing as Louis Napoleon was, in fact, only the nephew of a certain artillery officer well known to him personally. It seems probable that the artillery would never have allowed an indubitable Napoleon to be arrested by Orleanist officers. It acquiesced only because the real Napoleon had been denounced as an impostor. The "mad descent on Strasburg," which the officially-controlled French Press of the day ridiculed as a boyish escapade, was a rather brilliant performance which came within easy reach of success, and failed only because Louis Napoleon was, in reality, too much the idealist. What would have happened next if Alsace had been won as the basis for a Napoleonic movement, one can only speculate. The chances are that Louis Philippe would have collapsed as feebly in 1836 as he did in 1848.

* "The Rise of Louis Napoleon." By F. A. Simpson. With unpublished documents and illustrations. John Murray. 12s. 6d. net.

Mr. Simpson has succeeded in writing an interesting record of an adventurous career. He has spent immense pains in mastering the bibliography of his subject, and he has used the British diplomatic material to which he had access with great effect. His bias is clearly friendly to his hero, but there is no instance, we think, in which he allows it to mislead him in handling a serious question of disputed facts. Adequate as a political biography, the book has two serious limitations. It does not present an intimate human picture of Louis Napoleon the man. Nor does it attempt to investigate very fully the movement of opinion in France which rendered possible his success. But, in spite of these omissions, it is at once a readable narrative, and a valuable contribution to an obscure chapter in recent history.

SIR HUBERT PARRY ON BACH.*

SIR HUBERT PARRY'S long-expected book on Bach will be a boon or a disappointment to the reader, according to the degree of his own knowledge of Bach. Let it be said at once that if the volume be taken solely on the basis of what it sets out to do, it is excellent. Spitta's huge "Life" is, of course, the foundation of all later Bach criticism of this type. But Spitta's book is unwieldy, overgrown, and often dull. In Sir Hubert Parry's study the reader will find practically all the essential historical information that Spitta could give him, phrased in much more readable terms, and with a constant stream of criticism of the highest quality in the particular order to which it belongs. The book is the product of ripe scholarship, and of a life-long study of Bach by a mind that is in many ways peculiarly fitted to understand him. The purely technical criticism is, of course, most valuable; one would not expect less from so accomplished a musician as Sir Hubert Parry. But, although the bulk of the volume is devoted to technical elucidation, it contains a great deal of criticism of the vital kind that only comes when a personality of some depth is stirred by loving communion with one of the great souls of art. There is no one, student or expert, who will not be the better for reading such chapters as that upon the "Matthew Passion," or the final summing up of Bach as man and artist.

The book is thus peculiarly opportune, for we need a book in English that shall kindle enthusiasm for Bach in the mind of the average reader, giving him a glow that will send him to look at the music of this mightiest of masters at first hand. It is a book that one could have praised practically without reserve ten or fifteen years ago. If one commends it with some reservations to-day it is because during the last few years, thanks mainly to the two remarkable books of Albert Schweitzer and André Pirro, we have learned a host of new things about Bach, of which there is not a hint to be gathered from Sir Hubert Parry's volume. In reading it, indeed, solid and trustworthy as we recognise it to be, one has rather a shamed sense of the relative backwardness of English musical history and criticism. Our best men too often seem to begin where the French and Germans leave off—to be satisfied with the known results of old research, instead of making fresh research of their own. Sir Hubert Parry's book, for example, for all its learning and its sound sense, only looks like a piece of first-class amateur work—something like Lord Rosebery's history—by the side of so brilliant and original a performance as that of Pirro, who has the nervous temperament and restlessly inquiring brain of the true critic—the mind that does not merely exhibit its theme from all standpoints like a well-informed mineralogist turning a piece of rock over and over in his hand, but darts flame-like through the subject, illuminating as it pierces. In Pirro, and again in Schweitzer, we have perpetually new lights flashed upon Bach. Pirro, in particular, delves more thoroughly than Sir Hubert Parry does into the sources of Bach's earliest impressions, and the music that he must have had the opportunity of studying—a much larger list than has hitherto been supposed—and again, at the end of his book, in a chapter or two of most illuminative psychological analysis, brings us nearer than anyone else has done to the real Bach as we should have found him to be, could we have spent a week with him and heard him talk. But the real value of the books of Pirro and Schweitzer is that they tell us a great deal that was never suspected before of the inmost secrets of Bach's musical nature, and not only make Bach himself better known to us, but throw a new light on the aesthetics of music in general.

Every writer, from Spitta onwards, has noticed examples of musical realism in Bach; but they have all regarded them—or affected to regard them—as the passing aberrations or diversions of a great man, who really had a soul above this kind of thing. The reason was that most of the writing upon Bach was done by men who disliked Wagner and Liszt and Berlioz and the modern type of "poetic" musician in general, and who, fighting what they thought to be a kind of Antichrist in art, believed, or tried to believe, that in Bach they had the purest type of the musician who wrote music for music's sake alone, uncontaminated by any of the poetical and pictorial fancies of the moderns. Schweitzer and Pirro have knocked that pretty theory most effectually on the head. They have showed that Bach's bias towards realism was congenital and inveterate—that he indulged in "word-painting," for example, to an extent without parallel in the music of to-day. But they have shown us more than this. Bach's mind seems to have been curiously of a piece in that concrete things incessantly suggested abstract ideas or inward moods to him, and vice versa; and he made his music reflect most faithfully every correspondence of this kind that occurred to him. Further, so bent was he on "illustrating" in music in the most rigidly pictorial way that he would time after time use the same musical formula for the same word or idea. Let us take one or two examples of these three methods of working. He first of all suggests the external concepts of "high" and "low," as other composers have done, by high or low notes, and motion up or down by ascending or descending themes. That is realism in its simplest form. But, unlike later realists, Bach correlates with the outward, objective thing a whole series of things that are purely subjective. Thus moods of elation or of depression are to him the mental equivalents of the physical acts of going up or down. So he gives us a whole series of ascending themes to words that express "mounting" states of mind, as it were—such as pride, courage, strength, resolution—and descending themes to words that express "declining" states of mind—such as prostration, adoration, depression, discouragement, grief at sin, humility, poverty, fatigue, and illness. For the two sets of concepts, internal and external, he will use the same musical symbols. To represent the physical concept of "surrounding," again, he adopts the realistic device of a circling or undulating theme. A crown or a garland suggests the same idea to him, so for this, too, he uses the same kind of theme. But the correspondence goes still further; for when he comes to the word "considering," he uses the same curving musical symbol once more—his notion of "considering" being that of looking round on all sides. Again, a word of purely external signification that suggests something twisted will have an appropriately twisted theme. Then come the subjective applications of the theme—the same disordered melodic outline is used to express a frame of mind like anxiety or confusion, or to depict the wiles of Satan. Careful study of the vocal works of Bach, and especially of the cantatas, has revealed a host of these curious symbols, and, in short, a mental constitution that was incessantly bent on "illustrating" and "singing" to the utmost. Sir Hubert Parry, following the older line of criticism, merely notes an isolated instance or two of Bach's realism, and disposes of it summarily as being merely "curious" or "quaint." He has apparently no idea of the vast network of symbolism that runs through Bach's whole music like the veins through our bodies—nor, it may be said in passing, of the many foreshadowings of such a symbolism in the music of Bach's predecessors. The existence of the system in Bach is conclusively shown by Schweitzer and Pirro by hundreds of quotations in musical type. Pirro, too, gives an exceptionally interesting proof of the justice of his deductions. Spitta conjectured that the music of the first chorus in the cantata "Lobet Gott in seinen Reichen" was originally written for other words—on the ground that the melodic outline does not quite fit the words to which it is now applied. Pirro shows that this was really so, and that the earlier text was that of the chorus "Froher Tag" in a cantata performed in 1732 to celebrate the enlargement of St. Thomas's School in Leipzig. When these earlier words are written beneath the music, the melodic outlines are seen at once to constitute the usual symbols employed by Bach for words of certain kinds.

* "Johann Sebastian Bach." By Sir C. Hubert H. Parry. Putnam's. 12s. 6d. net.

The results so far established by this research are not only highly interesting in themselves, but bear important results. It should be possible to prove other uses, hitherto unsuspected, by Bach of old material for new works, as Pirro has done in the case just cited. Further, the whole psychological outlook upon music that is thus revealed is of the utmost consequence to all future theories of musical aesthetics. Apart from this, the new research illuminates Bach's work for us in two ways. It shows us, in the first place, that there was much more sense than the older critics imagined in Bach's methods of adapting old music to new texts. A connection between the two sets of words—one of them perhaps secular and the other sacred—is not always obvious at once; but if we look below the bare superficial meanings of them to the symbolism that they had in Bach's mind, a good many of the hitherto inexplicable features of the music disappear. In the "Christmas Oratorio," for example, he uses afresh a quantity of the music of an earlier cantata, "The Choice of Hercules." It is admitted that the old music suits the new words quite well in many cases; but it was always contended that certain curving figures in the bass in the aria "Prepare thyself, Zion"—which represented the serpents in the Hercules cantata—had no meaning in their new environment. Pirro shows that Bach, like the pietists of his day, was wholly familiar with the conception of Jesus crushing the serpent, and it is certain that the retention of a "serpent" motive in an aria announcing the coming of the Saviour was a perfectly natural thing to him. In the second place, we have now the key to a number of Bach's instrumental works, and so understand the better how to play them. The clue to the mood that prompted a purely instrumental piece is given at one time by its being founded on certain symbolic phrases the significance of which we have learned from the vocal works, at another by the fact that Bach selected such and such an instrumental movement to preface a particular cantata. The whole problem of Bach's mind and art has indeed been moved into a new plane during the last few years; and the lack of all mention of this in Sir Hubert Parry's book is a grave defect. Had it, in addition to its own excellences, given the English reader the main results of this newest Bach research, it would have been a study of exceptional value. As it is, one can best commend it by saying that it represents the criticism of a generation or so ago at its finest.

E. N.

AN EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY BISHOP.*

It is certainly remarkable that the life of Bishop Horsley has never been written. Most people know three things about him, and they are of a kind to stimulate a desire to know more. One is, of course, his tremendous battle with Dr. Priestley, a battle that has been compared—though the comparison is unfair to Priestley—to the encounter between Bentley and Collins. The second is his famous obiter dictum that the people had nothing to do with the laws, except to obey them. The third is the profound impression he made in the House of Lords when preaching on the death of Louis XVI., a sermon that struck such solemnity into his hearers that they rose and stood in silent reverence during his peroration. The cynical may reflect that it was not difficult to excite emotion and awe in such a congregation on such a subject at such a time. Certainly the sentence quoted by Mr. Jebb from the sermon would hardly of itself explain the success of the performance. We know, however, from De Quincey that his reputation as a pulpit orator stood remarkably high. But though Bishop Horsley is distinguished from the crowd of Bishops who are known only to diligent students of Church history, by the character of his excursions into politics and debate, his biography has never been written, and Mr. Jebb has conceived a happy idea in collecting and preserving some of the more important facts of the life of his great-grandfather. The book is a sketch rather than a life, but Mr. Jebb explains that the material for such a work is unfortunately very scanty, so that we may be thankful for this memoir of an interesting and striking personality.

An eighteenth-century bishop was never a bishop only. According to his tastes he combined his pastoral duties with pleasure or with scholarship. Some cases fall outside these two categories, such as the case of Bishop Watson of Llandaff, who, not liking the look of his diocese, gave himself up to planting trees and other agricultural pursuits in Westmoreland. He was bishop for thirty-four years, but during the whole of that time he never lived in his diocese, preferring to play the grand seigneur at his country seat. He gave a delightful and sympathetic account of what he called his retirement "from public life," a very different thing, we need hardly say, from retirement from his see, and of his building the palace on the banks of Windermere, where he spent the emoluments of Llandaff for the thirty years of life that remained to him. Bishop Horsley's own diversions were intellectual. He had made a reputation early as a mathematician, as is shown by his appointment as Secretary of the Royal Society in 1773. He was one of the first members of the Essex Head Club, founded by Dr. Johnson; he was a friend of Thurlow, who sent him a treatise on the Aeolian digamma, and he was consulted by Windham on Plato, balloons, the penetrability of matter, and the theory of motion. Canon Overton puts him in the same rank as Bishop Butler, and he was generally recognised by his generation as by far the ablest of the speakers and writers that the Church possessed. He had what the eighteenth century liked and admired particularly, a genius for polemics. In his great encounter with the President of the Royal Society, he was worsted, and he and his friends had to secede. But his more famous controversy with Dr. Priestley over "the corruptions of Christianity," which lasted for several years, brought him great renown, among his admirers being Coleridge and Gibbon. The discussion was treated by contemporaries as a very important public event, and Horsley was regarded as having won a signal victory for the Church, well calculated to arrest a certain drift to Unitarianism that had alarmed the bishops. Thurlow, not much of a practising churchman, said of Horsley's performance that "those who defended the Church ought to be supported by the Church," and gave him a prebendary's stall at Gloucester. This was the beginning of a warm friendship between them, a friendship so cordial that Horsley once asked Thurlow to come and hear him preach. "No," replied the Lord Chancellor, "I hear you talk nonsense enough in the House where I can contradict you and do; but I'll be damned if I come and listen to you where I can't."

Horsley, like Blomfield, was one of the reforming bishops. He set himself to correct some of the abuses of the Church, and among others the abuse of non-residence. Not that Horsley pushed his principles on this point to an unreasonable degree. "I am well aware," he said in one of his charges as Bishop of Rochester, "that many non-residents are engaged in various ways in promoting the general cause of Christianity, and are perhaps doing better service than if they confined themselves to the ordinary labors of the ministry in a country parish. But I will show no connivance to the non-residence of the younger clergy who absent themselves from their parishes for no better purpose than 'to study men' in that manner in which that delightful study is usually pursued by them." It would be strange indeed if the bishop had allowed himself to take too harsh a view of this practice, for it was only on his translation from St. David's to Rochester that he thought it necessary to give up the living of Newington, and, as Mr. Jebb points out, he had been himself at one and the same time Rector of Newington, Rector of Albany, lecturer of St. Martin, domestic chaplain of the Bishop of London, and prebendary of St. Paul's. We do not know whether he would have thought that in accepting the offer of a private tutorship to Lord Guernsey, which involved his residence at Oxford for some years with his pupil, at the time he was Rector of Newington, he was "promoting the general cause of Christianity" more effectively than he could have done in remaining in his own parish. He was perhaps absolved from too nice a self-examination on this point by the form of his attack on the abuses of non-residence. For his main argument was, not that rectors should always live in their parishes, but that they should see that their curates were efficient and well paid.

* "A Great Bishop of One Hundred Years Ago: Being a Sketch of the Life of Samuel Horsley, LL.D., formerly Bishop of St. David's, Rochester, St. Asaph, and Dean of Westminster." By Heneage Horsley Jebb, M.A. Arnold. 5s. net.

Another question on which he felt strongly was the observance of Sunday. The Church was much less indulgent in this regard at the end of the eighteenth century than it had been in the days of Archbishop Cornwallis, whose Sunday routs provoked the intervention and rebuke of George the Third. It was indeed at this time that Sunday began to get on the nerves and consciences of the governing class. Wilberforce considered Percival's conduct in arranging for Parliament to open on Tuesday rather than on Monday almost the most important event of a generation in which war was incessant and the misery of the poor was unspeakable. A more striking reform was that which substituted Tuesday for Easter Monday as the opening day of the Newmarket Races. In the old times the villages on the route used to turn out on Easter Sunday to watch the procession of rich revellers and their gay colors and equipment. Bishop Blomfield had tried hard, when Vicar of Chesterfield, to reform the habits of the aristocracy in this respect, and Bishop Howley addressed the Duke of York on the subject, though without success, for the Duke replied that though it was true that he travelled to the races on Sunday, he always had a Bible and Prayer Book in the carriage. For the changed tone of the aristocracy about Sunday, Wilberforce and his friends had to thank the French Revolution, which scared the upper classes into decorum and gravity. The Annual Register of 1798 described this effect in a naïve passage, which ended thus: "It was a wonder to the lower orders, throughout all parts of England, to see the avenues to the churches filled with carriages. This novel appearance prompted the simple country people to inquire what was the matter." This new zeal was skilfully employed for the defeat of Stanhope's Toleration Bill in 1789, and Horsley helped to overthrow it by the argument that if the barbarous punishments that still survived for those who did not steadily observe Sunday were relaxed, "watermen would ply upon the Thames and hackney coachmen in the streets upon the Lord's day as upon any other under the express sanction of the law."

Horsley was a very vigorous politician with very pronounced views. He was one of the small minority that voted against the Peace of Amiens. On religious questions he cannot be said to have been much in advance of his Church, for, though in common with most of the bishops, he supported the Catholic Relief Bill, he resisted the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, and he opposed Catholic emancipation. He was an ardent supporter of the crusade against the Slave Trade. On domestic politics he was an uncompromising Tory, and voted and spoke for Pitt's measures of coercion. It was during the debates on one of these Bills that he made his famous declaration about the relation of the people to the laws. Lauderdale retorted that such an expression would not have surprised him if it had come from the lips of an Eastern mufti. Horsley rejoined with admirable dialectical effect: "My Lords, the noble Earl is mistaken; the maxim is not calculated for the meridian of Constantinople; the miserable inhabitants under that dismal sky have no law, my Lords, to study or to obey; they have only to obey the changeable will, caprice, or whim of their tyrant." He then went on to contrast with this the state of England, where law was equal and known and liable to no sudden change or perversion. It is difficult to know which to admire more: the audacity of a speaker who could draw that picture in the very act of supporting a series of measures that destroyed all the guarantees of equal law, or the solemn make-believe of a Chamber which could listen to it. Another very interesting passage quoted by Mr. Jebb occurs in an eloquent speech against the Slave Trade, in which Horsley, dealing with the argument that there was not much to choose between the lot of the negro in the West Indies and the English peasant, drew an idyllic picture which the English peasant might have had some difficulty in recognising. But most of Horsley's speeches—and they are very eloquent speeches—were concerned either with what we may describe as domestic or with the foreign policy of the Church. He was first and foremost a great Churchman, and if he represents in his scholarship and attainments the Church of his time at its best, he represents not less truly her bondage to the atmosphere of a class and her absolute separation from the life and interest of the poor.

A SCOTTISH LAWYER.*

THE writer of these Memorials, a book which should be in the hands of every Scotsman, was a notable figure in the Edinburgh of the first half of the last century. A distinguished lawyer and man of letters, he was, says a contemporary, one of the most popular men north of the Tweed. His life (1779-1854) covered an important period of the history of his country—a period whose representative men he knew intimately, and in which he played an honorable part. The Memorials, which appeared two years after his death, took rank at once as a classic; and the new edition, to which his grandson, Mr. H. A. Cockburn, contributes an introduction, and which is illustrated by twelve portraits reproduced in color from paintings by Raeburn, supplies a want of long standing. To some still living it will recall the attack made on the book by Brougham, in the "Law Magazine" (1856) and the exposure of the ex-Chancellor by Alexander Russel, of the "Scotsman," and by the "Edinburgh Review."

Henry Cockburn (Solicitor-General for Scotland 1830; raised to the Bench 1834) was one of the brilliant group of Whig lawyers—a group to which Scotland owes a debt of gratitude not easily exaggerated—who, impatient of the Dundas despotism, threw themselves into the reform movement at a time when to be a Reformer meant professional and social ostracism; and, associated by family with the old, by conviction and sympathy with the new order, formed a link between two sharply conflicting worlds. The Toryism of the day was singularly destitute of ideal elements. In Scotland, at least, it seldom implied anything except a dislike of popular institutions; and even this—history, it seems, is repeating itself—chiefly on grounds of personal advantage: historical and constitutional Toryism was rare. Its distinctive quality was fear—a fear which was so extreme and so general as to deprive brave men of courage and wise men of sense. "We were a' mad, sir," Francis Horner's father used to say when reminded that he was one of the jury that convicted Muir. Nations, like individuals, are liable to fits of insanity; we have seen the same phenomenon, happily on a smaller scale, in the Teutophobia of our own day. Then the French were the enemy:—

"Everything rang, and was connected, with the Revolution in France; which, for above twenty years, was, or was made, the all in all. Everything, not this or that thing, but literally everything, was soaked in this one event. . . . Jacobinism was a term denoting everything alarming and hateful, and every political objector was a Jacobin. No innovation, whether practical or speculative, consequently no political or economical reformer, and no religious dissenter, from the Irish Papist to our own native Protestant Seceder, could escape from this fatal word."

The preservation of the status quo, as such, was the aim of the courts and of the legislature: to suggest the possibility of its improvement was the unpardonable sin. Lord Braxfield's memorable charge in a sedition trial (1793) may be quoted:—

* "Memorials of His Time." By Henry Cockburn. New Edition. T. N. Foulis. 6s. net.

"Two things must be attended to that require no proof: First, that the British Constitution is the best that ever was since the creation of the world, and it is not possible to make it better. . . . What right had they (the non-voters) to representation? He could tell them that the Parliament would never listen to their petition. How could they think it? A Government in every country should be just like a corporation: and in this country it was made up of the landed interest, which alone has a right to be represented. As for the rabble, who have nothing but personal property, what hold has the nation on them? What security for the payment of their taxes? They may pack up all their property on their backs, and leave the country in the twinkling of an eye; but landed property cannot be removed."

Such was the temper of the administration. There was neither public opinion nor popular representation. The self-electing town councils returned the burgh members; the 1,500 or 2,000 freeholders who possessed the county franchise were easily controlled by Dundas, who, personally amiable, and well calculated by talent and manner to make despotism popular, "was the absolute dictator of Scotland, and had means of rewarding submission and of suppressing opposition beyond what were ever exercised in modern times by one person in any portion of the empire." A written test was imposed upon suspects. It was offered in 1793 to the future Lord Corehouse by no less a person than David Hume, the nephew of the historian, then Professor of Scots Law. It was refused; but the young advocate found it expedient to leave the bar for the time being. The issue of political trials was as foregone a conclusion as had been the case under the Stewarts. Braxfield, the Lord Justice Clerk, was "the Jeffreys of Scotland": "indelible iniquities" is the term applied by Cockburn to the trials of 1793-4. Sedition, punishable in England by fine and imprisonment, was dealt with in Scotland by transportation; and words and acts adjudged in Scotland to be sedition were in England, severe as the Government was, not held to be sedition at all. Trial by jury was a farce. Jurymen were sent to the court at the discretion of the Sheriff of their county; and when they got there they were picked for their duty by the presiding judge. "Hoot! just gie me Josie Norrie (the clerk) and a gude jury, and I'll do for the fellow," was the answer of Braxfield to suggested or anticipated doubts. Some of his colleagues, if less savage, were more ridiculous. A more grotesque figure than that of Eskgrave could not be found.

"I heard him, in condemning a tailor to death for murdering a soldier by stabbing him, aggravate the offence thus: 'And not only did you murder him, whereby he was bereaved of his life, but you did thrust, or push, or pierce, or project, or propell the le-thall weapon through the belly-band of his regimental breeches, which were his Majesty's.'"

On another occasion, in sentencing certain persons to death on a charge of hamesucken, he first gave them the etymology of that term; then, having reminded them that they had attacked the house and its inhabitants and robbed them, he came to his climax—"All this you did; and God preserve us! joost when they was setten doon to their denner!" Others, in spite of their oddities, were men of character and ability. Hermand, famous alike for his piety and his potations, could criticise a speech of the future Lord Eldon on a Scottish entail case—"Sir, it's delightful! I could listen to it for ever! But, sir, it's the greatest nonsense! It may do very well for an English Chancellor, but it would disgrace a clerk with us"; and, when a diminutive midshipman, who had accidentally killed his assailant in a street row, at Greenock, was brought up before him on a charge of murder, he indignantly refused "to try a child."

The General Assembly was divided between the Moderates and the Evangelicals, or "High fliers." Politically the former were for the most part Tories, the latter Whigs; for which reason perhaps these rather than those possessed the sympathies of Cockburn, who was before all things a good Whig. But he was influenced by higher than political motives. The supremacy of the Moderates, he thought, meant decadence.

"The descent of the Scotch clergy throughout the last half of the eighteenth century was steady and marked. Not that there were no distinguished men among them; but they were not many, and they were always decreasing. Mouldering in their parishes was their general doom. And the descent proceeded with always increasing velocity. . . . Until Chalmers and his consequences arose, the theological philosophy and eloquence of the Church seemed to be worn out. And no wonder. Nothing can inspire religious duty or animation but religion. A new Presbyterian revolution was approaching which brought out new men, and new dangers, and new popularity, with a necessary elevation of those who shone in it. But about this time the old thing was dead."

The Disruption does not come into the period covered by the Memorials, which ends with 1830; but Cockburn's admiration for the Fathers of the Free Church of Scotland is well known. It did credit no less to his head than to his heart. The standpoint of Gallio has rather the appearance than the reality of statesmanship. Religion is too powerful a force, individual and social, to be ignored by the civil power; the wise ruler is he who foresees, guides, and utilises the enthusiasm of the ruled. For this, sympathy and comprehension are needed. Had Cockburn's attitude to religion been that of the Government of Peel in 1843, or that of Mr. Balfour in 1904, in the one case the break-up of the National Church, in the other a flagrant and mischievous miscarriage of justice would have been avoided. The cynicism of the politician and the pedantry of the lawyer were equally foreign to him: his kindliness and good sense kept him clear of either shoal. The nature of the man is reflected in his book, which, in Russel's words, is "as admirable in its accuracy of narrative as in the genial humor and skilled expression which have gained it a place in the public heart, and will continue for generations to keep the memory of its author fresh and clear."

NOVELS OF MARRIAGE.*

THOSE of our novelists who are well qualified to guide the public through the mazes of "the marriage question," seem to develop a fine sense of strategy in their perilous calling. The public is always ready to enter the enticing maze and follow its baffling windings, on the stipulation that these will merge, finally, in the straight highway of accepted righteousness. This, however, is not necessarily part of the novelists' plan, and, like Mr. Thomas Hardy, they take a malicious pleasure in introducing to our notice characters, virtuous or otherwise, who emerge in happiness from the maze with partners other than those with whom they entered it. The novelists, irritated by the ingenuous demand of their audience for conformity at all costs, are almost perversely fond of discussing difficult cases in matrimonial ethics, and of proving that compulsory virtue is worth nothing. But the struggle to wrest from a British jury a verdict of acquittal does not always make for the integrity of a novelist's art.

We feel this in the case of Mr. Marriott's clever and ingenious novel, "The Intruding Angel." The Cornish hero, Richard Noy, a refined and intellectual man of business, unhappily falls in love with and marries Miss Pauline Roby, a young lady from Lancashire, who is the very pattern of conventional ideals in feelings, morals, and conduct. This lady, who has "no settled belief about anything, but only rules of etiquette about externals," feels that the absence of the spiritual bond in marriage is of no consequence so long as her husband is "good to her" in material ways, and regards "the lover's devotion in a husband as rather silly and slightly improper." After a given period Richard Noy discovers that he and his wife are "married but not united: they touched only at the circumference of their lives"; and the problem to be expounded is what is the relative gravity of the forces that make for the permanency or the disintegration of their social bond. Mr. Marriott, acutely alive to the obstacles placed on a frank treatment of his subject, retaliates by loading the dice. Richard Noy meets the grave, cool, and serious-minded Mrs. Ormiston, who is nursing an invalid husband whose death is near at hand, and he realises that she is the one woman in the world for him; she on her part discovers the same thing. The man and woman agree, however, that their intimacy must be kept within the bounds of a spiritual friendship, and the essential thesis would seem to be an analysis of the emotional strain developed in such a situation, following the aphorism of Bishop Butler: "Things are what they are, and the con-

* "The Intruding Angel." By Charles Marriott. Hurst & Blackett. 6s.

"The Agony Column." By C. A. Dawson Scott. Chapman & Hall. 6s.

FREE TRADERS

Should study and circulate the following important works:—

THE LIFE OF RICHARD COBDEN.

By LORD MORLEY. With a Portrait. Popular edition in 1 vol. Cloth 2s. 6d. net (post free 2s. 10d.).

Jubilee Edition in 2 vols. 7s. the set.

Special Edition in five parts. Paper covers, 6d. net each part.

THE POLITICAL WRITINGS OF RICHARD COBDEN.

New Edition. With Preface by LORD WELBY and Introductions by SIR LOUIS MALLEY and WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT. With Frontispieces. 2 vols. (Reformer's Bookshelf.) Large crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. (post free).

RICHARD COBDEN AND THE JUBILEE OF FREE TRADE.

By P. LEROY-BEAULIEU, HENRY DUNKLEY ("Verax") Dr. THEODOR BARTH, The Right Hon. LEONARD COURTNEY, M.P., and The Right Hon. CHARLES VILLIERS, M.P., with Introduction by RICHARD GOWLING. Uniform in style with the Jubilee Edition of "Richard Cobden." Cr. 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. (post free).

COBDEN AS CITIZEN. A CHAPTER IN MANCHESTER HISTORY.

Being a facsimile of Cobden's pamphlet, "Incorporate Your Borough!" with an Introduction and a complete Cobden Bibliography. By WILLIAM E. A. AXON. 21s. net (post free 21s. 5d.).

SPEECHES ON QUESTIONS OF PUBLIC POLICY.

By RICHARD COBDEN. Edited by JOHN BRIGHT and JAMES E. THOROLD ROGERS. With a Preface by JAMES E. THOROLD ROGERS, and Appreciations by J. E. THOROLD ROGERS and GOLDWIN SMITH, and 2 Photogravure Portraits. Fifth Impression. 2 vols. Large cr. 8vo, cloth. (Uniform with the Jubilee Edition of Morley's "Life of Cobden.") 7s. (post free).

ECONOMIC SOPHISMS OR FALLACIES OF PROTECTION.

By FREDERICK BASTIAT. Containing an Introductory Note by the Right Hon. H. H. ASQUITH, M.P., and a Frontispiece. Cloth 3s. 6d. (post free).

"The cardinal doctrines of Free Trade have never been more cogently presented or more brilliantly illustrated."—Mr. Asquith in the Introductory Note.

BRITISH INDUSTRIES UNDER FREE TRADE.

Essays by various writers. Edited by HAROLD COX. Cloth. (Reformer's Bookshelf.) 3s. 6d. (post free).

THE HUNGRY FORTIES.

An account of Life under the Bread Tax from the letters of Living Witnesses. With an Introduction by Mrs. COBDEN UNWIN. Illustrated (Reformer's Bookshelf.) 3s. 6d. (post free). People's Edition. Paper Covers, 6d. (post free).

COBDEN'S WORK AND OPINIONS.

By LORD WELBY and SIR LOUIS MALLEY. 3d. net (post free 4d.).

PEERS OR PEOPLE?

The House of Lords weighed in the Balance and Found Wanting. By W. T. STEAD. Popular edition, 1s. net (post free 1s. 3d.).

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

By J. WYLIE. Cheap edition. Paper boards, 1s. net. (post free 1s. 2d.).

"A concise and impartial history of the House of Lords."—The Times.

THE GOVERNANCE OF ENGLAND.

By SIDNEY LOW. Popular edition. 3s. 6d. net. (post free 3s. 10d.).

UNWIN'S SOCIOLOGY SERIES.

Paper boards, 1s. net. (post free 1s. 3d.).

INVASION AND CONSCRIPTION.

By J. A. FARRER.

THE LABOUR MOVEMENT.

By J. T. HOBHOUSE. With a preface by the Rt. Hon. R. B. HALDANE.

WOMEN'S WORK AND WAGES.

By EDWARD CADBURY and Others.

A complete list of the volumes in Unwin's Sociology Series will be sent free on request.

PAMPHLETS.

CORN LAW RHYMES AND OTHER VERSES.

By EBENEZER HOWARD. Paper covers, 2d. Cloth limp, 6d. (Postage 1d.).

SIGHTS ON PROTECTION.

The History of a Vanished Industry. By AUSTIN TAYLOR, M. P. Paper covers, 6d.

January Number Ready on 1st.

The Hibbert Journal.

Principal Contents of January Number.

Father Tyrrell: Some Memorials of the last Twelve Years of his Life. By BARON F. VON HUGEL.

George Tyrrell: A Friend's Impressions. By Rev. C. E. OSBORNE.

Tennyson. By Professor HENRY JONES.

Greek Religion and Morality as set forth by Pindar. By Professor EDWARD B. CLAPP.

The Collapse of Liberal Christianity. By the Rev. K. C. ANDERSON, D.D.

Orthodoxy, Heterodoxy, Heresy, and Freedom. By the Rev. P. T. FORSYTH, D.D.

Divoreons! By AN EVANGELICAL LAYMAN.

Grounds of Faith: A Study of Likelihoods. By ALBERT GEHRING.

Faith and Knowledge. By Professor EDUARD KONIG.

Truth in Art and in Religion. By E. F. CARRITT.

Catholicism and Happiness. By the Rev. R. L. GALES.

Savage Supreme Beings and the Bull-Roader. By R. R. MARETT.

Self-Assertion in Nietzsche and Self-Surrender in Boehme. By W. A. ROSS and the Rev. G. W. ALLEN.

Discussions. Reviews. Recent Books and articles.

Single Numbers, 2s. 6d. net.; 2s. 9d. post free.

Subscriptions, Ten Shillings per annum, post free.

JESUS or CHRIST?

BEING THE

HIBBERT JOURNAL SUPPLEMENT for 1909.

Now Ready, nearly 308 pp. super royal 8vo, 5s. net.

Postage inland, 5d.

This volume comprises contributions from the undermentioned writers:—

The Bishop of SOUTHWARK
Canon H. SCOTT HOLLAND
Rev. Father JOSEPH RICKABY, S.J.
The Late Rev. GEORGE TYRRELL
Rev. Principal A. E. GARVIE, D.D.
Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL, M.A.
Professor B. W. BACON, D.D.
Rev. JAMES DRUMMOND, D.D.
Rev. Principal J. E. CARPENTER, D.D.
Sir OLIVER LODGE
Professor HENRY JONES
Professor PERCY GARDNER
Mr JAMES COLLIER
Professor H. WEINEL
Professor P. SCHMIEDEL
Professor NATHAN SODERBLOM (Upsala)

Just Published. Crown 8vo, Cloth. 5s. net; postage 4d.

SCIENCE, MATTER, AND IMMORTALITY.

By RONALD CAMPBELL MACFIE, M.A., M.B., C.M.,
Author of "The Romance of Medicine," "Air and Health," etc.

Prof. J. ARTHUR THOMSON, in "The British Weekly,"—"We are continually in need of having the history retold, since each great discovery makes it new. For this reason alone we should welcome Dr. Macfie's story of the becoming of things, for he has got a grip of modern researches and sees their bearing on past evolution, but we find a stronger reason in the way the story is told. There is a glow about it that we miss in most expositions of the great process, which discuss the stages in the unfolding with palaeontological solemnity."

From the First Review.—"As a general compilation of the achievements and limitations of Science it is altogether admirable, and we know no work of recent date better fitted to give the non-expert some idea of the new knowledge. A man who has read it with any care will have quite as much knowledge of recent Science as anyone, not a specialist, need require, and he will find, besides, much that is stimulating to speculation on what Science in the future is likely to achieve."—From a Leader in Globe.

Crown Theological Library. New Volumes.

MODERNITY AND THE CHURCHES.

By Prof. PERCY GARDNER, Litt. D., Oxford.

Just Ready. Crown 8vo, 5s.

THE OLD EGYPTIAN FAITH.

By Prof. EDOUARD NAVILLE.

Translated by Rev. Colin Campbell, M.A., M.D.

Just Ready. Illustrated. 5s.

LIFE OF THE SPIRIT.

By RUDOLF EUCKEN, D.D., Prof. of Philosophy in Jenä.

Third Edition at Press.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

Ready. Crown 8vo, 6s.

NATURALISM AND RELIGION.

By RUDOLF OTTO, Professor of Theology in the University of Gottingen.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,

14 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

sequences of them will be what they will be; why then should we desire to be deceived?" For purposes of his own, however, Mr. Marriott keeps Richard and Mrs. Ormiston calmly marking time, both acting as angels of pity and forbearance to their respective spouses, while the doll-like Pauline is seen succumbing to the wiles of a degenerate and parasitic young man called Lindsay. Now we humbly submit that the episode of Pauline's convenient infidelity, however ingenious, is untrue to her type of character. Pauline, conventionally proper in all her ideas, is in love with her comfortable surroundings, her charming house, her smart furniture, and her fashionable wardrobe. She accepts her husband, too, in her shallow, soulless fashion, and she would have stuck too tightly to her place in society to jeopardise it for the sake of a corrupt young man who has nothing of value to offer her in exchange. Mr. Marriott's ingenious plea is that Pauline had been "taken unawares. . . . Flattered and flustered, and, for all she knew, compromised, between fear and anxiety to get rid of Lindsay without discovery, her yielding was hardly a matter of will. . . . She had not meant to betray Richard, and, evidently, in her opinion, the absence of passion was in itself an excuse." This may appear clever, but it is exceedingly thin. The more we scrutinise the episode, the more clearly we perceive that once the brilliant idea of putting the Philistines technically, as well as spiritually, in the wrong, has flashed on the author, the less has he been able to resist the temptation to solve the problem of securing his hero's and heroine's happiness by artistically illegitimate means. Lindsay's contemptible figure has been created solely for this end—that by sinning with him Pauline and all her suburban gods of external propriety should be put out of court. And, of course, so far as the worldly verdict is concerned, Richard has already won his case. It is only a matter of Richard's divorcing his erring wife, and of Mrs. Ormiston's invalid husband dying, for the hero and heroine to be free, and then no one can say them nay.

You cannot, however, load your dice with impunity. The tricky manœuvre which puts Richard in the right destroys our interest in the position. Mr. Marriott has placed himself in the dilemma of trying in the same breath to play to the gallery and to the select few, and the compromise he adopts is unsatisfactory. Should Richard divorce his wife, the story is at an abrupt end; should he forgive her, he will be given no further opportunity of escape. Another ingenious situation is therefore created. Pauline has a baby, and it is demonstrated that the child is not Richard's. Richard, of course, again behaves with the utmost charity and forbearance, though he declines to live with Pauline, and it is only then that Mr. Marriott feels that his hero has accumulated sufficient capital in virtue to enable him to follow his inclinations. Mr. Ormiston dies, precisely at the right moment, and after the delay that decency demands, Richard and Mrs. Ormiston leave together, en route for Paris, divorce proceedings being foreshadowed on the last page. Now if "The Intruding Angel" as an artistic dish leaves a perplexing aftertaste, it is due to the fact that the cookery is bound to be sophisticated. Richard is not a man: he is a bundle of special pleadings put together to support a thesis.

In "The Agency Column," Mrs. Dawson Scott, whose patient and restrained work in fiction has, we are glad to see, received general recognition since the appearance of "The Story of Anna Beames," promises better than she performs. The suggestiveness of life is certainly conveyed in her thoughtful pages, but also its discursiveness and inconsequence. And this, we imagine, springs from the spiritual theme she has chosen to handle being deficient in drama. The problem presented to us is, again, a marriage that leads to the bitterness and alienation of both husband and wife, but in the case of Colonel and Mrs. Morgan there seems no conclusion to be drawn except that they were spiritually unmade from the first, and that in consequence "the pair are like blind children stumbling over a stony road, and unable either of them to help or direct the other." Colonel Morgan is an honest, everyday kind of man, of proven courage and probity, but dry and bleak, narrow in his intellectual outlook and arid in his sympathies. He has had a bitter love disappointment in youth, and has chosen Frances, a beautiful and idealistic girl of nineteen, for a union of suitability and convenience. But he has failed to wake her love. Little by little he has slipped into being the companion of some dreary years of moderate discord, a companion of whom she has become utterly weary. The subtle selfishness of the woman's idealist nature is well indicated by her failure to win the love of her little daughter, Madge. She lives for herself, restless and unhappy, chafing openly or in secret against the loveless conditions of her life, and it is impossible to see how her marriage could have developed in her true spiritual happiness.

In the early stages of her story, Mrs. Dawson Scott holds our attention, and the social background, in which move the cheery and competent figures of Frances's sister, Mrs. Field, and her jolly husband, Tom, who twenty years ago have chosen poverty and a love match, is most actual. But with the introduction of Theodore Higham, the ardent youth of Jewish extraction, who falls in love with Frances, and attempts to rescue her from her environment, a certain haziness steals over the story. An exceeding sharpness of dissection is called for in the exact shades of feeling of the three people concerned, and the author, if she will forgive the suggestion, would appear to be writing without any direct contact with her characters. The scenes of Frances's dismissal of her lover, and of her own retreat, with her child, to her father's country house, Trenowan, bring on the stage several sets of characters who have nothing to do with the essential situation. It is here that the author fails in artistic co-ordination of the parts of her novel, rather than in any weakness of handling. And though the critic can lay his finger on no apparent falsity or insincerity in the treatment, the situation seems disappointing in the sequel, through the drama itself dragging on lamely to a finish without a solution.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

As an introduction to the facsimile edition of the four Shakespeare folios, published by Messrs. Methuen, the same publishers have issued a handsome volume called "The Shakespeare Folios and Quartos: A Study in the Bibliography of Shakespeare's Plays, 1594-1685," by Mr. A. W. Pollard. The object of the work is to show that the Elizabethan printers and publishers of Shakespeare were not as bad as they have been painted, and that "the pirated editions are few and clearly distinguishable from the honest ones, and they have left no trace whatever on our present texts." Mr. Pollard combats the view held by Mr. Sidney Lee and other Shakespearean scholars that the text of the First Folio is based upon earlier pirated texts, modified by more or less perfect transcripts which had passed into private hands, the editing being done clumsily and without care. Mr. Pollard's theory is that there is no necessity for postulating the existence of such private transcripts and that the arrangement of the plays in the First Folio, far from being haphazard, is due to a careful editorial plan. The editors, he thinks, took less interest in plays that had been already printed, and placed the unprinted plays in all the important positions—the new plays being placed at the beginning and end of each section and the old "hidden away in the middle." The Histories were arranged in the chronological order of the kings, but the arrangement of the Tragedies gives Mr. Pollard more trouble to explain. His discussion of the editorial methods of Heminges and Condell may seem rather fanciful, but deserves the consideration of textual critics. More important is his marshalling of his general arguments regarding the care taken by editors of Folios and Quartos alike, and his classification of the Quartos into good and bad. He has in this carried the criticism of Shakespeare's text a step forward and opened up several interesting questions. The chapter called "The Quartos of 1619" deserves especial notice. It contains fresh materials of great value, brought to light by the labors of both Mr. Pollard and Mr. W. W. Greg, regarding the dates on some of the quartos. The book is illustrated by reproductions of the title-pages of Quartos and Folios, and gives a mass of other bibliographical information. Mr. Pollard is to

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LISTTHE GLADSTONE CENTENARY

THE LIFE OF

William Ewart Gladstone

BY JOHN MORLEY.

In 3 Vols. 8vo. 42s. net.

POPULAR EDITION. In 2 Vols. 8vo. 5s. net each.

Trans-Himalaya:

Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet. By Dr. SVEN HEDIN. With 388 Illustrations from Photographs, Water-Colour Sketches, and Drawings by the Author, and 10 maps. 2 vols. 8vo. 30s. net.

2nd IMPRESSION.

In the Grip of the Nyika.

Further Adventures in British East Africa. By Lieut.-Col. J. H. PATTERSON, D.S.O. Author of "The Man-Eaters of Tsavo." With Illustrations, 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Light Come, Light Go.

Gambling—Gamblers—Wagers—The Turf. By RALPH NEVILL. With 9 Colour Plates and other Illustrations. 8vo, 15s. net.

THOMAS HARDY.

Time's Laughingstocks and Other Verses.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.
The Times—"There have been a good many volumes of poetry published this year; but has there been one that surpasses or equals this in the indefinable quality of greatness by which human productions survive?"

The Rhythm of Modern Music.

By C. F. ABDY WILLIAMS. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

A Project of Empire.

A Critical Study of the Economics of Imperialism, with special reference to the Ideas of ADAM SMITH. By J. SHIELD NICHOLSON, M.A., D.Sc., F.B.A. Professor of Political Economy in the University of Edinburgh. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Macmillan's Guide to Egypt and the Sudan. Including a Description of the Route through Uganda to Mombasa. With 35 Maps and Plans. Sixth Edition, 5s. net.

Mexico. The Wonderland of the South. By W. E. CARSON. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 10s. net.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

The Education of Uncle Paul.

Algernon Blackwood,

Author of "Jimbo," &c.

Robert Emmet. An Historical Romance.

Stephen Gwynn.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription 16s.

TRAMPING IN PALESTINE. By HARRY A. FRANCK.AFTERWARD. A Story. By EDITH WHARTON.

Author of "The House of Mirth."

THE CREATORS: A Comedy. III. A Novel.

By MAY SINCLAIR.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,

LISTS SENT POST FREE. 53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

The 1s. Illustrated Bible, 1s. 3d. post free. The Red Letter Bible, from 5s. 4d.
The Indexed Salvation New Testament, 1s. 6d. post free. [post free.
The Red Letter New Testament, 1s., 1s. 6d. post free.
The Sunday School Prize Bible, with Coloured Illustration, 1s. 6d. post free.
Wide Margin Reference Bibles, from 3s. 9d. post free.
The Self-Explanatory Teachers' Bible, 12s. 6d., 15s., and 21s. post free.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME V. OF THE NATION

Will be ready shortly and may be had free, on application to the Manager.

THE ENGLISH REVIEW

MONTHLY.

2s. 6d.

CONTENTS OF JANUARY NUMBER:—

MODERN POETRYLETTERS FROM AMERICA

(II)

C. Lowes Dickinson

BLOOD OF WOMAN

Austin Harrison

COLOUR MEANINGS OF SOME BRITISH BIRDS AND QUADRUPEDS

Philip Oyster

"MAMKA"

J. Saturin

TWO ESSAYS

Elizabeth Martindale

LUCY EVANS (II)

Gilbert Cannan

THE WIFE OF ALTAMONT
(II)

Violet Hunt

THE MONTH

Editorial

SOCIAL PARASITISM

J. A. Hobson

THE CONTENDING FORCESProfessor L. T. HobhouseREVIEW

R. A. Scott-James

Subscription—One Year 30s.; Three Months 7s. 6d.

CHAPMAN & HALL, Ltd., 11, Henrietta Street, W.C.

BOOKS FOR THOUGHTFUL READERS.

JUST ISSUED. THE 1s. Cr. 8vo. 6s. net.

PRINCE OF DESTINY.

A Romance. By SARATH KUMAR GHOSH, Author of "1001 Indian Nights." A presentment of INDIA BY AN INDIAN, with its eternal patience, religious fervour, and PASSIONATE LOVE.

INDIA HELD BY THE SWORD (?)

This statement so often made in the British press is shown in this book to arouse Indian resentment and to cause BRITAIN'S PROBABLE LOSS OF INDIA.

The Daily Telegraph says: "Enthralling... A treat provided only by the most skilful of novelists."

The Outlook says: "An Epic of dreams... Stirrs the imagination and quickens the pulse."

Liverpool Post says: "... The reader who turns the first page will read to the end."

Bookman says: "We have read no book in which the very atmosphere of India is so wonderfully reproduced."

Observer says: "Sheer enchantment... A real study of British India. Written by a gentleman."

Just issued. Demy 8vo, Cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

PROGRESSIVE REDEMPTION.

The Catholic Church, its Functions and Offices in the World reviewed in the Light of the Ancient Mysteries and Modern Science.

By Rev. HOLDEN E. SAMPSON.

Author of "Progressive Creation" (see below).

This book is of profound interest and importance to Theologians, Clergymen, as well as Ministers of all Denominations and religious THINKERS and workers generally. It presents a new and extremely important view of the Incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the Virgin birth, that connects the Catholic Doctrine with its scientific interpretation. A book peculiarly appropriate for the Clergy and Ministers who are at this season contemplating the subject of the Incarnation.

Now ready. Two demy 8vo. vols. Cloth 21s. net.

PROGRESSIVE CREATION.

A Reconciliation of Religion with Science.

By Rev. HOLDEN E. SAMPSON.

A book that has confessedly baffled the reviewers, and of which Mr. Arthur E. Waite has said, "It is of the quality of Revelation."

Just issued. Demy 8vo. 4½ pp. 7s. 6d. net.

SCIENTIFIC IDEALISM:

Or Matter and Force, and their relation to Life and Consciousness. By WILLIAM KINGSLAND. Author of "The Mystic Quest," "The Esoteric Basis of Christianity," &c.

"Mr. Kingsland's work is well worth study, and that by men of all theologies, or of none. He is a man of wide knowledge." Christian World.

Descriptive Circulars of these and other

LONDON:
REBMAN, Ltd.,

Important Books sent on application.

129 Shaftesbury Ave,
W.C.
and all Librarians, etc.

be congratulated on the value of the new material he has brought to the study of Shakespeare, on the suggestiveness of his theories, and on the courtesy with which he treats those whose views he attempts to disprove.

* * *

"THE OLD TESTAMENT IN THE LIGHT OF THE RELIGION OF BABYLONIA AND ASSYRIA," by J. Evans Thomas, B.D. (Black, 3s. 6d.), is intended to present to the ordinary reader a fairly comprehensive idea of the recent discoveries made on the banks of the Tigris and the Euphrates. It is also intended to show the extent to which the Old Testament writers were indebted to the Babylonians and Assyrians. In the Biblical stories of the creation, the fall of man, the Sabbath, the deluge, the tower of Babel, we find ourselves amidst a circle of ideas which present many similarities to the ideas of the Assyrians and Babylonians. The resemblances are in many cases so striking that we are compelled to regard these ancient Semitic conceptions as having a common origin. Even the laws of Moses have a new light shed upon them by the ancient code of Hammurabi, which long preceded it in time. It is probable that many of the festivals in the ancient Hebrew calendar are of Babylonian origin. The Babylonian ritual and the internal arrangements of the Babylonian temples present many points of similarity to the Hebrew temples and forms of worship; and Professor Sayce goes so far as to say that the Temple of Solomon was little more than a reproduction of the Babylonian sanctuary. When we examine the sacred literature of the Babylonians we find that it resembles the psalms and prophetic books of the Old Testament:—

"Dissolve my sin," cries the Babylonian worshipper, "my iniquity, my transgression, and my offence.
Forgive my transgression, accept my supplication.
Secure my deliverance, and let me be loved and carefully tended.
Guide my footsteps in the light, that among men I may gloriously seek my way."

Mr. Thomas has done a very useful piece of work in his little volume, and it is to be hoped that his book will be widely read.

* * *

"LETTERS FROM THE PENINSULA, 1808-1812," by Lieut.-General Sir William Warre, edited by his nephew, Dr. Edmond Warre (Murray, 10s. 6d. net), can hardly be said to add much of interest to what has already been written about Wellington's campaigns in Spain and Portugal. But the contemporary account of stirring events by one who has taken an active part in them has nearly always a value and a freshness denied to even the most conscientious of later chroniclers. For this reason the letters written by Sir William Warre to his parents are well worth publishing. They do not form a connected narrative of events in the Peninsula, but this gap is filled in by Dr. Warre's brief introductions to each chapter. The author of the letters was born at Oporto, and his knowledge of Portuguese helped to secure him the post of A.D.C., first to General Ferguson, and after that officer's return to England, to Marshal Beresford. He was appointed to organise the Portuguese troops, helped to raise the armed peasantry in the province of Minho, and was present at the battles of Ciudad Rodrigo, Badajos, and Salamanca. In 1813 he was appointed lieutenant-colonel in the English Army and resigned his Portuguese commission. The letters show a great admiration for Marshal Beresford, whom the writer praises for his "unremitted exertions and Herculean labor," and defends against the charge of severity. Though mainly concerned with military operations, their chief interest for most readers will lie in the side-lights they throw upon the mind of the camp and the attitude of Portuguese, Spaniards, and Englishmen towards one another.

* * *

THE misdeeds of sundry past directors and trustees of the National Gallery have constantly been proclaimed—their good works less constantly. For the sake of fairness, therefore, we welcome such a volume as "The National Gallery Lewis Bequest" (Allen, 5s.), compiled by Mr. M. W. Brockwell, which shows the judgment and taste exercised in the administration of, at any rate, one pecuniary gift for the purchase of pictures. The Lewis Fund of £10,000 was bequeathed in 1863, and is a long way the oldest of such private bequests. If it had been used for nothing else, the acquirement of the works by Alfred Stevens, which are now at Millbank, would alone have sufficed to make the donor's name remembered with gratitude; but the representative character of the purchases is shown in the list (with biographical notices of the painters) here published. The latter part of the book includes an appendix, with tables, showing the relative importance of the National Gallery in regard to Italian pictures, to other European galleries. The main result of these tables is to prove that in the quantity of such pictures the National Gallery is second to the Siena Gallery alone, while a qualitative analysis reveals our Gallery as easily first. In the matter of Italian pictures in private collections, also, we still enjoy a more than comfortable lead, notwithstanding the recent energetic purchasing by agents of American millionaires. Mr. Brockwell deserves well of the connoisseurs of this country, and his book should serve as an appeal to their patriotism to preserve a fine heritage of art treasures, if not to augment it.

* * *

MR. HERBERT PRESTON-THOMAS'S "The Work and Play of a Government Inspector" (Blackwood, 10s. 6d. net) gives us the reminiscences of a cultivated and humorous civil servant who has done good service in his profession and also found time to do journalistic work and to make his appearance as an author. He gained a place in the Privy Council Office when Charles Greville was retiring, and his successor, Sir Arthur Helps, was not yet appointed. Of both of these, as well as of Palmerston, Mr. Preston-Thomas tells some good anecdotes, though those culled during his later experience as Inspector of Workhouses are the best in the volume. The following is new to us and well worth quoting: A mother, imbued with orthodox opinions as to future punishment, came quite seriously to a lady responsible for the Sunday School in order to complain that her child was taught that there was "No 'ell.'" The explanation was found in the fact that the children had been singing a carol with the chorus—

"No-el, No-el,
Born is the King of Israel."

Mr. Preston-Thomas's administration as a Workhouse Inspector seems to have been guided by what are generally classed as "C. O. S." principles, mitigated in some degree by a fund of natural kindness.

* * *

It is no disparagement to Mr. Stewart Dick's writing to say that it is of subsidiary interest to Mrs. Allingham's pictures in "The Cottage Homes of England" (Arnold, 21s. net). He shows a knowledge both of the English countryside and of the best that has been written about it, and he gives an admirable account of the evolution of the cottage from its beginnings to the time of its artistic splendor in Tudor and Stuart days. There is besides a chapter on old village life and its festivities. Mrs. Allingham is so well known as a painter of English cottages and country that nothing needs to be said in praise of her pictures. Mr. Dick points out that in the sixty or more illustrations to this volume there is not a single dark or lowering sky. "The old twisted beams could be made to look grim and terrible, the building unutterably sad in its decay. But her pictures have always a green and smiling old age." This cheerfulness, as well as the artist's evident sympathy, makes "The Cottage Homes of England" one of the pleasantest color-books of the season.

* * *

THE Clarendon Press issues the two last volumes of Mr. J. C. Smith's edition of Spenser's "Poetical Works." These contain the "Faerie Queen," the text of which, as now presented, is based upon a fresh collation of the Quartos of 1590 and 1596 and the Folio of 1609. The whole text of the 1596 Quarto is given, as in every case where Mr. Smith adopts another reading he places the variant of 1596 in the notes. The differences between the Quartos are nearly always trifling, but Mr. Smith has recorded them with punctilious exactness. The volumes are printed in an excellent type, and this edition of Spenser is one to delight the book-lover

CHAIRMAN: To those qualities of fine flavour and aroma that one requires for real enjoyment in smoking it adds the unusual attribute of coolness.

Whether smoked much or little it is always cool, always pleasing and burns evenly to the last shred.

BOARDMAN'S is the same tobacco milder, and

RECORDER the same, but fuller flavoured.

6d. per oz. from
all tobacconists.

R. J. LEA, MANCHESTER.

Hints on taking a cold

Not on how to take a cold: but on how to take a cold in time!

Everybody can catch cold; nothing is easier in this climate; but it is not everybody who knows how to avoid one. Yet it is quite simple.

If you suspect a cold is coming, take a

Mustard Bath

a bath to which a couple of table-spoonfuls or so of COLMAN'S MUSTARD have been added.

Colman's mustard

The Daily News YEAR BOOK.

PREFACE BY

The Rt. Hon. D. Lloyd George.

ON SALE EVERYWHERE.

Price 6d. net.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposits repayable on demand.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

TOURS.R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE."*£12 12s. OPORTO, GIBRALTAR, TANGIER, ALGIERS, PALERMO, February 15th.£26 5s. PALESTINE, EGYPT, CONSTANTINOPLE, GREECE, March 3rd.

Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, N.W.

£7 7s. —SKI-ING, SKATING, TOBOGGANNING TOURS, including Second-Class Return Ticket and Accommodation Hotel Aubepine, Ballaigues. Also Hotels at Mantana, Villars. St. Beatenberg, Wengen, Lenzerheide, etc. — Secretary, 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, S.W.

BOOKSELLERS.J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and StudentsBOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

GLAISHER'S DECEMBER CATALOGUES OF PUBLISHER'S REMAINDERS AND BOOKS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS are now ready, and will be sent post free on application.

These TWO CATALOGUES include many ENTIRELY NEW REMAINDERS in General Literature: also a large and wide selection of well-illustrated and attractive books for the young, suitable for Christmas Presents.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., Remainder and Discount Bookseller, 265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.LAMLEY & CO., Discount Booksellers and Publishers,

1, 3, 7, EXHIBITION ROAD, S.W.,

Invite inspection of their large and varied stock.

INTERESTING AND OUT-OF-THE-WAY BOOKS.

DOMESTIC EXPERIMENTS, and other Plays.

By I. E. MAITKEN. Square 16mo, 2s. 6d. net.

"Entertaining bits of fashionable fooling."—Scotsman."Bright and amusing short plays for amateurs."—Queen.EDUCATIONAL.*ST. GEORGE'S WOOD, HASLEMERE, SURREY.

COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Sandy Soil. 600 feet above sea level.

Healthy outdoor life, combined with thorough education on modern lines. Usual curriculum, including citizenship course, extension lectures, &c. Preparation when required for University and other careers. Handicrafts, gardening, riding, nature study, archaeology, &c.

Principal: Miss AMY KEMP.

CHANCERY MOUNT SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, BISHOP'S STORTFORD.

Head Mistress: Miss ESTHER CASE, M.A., Dublin (Class, Tripes, Camb.)

Second Mistress: Miss ESTERBROOK HICKS, B.Sc., London.

A limited number of boarders received.

EDUCATIONAL.THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER. Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For Prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

Spring Term commences January 14th.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the Bursar.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE, BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal, F. W. Aveling, M.A., B.Sc.

Preparation for London Matriculation 1st Class College of Preceptors, and Entrance to Oxford or Cambridge.

TANGLEWOOD, BARNT GREEN, THE LICKEY HILLS, Near Birmingham.BOARDING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

On approved Modern Lines. Thorough Education with individual care and character training. Games, gardening, and open air life in lovely country with bracing air. Good train service on main line. Escorts provided.

Principal - - MISS EBBUTT, M.A.

(Newnham College, Cambridge—Trinity College, Dublin.)

TETTENHALL COLLEGE, STAFFORDSHIRE.

500 feet above Sea Level.

Headmaster—R. L. AGER, M.A. (Rugby and Corpus Christi College, Oxford).

FREE CHURCH PUBLIC SCHOOL.CROYDON. Croham Hurst School for Girls.

House built for the purpose in healthy and beautiful situation. Limited number of girls taken. Thorough education on modern lines. Special encouragement given to reading and leisure pursuits, and to interest in current movements.

Hockey, Tennis, &c., &c. Swimming. Riding. Much outdoor life.

Principals { THEODORA E. CLARK.
K. M. ELLIS.STRAMONGATE BOYS' SCHOOL, KENDAL.

A Boarding School for Boys.

Founded by the Society of Friends in Kendal.

A strong staff—leisure-time pursuits—school journeys—good games—gymnastics—a magnificent country district.

The school has doubled itself in the last five years.

Prospectus, School Magazine, etc., from WILFRED SESSIONS, B.Sc., Headmaster.

ROYAL HOLLOWAY COLLEGE.

(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.)

The LENT TERM BEGINS on JANUARY 13th, 1910. The College prepares Students for the London Degrees in Science and Arts.

TWELVE ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, from £50 to £60 a year, and a certain number of Bursaries of not more than £30, tenable for three years, will be offered for COMPETITION in June, 1910.

Inclusive fee £100 a year.

For further particulars, apply to the SECRETARY, Royal Holloway College, Englefield Green, Surrey.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL.

HEAD MASTER:—ARTHUR ROWNTREE, B.A. (Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History and Practice of Education Cantab.)

*Preparation for Universities.Citizenship Course. Leisure Hour Work.

The Spring Term begins on January 18th.

For prospectus, etc., apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Bathrooms on every Floor,
Lounges and Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading,
Billiard and Smoking Rooms.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) Single from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. WILD, C.C., Man. Direc.,
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71 Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) Hotel. Close Pier; 1st Class; moderate

SILVER HOW.. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30/- week

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS PRIVATE HOTEL (en pension). Tel. 199. Mrs. F. Sara

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House. Sussex Gdns. 5/- day

HADDON HALL. Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day

EDINBURGH.

ROYAL HOTEL (MacGregor's). Scotland's leading Hotel

GREAT YARMOUTH.

MELTON LODGE RESIDENTIAL MANSION. Facing Sea. 10/- per day

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL 120 rooms. Facing Sea

KEARSLEY (FARNWORTH), S.O. LANCS.

CHURCH HOTEL. Bowling Green and Cheap Refreshments

LANCASTER.

BOAR'S HEAD HOTEL. Wm. McIntosh

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE. 2 minutes' walk from either station

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone 3032 Royal, 3 wires

LLANDUDNO.

The WHITE HORSE Boarding Estab., centre of Prom., facing sea

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LYNTON (Devon).

ROYAL CASTLE FAMILY HOTEL. Grounds 9 acres

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & Manager—J. Wilson

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S HYDRO. Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links (18 holes)

NELSON.

RAMSDEN'S HOTEL and Restaurant. One Minute from Station

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boar's Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, &c., Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles

SOUTHPORT.

KENWORTHY'S HYDRO. Near Pier, Lord St., Band and Illuminations. Turkish, Electric. Hydropathic, &c., Baths & Treatment

ROWNTREE'S CAFE, Lord St., Hot Luncheons, Aft'noon Teas, Tel. 647

ROCKLEY HYDRO. Electric and other baths; Excellent cuisine.
Lift. Near Golf Links. From 7s. per day. Tel. 422.

HOGHTON HOTEL. The Cyclist's Home. Tel. 506. J. Hough, Prop

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt

The Strange Disappearance of a Baronet—

an eerie and whimsical story by ALGERNON BLACKWOOD
—will appear in this week's issue of

The Saturday Westminster,

which will be a SPECIAL LITERARY NUMBER enlarged to TWENTY PAGES.

Other Special Contributions to the issue will be

THE NEXT DOOR BABY: by Mrs. Neish.FOREIGN AFFAIRS: by G. A. B. Dewar.AN AMUSING STUDY BY "SAKI."

And in addition there will be

Special Articles on Christmas and Gift Books,
Reviews of the Season's Books, F. C. G.'s
Cartoons, and all the usual features.

'Saturday Westminster,' November 27th.

OFFICES: Salisbury Square, Fleet Street, E.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION
Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE NATION
PUBLISHING Co. LTD., and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book
sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—
Gordon and Gotch.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions
are received.

By their Measures which is the greatest man?

Only illusion!

In the above Silhouette Lansdowne does not appear so tall as Lloyd George, nor he so tall as Asquith, but if measured they will all be found of equal height.
N.B.—No other equality is to be inferred.

The Nation

VOL. VI., No. 14.]
Registered as a Newspaper.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, 1910.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K. ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	553	LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		Irish Liberals and the Govern-
The Appeal to the Moderate		ment. By W. J. Johnston ...	571
Man ...	556	The Creation of the Peers. By
The Social Programme of		"Lex" ...	572
Liberalism ...	557	Balzac on Free Trade. By
The Allies ...	558	S. D. S. ...	573
The Inevitable Duke ...	559	Forceful Feeding. By J. A.
From Armed Truce to		Salter and R. Nash ...	573
Arrangement ...	560	The Falsity of the Plebiscite.
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		J. L. Baldi ...	574
The Moral of the Hoardings ...	562	Making the Foreigner Pay.
The Art of Spending ...	563	By S. R. ...	574
"A Nation once again" ...	564	"The Blue Bird." By M. B. L.	575
On Playing-cards ...	565	Food Taxes, Widows, and
SHORT STUDIES:—		Pensioners. By A. W. Findlay	575
A Home-made Religion. By		POETRY:—
Mark Rutherford ...	566	New Year Verses. By C. H.
ART:—		Herford ...	575
A Pastel Portraitist ...	567	REVIEWS:—
PRESENT DAY PROBLEMS:—		The Ideas of the French Revo-
The Psychology of "Conver-		lution ...	576
sion." By Sidney Low ...	568	The Cults of the Greek States.
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—		By Dr. A. M. Fairbairn ...	577
How German Workers Live.		Some Errors of a Theorist ...	577
By Ed. Bernstein ...	569	A City of Italy ...	578
COMMUNICATIONS:—		Tales of Overseas ...	580
Australia and the Rejection of		BOOKS IN BRIEF:—
the Budget. By C. H. Chomley	570	Lady Hester Stanhope ...	582
		The Dauphines of France ...	582
		The Aberdeen Doctors ...	582
		Christians at Mecca ...	584
		The Dook's Doomsday Book ...	584
		THE WEEK IN THE CITY. By
		Janus ...	584

